Serj. Thompson. My lord, we would open this piece of evidence before we read it, that it may be understood, and we shall prove it to be my lord's hand afterwards. It consists of many heads and particulars, without order or method, and seems to be no more than memorandums made by my lord Preston, to put him in mind what he was to enlarge upon when he came thither.

L. C. J. Holt. Well, Gentlemen, have you any more evidence?

Serj. Tremain. My lord, we shall now prove these papers to be my lord Preston's own hand. Pray call Mr. Warr, Mr. Townesend, Sir Henry Johnson, and Mr. Bland.

Mr. Townesend sworn.

Serj. Thompson. Pray shew Mr. Townesend that paper. (Which was done) Pray, Sir, whose hand writing is that?

Mr. Townesend. I believe this to be my lord Preston's hand: I did not see him write it.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Are you well acquainted with my lord Preston's hand?

Townesend. I have seen his lordship's hand sometimes.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. How often?

Townesend. Not very often, but I have seen it sometimes.

Serj. Thompson. Pray were you clerk in any office?

Townesend. Yes, I am in the office of the great wardrobe, where I have had occasion to see his lordship's hand sometimes, and I believe this to be his hand.

Serj. Thompson. Look upon the other two.

Townesend. I do believe these three papers are my lord Preston's hand.

Serj. Tremain. Those are the three papers that have been read last, which he says are my lord's hand.

Townesend. I do believe it, Sir.

Serj. Tremain. Pray look upon that paper, with the little one within it; do you know whose hand that is?

Townesend. I did not see it written, Sir.

Serj. Tremain. Do you believe you know who writ it by the hand?

Townesend. The latter part looks like my lord Preston's hand; but I cannot well say any thing to the other, it is written so small.

Serj. Tremain. Then swear Mr. Bland.

[Which was done.]

Serj. Thompson. Give him the papers. We ask you, Mr. Bland, whether you were well acquainted with my lord Preston's hand?

Bland. I have seen my lord's hand sometimes.

Serj. Thompson. Have you looked upon those papers, Sir?

Bland. Yes, I have.

Serj. Thompson. Pray whose hand are they?

Bland. I do believe these three papers are my lord Preston's hand-writing.

Serj. Tremain. Then we pray Mr. Warr may be sworn. [Which was done.]

Serj. Thompson. Do you know my lord Preston's hand?

Warr. I have seen my lord Preston write, but not very often; most commonly it was only his name: But I have seen him write some letters too.

Serj. Tremain. Pray, Sir, look upon those papers; whose hand are they, do you believe?

Warr. This paper seems to be like my lord Preston's hand; the other I cannot say much of, because that which I commonly saw him write was a large fair hand, and this is a little hand.

Serj. Tremain. Pray, Mr. Warr, look upon these seals; whose seals were they?

Warr. I believe the seals to be my lord Preston's: one of them was his seal when secretary of state.

Serj. Thompson. You were under him in that office, were you not?

Warr. Yes, my lord, I was.

Serj. Tremain. Now, my lord, we have done with our evidence, and shall rest here till we hear what my lord Preston says to it.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord Preston, you have heard what has been said concerning the matter you have been indicted for: What has your lordship to say for yourself?

L. C. J. Pollexfen. If the gentlemen of the jury desire to see the seals, they may have them. [The Seals were shewn to the Jury.]

Sol. Gen. My lord, we have done for the present.

L. C. J. Holt. Then if your lordship please, you may make your defence.

L. Preston. My lord, in the first place I must refer myself again to my Indictment, for I find, my lord, that the treasons of which I am accused, were none of them done in the county of Middlesex, and they are laid to be done within this county; I find nothing of that kind proved upon me to be done here; for any memorandums that they say may be in that hand, I hope the gentlemen of the jury will consider, that there was nothing followed upon any of these things, that may be found in those papers: And in the next place, I desire to know, whether they are sufficiently proved to be mine; that is, whether similitude of hands is proof or not against me in such a case? I humbly offer these things to your lordship, and hope your lordship and the jury will consider of it.

L. C. J. Holt. Is this your lordship's defence, my lord?

L. Preston. My lord, I leave these things to the consideration of the court and the jury.

L. C. J. Holt. Your lordship insists upon it first, that there is no act of treason proved in the county of Middlesex; and then, whether similitude of hands be a good proof to prove these three papers, or any of them, to be your hand?

L. Preston. Nobody saying they see me write them, if I did write them.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. My lord, have you no witnesses, nor nothing that you would use of evidence for yourself?

L. C. J. Holt. Would your lordship disprove any thing of the matter that has been proved against you?

L. Preston. I must deny the whole fact; but I have no witnesses or evidence to offer you.

L. C. J. Holt. Then your lordship has no more to say?

L. Preston. I have not, I must leave it so with your lordship and the gentlemen of the jury.

Sol. Gen. We shall offer nothing farther, but leave it wholly to your lordship.

L. C. J. Holt. Your lordship has done then?

L. Preston. Your lordship observes none of the witnesses have declared that I was going into France, nor knew any thing of it. I did not hire the ship nor any thing of that kind; though I suppose if they had, it is not treason; but your lordship observes there is no such thing has been sworn.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, as to the first matter that your lordship makes a question upon, whether there be any act of treason proved in Middlesex, that does depend upon the proof of your lordship's being concerned in the papers; for if your lordship had an intention in carrying these papers into France, which speaks a design to invade this realm, your lordship took boat in Middlesex at Surrey-Stairs, in prosecution of that intention, there is an overt-act in this county of Middlesex.

L. Preston. Your lordship, and the gentlemen of the jury observe, these papers were not found upon me.

L. C. J. Holt. No, my lord; but if it be proved that your lordship had an intention to carry these papers into France, and took boat in order to go with them into France, in the county of Middlesex, wherever your lordship acted in order to that design, that is treason, and there you are guilty. It is a treason complicated of several facts, done in several places.

L. Preston. My lord, I humbly desire to know, whether they have been proved to be my papers?

L. C. J. Holt. That is a question that must be left to the jury upon the evidence.

L. Preston. Nobody swears they are mine, nor were they found upon me.

L. C. J. Holt. But what I am speaking to your lordship, is in answer to your question about the place; for you say, that there is nothing proved done in the county of Middlesex; now the question is, whether your lordship had a design to go to France with these papers? If you had, and if your lordship did go on ship-board in order to it, your taking boat in Middlesex in order to go on ship-board, is a fact done in the county of Middlesex.

L. Preston. It is not proved by any witnesses that I designed to go into France.

L. C. J. Holt. That is before the jury upon the evidence.

L. Preston. I hope your lordship, and the jury will observe it is not proved, and in the next place, there are no papers taken upon me; with humble submission, there is no proof of any such thing.

L. C. J. Holt. Well, how far your lordship was concerned in these papers, and whether you were going with them into France, is to be left, upon the evidence that hath been heard, to the consideration of the jury.

L. Preston. But I humbly submit that.

L. C. J. Holt. Have you any more to say?

L. Preston. As to what I offer, that nothing has been proved in Middlesex, I hope your lordship will take it to be a point of law, and then it ought to be argued; and I desire I may have counsel.

L. C. J. Holt. No, it is a matter of fact only; but if you please, the rest of my lords the judges may give you their opinion; for this is a question upon a supposition that your lordship was guilty of a design of going into France, and this with a purpose to depose the king, and alter the government; then the question is upon such a supposition that you were guilty of that design, whether you were guilty in Middlesex or no?

L. Preston. My lord, they have not proved that design.

L. C. J. Holt. We do not say it is taken for granted now, but it is a question upon a supposition. Now, my lord, I'll tell your lordship in short my opinion, the rest of the judges will tell you theirs: I am of opinion, if your lordship had such a design to go with these papers into France, and these papers were formed by you, or you were privy to the contents of them, then it is plainly proved, that you went into a boat in the county of Middlesex, in order to carry on this design, and that will make it a good indictment, and here is a plain overt-act of high-treason in Middlesex.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. I am of the same opinion; for your fact as to this particular point in law stands thus: You are indicted of high-treason in two points; one is, for conspiring to depose the king and queen, and alter the government: and the other is, for aiding and assisting the French king, and his subjects, declared enemies, and in open war against the king and queen, and to invite the enemies of the kingdom to invade the kingdom. Now this design, and this help and assistance, are written in these papers; for they are instructions for the carrying on of this design. You, my lord, are the person that is charged to go with these papers to help on this design; you began your journey in the county of Middlesex, for according to the evidence, you took water at Surrey-Stairs, which is in the county of Middlesex, and every step you made in pursuance of this journey, is treason, where-ever it was: So then here is a sufficient proof of a fact in Middlesex.

L. Preston. That, my lord, is a point of law, and I humbly desire your lordship, that I may have counsel in this case. It is not proved by any body, that I said I would go into France; and in the next place, it is not proved that I had these papers about me; there has been no evidence given that I did take water with an intention to go with these papers into France.

L. C. J. Holt. The Jury are to be judges of that.

L. Preston. Then, my lord, what have I done? I have not done any thing within the danger of any statute upon which I am indicted; besides, my lord, what I have to offer further is this, I think I ought to have two credible witnesses to prove every fact, and I hope the gentlemen of the jury will consider, there is nothing but supposition as to me; and I hope I and my family shall not be ruined upon a supposition.

L. C. J. Holt. Has your lordship any more to say?

L. Preston. All the judges have not given their opinion.

L. C. J. Holt. The rest will give their opinions, if you desire it.

My Lord Chief Baron, what say you?

L. C. Baron. My lord Preston, I am called upon, it seems, to give my opinion in this case, but this I take it must be left to the jury, what credit they will give to the proof. Your lordship makes a question, as the proof stands, whether here be any thing done in this county? Here are instructions given to the French king how to invade England, and carry on the war against us. These instructions are contained in several papers, and these papers in a packet are carried to the smack, which smack was hired to go to France. You are found taking water at Surry-stairs, which is in the county of Middlesex, in order to go to the smack: you did go to the smack; the papers were taken in your company, and were seen lying by your seals; and the witnesses swear, they believe some of them to be your hand; you took care to desire to have them disposed of. Now how far the jury will believe this matter of fact, that is thus testified, is left to them; this seems to be the proof, and if the jury do believe it, here is a plain evidence of an overt-act in the county of Middlesex.

L. Preston. I do insist upon it, with humble submission, it is not proved that these papers were taken upon me, or that I did take water at Surry-stairs to go to France.

L. C. Baron. That must be collected out of all the circumstances; the credit of which is left to the jury.

L. C. J. Holt. All the rest of my lords the judges are of the same opinion, as they tell me. Have you any more, my lord?

L. Preston. I must submit.

L. C. J. Holt. Gentlemen of the jury, my lord Preston stands indicted for high treason, in imagining and compassing the deposition, death, and destruction of the king and queen; and for that purpose, did write, or cause to be writ, several treasonable papers and letters, designed to go into France, and there to correspond with the French king and his subjects, who are enemies to the king and queen; and to carry with him those treasonable papers and letters, containing a project, and a formed design how this kingdom should be invaded by foreigners.

There is another treason in the indictment mentioned, and that is for adhering to, and abetting the king's enemies, there being open war declared between the king and queen, and the French king.

You have heard, gentlemen, a very long evidence, witnesses have been produced viva voce, and several papers have been read to you; some of the papers that have been produced, though they may seem mysterious and canting, yet they are not so very obscure and unintelligible, but if you consider them well, the meaning of them will appear. Others of them are more express, and do plainly demonstrate a design, that this king and queen should be deposed, and that there should be another prince set upon the throne, and restored to the government of this kingdom.

Gentlemen, there are two other persons mentioned in the indictment with my lord; and though my lord is only now upon his trial, yet the evidence which doth affect them, doth also concern my lord.

You have heard how there was an intention of some persons to go to France, and how Mr. Ashton, one of the two others that stands indicted with my lord, did treat with one Mrs. Pratt, one of the witnesses, to hire a vessel for that purpose, and it was by the means of one Mr. Burdett, that lives in the city; they had a meeting at Burdett's house, where they treated about the price that should be given for the hire of this ship to go to France, but at that time they did not agree. It was concluded, that the woman and Ashton and Burdett should meet at the Wonder Tavern; but Mr. Burdett not being there, nothing was concluded upon then.

And after that the woman, Mr. Burdett, and Ashton, and Elliot, met at Mrs. Burdett's; the woman insisted at first upon 150^l. After they had been treating for some time, the bargain was made to go to France for 100*l*.

Then the next thing considered was, how this money should be paid; by agreement, 93 guineas, and 6*d*. which made up the 100*l*. was deposited in Mrs. Burdett's hand; a sixpence broken, one part Mrs. Burdett had: and the other part of the sixpence Mr. Ashton had: and when either Mrs. Pratt or the master of the vessel did bring back that part of the sixpence that Ashton had, to Mrs. Burdett, the money was to be paid.

After this agreement, they were appointed to go to the Seven Stars in Covent-Garden, to the house of one Mr. Rigby; and there the woman, Mrs. Pratt, and the master of the vessel, Ashton and Elliot met, and they were that night to go away, and to take water at some place near to go on ship-board; and having stayed there till it was about ten o'clock at night, then they went away into the Strand, and so into Surry-street, and took water at Surry-stairs.

But before that they came from Mr. Rigby's, some persons went to Surry-stairs to see for a boat, and met with that fellow that was here produced, who was a sculler, and did hire him to go through the bridge when the tide served, and to carry some gentlemen on ship-board; they agreed with him for half-a-crown, and he was to stay in an house near the stairs until they came.

And at the time appointed, Mr. Ashton and Mr. Elliot, and the master of the vessel, came to that place, and my lord Preston and his man with them, to take water. My lord Preston was not at Burdett's house at the hiring of the ship, nor at Mr. Rigby's; but it is proved by the master of the vessel, that he took water with the rest of them at Surry-stairs; that he went with them on ship-board, and was to go along with them.

Being on board the ship, they did appear to have some apprehensions of danger, and passing by a man of war, my lord Preston, his man, and the other two, went under the quarter-hatches, where they lay down to prevent themselves from being taken or discovered; and they hid another time when they came near Gravesend, and coming up they seeing a boat coming towards them, they hid themselves again. Captain Billop, who it seems, was sent to apprehend them, pretended he was to press seamen, and when he came on board the smack, he said he would press the mariners, who answered they had a protection: but he being upon his search, pulled up the boards of the quarter-hatches, and there was my lord Preston and the other persons lying down: it was not a place that was very proper for gentlemen, or, indeed, for any passengers, to repose themselves in; it was an uneasy place, nobody could sit or stand upright in it; nay, there was no convenient place for lying down, but they must lean upon their elbows, which posture those gentlemen were in; so that their purpose was plainly to conceal themselves, and their concealing themselves must be because of some design they were about, which they would not have discovered.

They being taken out from under the hatches, one of the witnesses tells you, he saw a packet lying there, and Ashton, pretending to fetch his hat, went down, took it up, and put the packet into his bosom; and the witness informing captain Billop thereof, he caused Ashton's coat to be searched, and from thence took the packet, and a piece of lead tied to it, which was produced here in court.

When they were bringing away in custody, they seemed all of them to be very much concerned about this packet; some of them, that is, Ashton and Elliot, would have had it thrown with the lead over-board. My lord Preston did not say so much, but complimented captain Billop in this manner, He was glad he was fallen into the hands of a civil gentleman, a person of worth, and he should always acknowledge his kindness, and would do him all the service he could, if he would dispose of the packet.

My lord Preston was searched at that time, and letters of no great moment taken about him. Ashton and Elliot would have had captain Billop to take those letters which were taken in my lord Preston's pocket, and tie the lead to them, and have thrown the packet over-board, and to report to the king and council, That those letters were the packet that was taken with the lead; and so have persuaded him to be false to the trust that was reposed in him.

And Ashton and Elliot used many expressions to induce him to that compliance; they told him the government was unstable, and every dog had his day, and the tide would turn; and that he would deserve very well if he would change sides, and go with them where they were going; and that he had opportunity to get any preferment he would have.

L. Preston. My lord, I hope your lordship observes that I said none of all this.

L. C. J. Holt. No, my lord, I do not say you did; my lord Preston did not say any thing of all this, but only about disposing of the packet; that his lordship spoke of to captain Billop, and complimented him, and promised him kindness if he would dispose of the packet.

But, gentlemen, as there was a packet taken, so there were two seals taken at the same time, and in the same place, which have been produced and shewn to you; they lay both of them upon the ballast under the quarter-hatches, near the packet: the one of them is the seal of my lord Preston's own coat of arms, the other seal belongs to the secretaries office, which office my lord once held in the late reign.

L. Preston. I beg your lordship would be pleased to observe that the papers were not taken upon me, and it can be no treason to have seals, I suppose.

L. C. J. Holt. Good, my lord, I will not do your lordship any wrong; I do not say that the papers were taken about you, no nor the seals; but only, that they lay upon the ballast from whence the packet was taken: and I say further, that these seals are not denied by your lordship to be your seals; the one is your own seal of your coat of arms, which was taken at that time, and so I do not your lordship any wrong, and by the grace of God will not.

L. Preston. It is no crime, I hope, to have seals.

L. C. J. Holt. I do say, my lord, the papers were taken about Ashton, and not about your lordship; but they lay upon the ballast where the seals were, and where your lordship lay: but how far my lord Preston is concerned in this matter, is to be considered by you of the jury by-and-bye.—Now, gentlemen, you have heard how earnest Mr. Ashton and Mr. Elliot were; one of them, to wit, Elliot, wished a thunder-bolt might strike the boat under water as they were coming back; and when they came through bridge, he wished that London-Bridge had fallen upon them and knocked them upon the head.

L. Preston. But I hope that is not to lie upon me neither, for I said no such thing.

L. C. J. Holt. No: but Ashton and Elliot did say these things, and how the case stands as to that in relation to your lordship, is to be considered. It is proved, they afterwards gave money to the seamen, half-a-crown a-piece, to two of them, to say they were going to Flanders, and not to France.—Now, Gentlemen, that my lord was on board this vessel, that my lord was under the hatches, and that the papers were taken in this manner, is beyond all contradiction: so likewise that the ship was hired for France; that my lord took water at Surrey-Stairs, and was taken in this vessel in that manner that you have heard.—The next thing, Gentlemen, is about the papers: I must tell you, though there are several of them that do seem mysterious, yet they are papers that do shew a very great design of deposing the king and queen, and a purpose of altering the present government.—But, Gentlemen, I will mention to you those papers that are very plain, and leave you to consider what construction to put upon those that are obscure. There is one paper that seems to be instructions and heads for a declaration, that is to say, that the king of France must not come with a design to make an intire conquest.

L. Preston. My lord, with submission to your lordship, I hope you will please to remember and observe to the jury, that paper is not proved to be mine.

L. C. J. Holt. No, my lord, I will do your lordship no wrong, but I cannot speak all my words at once.

L. Preston. I am sure you will not, my lord; but I beg leave to put your lordship in mind.

L. C. J. Holt. Well, then, Gentlemen, the paper begins, “That the king’s Declaration is “to be formed in general terms; that he will “govern by the laws; that they shall be the “rule of his actions; that he will endeavour “to settle liberty of conscience by a law, and “that whatsoever was done by him that gave “any occasion of jealousy, shall be settled by “parliament. That the king hath given suffi“cient proofs and evidence of his not being “willing to bring an army of strangers into “the kingdom, by refusing the succours the “king of France offered him, and that were “even ready to be embarked upon the first “notice of the prince of Orange’s coming.

“That he brings such an army only as is ne“cessary for his own defence, and securing “such of his loyal subjects as should come “to him; and that he will dismiss them as “soon as he shall have rid the nation of those “foreigners that had invaded us, and trampled
“upon the laws.”

So that, Gentlemen, here is a paper in this packet, that has plainly laid open and proved the design, and shews the meaning of it was to seduce their majesties subjects from their allegiance; it was to be in such general terms, making general promises, hoping thereby that people would be the more easily imposed upon to renounce their allegiance to their present majesties.

But, Gentlemen, the declaration imports farther, that the realm was to be invaded by foreigners; and to palliate it, it is pretended, that foreigners were only brought in to rid the nation of foreigners, and you know who are meant by that: so that this project was only to colour a foreign invasion; and this declaration was to direct them how, and upon what pretences they should invade this kingdom.

Gentlemen, there is no manner of doubt but this is a treasonable declaration, and if any person had this in his possession, and was going into France to carry, with an intention there to make use of it, that is treason, though it be couched under specious pretences of restoring people to their liberty: it was plainly a design to invade England by a French army.

L. Preston. My lord, that paper was not found about me.

L. C. J. Holt. No, no, my lord, it was not; but, good my lord, give me your favour, I will certainly observe every thing that is fitting; but I tell you I cannot do it all at once.

Then, Gentlemen, there is another paper found in the packet, that is said to be the result of a conference that was had between divers lords and gentlemen, as well Tories as Whigs, as they call them, to prove it possible to restore the late king by French arms; and how this may be effected, were proposals made: yet still it was pretended to preserve the Protestant religion, and the civil administration according to law.

And that it might be brought to pass, the credulous were to be imposed upon, and made to believe that the French king would not conquer England for himself; no, but he would conquer it for the late king; he would be at that vast charge, that great expence of men and arms to restore king James, and make no profit of it himself.

And it was proposed how to seduce the people of England into a belief of the French king's kindness; he was to indulge the English Protestants in France, and let them have the exercise of their own religion there at their own charges; and this to satisfy the English Protestants, that his persecution of the Hugonots in France, was not out of aversion to the Protestant religion, but only because of their antimonarchical and resisting principles. So that they were proposing among themselves what they were to do to make the people believe the French king had no dangerous design against our religion and liberties; and if they could meet with persons to believe this, that was a probable way thought upon in this conference to get a great many adherents to the French king, thereby this invasion was to be facilitated, and the whole project rendered more successful.

There is another thing, Gentlemen, in this paper, and that is this: they complained of the mismanagement of their affairs at St. Germain; that though they did earnestly desire the restitution of the late king, yet there was always some foolish thing or other that came from St. Germain that obstructed their design.

What that foolish thing is, I cannot say, it does not appear; but whether it were not too great a discovery of their zeal for popery, and the advancement of the Popish religion, is worth your consideration.

And something is to be done for satisfaction of the people as to that; and it is advised that there should be seven or nine, or such a number of English men, that should go over, and be received into favour at St. Germain, and they should be of the council there, and these were to be Protestants; and that was to be a colour and pretence that the late king was reconciled to the Protestant interest, because he chose Protestant counsellors, and had received them at St. Germain, and was advised by them.

This, says the paper, will make the world believe, he is ours, and that we have gained him; which was to delude a great many of the people of England, that they should not be affrighted in case there should be such an invasion of England, but invited rather, and encouraged to join with the French when they came.

But, Gentlemen, the three last papers that have been produced to you, are papers that do somewhat more nearly concern my lord Preston.

The first paper contains several memorandums: it begins with lady D. 2,000*l.* who that lady D. is, I must leave it to you to imagine, though perhaps it may not be hard to guess.

It takes notice that the English and Dutch were like to join; and these memorandums do also shew a design and purpose of something to be done for the prevention of that conjunction. They seem also to be instructions to be made use of upon going into France to negotiate or transport some matters of dangerous consequence.

L. Preston. My lord, I hope that your lordship will observe, that these memorandums are broken kind of notes, incongruous and incoherent.

L. C. J. Holt. Ay, my lord, they are so, they are but broken things; but I say still, they are Memorandums that were to be used for some purpose: now I leave it to the jury to consider of the matter of them: what can be plainer than what is there expressed? The French are to come in time, before the Dutch and the English join, they are to watch their opportunity and come betimes, and they are to fight at the Chops of the Channel, and not to come so far as Beachy.

L. Preston. This is all but presumptive evidence, my lord.

L. C. J. Holt. I appeal to your lordship if it was not in the paper, and I appeal to the memory of the jury, whether I mis-repeat it or not.

The Paper mentions Jennings, and Strickland, and Trevannion, that they were to come from St. Malo's in one night: the king (meaning the late king) was not to be on board: and there were ships to lie at Newcastle to plague London: it is easy to understand what they meant. Among these memorandums, it is made as a remark, that the London clergy are the worst. It gives an account how Portsmouth was fortified, and Gosport, and what number of men were in them; and of the state and condition of our navy; what rates our ships were, and how many, and who were to be the commanders.

L. Preston. I beg your lordship to observe this is not treason.

L. C. J. Holt. I shall tell you that, my lord, by-and-bye: I am now stating the evidence.

Gentlemen, my lord Preston insists upon it, that these papers were not found about him: it is true they were not, but it does not therefore follow, that they were none of his papers: but you have three witnesses, Mr. Townesend, Mr. Bland, and Mr. Warr, produced to prove these papers to be my lord's hand; Mr. Townesend says, he was acquainted pretty well with my lord Preston's hand; he was one of his clerks in the office of the wardrobe; he says, he has seen my lord write several times, and does believe the writing to be his hand; and to the same purpose says Bland; and Mr. Warr swears to one of the papers, that he believes it to be my lord Preston's hand.

L. Preston. I hope your lordship will please to observe to the jury, that this is only a proof of similitude of hands: nobody see me write them.

L. C. J. Holt. They only say they do believe it to be your hand: nobody says they saw you write them; if I omit any thing, pray tell me when I have done.

Gentlemen, there are other papers which have been produced and read, that are writ in canting terms, which yet plainly shew the general design; they tell the party, that counsel are of opinion, he has a very good title; they hope he will appear himself, and if the cause be well solicited, it may come to a hearing before the end of Easter term. There is another matter mentioned in another letter which is under the disguise of trade, that the goods must come before the 1st of March. And another of them says, that unless the copper and the linnen come before the 10th of March, they should lose this summer's profit. Gentlemen, what can be the meaning of all this?

L. Preston. I know not indeed, my lord.

L. C. J. Holt. In another of the papers it is said, It is thought our fleet will be ready by March or April, but they believe not till June. Truly, Gentlemen, I have not been able to take particulars of every letter, but I must leave it to your observation; only there is one of them that makes mention of acquainting my lord with the condition of the writer, and direction is therein given to speak to the hearer; and what other lord was there, but he, in the company?

L. Preston. I desire to observe, my lord, that I was not the bearer.

L. C. J. Holt. Truly, my lord, I cannot tell who was meant; I must leave it to the jury to judge of that; but there was no other lord in that company.

L. Preston. I give your lordship thanks for observing that it was not proved that they were taken upon me before; but I beg your pardon for interrupting of your lordship.

L. C. J. Holt. Interrupt me as much as you please, if I do not observe right; I will assure you I will do you no wrong willingly.

Now, Gentlemen, the question is, in the first place, whether this be treason? and I told you before, without question, if any persons do go into France to negotiate such a design as this, or do purpose to go into France, and do any act in order therunto, that is high-treason; and these letters do import high-treason as great as can be committed; a treason against the king and queen, a design to invade the realm, to subvert the government, to restore another prince to the throne by the assistance of foreign force.

There was a design to delude and impose upon a great many people; and those that would not be deluded into a belief by these fair pretensions of friendship, they were to be subdued by an army of foreigners.

Then, Gentlemen, the next question will be, how my lord Preston is affected by this evidence, and whether you have sufficient proof from what has been offered, to satisfy you, that he is guilty of this treason or no?

First, my lord tells you, there has not been a clear proof that these are the papers that were taken; for, (saith he) they have been conveyed from hand to hand, and therefore, possibly there might be some alteration made in them.

VOL. XII.

You, gentlemen, are to consider, notwithstanding this objection, whether the identity of the papers be not proved.

Captain Billop tells you, he took them, and in what manner; and afterwards carried them to my lord Nottingham, who laid them by for a little while upon his table, and captain Billop withdrew (that is part of my lord's objection) while my lord Nottingham examined my lord Preston: after that, my lord Nottingham called in Billop again, and Billop swears the packet was not opened, but remained intire in such manner as they were delivered to my lord Nottingham; and so says my lord Nottingham. Then captain Billop saw my lord Nottingham open it at that time, and he saw all these papers every one put up again by my lord Nottingham; so that he could not be deceived; and my lord Nottingham delivered them to him, and he carried them to my lord president, all sealed up with my lord Nottingham's seal: and my lord president tells you he opened them, and brought them to the king, and had them back from the king: but they were never out of his sight while the king read some of them, but he took them all, and brought them into the cabinet council, where my lord Sidney received all these papers that have been read, and marked them. You have my lord Sidney's oath that these are the papers he had from my lord president; you have my lord president's oath that he had them from Billop, sealed with my lord Nottingham's seal; you have my lord Nottingham's oath that he had them from Billop; and Billop swears that they were taken in the smack.

So that it is plain, if you believe this evidence, that they are the same papers. Besides, as to several of them, Billop marked them, and swears directly to them. If you believe these witnesses, as you have no reason, I think, to the contrary; it is plainly proved these are the very papers which were taken from the bosom of Ashton, and taken up by him from under the quarter hatches in the smack.

L. Preston. I beg your lordship's pardon for one thing.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, what say you, pray? Say what you will.

L. Preston. With humble submission, there is one thing that I think the jury ought to take notice of, that when the papers were sent from Mr. Bridgman to my lord Sidney, they were sent by a messenger.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, you are mistaken as to that objection, for my lord Sidney did not send them to Mr. Bridgman by a messenger, but he delivered them with his own hand, and after he had set his own mark upon them; and Mr. Bridgman says they were never out of his sight, he copied them all but two or three, the other Mr. Poultney copied in his presence, and so he swears he re-delivered them to my lord Sidney.

L. Preston. With humble submission, my lord, if I remember right, they were in a third hand.

L. C. J. Holt. Never, never.

L. Preston. Did not my lord Sidney say so, or Mr. Bridgman.

L. C. J. Holt. No, neither my lord Sidney, nor Mr. Bridgman said so; I suppose the jury are apprehensive of the matter; I would not mislead them, I'll assure you, nor do your lordship any manner of injury in the world.

L. Preston. No, my lord, I see it well enough that your lordship would not; I am for my life, and beg your lordship's pardon for interrupting of you.

L. C. J. Holt. Gentlemen, the next thing is to consider, whether my lord Preston be answerable for these papers, or a party in this treason.

First, Gentlemen, I would have you to consider, that there was the hiring of a vessel for France: it is true, my lord Preston was not present at the bargain; but you observe, that my lord Preston, his servant, Ashton, and Elliot took water at Surrey-Stairs, on purpose to go on board that smack.

Now, gentleman, whether or no you can intend any other ways than that my lord Preston was privy in the hiring of this vessel, though he was not present at the hiring of it; for how should my lord Preston be ready to take water with them at Surry-Stairs? Can you imagine my lord came there by chance, and took a sudden resolution? If you can imagine that he came only to go on ship-board, without knowing the previous design, truly you imagine a very great thing for my lord's advantage.

It is plain he went voluntarily, without compulsion; truly, I think the evidence is very strong to induce you to believe he was privy to this design, and that he did know of hiring the vessel.

L. Preston. I hope your lordship will observe, at the same time, that I was never seen before we took boat.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, I have observed it, and I lay that weight upon the evidence that I think it will naturally bear, and no more; and leave it to the jury to consider, whether your lordship was privy to the design or no, when they weigh the circumstances of the evidence together.

L. Preston. I hope I shall not be condemned upon presumption and argument.

L. C. J. Holt. What weight the evidence has they will consider.

And then, gentlemen, there is another thing that I would observe: why should my lord Preston, a nobleman, a person of his honour and quality, put himself in such a place as he was found in, and that twice? It must sure be out of an apprehension of some danger. As for the seamen, they were secure enough; they were not frightened, because they thought they were protected, and my lord Preston knew he was not liable to be prest: the master of the vessel tells you they were fearful, and therefore hid themselves in a place they could not stand in, nor sit in, there was the gravel and ballast, it was uneasy to them, dangerous to their health to be there. Gentlemen, why do men avoid the light and put themselves under covert, unless they have some evil design? Persons that are innocent seek not obscurity. The seals were found there, and my lord does not deny they were his seals.

L. Preston. I do not deny that: I hope it is no crime to have such seals.

L. C. J. Holt. Ay but, says my lord, that does not affect—because the papers were not found about me, but were found about Ashton. Gentlemen, if you can imagine my lord Preston had a different design from the rest of the company, that were with him, then you may acquit my lord, and find him not guilty. But it is left to you to consider, whether he had not the same design with them. Besides there is mention made in one of the letters, 'my lord,' and there was no other lord but he; and here are papers proved to be my lord's own hand, containing several of the matters of which he stands indicted, and he would have had the captain to have disposed of the papers.

Now, Gentlemen, what account does my lord give you where he was going? It seems they did pretend at the time they were taken, and they would have had the master of the vessel said, that their design was for Flanders; but the witnesses tell you positively, that the vessel was hired for France.

Truly, gentlemen, I must leave the matter to your consideration, whether my lord be guilty of this design or not guilty.

There is another thing that my lord has urged (for I would not willingly omit any thing material on the one side or the other) he says his indictment is laid in the county of Middlesex, but the papers were not taken there, the ship they went on board lay at anchor in Surrey; and when they were taken, it was in the county of Kent, and so there is no proof of treason in Middlesex.

Ay, but gentlemen, give me leave to tell you, if you are satisfied upon this evidence that my lord was privy to this design, contained in these papers, and was going with them into France, there to excite an invasion of the kingdom, to depose the king and queen, and make use of the papers to that end, then every step he took in order to it, is high-treason, wherever he went; his taking water at Surrey stairs in the county of Middlesex, will be as much high-treason, as the going a ship-board in Surrey, or being found on ship-board in Kent, where the papers were taken.

Gentlemen, I have failed of recollecting several of the particulars of the evidence, because they are many; and you will not depend upon my recollection of things so very incoherent as some parts of the evidence in the papers are, but upon your own notes and observations.

If you do think, having heard this evidence, that my lord was not concerned in this matter, that my lord had no design to go into France with these papers, but that he was an utter stranger to all these things, then you are to acquit my lord. But if you believe my lord was privy to, and knew of the hiring of this vessel, and that he went to carry on the design contained in these papers; and that he wrote some of these letters, and with the others he was acquainted, then you are to find him guilty.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. My lord, if you please, I would observe one thing to the jury.

L. C. J. Holt. Ay, by all means, my lord.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Gentlemen of the jury, I shall say but a few words to you, because indeed my lord has summed up the evidence very fully, for matter of law: I am fully of opinion there never was a more black nor horrible treason than is in this plot that is now discovered; for I think Englishmen have no greater enemies than the French and the Papists, and you see this is a plot to bring in both; and therefore I think there was never any thing of greater consequence to the government and the nation, than to have this plot detected and punished; though perhaps never any thing was more improbable than this same plot, that it should ever take effect, whatsoever they promised to themselves, and their desire of having it effected might persuade them to the contrary.

But, Gentlemen, the thing that I would mention about the matter before you now, is this; here are three papers, that by three several witnesses, acquainted with my lord's hand-writing, are testified, as they believe, to be his hand-writing; if so, then there is an end of all, for therein is a horrid deal of treason contained. If these instructions, these memorandums, these heads that were written down, were my lord's, and he did intend to go with these in a voyage towards France, that will be sufficient of itself, if there were nothing else in the case to maintain this indictment.

But, Gentlemen, you have in the rest of the papers that were taken, a great character of 'the bearer'; that 'the bearer' had done great things; that 'the bearer' could inform them fully of every thing; and there should be full and intire confidence put in 'the bearer,' and a great many such phrases.

But, says my lord, I was not the bearer, it was Mr. Ashton that the papers were found about; it does not appear directly who the bearer was; and they were not found about me.

Now, Gentlemen, pray let us look a little how this evidence stands: pray where was this bundle found? even upon the gravel, where my lord Preston and Mr. Ashton lay; there was it found, and my lord's own seal with it.

How, in the name of God, came my lord's seals to be found with other people's papers, if they did belong to any body else? How came they together in that place? It may be, he had a mind to leave his seals behind him, because they would discover his quality. But why should my lord Preston have all this fear upon him? why should two men go and take a ship for themselves and two others; and when they came to take boat, take in my lord, and his man, if they were not the two others that were designed? and this to be done at night in the dark? why should my lord be under such terrible apprehensions, as to creep into a hole so unfit for one of his quality.

Why do you not hear from my lord some good account from what occasion my lord and his man were going to France? or whither else my lord was really going? for some where or other it was plain he was going.

Gentlemen, no man goes into an enemy's country without some licence, unless he go upon some ill design: fear seldom is without some guilt; and there appears throughout the whole management of the story, that there was a great deal of fear upon these gentlemen.

Besides, afterwards, when he is taken, and the letters taken with him in the same company, you hear what endeavours there were to suppress the truth even by my lord's desiring to have the packet disposed of; and my lord's man gave one of the seamen half-a-crown to say they were going to Flanders, not to France. I suppose the man knew how unfit it was to be known that they were going to France: and my lord's two companions spared for no pains to get the packet thrown overboard; though all that my lord said was what great kindness he would do him when it lay in his power, if he would dispose of the packet; I suppose that is very easily intelligible.

Gentlemen, there is one thing which is mentioned in one of the particular letters, that I desire particularly to observe to you, and that is all I shall say to you: here is a letter in my hand that in divers places has somewhat remarkable; it says, 'Your daughter and I must starve, if this government can make us: that the party did not repine at all for having lost all for your sake, which your favour had bestowed.' And in another place this letter doth say, 'Your daughter grows very tall, and very pretty, as I am told.' But that which I chiefly mention it for, is, it's twice mentioned, 'My lord will tell you all my condition, how I have been used; and I have told my lord my condition: what I desire of you, he thinks very moderate.'

And pray consider and remember, that the first article of my lord's paper, that is taken to be under my lord's own hand, there is two thousand pounds to the lady D.

Now if any body should put these together, do they lack any great interpreter for? For my part I leave them to you.

Then, in another place, towards the end of the letter, it is said, 'Pray, Sir, ask my lord how I have been used.'

Now this letter being thus taken, and there is never a one of the rest that was a lord, do you think any of the rest was meant? I must leave it to you.

If my lord Preston had produced any testimony to prove his own good carriage and behaviour towards the present government, it had been very much for his advantage, and might have had great weight with you; but when things appear only in this manner as they do now, I must leave it to you.

Gentlemen, it is a great matter, and of great moment; if those that conspire against the kingdom, against the Protestant religion, and against the present government, may do it with impunity, it will be worth the considering what the consequence of that may be. Your own consciences require you to do right and justice on both sides; and if you are satisfied he is not guilty, you will find him so; if you are satisfied that he is guilty, you will find him so.

L. Preston. My lord, may I have the liberty to say any thing before the jury go out?

L. C. J. Holt. Your lordship should have said what you had to say before: It is contrary to the course of all proceedings in such cases to have any thing said to the jury after the court has summed up the evidence; but we will dispense with it. What has your lordship to say?

L. Preston. My lord, I humbly thank your lordship; I am not acquainted with such proceedings.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, you know I permitted your lordship to interrupt me as much as you would, which was never done before in any such case.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. It is contrary to the course of the court: but yet, if you have any thing to say to the court or the jury, for this once we permit it.

L. Preston. Gentlemen of the jury—

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, what you have to say, pray direct yourself to the court, that we may hear what it is.

L. Preston. My lord, I only desire the jury may be informed, that I am a Protestant, that I was baptized in the religion of the church of England, and have always lived in it, and hope to die in it. My lord, it is true, things have been urged with severity against me that are a little hard, in making that, which I hope will amount to but a presumption, to be a proof; as in the case of the letters that are written in a cant, and my intention to go to France, and those words in the letter, where my lord the bearer is named. But your lordship observes, that that letter is not directed to any body, and that is full of cant as well as all the rest; why should I be supposed to be the bearer any more than either of the others, and they were found about one of them? But, my lord, for the reason of my going beyond sea, it was this; I designed to go to Flanders, or any place I could be driven to, and that ought not to be wondered at; for really I who had lived quietly after the loss of my places, upon this revolution, and suffered great inconveniences in my estate, and was retired to my own house, with a design to live a retired life, was imprisoned twice in the Tower, and proclaimed a traitor in every market town, without any indictment; and my imprisonment tended greatly to the impairing my health and my fortune; all this made me very uneasy here: and, my lord, I went under a fixed resolution to go to Flanders, or any place where I thought I could be quiet.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, your lordship should have said all these things before, for it is not the course to reply upon the court; if you had had any thing to say, you know we heard you out of course, and I let you interrupt me as much as you did think fit, though that has not been allowed at any time before. But, my lord, pray let me say one thing more: Suppose your lordship did think yourself hardly used, though I know not any reason you had to think so: yet your lordship must remember, it was in a time of danger that your lordship was taken up before; and you had shewed your dissatisfaction with the present government, and therefore they were not to be blamed if they secured themselves against you: but if you had a mind to retire into the country, or to go abroad, was France the only country you could choose? A known declared enemy's country, at open war with the government?

L. Preston. My lord, I beg your lordship's pardon, if I give any offence.

L. C. J. Holt. No, my lord, you give me no offence at all; but your lordship is not right in the course of proceedings; I acquaint you with it, not by way of reproof, but by way of information.

L. Preston. Then I hope the gentlemen of the jury will consider, that all that is alledged against me is but presumption; my life and fortune, my posterity and reputation, are all at stake; I leave all to the jury's consideration, and the God of Heaven direct them!

L. C. J. Holt. If you go on thus to reflect on the court, you will make the court reflect upon you. The jury hear how the evidence has been stated; I think it has been done very impartially, and without any severity to you: Why should you think we would press the evidence further than it ought to go against you? You are a stranger to most of us, and I am sure we do not desire your life; but still we must take care that justice be done to the government and the kingdom, as well as to any particular person; and evidence that is given must have its due weight and consideration: If any one can design innocently to go into France, at this time of day, with such papers, and in such a manner, that I leave to the jury's consideration.

Then the Jury withdrew, to consider of the evidence, and the court adjourned for a little while, and returned in half an hour; and the Jury came in, and were called over, and appeared.

Cl. of Ar. Are you all agreed of your verdict?—Jury. Yes.

Cl. of Ar. Who shall say for you?

Jury. Our foreman.

Cl. of Ar. Sir Richard Grahme,* hold up

* Lord Preston claimed to be a peer of England: as to which, the following extracts are made from 14 Lords' Journals, pp. 336, 7, 8. 354, 5.

“Nov. 9. The House being informed, your hand (which he did.) Look upon the prisoner. How say you? Is he guilty of the felony and high-treason whereof he stands indicted, or not guilty?

Foreman. Guilty.

Cl. of Ar. What goods and chattels had he?

‘That Richard lord viscount Preston, of the kingdom of Scotland, claims the privilege of a peer of this realm:’

“It is thereupon ordered, by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the said lord viscount Preston do attend this House on Monday next, at eleven of the clock in the forenoon.”

“Nov. 11. Then the lord viscount Preston appeared; and was told by the Speaker, ‘that the House being informed that he claims the privilege of a peer of this realm, they had sent for him, to know upon what ground he did so.’

“He said, ‘The earl Mountague had commenced a suit against him; that he was ready to give his lordship an appearance, though he had a patent to be a peer of this realm, from the late king James, before the vote of abdication passed; and he thought he had the privilege of a peer.’ And then he withdrew.

“After debate, the patent being sent for, and brought in, bearing date, Apud Fanum Sanct. Germani ad Layam, 21 Januarii, Stilo veteri, Anno Regni Nostri 4to.

“Upon this, the House made this ensuing order. ‘Ordered, That the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod do take Richard lord viscount Preston immediately into his custody.

‘To sir Thomas Duppa, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod attending this House, his Deputy and Deputies, and every of them.’

“Ordered, That all the judges do attend this House to-morrow, at ten of the clock in the forenoon; at which time the House will take into consideration the lord viscount Preston’s patent, and the lord Griffin’s case.”

“Nov. 12. Next, the House took into consideration the patent of the lord viscount Preston.

“And the Speaker told the House, ‘That he had acquainted the judges with the particulars of the whole case; which they hold to be a high misdemeanor.’

“After debate, the House had this question put, ‘Whether the pretended patent sent into this House by the lord Preston, by which he claims to be a peer of England, be null and void?’ It was resolved in the affirmative, nem. con., and so declared.

“Ordered, by the lords spiritual and temporal assembled in parliament, that the pretended patent of the lord viscount Preston be kept in the custody of the clerk of the parliaments, until further order of this House.

“Ordered, by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that their majesties attorney general do prosecute Richard Foreman. None at all that we know of.

Then the Verdict was recorded.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. I think, truly, gentlemen, you have done according to your evidence; and though it be a hard case upon par-lord viscount Preston of the kingdom of Scotland, in their majesties court of King’s Bench, for a high misdemeanor, in claiming to be a peer of this realm by his pretended patent.

“To sir George Treby, their majesties attorney general.

“Ordered, by the lords spiritual and temporal assembled in parliament, that the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod do carry Richard lord viscount Preston, now in his custody, to their majesties Tower of London; there to be kept in safe custody, until he shall be delivered by due course of law.

“To sir Thomas Duppa, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, his Deputy and Deputies, and every of them.

“Ordered, by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that Richard lord viscount Preston, of the kingdom of Scotland, be, and is hereby, committed prisoner to their majesties Tower of London, for high misdemeanors, in claiming to be a peer of this realm by his pretended patent, there to be kept in safe custody; and this shall be a sufficient warrant in that behalf.

“Nov. 27. Upon reading the humble petition of Richard lord viscount Preston, of the kingdom of Scotland, now prisoner in the Tower of London by order of this House; shewing, ‘That he is very much concerned and troubled that he hath incurred the displeasure of this house; and that he never had a thought, purpose, or in the least a design, to misde-mean himself in any thing towards this house, or of doing any thing that should give the least offence thereunto; and praying to be discharged from the confinement under which he lies:’

“It is thereupon ordered, by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the order of this house, made the 12th of November instant, wherein their majesties attorney general was ordered to prosecute Richard lord viscount Preston, of the kingdom of Scotland, in the court of King’s Bench, for a high misdemeanor, be, and is hereby, superseded: and it is further ordered, that the said Richard lord viscount Preston be, and is hereby, discharged from his present imprisonment in the Tower; and that this shall be a sufficient warrant on that behalf.

ticular men that have brought themselves into these inconveniences; yet it is necessary justice should have its due course, or else there is no longer living for any man in any society or government.

Then the prisoner was carried back to Newgate, and the court adjourned till Monday morning following at seven o'clock.

Monday, January 19, 1691.

The Court being sate, the Jury was called over, and the appearance of those who answered recorded. Then Mr. Ashton and Mr. Elliot were brought to the Bar; but Mr. Elliot was ordered to be carried back to Newgate, the King's Counsel resolving to try Mr. Ashton by himself.

JOHN ASHTON, hold up thy hand (which he did.) Those men that you shall hear called, and personally appear, are to pass between our sovereign lord and lady our king and queen, and you, upon your trial of your life and death. If therefore you will challenge them, or any of them, your time is to speak as they come to the book to be sworn, and before they be sworn.

Ashton. Pray stay a little.

L. C. J. Holt. What say you, Mr. Ashton?

Ashton. My lord, I humbly desire your lordship will allow me the benefit of pen, ink, and paper.

L. C. J. Holt. Pray let him have pen, ink, and paper.

Ashton. And likewise that you would give my solicitor leave to be as near me as possibly he can, only to refresh my memory, if I should forget any thing.

L. C. J. Holt. That is a thing you cannot of right demand; the other, of pen, ink and paper, you may.

Ashton. My lord, I shall acknowledge it as a very great favour.

L. C. J. Holt. That is an innovation that ought not to be; the court cannot allow it.

Ashton. I acknowledge it a favour; but if the court thinks it not fit to allow it, whatsoever your lordship shall order, I readily submit to.

L. C. J. Holt. You shall have pen, ink and paper; and what is fit for the court to do, they will do it.*

L. C. Baron. If the witnesses say any thing that you do not hear, you must speak to the court, and you shall have them say it over again.

[Pen, ink and paper was given to the prisoner.]

Cl. of Ar. Sir William Hedges, knight. (He appeared.)

Ashton. My lord, I would not trouble your lordship and myself with unnecessary challenges; I intend to put myself with an entire dependance upon the first twelve men that appear, be they who they will.

L. C. J. Holt. What you please for that matter, you have your own choice.

Ashton. Whoever they are, I submit to them; I know them not.

Cl. of Ar. Swear sir William Hedges. (Which was done.)

And so were the eleven next succeeding in the pannel; and the names of the twelve sworn follow: sir William Hedges, knt. John Wolstenholm, James Boddington, Thomas Johnson, Ralph Bucknall, Lucy Knightly, Thomas Cuthbert, John Herbert, John Tully, Thomas Smith, William Withers, and Daniel Thomas, esquires.

Then the jury were numbered, and proclamation made for information and evidence in the usual manner.

Ashton. Gentlemen of the jury, if you desire pen, ink, and paper, I hope the court will take care to provide them for you.

L. C. J. Holt. Ay, ay, let the gentlemen of the jury have pen, ink, and paper.—(which was done.)

Cl. of Ar. John Ashton, hold up thy hand. (Which he did.)

Gentlemen, You that are sworn, look upon the prisoner, and hearken to his cause: He stands indicted by the name of John Ashton, late of the parish of St. Paul's Covent-Garden, in the county of Middlesex, gent. For that he, together with sir Richard Grahme, late of the parish of St. Ann, in the liberty of Westminster, baronet, who stands convicted of high treason, and Edmund Elliot, late of the parish of St. James, in the said liberty, gent. For that they, as false traitors, &c. (Prout in the indictment, mutatis mutandis) and against the form of the statute in that case made and provided. Upon this indictment he has been arraigned, and thereunto hath pleaded not guilty, and for his trial hath put himself upon God and the country, which country you are: Your charge is, to enquire whether he be guilty of the felony and high treason whereof he stands indicted, or not guilty: If you find him guilty, you are to enquire what goods or chattels, lands or tenements, he had at the time of the felony and high treason committed, or at any time since: If you find him not guilty you are to enquire whether he fled for it: If you find that he fled for it, you are to enquire of his goods and chattels as if you had found him guilty: If you find him not guilty, nor that he did fly for it, you are to say so, and no more, and hear your evidence.

Mr. Knapp. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury; This is an indictment of high treason against John Ashton, the prisoner at the bar; and the indictment, gentlemen, charges him, That he, as a false traitor against their present majesties king William and queen Mary, his supreme and natural lord and lady, not weighing the duty of his allegiance, did, upon the twenty-ninth of December last past, together with sir Richard Grahme, who stands convicted, and one Edmund Elliot, and divers other ill-disposed persons, unknown to the jury, did conspire, imagine, and intend to depose and deprive the king and queen, and to bring them to death and destruction, and to subvert and alter the government; and to cause war and rebellion within this kingdom against their majesties; and to bring these intentions and purposes to pass, the prisoner, with the rest of them, did prepare divers notes, papers, letters, and memorandums in writing, which were to instruct the French king, and other enemies of the king and queen, of the number of their majesties men of war, how they were manned, and the names of the commanders of several of them, and to inform them how the castles and forts of Portsmouth, Southsea, and Gosport were fortified, and how they might be surprised by the king's enemies; and of the times, ways and means how they might invade the kingdom, in order to depose the king and queen; and to procure and incite such an invasion: and further to bring these purposes to pass, the prisoner and the other traitors did secretly conceal, and detain in their custody, several bills of exchange, for the payment of money to the king's enemies, and the several letters, notes, and memorandums before mentioned, which were for the purposes I before opened to you: and further, to bring these purposes and treasonable intentions to pass, they did for 100*l.* hire and prepare a ship, which was to carry them secretly out of this kingdom into France, with an intent there to deliver these instructions, and memorandums, and bills of exchange into the hands of their majesties enemies; and did hire a boat to carry them to the ship, and did enter into it at St. Clement Danes, within your county, and rowed to the ship, and went on board the ship, and there with the bills of exchange, notes, and memorandums, they set sail to go to France, in order to deliver them to the French king, and other enemies of the king and queen: and the indictment doth further set forth, that there hath, and still is, a war between the French king and our king and queen; and that he and his subjects are enemies to the king and queen and their subjects; and that during this war, the prisoner, together with the rest that were before named, were adhering to the king and queen's enemies in this war; and in pursuance thereof, did prepare such letters and instructions before opened, and had, and concealed in their custody, and hired a ship and a boat, and went into the ship, and set sail in order to go for France, to aid and assist the king's enemies there with money, intelligence, and counsel: and this is laid to be against the duty of his allegiance, against the peace of the king and queen, their crown and dignity, and against the form of the statute in that case made and provided. To this he hath pleaded not guilty: if we prove him guilty, you are to find him guilty.

Serj. Thompson. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury: the prisoner at the bar stands indicted of a very heinous offence, no less than high treason, the greatest offence that can be committed against any human law. You have heard the particulars in the indictment read. I will not trouble you with any repetition, but go to open the evidence according to the steps that are obvious in the case. You have heard in general, the design was to depose this king and queen, which the law expounds to be to bring them to death and destruction: you have heard it was to alter the government, and cause a rebellion in the kingdom, and to bring in a foreign power; and these are laid to be the heads of the offences that the prisoner stands charged with.

Gentlemen, the first step that was made in this matter was by the prisoner at the bar; for there was one Mr. Burdett, which it seems had been one of his acquaintance, and had undertaken to bring him acquainted with a person that could furnish him with a ship; and in order to that, one Mrs. Pratt had the management of the smack which belonged to her husband; she, by Burdett's means, was brought to Burdett's house, where she met Mr. Ashton, the prisoner at the bar, and they had some treaties about the hiring of a ship; the purpose declared by the prisoner then, was to hire a ship to go to any part of France, and he would give a considerable reward for it; he said it was for himself and three more. They did not come to any conclusion about the ship, but there was an appointment made, to have the master of the ship to meet with them at the Wonder tavern, in Ludgate-street; and in order to that, Paseley, that is the master, and the woman, came there and met with Mr. Ashton; but because Mr. Burdett was not there, they came only to this proposal, 150*l.* was demanded for the hire of this vessel; but there being no conclusion then made, they thought it better to do it at Burdett's house; and about a day after they came to Mr. Burdett's, and then it happen'd that Elliot, one of the persons that is indicted, but not one before you, came thither too; and at that time it was agreed to give 100*l.* for the hire of the ship. Ninety-three guineas were deposited in Mrs. Burdett's hands; and there was a token past betwixt them by the breaking of a sixpence, one part whereof was to lie with Mr. Ashton, and the other with Mrs. Burdett; and whenever the master of the vessel brought back the broken piece of sixpence that Mr. Ashton had, then she was to pay the money, that being the sign that they had attained their ends, and were safely landed in France.

The next step they take is this, they appoint to meet at the Seven Stars in Covent-Garden; thither the master of the vessel and the woman were to come, and that was near the time that very day that they designed to go down; and there was Mr. Ashton and Mr. Elliot, but the other person did not appear as yet; there the seamen were ordered to go along with them, and thence they went down to the water-side, to Surrey-stairs, and the waterman was called, and in the mean time came my lord Preston and his man to them, and they four did go in that boat, by the direction of the master, and were carried on board his smack.

After they came on board (for I would note the particular circumstances) they were very apprehensive of danger, for they knew what they went about, their own guilt gave them reason of fear, and when they came near a man of war, which lay at anchor in Long-Reach, in the river, they desired the master to hide them, that they might be safe from any search, and they were hid and put close under the hatches for some time; afterwards, when they came to another place of danger, it was by the Block-houses at Gravesend (as they apprehended), there they desired to be hid again; and so they were put in that place, where they were in very difficult circumstances under the hatches, and there they remained till a pinnace, that had been sent to enquire after them, came and boarded this same vessel.

Upon its boarding of them, the captain made a search, and found these gentlemen, my lord Preston, Mr. Ashton, and Mr. Elliot, and I suppose his man also, all hid under the hatches.

Then the next thing which is observable, gentlemen, and the great matter that will shew where the treason was, is this, there was a bundle of papers that was on board, ready prepared, if they had not been surprized, but could have had an opportunity for it, to have been cast overboard, and there was lead fixed to it, to have sunk it; and Mr. Ashton, the prisoner at the bar, was the person that concealed this bundle of papers betwixt his body and his coat, and from thence it was taken by the captain that took them.

When they were so taken, the captain, according to his duty, was bringing the prisoners to Whitehall, they desired to go on shore at Gravesend, but the captain did not think that so fit, but carried them on board the George frigate, and then you will hear these gentlemen did fall into a treaty with the captain to suppress these papers; and one instance I remember they did tell him, that since there were a parcel of papers that he had taken out of my lord Preston's pocket, he might take off the lead and fix it to those papers, and sink the others; and what should he have for it? They promised him great rewards, they told him he might be a great man, he had an opportunity of making his fortune; and when that would not do, they used many threatenings to him, all which will appear in the several circumstances that the witnesses will tell you of.

I come, gentlemen, in the last place to shew you, that all the whole conspiracy, all this treason, did lie hid under this bundle of papers that were taken from Mr. Ashton, and so he might well be afraid of having them opened, for there you will find a formed design to alter this government by a French power and assistance; and they contain so many particulars, that in regard I would not do the king's evidence injury on the one hand, nor the prisoner on the other, I will forbear repeating the particular instances.

Gentlemen, you will have all the letters and papers read; but in the general, I must needs say, you will find it manifest, that there is a black and wicked conspiracy to introduce a foreign power to establish the Protestant religion, and that by a popish interest, and to settle our laws, liberties, and properties by a French army. And let them pretend what they will for the Protestant religion, when you hear these papers read, no-body will imagine it was to any other purpose (if the plot had taken effect) but to have what religion, what laws the French king had pleased to impose upon us.

If the prisoner be guilty, gentlemen, of these matters, I know you will do your duty; but if he be not guilty, God forbid that you should find him guilty.

L. C. J. Holt. Call your witnesses, brother.

Serj. Thompson. We begin with Mrs. Pratt. [She was sworn.]

Sir W. Williams. Look you, Mrs. Pratt, here is another gentleman at the bar to be tried, against whom you are called as a witness.

Mrs. Pratt. Yes, my lord.

Sir W. Wil. Pray hear what we ask you. Pray do you give the court and the jury an account, what treaty you had with that gentleman about a vessel to go to France, and what was done in it?

Mrs. Pratt. If it please you, my lord, I was sent for to Mr. Burdett's house in Queen-street by Cheapside, to know whether he could have a smack to go for France; I told him yes, I could help him to one; he told me, there were two or three gentlemen bound for France, as merchants to fetch silk, and I was at Mr. Burdett's two or three times, and at last Mr. Ashton met me there.

L. C. J. Holt. Look upon the gentleman, is that he?

Mrs. Pratt. Yes, that is the gentleman, and he met me there, and meeting with Mr. Ashton, he hired the vessel; but, first of all, he desired us to meet at the Dog tavern upon Ludgate-hill, to make the bargain, and we did meet there, and were there about an hour, or an hour and a half, and Mr. Burdett did not come; and the next morning Mr. Ashton desired me to meet him at Mr. Burdett's again; and the next morning I met at Mr. Burdett's, and there we made the bargain for 100*l.* and there was a sixpence broke in two pieces.

Serj. Tremain. Was the 100*l.* paid?

Mrs. Pratt. Yes; but we agreed on the Tuesday morning, and there was a sixpence broken in two, and Mr. Ashton had both the sixpences in his hand, and the Tuesday night the 100*l.* was paid at Mrs. Burdett's.

Sol. Gen. Who was by?

Mrs. Pratt. There was one Mr. Elliott, and the master of the smack, and Mrs. Burdett.

Serj. Tremain. Did they pay the money in gold or silver?

Mrs. Pratt. This gentleman, Mr. Ashton, told the money, there was 93 guineas and a sixpence, and Mr. Ashton gave one half of the broken sixpence with the 93 guineas, to Mrs. Burdett; and when the master of the vessel brought the other half of the sixpence, or I, either of us, we were to have the 100*l*.

Sir W. Wil. Pray to what place did they hire the ship to go?

Mrs. Pratt. To France.

Sir W. Wil. Who hired the ship?

Mrs. Pratt. That gentleman.

Sir W. Wil. Who paid the money?

Mrs. Pratt. That gentleman, Mr. Ashton.

Sir W. Wil. To what hand was the money paid.

Mrs. Pratt. It was paid in Mrs. Burdett's bed-chamber into her hand.

Sir W. Wil. Who broke the sixpence?

Mrs. Pratt. Mr. Ashton, that day the bargain was made.

Sir W. Wil. Who carried it away?

Mrs. Pratt. When the money was paid, Mr. Ashton had one, Mrs. Burdett had the other part.

Serj. Tremain. To which part of France were you hired to go?

Mrs. Pratt. To any part where they could touch.

Serj. Tremain. Pray did they give you any note about any thing?

Mrs. Pratt. Yes, they gave me one note to meet at the Dog tavern, and another to meet at the Seven Stars in Covent-garden.

Serj. Tremain. Who gave you the notes?

Mrs. Pratt. Mr. Ashton, and Mr. Elliot.

Serj. Tremain. Look upon that note. [Which she did.]

Mrs. Pratt. This to my best remembrance Mr. Ashton wrote, I cannot well remember the hand.

Serj. Tremain. Did Mr. Ashton desire to meet at the Dog tavern?

Mrs. Pratt. Yes, and he did meet at the Dog tavern; but Burdett did not come.

L. C. J. Holt. When did you meet at the Dog tavern?

Mrs. Pratt. On the Monday night before New Year's day.

L. C. J. Holt. When was the money paid?

Mrs. Pratt. On Tuesday night, at Mrs. Burdett's.

Serj. Tremain. After the money was paid, what did you do the next day?

Mrs. Pratt. Mr. Ashton ordered a note to be written, to meet at the Seven Stars in Covent garden, at one Mr. Rigby's.

L. C. J. Holt. At what time were you to go to Rigby's?

Mrs. Pratt. A Wednesday night.

L. C. J. Holt. But at what time?

Mrs. Pratt. Some time about ten o'clock, and we came there accordingly.

Sol. Gen. Who was with you at Rigby's?

Mrs. Pratt. There was the master of the vessel, Mr. Ashton and Mr. Elliot, and two gentlemen more that I never saw before nor since.

Sir W. Wil. I ask you again, who first treated with you about hiring this vessel?

Mrs. Pratt. Mr. Burdett first treated with me about it.

Sir W. Wil. Who next?

Mrs. Pratt. Mr. Ashton.

Sir W. Wil. Who made the bargain with you?

Mrs. Pratt. Mr. Ashton.

Sir W. Wil. Who paid the money?

Mrs. Pratt. Mr. Ashton.

Sir W. Wil. What can you say more?

Serj. Tremain. Pray let me ask you, when you came to Mr. Rigby's, in what manner did you go away from his house, and what was said at parting?

Mrs. Pratt. Mr. Ashton was not there himself, at first; but he and Mr. Elliot, and two other gentlemen were there afterwards, and Mr. Ashton's wife said something about papers hove in a hat at court, and about somebody's being chosen; and one of the gentlemen said, there was nothing in that, I was one that was chosen last year.

Serj. Tremain. Did Ashton and Elliot go out together from Mr. Rigby's?

Mrs. Pratt. I did not see them go.

Mr. Trevor. Had you any directions from Mr. Ashton to send for a hamper or a trunk?

Mrs. Pratt. Yes, that was at Mr. Burdett's house.

Mr. Trevor. When was that hamper and trunk to be sent for?

Mrs. Pratt. On the Wednesday night before we went to Rigby's house.

Sir W. Wil. Do you know one W. Paseley?

Mrs. Pratt. Yes.

Sir W. Wil. Was he with them?

Mrs. Pratt. Yes, he was with them.

Sir W. Wil. What occasion brought him thither?

Mrs. Pratt. I carried him to Mrs. Burdett's house.

Mr. Trevor. Pray did the prisoner desire to see the master of the vessel, or speak with him?

Mrs. Pratt. Yes, and when I brought him, he said he liked him very well.

Mr. Trevor. What is the master's name?

Mrs. Pratt. William Paseley.

Serj. Tremain. Had you any discourse with Mr. Ashton's wife after they went away?

Mrs. Pratt. We had little discourse, only she gave me some victuals and drink; and she said she hoped I would not tell of her husband.

Serj. Tremain. What else did she say?

Mrs. Pratt. She hoped God would deliver them out of the lion's mouth.

Serj. Tremain. Did she say any thing about cock-crowing?

Mrs. Pratt. Yes, she said she thought she should have no good luck, for the cock crowed.

Serj. Tremain. Who was by in the chamber when the money was paid?

Mrs. Pratt. There was the master of the vessel by, and Mrs. Burdett.

Juryman. My lord, I heard her say something of some papers, which I do not very well understand. Does she know of any papers that the prisoner had?

Serj. Tremain. That was only about the two notes.

L. C. J. Holt. She talks of papers being shaken in a hat, but nothing can be made of it.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. If you would ask her any questions before she goes, now is your time to do it.

Ashton. My lord, I desire she may stand up again. Mistress, I ask a question, not so much in kindness to myself, as justice to another gentleman. You say Mr. Elliot writ one of the notes?

Mrs. Pratt. Yes, as I remember, it was that to meet at Mr. Rigby's.

Ashton. I do it to justify that gentleman, I take that note upon myself; and you say I hired the ship, and Mr. Elliot was by.

L. C. J. Holt. Look you, Mr. Ashton, Mr. Elliot is not now upon his trial, it concerns you only to ask such questions as relate to yourself. What is said now concerning Mr. Elliot, goes for nothing against him.

Ashton. My lord, I do it only to do him justice.

L. C. J. Holt. But you are to ask questions only for yourself.

Ashton. Remember, good woman, you are upon your oath; and have a care of forswearing yourself; my blood is at stake.

Mrs. Pratt. I am sure I say nothing but the truth.

Ashton. Did I ever speak to you of going to France?—Mrs. Pratt. Yes, you did.

Ashton. As I hope for salvation I did not.

Mrs. Pratt. And another thing you told me more, if I helped this well away, you would help me to the earning of 1,000*l.* before Lady-Day.

Ashton. Gentlemen, as to what was said of that kind, of helping her to 1,000*l.* is no great matter to the thing in hand; for if I was minded to go out of the kingdom, it was necessary to use all arguments I could, to persuade her to help me to go away.

L. C. J. Holt. Mr. Ashton, you must stay your time before you speak to the jury; make your observations upon the evidence to yourself, you shall be heard at large all that you can say in your proper time.

Ashton. I do assure myself, my lord, of all the favour that can be shown to a man in my circumstances.

L. C. J. Holt. You shall have all that is just, I do assure you.

Ashton. My lord, I am glad in the circumstances I am in, that I am to be tried before your lordship. But, good woman, by virtue of the oath that you have taken, did I ever speak to you directly or indirectly of going to France?

Mrs. Pratt. Yes, and you asked for a hole to hide what you might have occasion to keep secret.

Ashton. But I ask you about going to France; did I speak to you about going to France?

Mrs. Pratt. Yes, you did.

Ashton. Then, as I hope to be saved, I never spoke directly or indirectly of going to France to her.

Mrs. Pratt. You were not to go for Holland or Flanders, I am sure.

Ashton. Nay, I did take it for granted, that you did know before I met you, that we were to go to France; but I never spoke to you of it in my life, that I am sure of; but I only urge this to let your lordship know, that woman has forgotten herself.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Mr. Ashton, you will have all lawful favour; but your time for arguing upon the evidence is not come.

Serj. Thompson. You must ask your questions now, and make your observations afterwards; you must reserve yourself for that, till after we have done.

Ashton. But then, my lord, I shall have too many things for my memory to retain; and therefore I beg leave, as they occur to my memory now, and as the witnesses go along, to make my observations.

Serj. Tremain. Mrs. Pratt, pray, when the vessel was hired, and you were told it was to go to France, what persons did Mr. Ashton say were to go with him?

Mrs. Pratt. Three persons he said were to go, but he did not name them.

Serj. Tremain. Then set up William Paseley. [Which was done.]

Sir W. W. What can you say of any for the hiring of a vessel?

Paseley. I did not know the vessel was hired before I came thither.

Serj. Thompson. Prithee tell us what thou dost know.

Paseley. The woman came to me when I was at Billingsgate, and said I must go a little way along with her; and as we were going, she told me it was to go to Mr. Burdett's in Queen-street; and when we came there, Elliot and Ashton were not within: but by that time we had been there a little while, in came Mr. Ashton, and presently after him Mr. Elliot; and Mr. Ashton bid the woman give him the money out of the place where it was.

Juryman. My lord, we do not hear him.

Sir W. W. Pray begin again, and speak out.

Paseley. I met with this woman at Billingsgate, and she told me I must go a little way along with her.

L. C. J. Holt. That woman, name her.

Paseley. Mrs. Pratt; and I went along with her, and asked her where she was going; she said up into Queen-street: and coming to Queen-street, we went to Mr. Burdett's house, I was never there in my life before. When I came there, Ashton nor Elliot were neither of them there; after a little while in came Ashton, and presently after in came Elliot, and he went up stairs into the bed-chamber; and being in the bed-chamber, they brought the money out, rolled up in a half sheet of paper, set up an edge, and told it out at the window.

L. C. J. Holt. Who told it?

Paseley. Ashton told the money out; and after the money was told, he pulled out two pieces of a sixpence, and when he had pulled out the two pieces of a sixpence, he gives one half to this Mrs. Burdett, and the other half he kept himself; and he bid her pay this same money, when the other half sixpence that Ashton kept, came to this woman, to match that which she had; and after the money was told, we staid but a small while there, and came down stairs; and when we came down stairs we went down to Billingsgate. I think John Fisher was there, and we carried away with us a trunk and a hamper; John Fisher carried the trunk, and another man the hamper; and after that we had carried the things on board, I came up to the house again; and after I came up to the house, they directed us to go to the Seven Stars in the Little Piazza, there was a note written to direct us, which ordered us to go thither betwixt 10 and 11 at night. When we came there, I think there was neither of them there present, but by that time we had been there a small space, in they both came and sat down; and a gentleman came in and said the cock crowed, and therefore they should have no good luck. And then they talked about papers being tossed in a hat, I don't know what, and in came two gentlemen more, just before we went away, to see them; and after those gentlemen had seen them, they staid but a little while. Says Elliot to me, Master, come along with me; so I went along with him, and we came to Surry-stairs, and on the corner on the left hand, there was an ale-house. He called the waterman out of the ale-house, and he bid me go before, and I went down: and by the time that I had gotten down, the waterman came and hauled his wherry to, and I went in, and by that time I was gotten to the stern, down came Ashby and Elliot, and my lord, and his man.

L. C. J. Holt. You mean Ashton, not Ashby?

Paseley. Yes, my lord, that is the man. And after they had got into the wherry, and were seated, they bid the waterman put off from land, and so we went through bridge; and after we were through bridge, we got on board the smack, and they got into the cabin; and when they were got into the cabin, I called my men, and bid them haul up the anchor, and they did so; it proved to be but little wind, but that tide we got below Half-way Tree, and were forced there to drop our anchor, and stay till the next morning: the next morning we weighed anchor, and by that time it was nine o'clock, we got to Long Reach, where lay the George man of war, and there they hid.

Sol. Gen. And how was the biding, pray?

Paseley. It was down in the quarters under the hatches.

Sol. Gen. Why did they hide?

Paseley. We reckoned they would come on board a pressing, and they bid me shew my protection.

Serj. Tremain. Did they desire to be hid?

Paseley. Yes; and after we came by the George man of war, they came up again, and remained afterwards in the cabin, till we came almost to Gravesend: a little before we came to Gravesend, they all hid again; and when they were hid, remained hid all, I think, but only Elliot, I think, he popt up; and they were resolved to go eat their victuals; but then I told them there was a barge a coming, and so he went down again, and there they remained till they were taken, for the barge was on board presently, and found them there.

Serj. Tremain. What kind of place was it that they were hid in?

Paseley. They could not sit, nor stand upright in it, but lay all along, or leaned on their elbows.

L. C. J. Holt. What did they lie upon there, pray?

Paseley. There was ballast, and slit deal a-top of the ballast.

Serj. Thompson. Well, what happened when the captain came on board?

Paseley. When captain Billop came on board, Master, says he, you have got a couple of stout young men, I must press them, or to that effect. I hope not so, captain, said I. Why what have you to shew? says he; I told him, I had a protection. Let me see it, says he: so I shews him my protection, and he looks in it. Well, says he, Master, I must look farther; and went to rights to the place where they lay, and found them lying all together. After they were taken, and were come out, captain Billop commanded them into his boat, and commanded me and my two men, to go into the barge; afterwards he set his man on shore at Hungerford-stairs; and when we came to Whitehall bridge, the gate was not opened, and we staid a little while at Whitehall bridge; and when we came a shore, Elliot gave me half-a-crown, and bid me say, when I came upon my examination, that we were bound for Flanders, and not for France.

Serj. Tremain. Where were you bound for, pray?

Paseley. They examined me in the chamber, when they paid the money, if I knew they went to France; and I told them, yes, very well.

Serj. Thompson. Did they desire you to go to any particular port in France?

Paseley. No, we were to touch at any place we could.

Sir W. Will. Did they mention any thing of Flanders to you?

Paseley. No, they did not.

L. C. J. Holt. Did any body mention going to France to you?

Paseley. Yes, they did. They asked me, whether I could carry them to France safe.

L. C. J. Holt. Who did ask you that?

Paseley. Elliot or Ashton, one of the two, I cannot directly say which; but if I be not mistaken, it was Ashton.

Serj. Tremain. When came you from Rigby's at the Seven-Stars, who came away with you?

Paseley. Ashton and Elliot.

Serj. Tremain. Did Elliot and Ashton both come out with you?

Paseley. Yes, they did.

Serj. Tremain. And did they part after they were come out?

Paseley. Yes, Ashton did go away from us presently after we were come out.

Serj. Thompson. When you came on board, had you any discourse with Ashton about going to France?

Paseley. No, not that I remember.

L. C. J. Holt. Did you go on foot from the Seven-stars?—Paseley. Yes.

L. C. J. Holt. And did they part after you come out?—Paseley. Yes, they did.

L. C. J. Holt. And who went with you, did you say?

Paseley. Elliot came with me.

L. C. J. Holt. Whither went Mr. Ashton then?

Paseley. I cannot tell, my lord.

Sol. Gen. What did he say to you when he went from you?

Paseley. He bid me go along with Elliot.

L. C. J. Holt. Was Mr. Ashton there as soon as you?

Paseley. Not quite; but by that time the waterman had got the boat to the shore, and I in the stern, they were all come down.

L. C. J. Holt. When Ashton came, who came along with him?

Paseley. I saw them all upon the stair-head; I was in the boat when they came. I never saw my lord, till he was upon the stairs.

Juryman. My lord, I desire to ask him, what the sum of money was that was paid at Burdett's?

Paseley. It was 93 guineas and six-pence.

L. C. J. Holt. Who brought it?

Paseley. It was laid down in the window.

L. C. J. Holt. But I ask you, who brought it?

Paseley. I did see Ashton bring it, and lay it down in the window, and he told it out, and put it up again, and gave it to Mrs. Burdett.

Juryman. My lord, I desire to know what is the usual rate to go to Flanders? What may a smack and three men deserve?

Paseley. Truly I cannot tell, I never went upon my own account in my life.

L. C. J. Holt. Mrs. Pratt, what say you, what is the usual rate to go for Flanders or Holland?

Mrs. Pratt. I believe they may go for a matter of 20*l.* or 30*l.*

L. C. J. Holt. You hear them, gentlemen, what they say?

Juryman. Yes; but, my lord, he says, he gave them notice the barge was a-coming: I desire to ask him, Did he know there was a design to search him or no?

Paseley. Sir, I knew that there was a search for seamen.

L. C. J. Holt. But did you know there was to be a search, in order to the taking these gentlemen on board you? For that is the question, I believe, the jury would ask you.

Paseley. No, I did not know of it.

Sol. Gen. But you say, these gentlemen desired to be hid?—Paseley. Yes.

Sol. Gen. And you hid them according to their desire?—Paseley. Yes.

Serj. Tremain. Before you went on board, had you any discourse of hiding? Did they ask you for a place to hide in?

Paseley. Yes, they did.

Serj. Tremain. Who did?

Paseley. Ashton and Elliot both asked if there were a place in the ship to hide them, and I told them, Yes, there was.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Mr. Ashton, will you ask him any questions?

Ashton. My lord, I desire to ask him this question: did we desire you to come and hide us, or did you desire us to go down?

Paseley. You desired this of us, that if we saw any man of war's boat we would tell you, that you might be hid.

Serj. Tremain. Pray repeat that over again, did they desire you to give them information when any boat was coming, that they might hide, or did you desire them to hide yourself?

Paseley. They desired it of me.

Serj. Thompson. Then set up Charles Betsworth.

Serj. Tremain. Before Betsworth is examined, I would ask Paseley one question? Was there any coat left on board you?

Paseley. Yes, there were two coats of the waterman's left on board, and I took them and locked them up.

Serj. Tremain. Is that the man that owned the coats?—Paseley. Yes, it is.

Sir W. Williams. Then, Betsworth, will you give an account of what you know against the prisoner at the bar?

Betsworth. I cannot tell, my lord, I never saw the gentleman in my life before, that I know of.

Sir W. Williams. Prithce hear, friend, tell what you know of carrying any gentlemen on board the smack.

Betsworth. If it please your lordship, I was going home from our stairs about 7 or 8 o'clock in the evening; that is from Surrey stairs, and a gentleman called, Sculler. Said I to him, Sir, where do you go? Says he, As far as the Tower; said I, It is against tide, I cannot go; it will be ten o'clock before it be high water. Says he, will you go with us at that time? Said I, what will you give me? Will you give me half-a-crown? then I will carry you down, for I cannot stay out so late for nothing. Yes, says he, I will give it you. Then I came and brought my boat to the shore; he asked me then, what my name was; I told him Charles Betsworth. Says he, Will you be sure to stay till we come? Yes, said I, if you will be sure to come; and if I be not here, I will be at such a house, an ale-house, that was there by; the sign of the Swan: so I staid, and carried a fare or two over the water; and about 11 o'clock comes a gentleman down, and calls Charles, and I went out of doors down towards my boat, and there comes one gentleman down, and a kind of a seaman, as I thought; and the seaman went into the stern, and the gentleman sat down at the back-board, and there was three gentlemen more came down the stairs into the boat; one had a whitish cloak, and the other a loose coat; and they brought a leather bag that would hold about a peck; so I put off with them, and rowed down the river, and all that I heard them say, was, when we came under the Temple, says one of the gentlemen, When do you hear the king goes away? Says another of them, He goes away a Tuesday; and when we got through bridge, one of the gentlemen asked where the vessel lay, and a man in the stern said, On Southwark side, over-against the Tower; and when we came a little below Battle-bridge, near Pickle-herring stairs, the master said, There lies the vessel, and it had a long pendant and a top-sail loose; so they paid me before they came on board, and when they were got a-board, away rowed I, and when I came to land to take out my sculls and things, there I mist my cloaths; and I rowed after them, thinking they could not be got far; but when I came to the place where they went on board, the vessel was gone, and I rowed down as low as Limehouse Reach, and in Blackwall Reach I overtook a vessel, which I thought was the vessel. I asked them who they belonged to, and they said they came from Horsleydown; and I made answer, I brought two fares on board a vessel at Pickle-herring stairs, and had forgot to take my cloaths that they had; they made answer, I brought no fare on board them; so I rowed on farther beyond Barkinshelf, and because there was no wind, I thought none could have gone beyond that place, and therefore resolved to row back again when it was flood; and I rowed up to Greenwich, but could not meet with the vessel; and I heard nothing of my cloaths, till last Friday was sevensnight I had my cloaths brought to me.

Sir W. Williams. Can you say this gentleman, Mr. Ashton, the prisoner at the bar, was one of them that you carried on board the smack?

Betsworth. No, I know never a one of them.

Serj. Tremain. But you say the persons that you took in at Surrey stairs carried away your cloaths with them.

Betsworth. Yes, Sir.

Serj. Tremain. Then I ask you, Paseley, is that one of the persons that he brought on board your smack?—Paseley. Yes, he was.

Serj. Tremain. How many came on board the smack?

Paseley. Four; my lord Preston, Mr. Ashton, Mr. Elliot, and my lord Preston's man.

Serj. Tremain. Did you take in your pendant?—Paseley. Yes, I did.

Serj. Tremain. When did you take it in?

Paseley. As soon as we weighed anchor.

Serj. Tremain. How came you to take it in?

Paseley. Elliot spoke to me to take it in.

L. C. J. Holt. Did they mention how many were to go in the smack?

Paseley. He said, there were three of them, not four, as I remember, that were to go.

Sir W. Williams. Will you ask him any thing, Mr. Ashton?

Ashton. No, Sir: but I desire the woman may not go out of court.

L. C. J. Holt. No, no; she shall stay.

Serj. Thompson. Then call John Fisher and James Amords. (Fisher stood up.)

Sir W. Williams. Pray do you acquaint the court and the jury what you know of this matter, whether you carried any things on board the smack, and what, and who came on board, and what happened?

Fisher. My lord, a matter of six hours before they came on board, my master carried me a-shore, and brought me to Mr. Burdett's house, and gave me a trunk, and I went with it, and another man with a hamper, and brought them on board; and about 11 or 12 o'clock, my master comes and brings Mr. Ashton and the other aboard; and he bid me go forward, and heave up the anchor, and so I did, and we went down the river; but we could go but a little way because there was no wind, and when we came to Halfway-Tree, the tide turning, we were forced to cast anchor again, and stay till the morning; and in the morning we weighed anchor again, about 8 o'clock, and about 9 we came into Long-Reach, where lay the George man of war, and then Mr. Ashton and they hid; and when we came below them again, they came up again till we came almost near the Block Houses at Gravesend, and there they hid again; and Mr. Ashton, I think, came up afterwards, and bid me go down to the hamper, and fetch them up some victuals for their dinner, and I went down and fetched up some beef, and Mr. Ashton took hold of it; and I took a bottle of wine or two out; and just before I brought all the victuals up, the barge was spied a-coming to us; and then he went down again, and there they hid, and the piece of beef was a top of them. Captain Billop, when he came near, waved his hat, to bid us lie by; and we did lie by till he came up to us; and when he came up to us, says he, Master, you have gotten a couple of good likely men, worth the coming on board for. Says the master, I hope, captain, you won't press them. What have you to keep you clear? Says he, I have a protection. Have you, says the captain? Let me see it. So he shewed him the protection, and he read both our names in it. Then, says he, Master, I must look farther; and he went down to the quarter-hatches, and took them up just where they lay. First my lord came out; and he searched them all as they came out:

Mr. Elliot came out next, and Mr. Ashton staid within, being the last man. And after he had searched them, and done what he pleased, he got all the papers and writings; then he commanded us all to go into the barge, and they came on board the George frigate in Long-Reach. And at the ship, Mr. Elliot came to us, and bid us say, we were going to Flanders. And after we came to Whitehall, Mr. Ashton gave me a half-crown piece, and bid me say, we were bound for Flanders, and not for France.

L. C. J. Holt. Was that after they were taken, or before?

L. C. J. Pollexfen. When was the first time, that they would have you say, they were bound for Flanders?

Fisher. It was on board the George frigate in Long-Reach.

L. C. J. Holt. Who was it that bid you say so?

Fisher. Mr. Elliot and Mr. Ashton both, in the ship's steerage, where they came to us.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Where was the next place they bid you say so?

Fisher. At White-hall bridge Ashton gave me a half-crown piece, and bid me say so.

Juryman. Did he speak that aloud, or softly at Whitehall?

Fisher. He whispered it in my ear.

L. C. J. Holt. Did they ever say they were bound for Flanders, till after they were taken?

Fisher. No.

Serj. Tremain. What manner of place was this that they hid in?

Fisher. An ugly hole, where a man has no room to lie along at ease; he can neither stand upright, nor sit upright.

Serj. Tremain. Did you see the waterman that brought them on board?—Fisher. No.

Serj. Tremain. Was there any waterman's coat left?—Fisher. Yes, there was two.

L. C. J. Holt. But didst thou see the boat?

Fisher. We were asleep when they came on board, and the boat was put off as soon as ever they came on board.

Serj. Tremain. Then as soon as ever they were on board, you got up the anchor and pulled in the pendant?

Fisher. Yes. We immediately hove up the anchor, and took in the pendant.

Serj. Tremain. Did any sculler hail you afterwards, as you were going down?

Fisher. Yes, as we were going down there did.

Serj. Tremain. What did you say to him?

Fisher. I was not steering then; but this other man made answer.

L. C. J. Holt. Mr. Ashton, will you ask him any thing?

Ashton. When I gave you the half-crown that you speak of, what did I say to you?

Fisher. You bid me, when I came to be examined, say we were going to Flanders, and not to France.

Ashton. What did I say else?

Fisher. You bid me take that half-crown for to night, to help to bear my charges, and to-morrow you would take farther care of us.

Ashton. I told you, you were prisoners now, and I gave you that, and told you I would take farther care of you.

Fisher. You did not say we were prisoners, but you said you gave me that to help to bear charges for that night, and on the morrow you would take farther care of us.

Serj. Thompson. Then set up James Amonds.

Sir W. Williams. Are you sworn, friend?

Amonds. Yes, Sir.

Sir W. Williams. Then let the court and the jury know what you can say in this matter.

Amonds. My lord, they came on board about 11 or 12 o'clock at night; I was asleep in the cabin, and heard a boat coming aboard, and I turned out, and before I could get out of the cabin, they were got aboard, and I see no boat, nor nothing. So says the master, go forward and heave up the anchor, and after we had heaved up the anchor, I goes into the ship to tow the vessel down, because there was no wind, and we would not let the vessel go foul on the ships that were in the river, and a little after we came on board again; and when I came on board again, they were all on board, all four. After that comes a waterman, and I was at the helm steering, and he called out to us, Oh hoe! says he; did not I bring a parcel of gentlemen on board this smack? Not as I know of, said I. Says he, I carried a parcel of gentlemen on board some smack that had a pendant out, and I know not where it is; they carried my cloaths on board with them. Said I, I know nothing of it, nor I did not; for I saw neither waterman nor boat; so away the waterman goes, and we went down the river, and when we came to Halfway-tree, we came to anchor, and my master went and laid himself down, the tide being almost done, and there being no wind, and Mr. Ashton and they lay in the cabin: and says Mr. Ashton to me, take care of us now, and we will take care of you hereafter; says he, we shall help you to many a freight, and many a pound. Ay, ay, said I, you will be taken care of to be sure at day-break, or when the day comes on. About 8 o'clock, we hove up the anchor again, and fell down as low as Long Reach, where the George frigate lay; and when we came there, they went down to hide in the quarter hatches. I steered it down still; and when we were got past that man of war, the hatches were taken up, and they came up again out of the quarters, and sat in the cabin again, and we had a fresh gale of wind, and run down to Gravesend quickly, and when we came near the block-houses, said I, we are almost at the block-houses; then said they, we will go down and hide a little; and so they did till they were past there, then resolving to go to dinner.

L. C. J. Holt. What time a day was this?

Amonds. About 11 o'clock, as near as I can guess.

Sol. Gen. Well, they did go down to hide then, did they?

Amonds. Yes, they did go down and hide, and came up again, I am sure some of them; I heard some of them in the cabbin.

Sol. Gen. Well, what followed?

Amonds. After they were gotten up, and past Gravesend, this man was sent for victuals for them, and so he fetched them some roast beef, and some other things; and just as the roast beef was going into the cabbin, said I, here comes a barge off to press. So when I cried, the barge was a-coming, they took the victuals down into the quarters, and there lay they, and the victuals a-top of them. And when the barge came near us, the captain waved his hat to command us to lie by. Said I, 'We must lie by, for the barge is coming up to us.' And we clapped the helm-a-lee, and lay by; and after we were laid by, the barge came on board us. Says the captain of the barge, 'You have got a couple of likely good men, master,' said he. 'Ay, says the master, but I hope you won't press them.' Says the captain, 'Have you got any thing to keep you clear?' 'Yes, if it please you, noble captain; I have got a protection.' 'I am sorry for that,' says he, and comes on board, for he staid all this time in the barge; and smiling upon him, he comes on board, and says he, 'Come, let us see your protection.' And the master shewed it him and he read it. Says the captain, 'I must look a little farther.' And he goes into the cabbin, and took up the hatches, and there lay all these gentlemen. They were something longer in coming up than he would have them; so says the captain to his men in the barge, 'Come on board, and see who is here.' And so some of his men did come on board; and, to the best of my remembrance, my lord was the first man that came up: and when my lord came up, the captain run his hands into his coat pockets, to feel for papers, as I suppose; and my lord desired the captain to be kind, and take nothing away. Says he, 'I'll take nothing but papers; it is papers I look for:' and he pulled out a watch, and gave him again. After that Elliot came out; and whether he found any thing upon Mr. Elliot or no, I cannot tell. Mr. Ashton was the last that came up; and when he came up, a waterman of the captain's calls to him, and says, 'That gentleman that came up last has put something into his bosom, but what I can't tell.' So the captain took Mr. Ashton by the arm, and turned him about, and says he, 'What did you put in your bosom?' Says Mr. Ashton, 'Nothing but my handkerchief;' and pulled out his handkerchief, and shewed him. Then the captain put his hand in, and pulled out papers, with a piece of lead tied to them. And that is all that I saw.

Serj. Tremain. But tell us what happened afterwards?

Amonds. When that was done, the captain commanded us all into his barge; and I rowed, and some of the rest rowed, it being cold weather, till we came up to London. After we came up to London, they did not say any thing to me, because I was a-rowing till then. It seems they did give them some money, but they gave me none, not till I came into Whitehall; and then my lord's man came to me, and called me a one side: says he, 'Here's half-a-crown, will serve you to night; and be sure, when you come to be examined, that you say you were bound for Flanders, and not for France, and you will be taken farther care of to-morrow.'

Serj. Tremain. What manner of place is that quarter-hatches?

Amonds. They could neither sit, nor stand upright in it.

Serj. Thompson. What did they lie upon?

Amonds. There were three or four slit deals that were laid over the ballast, but it seems they had shuffled them on one side when they were taken, for the ballast lay open.

Serj. Tremain. Did the waterman that brought these men on board you leave his coat there?

Amonds. I did not see the boat, nor the waterman; and therefore I am not able to say any thing about it.

Sol. Gen. How came the pendant to be taken down?

Amonds. I can't tell that; I was in the skiff when it was taken down.

Juryman. My lord, I do not well understand how the papers came to be taken away from Mr. Ashton.

L. C. J. Holt. He tells you, Mr. Ashton was seen to put his hand with something into his bosom; and being taxed with it, he said it was his handkerchief; and the captain put in his hand, and pulled out a bundle of papers.

Juryman. Did he see Ashton take away the papers from any other place?

Amonds. No, an't please your honour, I did not see them till they were taken out of his bosom.

L. C. J. Holt. Did you see captain Billop take the papers from out Mr. Ashton's coat?

Amonds. Yes, I did.

L. C. J. Holt. Where were they before they spied the barge a-coming?

Amonds. If it please your honour, I heard them talk; I thought they had been up, but it seems there was but one of them up when they said, the barge was coming aboard: I was at the helm, and heard them talk.

L. C. J. Holt. Then you knew nothing of these papers, but when you saw them taken out of Ashton's bosom?—Amonds. No, my lord.

Sir W. Williams. If you will ask him any thing, Mr. Ashton, now you may.

Ashton. Pray, friend, had not I been up first, and searched before the papers were taken?

Amonds. Not as I know of.

Ashton. Did not I go down into the hold to take my hat, and call to you, and desired that I might go down for my hat?

Amonds. I cannot tell; for when I saw the papers taken from you, I was in the stern; I was not down.

Ashton. Had not I been searched first?

Amonds. Not that I know of, till you were in the stern.

Serj. Thompson. Then swear captain Billop. Which was done, he standing up by the Sheriff.

Serj. Tremain. Captain, I suppose you may be heard from that place.

Ashton. My lord, I desire the witness may come down, else I shall not be able to distinguish what he says: It is the proper place for him I think.

L. C. J. Holt. Let him come down.

Ashton. I humbly desire, my lord, that the witnesses may all be obliged to stay in court.

L. C. J. Holt. Let them all stay.

Sir W. Williams. You are sworn, Sir: Are you not?

Captain Billop. Yes, I am.

Sir W. Williams. Then, pray, will you give an account where you took these persons, how you took them, what you found, and how you disposed of it?

Billop. Must I begin from the beginning?

Sir W. Williams. Yes; Tell your whole knowledge, in order of time, as it fell out.

Billop. What, from the time I went out?

Serj. Thompson. Make it as short as you can.

Sir W. Williams. Yes, you must tell all; for you speak now to a new jury, and here is another prisoner at the bar to be tried.

Billop. The last of December, about two a-clock, or between one and two, my lord of Danby came to me at one of the doors of the House of Lords, and told me, his father must speak with me; and he carried me up to my lord Lindsey's chamber; and in a little time my lord president came there, and told me, he heard there were divers persons that had papers of dangerous consequence, and were going to France, and desired me to use my skill for my seizing and securing of the papers. I began then to talk of what was proper for such an undertaking; and I told my lord, I thought the best way was to go to Woolwich or Deptford, and to take a man of war's pinnace with us: upon that, my lord of Danby being by, said, he knew of a boat that he could have, which was my lord duke of Grafton's; and my lady duchess had lent it him, and he would go and get it ready: upon this my lord president said, he would give me a note of the name of the vessel, and where she went out; and likewise a letter to another person, that would instruct me farther, and shew me the vessel: accordingly my lord president gave me the letter, and I went away to look for the person, but could not find him. My lord Danby came to Tower-Wharf himself with the boat; and I left a man there to bring me word when the boat came up at the place where I was; and captain Stringer and sir Thomas Taylor came there to me. After my lord of Danby had told me what I had in the boat, I told him, I thought there were not arms enough; and therefore it were best to go to the Tower, to borrow some arms from thence:

when we came to the Tower, my lord Lucas was not come in; and when I had staid a little time, he did come in: and when I had acquainted him with my business, he sent for an officer of the guard, and there we borrowed some arms, a blunderbuss of his, and a carbine, and the like; and about eleven a-clock, or somewhat past, we put off from Tower-Wharf. It was calm, and we rowed down towards Gravesend; and we went aboard a vessel or two; but I was not willing to lose much time, because I was resolved to take them before they were gotten too far: so we rowed away for Gravesend, where I refreshed my men, and afterwards went down into the Hope; and I did judge that no vessel that came from London that tide could be a-head of me. I went on board several vessels that lay in the river, in order unto the pressing of men; and I went on board all sorts of vessels, because I would give no suspicion of what I was about; and having been on board of several, I pressed two or three Barkin men; and one particularly, that knew all the vessels upon the river; and I made him to row very near to me, that I might talk to him; I had got the names of a great many smacks, and gave it out, that I would press a smack to carry for a tender to my ship, when the fleet went out; and naming this smack that I was to go to search, I told him, 'I heard such a smack sailed well, and I had thoughts of pressing her:' he told me, 'She was old:' but said I, 'She will serve a summer well enough; and that is it I intend to press, if I can find her.' Says he, 'I'll shew you her, I know her when I see her.' So we went on board several vessels as we went along. And as we were rowing along, before we came to the Nest point by Tilbury-Fort, we saw several smacks coming down the river; and when we came about the point, the headmost smack of all, the fellow looked out, and said, 'Yonder is the Thomas and Elizabeth.' Then I called to one of my men to wave, and bring them to lie by; which they did, and they lay by till I came on board. When I came on board, I saw two lusty men stand by the master; said I, 'Master, you have got two good lusty fellows that would serve the king; but I'll be kind and civil to you, I'll take but one.' Says the master, 'I hope not so, for I have a protection.' With that, I came on board, and took his protection in my hand, and read it. As soon as I had read it, I asked him, if he had no more men upon deck than what I saw? He said, 'No.' Then, said I, 'I must look a little farther.' And I went into the quarters, and took up the scuttle, and the hatches, and I saw some gentlemen lie. 'Oh,' said I, 'what a pretty posture is this! where are we a-going? gentlemen, you must turn out.' The first that came to hand was my lord Preston; but I did not know him then, nor some time after I was in the boat with him: So I took hold of him, and helped him up; and when he was up, said I, 'Sir, I must search you.' Says he, 'I hope you will take nothing from me.

‘Nothing,’ said I, ‘but papers.’ So I searched all his pockets; and as I found any papers, I put them into my own coat-pocket. And I took his watch, and pulled it out, and gave it him again: after that I had searched him, came up Mr. Elliot the first man, and the next was Mr. Ashton, who crowded up while Elliot came up, in his night-cap. I think, Mr. Ashton, you had your night-cap on. So Mr. Ashton goes down again, and puts on a perriwig, I think; but coming up again, one of my seamen sees him take something, and put it into his bosom: he follows Mr. Ashton quick, and pulls me by the coat: and, says he, ‘That gentleman has got something in his bosom.’ So I took hold of him, and turned him round: Said I, Mr. Ashton, what have you got in your bosom? Nothing, says he, but a handkerchief; and immediately he put his hand into his bosom, and plucked out the handkerchief, and shewed me. As soon as he had pulled out the handkerchief, I put my hand into his bosom, and there I met with the packet that had the lead affixed to it; and pulling it out, I clapped it into my own pocket; for I thought that was the matter of moment that I was to secure. So I ordered them to go into the boat, and the master of the vessel to let go his anchor: and two men I left in the vessel, whom I ordered to search, and to secure what they found till farther order; and I left two musquets with them. And after we were in the boat, they desired to have something handed in, which I gave order for, a hamper, and a night bag; and away we put off from the vessel, and rowed up; it was against tide, and very cold weather. In a little time Mr. Elliot called one of the gentlemen my lord; then I whispered him, and asked him who that lord was; and he told me, it was my lord Preston. Then I saluted my lord; and my lord was pleased to say, he was very well satisfied they were fallen into the hands of a civil gentleman. So rowing up against tide, and it being a westerly wind, which blowed very fresh, my lord desired that I would let them stop at Gravesend, till the tide turned, that they might refresh themselves. I begged his pardon, and said, there was a ship in Long-Reach, the George frigate, and we would stop there; and I did not doubt but I could command the great cabin for his accommodation; and there he might have any thing that he wanted. My lord seemed contented with it: but before we came on board the man of war, there happened a great deal of discourse betwixt us of several things.

Sir W. Williams. Pray repeat it, as well as you can remember; what discourse happened?

Billop. Truly, my lord Preston being cold, and the hamper standing by, says he, captain Billop, we have not eaten, we will eat, if you will. And there was a piece of beef at the top of the hamper, and bottles of wine; and I opened the hamper, sitting fairest for it, and handed out the beef, the bread, and the bottles; and after we had eaten what we would, my lord ordered the rest to be given to the men that were the boat’s crew; and after we had done this, and taken out a bottle or two, and shut up the hamper again, my lord Preston drank to me once or twice, and seemed very well satisfied and pleased with his usage. He told me, he was sensible of my civilities; and if ever it lay in his power, he would not forget me. So we drank again, and talked again; but before we came to the ship, my lord Preston told me, that if ever it lay in his power, he would be sure to make an acknowledgment of the civility I had shewed him. And, to the best of my memory, he had this expression, ‘If there ever was any thing he could serve me in, he would do it with all his heart, if I would but dispose of the packet.’

Serj. Thompson. What would Mr. Ashton have had you done? What did he say to you?

Billop. Mr. Ashton said, it would do me no good to injure so many gentlemen; and desired me that I would throw the packet overboard.

Serj. Tremain. What did he mean by so many gentlemen?

Billop. My lord, I cannot tell; but that was his expression.

Serj. Tremain. Who desired you to throw the packet over-board?

Billop. Mr. Ashton did several times.

Serj. Tremain. What did he say to you? What arguments did he use?

Billop. My lord, it was so many times over, and so much mixture of discourse we had, that I am not able to tell the particulars.

L. C. J. Holt. But what arguments did he use?

Billop. I do not know that he used any more great arguments, more than what I have told you already.

L. C. J. Holt. Say that again that you said before.

Billop. He said, it would do me no good to injure so many gentlemen. Prithee, captain Billop, says he, throw it overboard.

Serj. Tremain. What did he say farther?

Billop. I will tell you, if you will give me leave. Mr. Ashton did say, a little after this, with a great deal of insinuation, ‘Captain Billop, what if you should turn about, and go along with us?’ ‘No, Mr. Ashton,’ said I, ‘that I cannot do.’ Says Mr. Elliot, ‘Prithee, throw the packet overboard.’ This they did as we came up the river; and it is the most that I can remember, till we came on board the George; and when we came on board the George, Elliot called me into the steerage, and desired me, of all love, that I would dispose of the packet: and he said, that now I had an opportunity to make myself as rich, and as great as I would, and nobody could see it, if I did throw it away. While I was in the ship, Mr. Ashton, my lord, and Mr. Elliot were with me in the steerage. Said I, ‘I shall be taken notice of to be whispering; pray forbear.’ Ashton then spoke to me again, to desire me to throw the packet overboard. By this time the victuals was handed in, and there we eat and drank, and my lord smoaked a pipe of tobacco before the tide turned; and when the tide made, we went into the boat again, and rowed up towards London, and they were using these sorts of arguments over and over again. And once Mr. Elliot, I think it was, to the best of my remembrance, told me, 'Now you have it in your power to make your fortune, and may be as great a man, and as rich a man as you can desire.' And Mr. Ashton said some words something to the same purpose: 'Prithee,' said he, 'throw it overboard: what good will it do you?' So I refusing it, as I did many times, Mr. Elliot told me, that I might take the letters that were taken, in my lord Preston's pocket, and tie the lead to them, and throw the packet overboard. 'No,' said I, 'Mr. Elliot; sure you would take the king's counsel to be a very odd sort of men, that they cannot find out such a thing as this.' 'Prithee, dear Billop,' said he, 'throw it overboard;' many times whispering me in the ear; and so did Mr. Ashton many times, saying, 'You may do us a great kindness in it.' And we drank, and had several intermissions; and they at me again, and I denied them, and they desisted; and then they at it again: and Mr. Elliot then told me, 'Prithee, dear Billop, throw it over-board.' Said I, 'Mr. Elliot, if I should be so great a villain to do such a thing, if ever it was your day, would you trust me again? Put it to be your own case.' Says he, 'You have gentlemen to deal withal.' 'But,' said I, 'I will never put it into your power.' Mr. Elliot seemed to be angry at this, and said, 'Every dog had his day.' Said I, 'I hope never to see it your day: but I pray forbear this discourse; let me beg that of you; for I do not desire to be provoked to use you otherwise than as gentlemen.' And after that, they never urged me more to throw the packet over-board: but Mr. Elliot was angry, and very much disturbed, and wished a thunder-bolt might strike the boat and sink it. So I brought them up, through London-bridge, and they said no more about the packet: but Elliot wished, that London-bridge might have fallen on our heads. At length I brought them to Whitehall; and I put my man ashore at Hungerford stairs, that he might get before, and give the porter notice at Whitehall-bridge, that he might open the gate. I brought my lord Preston and the rest to the bridge; and while I was arming my men, to guard them up to my lord Nottingham's office, I suppose they then took the opportunity to give the men money, getting near to them; I know nothing of that: but I carried them up to my lord Nottingham's, and there I delivered them and the packet to my lord. After some time, the packet lay upon the table, and my lord Nottingham sends me for my lord Preston. When my lord Preston came in, I withdrew without bidding, and the packet lay upon the table unopened: and when my lord Preston came out, I went in myself, and the packet lay in the same place and posture, and not opened. And I stayed while Mr. Ashton was called in, and my lord Nottingham asked him a great many questions.

Ashton. Pray repeat those questions, captain Billop; and what answers I made.

Billop. Truly, my memory does not serve me to remember all of them, and I was in a very uneasy condition at that time, and would much rather have been in my bed, than any where else: for the night before I went down, I had a plaister of Spanish flies put to my back, and they had raised a great blister, and it had not been dressed so long, that the napkin that was applied stuck so to it, that the flesh was jagged, and I was in a great deal of pain, so that I did not mind so much as I should have have done at another time, what was said.

Ashton. But pray, captain, remember as much as you can what passed.

Billop. But I will tell you what I remember, I remember my lord Nottingham asked, who I took the packet from? And you owned, I took it from you.

Sir W. Will. Pray, Mr. Ashton, give us leave to have done with him, and then you shall ask him what you please. Pray go on, captain Billop.

Billop. Then my lord Nottingham sent for Mr. Elliot in, and asked him whither he was going? And he said for Flanders. My lord asked him, what he was going there for? He said, he was going to seek his bread; he was turned out of all at home, and he had rather go abroad to seek his bread, than stay at home to starve.

Serj. Tremain. Was this the lead that you took fixed to the packet?

Billop. Yes, Sir; that is the lead.

Serj. Tremain. Did you take that lead, with the packet, out of Mr. Ashton's bosom?

Billop. This was tied fast to the packet that was taken out of Mr. Ashton's bosom. These honest men saw me take it.

Sir W. Will. Now, if you have a mind to ask him any questions, you may.

Ashton. Pray, captain Billop, did not you search me before you took the packet upon me?

Billop. No, not that I remember.

Ashton. Had not you taken some other papers from me before?

Billop. No, Sir; I took none from you but the packet.

Ashton. Pray recollect yourself, for perhaps my life may turn upon it: You are as much a witness for me, as for the king; you are to swear the truth, and the whole truth.

Billop. And I will do you all the justice I can, I will assure you.

L. C. J. Holt. Answer his question, captain Billop.

Ashton. Was not I the first man that spoke to you after we came up?

Billop. No, Mr. Elliot was the first man that spoke to me, that I knew.

Ashton. Did not I ask you to give me leave to go down for my hat?

Billop. Truly, I do not remember that.

Ashton. Did not you reply, That the man should go down and fetch my hat?

Billop. It is likely I might, but I do not remember it.

Ashton. Had not you searched me then, and taken my papers from me?

Billop. No, Mr. Ashton; for upon the oath that I have taken, I took no papers that I remember, but the papers that I took out of my lord Preston's pocket, and the packet that I took out of your bosom; for my lord Nottingham asked me, if that packet was all the letters I took? I told him, no; and shewed him the papers I took out of my lord Preston's pocket, and they proved to be of no consequence, and my lord Nottingham gave them me again, and I carried them to my lord Preston.

Ashton. Did I not go down into the hole for my hat?

Billop. I believe you might.

Ashton. And was it not after that, that you took the papers out of my breast?

Billop. Yes, I believe it was.

Ashton. Where is your man that called to you, and said, I put something in my breast?

Billop. Here he is by me, if you would ask him any thing?

Ashton. You say, I spoke to you about disposing of these papers; pray, from the time that we came into your boat, before we came on board the George man of war, did I speak to you?

Billop. Yes, of the packet you did: You said, 'What good would it do me to injure so many gentlemen?'

Ashton. There passed no more than general discourse before we came on board.

Billop. Yes, Mr. Ashton, I will tell you another thing you put me in mind of. When you saw that, though you were so eager with me, nothing would prevail, you said, 'I know Capt. Billop, and have known him many years; and nothing will prevail on him, if he have no mind to it; And I know, if he will serve us, he will serve us generously, and like a gentleman.'

Sir W. Wil. Speak that again.

Billop. He said, 'I know capt. Billop; if he will serve us, he will do it generously, and like a gentleman.'

L. C. J. Holt. Who said so?

Billop. Mr. Ashton.

Ashton. Did I speak to you to dispose of the papers after we came from on board the ship? I suppose you remember it was cold, and the tilt was called for, to be laid over us, and I fell asleep; and you know I never waked, nor spoke, till I came to London-Bridge.

Billop. Yes, yes; we had the tilt over us.

L. C. J. Holt. Pray speak your questions out, that we may hear them, Mr. Ashton.

Billop. Mr. Ashton did go to sleep a while; but he had many times urged me, and spoke to me to throw the papers over board.

L. C. J. Holt. Who was it that told you 'every dog had his day?'

Billop. That was Elliot.

Sir W. Wil. Was there any discourse about turning of the tide?

Billop. Mr. Elliot said, 'You have now an opportunity to make your own fortune, and you may be as great, and as rich as you please; for it is impossible the tide can run long this way.'

Serj. Tremain. Did Mr. Ashton say any thing about going along with them?

Billop. Yes: You may remember, Mr. Ashton, that you said, 'Come, go along with us, you may do as well there, or better than you do here.'

Serj. Tremain. Did he tell you where you were to go with them?

Billop. No, Sir; nor I did not ask him the question.

Ashton. Pray, when did you give my lord Nottingham these papers?

Billop. Do you mean that bundle that I took out of your bosom?—Ashton. Yes.

Billop. As soon as ever I followed my lord Nottingham into his room, I pulled them out and gave them him.

Ashton. Did not you go out of my lord Nottingham's room, and give my lord Nottingham some loose papers?—Billop. Yes.

Ashton. After this, was not my lord Preston called in to be examined?—Billop. Yes.

Ashton. How long was my lord Preston in the room while you were out?

Billop. I cannot tell very well.

Ashton. Pray, Sir, answer that question.

Billop. I believe it might be half a quarter of an hour. I do not think it was much more.

Ashton. I believe you must remember some sort of discourse that was betwixt you and captain Elliot, even to a quarrel almost. And did you not speak to my lord Nottingham's servants, to fetch your hat out of my lord Nottingham's room?

Billop. Yes, I do remember that.

Ashton. This must be a good considerable time: it was all the time that my lord Preston was within with my lord Nottingham, that you were out?

Billop. Yes, it was.

Ashton. And all that while was not the bundle of papers out of your sight?

Billop. It lay upon the table.

Ashton. Pray, answer my question? was it not out of your sight?

Billop. Yes, it was.

L. C. J. Holt. Yes, yes; it must be, for he was out of the room.

Serj. Tremain. When you came into the room, did you find the papers in the same condition?

Billop. Yes, they were un-opened, except that my lord had taken off the lead, and a little paper fell loose from the rest.

Ashton. Pray, take notice of that, gentlemen.

L. C. J. Holt. But pray don't infer more from thence than it will bear.

Ashton. It seems some of the papers were taken out.

L. C. J. Holt. He does not say any such thing, that some of the papers were taken out.

Ashton. He says, something was cut, and some papers fell out.

Billop. There was a little paper or two tied to the great packet.

L. C. J. Holt. What became of them?

Billop. They were cut loose, but not opened.

Ashton. How can you tell they were not opened?

Billop. Because I stood by when they were cut.

Ashton. But how can you tell that; for you see the little papers taken, and they were loose from the others?

Billop. They were taken from the great bundle before I went out.

Ashton. Had not my lord opened those papers before you came in?—Billop. No.

Ashton. How can you tell that?

Billop. I tell you, as near as I can judge, they lay in the same posture that I left them in.

Ashton. Was the packet sealed when you took it?

Billop. No: but it was tied. There were several letters in it that were sealed; it was tied up very hard.

Ashton. I do not question but my lord Nottingham will do me the justice to say how long he was in the room.

L. C. J. Holt. You must not comment, nor make your observations till your proper time.

Juryman. Pray, my lord, I desire he may be asked, who was with my lord Nottingham when my lord Preston was there?

Billop. There was nobody else then.

Juryman. Then 'tis not probable they were altered before captain Billop came in.

Ashton. But I hope probabilities shall not be evidence to condemn any man.

Juryman. Those two little papers you speak of, were they severed from the packet?

Billop. I cannot tell whether they were or no; they seemed loose upon untying the bundle.

L. C. J. Holt. Were they cut in your presence?

Billop. Indeed, my lord, I cannot say that I did see them cut.

Ashton. Pray take notice of that, gentlemen of the jury.

L. C. J. Holt. They are twelve honest gentlemen, they will do you right.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Observe what the witness says; he says, That he does not remember that they were cut in his presence, but he does not say they were not.

Ashton. If he does not swear they were, it is reasonable to conclude they were not cut in his presence.

L. C. J. Holt. He says, the great packet was not opened, the two little papers were loose from the rest of the great bundle.

Billop. There might be two or three of them, less or more, I cannot tell.

Serj. Thompson. You will be farther satisfied in this matter upon my lord Nottingham's evidence, I suppose.

Serj. Tremain. We have done with capt. Billop for the present. Pray call Johnson. [Who was sworn.]

Sir W. Wil. Were you at the taking of that gentleman, and the other in the smack?

Johnson. Yes, I was.

Sir W. Wil. Then pray give an account of the matter how it was?

Johnson. We went down in a pleasure boat, and went to the Tower, we set through bridge against tide, my lord of Danby was with us; and when we came to Tower wharf, there they went to the Tower for arms, and we stayed till ebbing water, and rowed to Gravesend; and when we came to Gravesend, we went on board several ships, and I thought we were going a pressing; and we stayed at Gravesend the time of the writing of a letter, and then we went both into the boat again, and rowed after a smack that had gained of us; but that not being the smack, we turned back again, and then it was high water: and when we came to the upper end of the Hope we saw several smacks coming, and there was a fisherman on board that said, That was the smack the captain enquired after, that was coming down there; and when they came on board, the captain said, there were two or three brave men, and he hoped he could spare one of them: and the master said, he hoped he would take none of them, because they had a protection, which he shewed to the captain. Then the captain went in and bid me take some small arms, and go on board with him, and told the master he must look a little further; and the boards were taken up, and I saw a great piece of roast beef, and under that, my lord Preston, and Mr. Elliot, and this gentleman, Mr. Ashton: my lord Preston came up first, and Mr. Elliot next to him; and I see this gentleman take up something and put it into his bosom, and I told the captain of it, and he asked him what it was, and he said, nothing but his handkerchief, and plucked out the handkerchief; but the captain put his hand into his bosom, and pulled out something else.

L. C. J. Holt. What was it?

Johnson. It was a parcel of papers tied up, with a piece of lead tied to it, for I came up close after him, and see him take it up.

Sir W. Williams. What else were there found with the papers? was not there some seals?

Johnson. That was afterwards; but when the captain asked him what he had gotten in his bosom, he pulled out his handkerchief, and said, Nothing but his handkerchief; but the captain took the other papers out of his bosom, and so I went down, and there were the two seals, and I took them up; and when I came up, Elliot had a pair of black whiskers on, and he borrowed a pair of scissars and cut them off, and said, he should remember me again if ever he lived, he should know me by my tooth being out. And coming up into Long Reach, Elliot was a cold, and got to the oar and rowed, and said, You row as if you were rowing to prison; and he wished that a thunderbolt might drop into the boat, and that London Bridge might drop down upon his head. And when we came up to Whitehall, I stood a guard over them.

Juryman. Did you see captain Billop take the packet of letters from that gentleman's breast?—Johnson. Yes, I did.

Juryman. Did you belong to captain Billop?

Johnson. Yes, I was one of the boat's crew.

Ashton. Had not I been up and searched before?

Johnson. Yes, I think you had been up before.

Ashton. And then you saw me take up the packet off from the ballast?

Johnson. Yes, I saw you take it out of the ballast and put it into your bosom.

Ashton. Gentlemen, I hope you will be pleased to take notice of that.

L. C. J. Holt. No doubt of it they will.

Ashton. Did not that bundle of papers that was taken out of my breast, did not they lie near to the place where the seals lay?

Johnson. Yes, it lay just by them.

Serj. Thompson. Pray set up captain Billop again. [Which was done.] When you brought these papers to Whitehall, captain Billop, who did you deliver them to?

Billop. To my lord Nottingham.

Serj. Thompson. After he received them, what did he with them?

Billop. After he had examined all these gentlemen, he went to opening of the papers, and he desired me to stay in the room till they were opened, which I did; and my lord looking on some of the papers, said, If this packet had gone, we had quickly been visited by the French. With that I took them up, and looked into them. My lord said, I might look into as many papers as I pleased; but I was very uneasy, and full of pain, and had more mind to be gone, and be a-bed, than looking into papers; but several of the papers I did look into, and several I put my mark upon; and the next day at the council, what of them I did know, I did put my mark upon.

Serj. Thompson. After my lord Nottingham had perused them, what did he do with them?

Billop. My lord put them up in a cover, and tied them with a piece of twine, and put his seal upon them, and gave them me, and desired me to carry them to my Lord President; which I immediately did; and, without stopping, carried them to my Lord President.

Ashton. When was this, Sir? Was it that very night that we were brought to Whitehall?

Billop. Yes.

Serj. Tremain. Then we must desire my lord Nottingham to be sworn.

The Earl of Nottingham sworn.

Serj. Thompson. Will your lordship please to give the court an account how these papers came to your lordship, and how your lordship disposed of them?

E. of Nottingham. Captain Billop came to my office—

Ashton. I humbly desire your lordship would please to speak louder; for I cannot hear your lordship, and I fear the jury cannot.

E. of Nott. I speak as loud as ever I can, but I have a great cold.

L. C. J. Holt. You may hear my lord very well, if the court be but silent.

E. of Nott. Captain Billop brought to me a packet tied about with a packthread, to which there was a piece of a leaden pipe fixed, in which packet there was stuck in another paper; I think there was but that one besides the cover, but what it was particularly I do not remember: this packet was laid upon the table while he was by; and I called in my lord Preston, not being willing to make him stay, and after I had some discourse with my lord, to examine him what account he could give of these proceedings: then I called in yourself, Mr. Ashton, and captain Billop was by also, but the packet so tied with the packthread, I cut open in Billop's presence with a pair of scissars; the same papers that were in that packet, together with the little paper that was stuck in, I tied up; I am sure I sealed them in a sheet of paper, and gave them back again to captain Billop to carry them to my Lord President.

Sir W. Williams. Captain Billop, you have already declared, that all you received from my lord Nottingham you carried to my Lord President.

Billop. All the papers that I received from my lord Nottingham, just as I received them, sealed with my lord's seal, I went directly to my Lord President's, and gave them him.

Sir W. Williams. Pray, my lord, did your lordship deliver to captain Billop all the papers that you received from him?

E. of Nott. My lord, all the papers that captain Billop brought to me, that were in the packet (for he brought some letters that he took out of my lord Preston's pocket, that were of no consequence), but all the papers that were in the packet, I delivered back to captain Billop, sealed as I received from him, and no more, and no others; for the other letters, they being from my lord Preston's children, and not relating to the public, I gave them to him to give my lord Preston again.

Ashton. My lord, I humbly beseech your lordship to tell the court how long my lord Preston was with your lordship in the room?

E. of Nott. Truly I am not able to tell you particularly how long it was, I believe it might be about a quarter of an hour, or scarce so much.

Juryman. Was there nobody with your lordship, when captain Billop was out, but only my lord Preston?

E. of Nott. No, not that I know of.

Ashton. My lord, I have one favour more to beg your lordship, I humbly pray your lordship will please to tell the court and jury what answer I gave to your lordship, when you asked me how I came by those papers?

E. of Nott. As near as I remember, the account that you gave of them was, That you went down again after you were come up, as you said, to fetch your hat; and that when you did go down into the little hole to fetch your hat, you brought these papers with you.

Ashton. My lord, this was the account I did give. Now this very well corresponds with that man's evidence, that says he saw me take up the papers and put them into my breast.

L. C. J. Holt. He does say so, and this does all very well agree.

Sol. Gen. Now we desire my Lord President would be pleased to be sworn.

The Lord President sworn.

Serj. Thompson. Pray, my lord, will your lordship please to declare to the court what papers captain Billop brought to your lordship, and how your lordship disposed of them?

L. President. Captain Billop did bring me a packet tied with a packthread, and that was sealed with my lord Nottingham's seal, I knew it to be his seal; and he told me, that my lord Nottingham commanded him to bring the packet to me. I opened the packet, and perused all the papers; it was very late, and I locked them up till morning, and I then carried those very papers to the king, and in the king's closet, at Kensington, the king read some of them, and in my sight, for I never parted from the king, but was by all the while: the king put up all the papers again, and commanded me to call a cabinet council, and to let them be delivered there to the council; accordingly I did deliver them paper by paper, and they were all marked there by my lord Sydney, who is here present; and they were then delivered into the hands of my lord Sydney.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Will you please to ask my lord any questions, Mr. Ashton?

Ashton. My lord, if your lordship will be pleased to pardon me, I would ask your lordship, did any of your lordship's servants or family, read any of these letters?

L. President. No, not one.

Ashton. Were they locked up where any of your lordship's secretaries or servants could come to them?

L. President. No, I locked them up in a strong box in my closet.

Ashton. My lord, I only desire this favour further of your lordship: your lordship, at the committee of the council, was pleased to ask me, how I came by those papers; I presume you may remember, and I pray your lordship to declare, what answer I gave.

L. President. Truly, Mr. Ashton, to tell you truth, I do not remember the particulars; I remember you denied every thing; I can only say that, in the general; but what you said in particular I cannot remember.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Do you put my lord in mind if you can; see whether he does remember it.

Ashton. My lord, I only desire to ask my Lord President, whether I did not tell him I went down, after I had been searched, into the hold, and there I see the papers lie, and brought them up, and put them into my breast; they were no sooner in my hands but captain Billop had them in his; for the man called and said, This gentleman has something in his breast, and the captain put in his hand and pulled it out.

L. President. Truly, Mr. Ashton, I do not remember the words that you used, but remember you said something to which I made answer, What makes it matter, they were found upon you, and taken out of your bosom, do you look to it how you came by them. I do not remember what you said, for I cannot remember particular words, but I believe you might say some such thing.

Sol. Gen. Then, pray, my lord Sydney, will you be pleased to be sworn?

The Lord Sydney sworn.

Sol. Gen. Will your lordship be pleased to declare what papers you received from my lord president?

L. Sydney. At the cabinet council my lord president delivered a packet of papers, I received them every one there, and marked them, and put them into my pocket.

Serj. Tremain. Did your lordship deliver them to any person afterwards?

L. Sydney. The next day, or the day after, I gave them to Mr. Bridgman to copy out, and he delivered them back to me again.

Sol. Gen. Pray, my lord, give me leave to ask this question—

Serj. Thompson. Your lordship had marked them before you delivered them to Mr. Bridgman to copy?

L. Sydney. Yes, I marked them at the council table, at my lord Nottingham's office.

Sol. Gen. My lord, those papers that you marked, were the same papers that my lord president brought, and delivered in at the council?

L. Sydney. Yes, the very same.

Juryman. My lord, shall we have leave to ask my lord Sydney a question?

L. C. J. Holt. Ay; what is it?

Juryman. Pray, my lord, did the packet come to you sealed? That which was taken from this gentleman, was it sealed when it came to you?

Sol. Gen. No, it had been opened by my lord Nottingham, and my lord president.

L. C. J. Holt. Sir, you are under a misapprehension of the matter. My lord Nottingham, after he had opened them, sealed them up again, and delivered them to captain Billop; captain Billop carried them sealed to my lord president; my lord president opens them, and lays them up; they were never out of his possession; he carries them to the king; the king read some of them in his lordship's presence; he delivers them at the cabinet council to my lord Sydney; and my lord Sydney swears he read them there, marked them, and when he had done, put them in his pocket.

Sol. Gen. My lord Sydney, will your lordship be pleased to look upon these papers, and see if these be part of them.

L. Sydney. I know them very well, I have read them ten times, I marked them at the council, and that is my mark.

Sol. Gen. Pray, my lord, are those two papers that you have in your hand, two of those papers that my lord president delivered at the cabinet?

L. Sydney. Yes, that they are.

Sol. Gen. My lord president, will you please to look upon them. [Which his lordship did.]

L. President. These are two of the same papers that captain Billop brought me.

Sol. Gen. Now we shall desire to have them read; but give me leave to observe to you, that one of them is a copy of the other; only in the one some words are written short, that are written out at length in the other.

Juryman. Pray, my lord, I desire to ask, are they of the same hand?

Sol. Gen. No, they are of different hands.

Serj. Thompson. Pray, gentlemen of the jury, take notice, and observe these papers, for there is a great deal of matter of great moment in them; for you cannot expect the king's counsel should repeat every thing that is in so many papers as we shall read; it is impossible we should take notice of all.

L. C. J. Holt. Or I either, therefore pray, gentlemen, observe what is read, for I shall be able only just to state the evidence to you.

Ashton. My lord, I hear them say, one of those papers is a copy of the other; I desire, the original may be read, and not the copy.

Serj. Thompson. Who knows which is the original?

L. C. J. Holt. Look you, Mr. Ashton, we do not know which is the original, or which is the copy, they are both found together, they contain the same matter, and the same words; it may be you can tell which is the original.

Serj. Thompson. You may look upon them yourself, and tell us which is the original, if you please.

Ashton. That is very well observed, Sir. That is throwing water upon a dead mouse. Then I desire both of them may be read.

Sol. Gen. Indeed, Mr. Ashton, I think there is a particular reason why you should not desire to have the copy read, because least it should prove to be your own hand writing.

Ashton. Pray, let both be read.

Cl. of Peace reads. "The result of a conference——"

Serj. Tremain. Pray, attend, for this is the scheme of the whole work.

Cl. of Peace reads. "The result of a conference, &c." [And the other was likewise read as before.]

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Pray, let Mr. Ashton see that paper.

[The paper was handed to Mr. Ashton, being one of the papers before read.]

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Mr. Ashton, look upon that same paper a little, satisfy your own mind a little whose hand that paper is in. Look upon it well, I would have you be satisfied about it. Look particularly upon the latter part of it.

Ashton. My lord, I have looked upon it, I have seen it all.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Come then, give it me back again, and think of it a little in your own heart.

Sol. Gen. My lord Sydney, pray, will your lordship look upon this paper?

L. Sydney. This is one of the papers that was, among the rest, delivered by my lord president, at the cabinet.

Sol. Gen. Pray shew it my lord president; what says your lordship to it?

L. President. This was one of the papers I gave my lord Sydney, and was brought to me in the packet by captain Billop.

Cl. of Peace reads. "That the king would return with a design of making an entire conquest of his people——"

Serj. Thompson. Pray, my lord, give me leave, before it be read, to acquaint the jury what this is, that they may make the better observations upon it. This, gentlemen, is the Heads of a Declaration that was intended to be published when the French came; and you will see what it is when it is read. Pray observe it.

Cl. of Peace reads. "That the king will return," &c. As before.

Serj. Tremain. The next paper is an account which they had taken with them of the force of the kingdom, of the ships, particularly how many in number, what rates, what were in repair, what out of repair, and what a building. Pray shew it my lord Sydney.

L. Sydney. This is another of the papers that I received from my lord president, and marked at the cabinet.

Serj. Thompson. Then shew it my lord president.

L. President. This is one of the papers that were in the packet that captain Billop brought me.

Cl. of the Peace reads.

Sol. Gen. Pray, my lord Sydney, look upon these papers, and tell where your lordship had them.

The Papers were shewn both to the lord President and the lord Sydney.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord president says he received them from captain Billop, and gave them to my lord Sydney; and my lord Sydney says, they are the same he received from my lord president.

Juryman. Are those the papers that have been read, my lord?

Just. Eyres. No, but they both say the same, as to those that have been read.

Juryman. Then pray, my lord, what are those papers that are going to be read?

Serj. Tremain. These are two letters, gentlemen, that are written, giving an account how the affairs in England stood with reference to the persons concerns that they are written to; and there is a particular passage in one of them, how their young master prevailed in his interest, and got ground of his adversaries. If you observe them, you will easily understand what is meant by them.

Clerk of the Peace reads. This is directed for Mr. Redding, New-year's Eve, "Though the bearer of this, &c." (As before.)

Clerk of the Peace reads. This is directed for Mrs. Redding. "As it is impossible for me to express, &c." (As before.)

Sol. Gen. Now we desire my lord Sydney, and my lord president would look upon these papers.

Juryman. My lord, I desire the former part of that last letter may be read again. (Which was done.)

L. Sydney. These I had from my lord president.

L. President. And I had them out of the packet that captain Billop brought me.

Serj. Tremain. If your lordship please, I will open them to the jury. Here are two letters, in one of them there is an account given, that they were heartily sorry they were disappointed, and that they had not been here already, but hoped they would be here as fast as they can; that the match was concluded, the settlement prepared, and no doubt but the daughter's portion would be well secured, if they would come quickly.

Clerk of the Peace reads. "Dec. 31, 1690. It is directed for Mrs. Charlton. I must not let this bearer depart, madam, &c." (As before.)

Serj. Tremain. That letter tells you that the daughter's portion would be well secured; this that we now produce will tell you, how it shall be raised. It says, the old tenants are weary of their master, and a little matter, if he would but appear in Westminster-Hall, would redeem the estate; and the cause might be brought to a final hearing before the end of Easter term, if they made haste, and it were well solicited.

Clerk of the Peace reads. This is directed for Mr. Jackson, Dec. 31, 1690. The bearer hereof will give you, &c. (As before.)

Sol. Gen. We must desire my lord president, and my lord Sydney, would be pleased to look upon these papers.

L. President. I received these from captain Billop in the packet, and gave it to my lord Sydney.

L. Sydney. These are some of the papers I had from my lord president.

Serj. Tremain. The letters we now produce to be read, seem to be written by a man that was involved in a great trade, that had great projects in his head, and drawn many schemes in his own brain how to carry on the trade; he directs what sort of wares he would have sent, what was proper for their markets, that he had got many a new customer, and hoped they should not be disoblged; that all must be sent before the 1st of March, at least before the tenth, or the whole summer profits would be lost.

Clerk of the Peace reads. "31 Dec."

L. C. J. Holt. Read the superscription first.

Cl. of the Peace. There is no superscription, my lord, at all.

L. C. J. Holt. Well, read on.

Clerk of the Peace reads. Dec. 31. "The interruption of the former correspondence had a very ill effect many ways, &c." (As before.)

Serj. Tremain. Gentlemen, doubting that letter might not be pressing enough, here is another to the same effect.

Clerk of the Peace reads. "Dec. 31. It is a presumption incident to those that are any ways upon the spot, &c." (As before.)

Serj. Tremain. One would imagine this letter were written by some person that used to talk cant, that he is so ready at it.

Sol. Gen. Pray, my lord president, what says your lordship to these papers?

L. President. These two letters were in the bundle that captain Billop delivered to me, and I delivered them to my lord Sydney.

L. Sydney. These are some of the papers I had from my lord president, at the cabinet.

Serj. Tremain. That first of these papers is a letter wherein the party gives an account of his own condition here, and how he would venture to bring about what was desired.

Clerk of the Peace reads. "31 Dec. 1690. Was my condition more desperate and uneasy than it is," &c. (As before.)

Serj. Tremain. This little paper was inclosed in the other.

Clerk of the Peace reads. "I beg," &c. (As before.)

Serj. Tremain. Now shew this paper to my lord president, and my lord Sydney. [Which was done.]

L. C. J. Holt. My lord president, and my lord Sydney swear the same for this paper, as for the rest.

Serj. Tremain. This paper shews they were going about a deed that they did not desire to have known; it is a key how to explain their meaning.

Clerk of the Peace reads. "For Mrs. Anne Russel," &c. (As before.)

Then three other Papers were shewn to, and sworn by the lord president, and the lord Sydney, to be part of the same papers.

Serj. Tremain. The papers that we are going to read are these. Gentlemen, here is a letter of recommendation in behalf of one Mr. Orbinet, which is a name, they pretended of some person that was at Paris, or to go there, and it is written by one Mr. Dellivere, to his correspondent there; and he tells him, the bearer had something to disclose to him, and that he might have an entire confidence in him: but the letter of recommendation alone, without a sum of money, they reckoned would meet with a bad welcome in France, and therefore they take 500*l.* with them, and here are two bills to pay it.

Then Mr. Humphrey Levermere was sworn to interpret them, being in French, (which he did) and read them as in the former Trial.

Juryman. Were these bills found in that packet?

Serj. Tremain. Yes, yes; they are sworn to by both those lords.

Sol. Gen. Now, pray, my lord, will you please to look upon these papers?

The Lord President and lord Sydney both testified, that those were part of the Papers.

Serj. Thompson. This next paper that we give in evidence is very short. It seems to be a table for the memory of the person that was to carry it. They are short heads for the memory, consisting of a great many particulars; you will make your observations upon them, and what judgment you think fit of them.

Serj. Tremain. My lord, I desire to take notice of these papers that we are now going to read; you will observe these things in them, which are worth your remarking, gentlemen; because these papers that we now read to you, are of themselves sufficient to prove every article in the indictment: for these papers give an account of the ships, their number and force, the forts of the kingdom, how they are manned, how they may be surprized, where the French fleet should fight, where they should assault us, how they should hinder the Dutch and English fleets from joining, what number of soldiers would be sufficient, and what number of ships in Newcastle to plague the city of London, how to manage this whole affair; and it gives characters of the clergy of England, and particularly of the city of London, and says, they are the worst of men.

Serj. Thompson. No, brother, it is the worst of all the clergy.

L. C. J. Holt. Come, read them.

Clerk of the Peace reads. "Lady D. 2,000*l.*" &c. (As before.)

The Jury desired to see the last Papers, and had them delivered to them.

Sol. Gen. Then we rest it here, to see what the prisoner will say to it.

L. C. J. Holt. Mr. Ashton, the king's counsel have done their evidence for the king, what have you to say for yourself?

Ashton. My lord, I humbly desire to know of your lordship, whether all the letters are read, that were read at the trial of my lord Preston?

L. C. J. Holt. What is that material to you, whether they be or not?

Ashton. My lord, I am informed, that there were several letters, that particularly name my lord, implying him to be the bearer, and I desire those letters may be read.

Serj. Thompson. With all my heart, if you do desire it, it shall be read, we do not think it material.

VOL. XII.

Ashton. I do desire it; it will be plain, I believe, from hence, that I could know nothing at all of this matter; and if your lordship please, my lord, to observe it, three or four of these last papers, as Mr. Serj. Tremain observed, were the ground-work of all this business, which refers to Portsmouth and South-Sea, and some other papers; these, I think, with submission, were proved to be the hand of another gentleman, and I desire it may be proved again to the jury, by which I think it will be plain, that they do not affect me.

L. C. J. Holt. Look you, Mr. Ashton, it is not proved to be your hand, nor pretended to be so.

Ashton. But positively proved to be another's hand, as I am informed, and it is that which Mr. Serj. Tremain observed, was the ground-work for carrying on the whole design. I presume the witnesses are in court that proved it then, and I hope your lordship will be so kind as to let it be proved now; they did prove it to be another person's hand upon a trial not long ago.

L. C. J. Holt. If you have a mind to call any witnesses to prove the papers to be another's hand, you may call them.

Ashton. I hope the king's witnesses are now in court that did prove them to be his handwriting, and they will prove it now I suppose.

L. C. J. Holt. If you have a mind, you may call them, they have not a mind to produce them for the king.

Ashton. I know not where they are, my lord. Pray Mr. Aaron Smith, be you so kind as to call them.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. You should have sent and subpoenaed them to be here.

Ashton. Mr. Warr is there, my lord, I desire he may be asked the question: and I believe Mr. Blane is in the court, pray let him be asked.

L. C. J. Holt. Mr. Warr, you are called by the prisoner, as a witness, to prove my lord Preston's hand.

Ashton. Mr. Warr, Mr. Townsend, and Mr. Blane, I desire may be all asked.

L. C. J. Holt. Mr. Ashton, you have insisted upon it, that these papers were my lord Preston's own writing.

Ashton. My lord, I do insist upon it, to know whether they were not proved to be his hand.

Serj. Tremain. Yes, they were so, it is agreed.

Serj. Thompson. We do grant the king's witnesses proved, that they did believe them to be my lord Preston's hand.

L. C. J. Holt. The king's counsel do admit, that these three last papers were not your hand, but they admit them to be my lord Preston's hand, and it is very well done of them to admit it; so that now it is to be taken for granted, that those three last papers were my lord Preston's hand.

Ashton. Then, my lord, I desire the substance of those papers may be the more pressed upon the jury, because Mr. Serj. Tremain observed that the whole design in the scheme of it lay in those papers, and they are not my hand, but another's; and for what is in them I know nothing, nor am concerned.

L. C. J. Holt. What have you farther to say, Sir?

Sol. Gen. You mentioned another letter, which you did desire should be read.

Ashton. Ay; two or three where my lord is named.

Sol. Gen. This is the letter I suppose you mean, the clerk shall read it.

Clerk of the Peace reads. "Sir, I vow to you, I do not repine at having lost all for your sake," &c. (As before.)

Ashton. Gentlemen, I hope you will observe, in that letter my lord is called the bearer; and it tells that he brings papers with him, by which it is plain, that you cannot imagine I could know any thing of these papers. And, gentlemen, it has not appeared, by any evidence that has been given, that I knew any thing more, than that they were unfortunately found upon me: but with submission, I believe there is another letter, if I am informed right, wherein my lord is named, and called, my lord the bearer.

Sol. Gen. Sir, I do assure you now we have to my observation, read every letter, and every paper, that was read on Saturday.

Ashton. Mr. Solicitor, I am satisfied, for I am confident you would not affirm it, if it were otherwise.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. There is not any letter that says my lord the bearer, but my lord will give you an account, so and so; the bearer will tell you these and these things. Will you have it read again? You shall if you will.

Ashton. I am unwilling to take up your lordship's time, unless the jury desire to have it read again.

Juryman. Pray, my lord, when that letter was read on Saturday, how was it construed by the court? How did they take it then?

L. C. J. Holt. We did take it then, because my lord was mentioned, that he might possibly be the bearer.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. It is very probable, and so it was understood then, that the lord mentioned in the letters was my lord Preston, and so that my lord was the bearer that could give an account of the countess's condition; and in the beginning of those papers that are of my lord's hand, there is mentioned so much money for the lady D——, which is my lady Dorset, I suppose, that is there meant, and that writ that letter.

Ashton. No, my lady Dorchester.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Dorchester, I cry your mercy; and it is probable, the same reason is a reason still to make it believed that my lord Preston was meant.

Ashton. I think my lord chief justice was pleased to observe, as I have been informed, in giving his charge to the jury, that these papers, some of them naming my lord, must be meant of my lord Preston, there being no other lord but he; and he likewise gave another reason; says he, They lay by my lord's seals that were produced, and therefore it was plain they could not be Ashton's nor Elliot's.

L. C. J. Holt. No, not so, but my lord might be concerned, because my lord's seals were there where the papers were found.

Ashton. I am wrong informed, if those were not the words my lord chief justice Pollexfen used.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. What do you say were the words? If you will repeat them, I'll tell you as near as I can.

Ashton. Your lordship seemed to infer, that my lord being named, and the bearer in the same paper, that of consequence, that must be my lord Preston, and the papers must be his; and you did give another reason for it, to enforce it, that the same man that saw me take them up, saw them lie by the seals, which were proved to be my lord Preston's, from whence your lordship did say, it is plain they were my lord Preston's, and that Ashton or Elliot could not be concerned in them.

L. C. J. Holt. You mistake that matter, sure there was not any such word said, for that evidence that tended to convict my lord Preston did by no means tend to acquit you; the question then was, how far my lord Preston was concerned; my lord insisted upon it, says he, they were not taken from me, but from Mr. Ashton; there the question was not about you.

Ashton. I humbly hope, my lord, you will forgive me for insisting upon these matters, because I am for life.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. I would do you all the right I can, I assure you, Mr. Ashton; but certainly, there was no such thing said as you have mentioned.

Ashton. My lord, I do not question but you will do me right, and I thought so when I chose the jury out of the first that appeared, without challenging any.

L. C. J. Holt. Well, Sir, pray go on to your defence.

Ashton. My lord, my own defence will be very weak upon the whole, for I am very illiterate and unskilled in the laws, but where I do fail of taking advantage, to observe what may be for my advantage, I hope your lordships will be so kind to me, as well as just (I may call it) to yourselves, being upon your oaths, as to take notice of it. My lord, in the first place —

Serj. Tremain. Before Mr. Ashton proceeds, I would observe one word in a letter that has been read, which is one of these papers; it says, "I say nothing of another gentleman that takes opportunity to see those parts, but he has shewn a zeal and sincerity in the affair equal to most."

Serj. Thompson. You hear, gentlemen, that there is notice taken of another person besides the bearer.

Ashton. Pray, my lord, is it any consequence that I must be the person that must be meant, or that I must know what the contents of the letter was. There was another besides me, and so it is not plain, who was meant; or if I were the man meant in this letter, it must not therefore follow that I must know of it.

Serj. Tremain. I did not mention it as a proof that you were the person meant, but only to shew that there was another person besides my lord taken notice of in them.

L. C. J. Holt. I must confess, I think Mr. Ashton observes right, it does not concern him, for as well as he was there, there was another, and it is uncertain whether it relates to him or the other, and so it signifies nothing at all; that's my mind. Pray go on, Mr. Ashton.

Ashton. My lord, upon the whole I have this to observe; first as to my business of going into France, I must ingeniously own it, though I protest to you I never owned it or named it to the woman, though she had sworn it, but yet I do now. My design was to go to France, and I had very great and good reason for it, I think; I had endeavoured all ways I could in the world to procure a pass to go to France; it is very well known, I did business under lieutenant-general Worden, that died half a year ago; his accounts are now depending, and such accounts as may be prejudicial in some points to his family, to whom I have always owned, and must, a great obligation, and would be very glad upon all occasions to serve it, and all the branches of it; this was not the whole nor the only design I had in going thither, but I had likewise some business of my own, I have a considerable sum of money owing me, if it be necessary to prove it, I can prove it by a bond from a person that is there; a great sum it is, a very considerable one to me at least. And, my lord, I did think, if I did not go myself, it was impossible for me to do any thing in that affair; and that was the true and only reason of my design in going to France, having been out of hopes of getting any other convenience other-ways; this was not a design just now formed, as if I were just now upon some plot concerning the public, but it has been my design ever since lieutenant-general Worden died, and he upon his death had engaged me to do it; and I once went down, hoping to have gone from Dover, and there I was apprehended and taken. And, my lord, I have used all manner of endeavours to go other ways, but they always failed me, and this way I hoped would have taken: my lord, I do own I did hire the boat, and I did pay the money; but, with submission, I think that is not any manner of treasonable act, my lord: perhaps it is an ill act, but it does not amount in the least to treason; going to the king's enemies, suppose I went upon that account, that is no manner of treason in the world; carrying papers to the king's enemies, except it be proved that I was privy to them, and knew the contents of them, if lawyers inform me right, is not treason; then what remains? It is true, I must own the papers were found upon me, and I believe, there is nobody that has heard the evidence that has been given, but must readily conclude, that I found them in the place where the seaman says I took them up; and besides, my lord, there is not any manner of proof so much as aimed at by the king's counsel in all their evidence, that I was privy to any one of these papers; so that, my lord, I think there is very little proved upon me at all; I had the misfortune to be taken in this company that was going where these papers taken, it's true, but they have not attempted to prove that I was privy to, or knew any thing of them at all, nor that I was more concerned than that they were taken in my stomach; this is all I have to observe upon the whole: as to the business of the indictment, there are great and grievous aggravations in it, and such as I am not able to comprehend the meaning of, the words confound me; and therefore I humbly desire your lordship to tell me upon what statute I am indicted.

L. C. J. Holt. I'll tell you, Mr. Ashton, you are indicted upon the 25th of Edward the 3rd, for conspiring, compassing, and imagining the death of the king and queen, and for that purpose going to France, and endeavouring to incite the French king to invade the kingdom, and telling him how he should do it, and letting him know in what state and condition the kingdom was, and how fit to be invaded.

Ashton. Pray, my lord, is that at all proved upon me?

L. C. J. Holt. That is the question that the jury are to judge of upon the evidence that has been given.

Ashton. As to that of compassing the death of the king and queen, I am ignorant of dealings in law; but I conceive there are several species of treason mentioned in that act of the 25th of Edward 3rd, and as to the imagining the death of the king, that's only to be proved by some overt-act: now I think nothing at all has been proved of any open act conducing to prove the imagination or compassing the death of the king or queen, no manner of consultation or treasonable act at all; and therefore, my lord, I do not see that there is any great matter that is proved upon me, and I hope you are of that opinion too.

L. C. J. Holt. Mr. Ashton, that you may not go away with a mistake, any that designed the deposition of the king and queen, and the invasion of the kingdom, which is proved by any overt-act, is sufficient to prove that they compass and imagine the death of the king and queen.

Ashton. I presume it may be so; I believe that may be the construction of the law.

L. C. J. Holt. And I make no question but those that you have consulted with have told you as much.

Ashton. Truly as to counsel, my trial has been as hard as ever man met withal.

L. C. J. Holt. Why do you say so, Mr. Ashton? the court has not been hard upon you.

Ashton. My lord, I do not complain of the court, but as to the matter of time, I had notice by that gentleman, Mr. Bale, to prepare for my trial, and that was on Friday, and not before.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Friday was sevensnight, you mean, I suppose.

Ashton. Yes, I do mean Friday was seven-night, I was then a close prisoner, I had not the opportunity or liberty of seeing any Christian soul; I spake to him then, and told him, Mr. Bale, this is very short notice, pray be so kind as to move my lord that I may have counsel; truly he was civil enough, and said, he would do all he could; says he, Will you give me the names of your counsel? So I gave him the names of four and of a solicitor; but I never heard more of him in the matter: I did with all my industry and skill give my friends notice, but I was under great difficulty, for I had not the liberty of pen, ink, nor paper, nor a man to send upon a message on Saturday; I gave my friends notice of it upon Sunday, which was no very good day for business, they applied themselves to my lord Sydney, whose favour and kindness I shall always own as long as I live; he gave me all the dispatch possible, and got me an order to see my wife that day, though it was Sunday; the next day I made application to have my council come to me, that was Monday; he with the same readiness procured that: but it was Tuesday in the afternoon before I could see any living soul but my wife; and some of the counsel that I desired would not readily come to me, and it was Wednesday before I did see any body of them, and so I had but Wednesday and Thursday to consult with them in. On Friday I was brought here, and I endeavoured to procure a copy of the pannel, that I might inform myself of the characters of the men that were to be my jury; and my lord, I would desire you would give me leave to clear one point, which through inadvertency slipt from me about the time that I desir'd to send to enquire about the jury. I did not mean, as was apprehended, to send to them to take them off, but I only meant to enquire after their characters; this was done upon Friday; I had not a copy of the pannel till last Friday, when we were arraigned in court, it was two of the clock before the pannel was given us, it was between three and four when we came to Newgate; we were to come upon our trial the next morning by eight of the clock; so that before the copies could be transcribed for us, there were left but six hours for us to enquire into the morals of so many men, of whom some lived eight, some ten, some fifteen miles out of town; for my part I was not able to enquire after any one, and that your lordship may think, by my taking the first twelve that appeared, and believing myself innocent of this matter, I resolved to put myself upon my trial by any twelve indifferent English men; I only beg if I have omitted any thing in reference to myself, or misbehaved myself with respect to the bench, that you will please to set me right, and consider that I stand here for my life; and to grant me your pardon for any thing wherein I have offended your lordships, to whom, and to the jury, I refer my cause: only I beg leave to call two or three witnesses, I know it hath been allowed before in such cases, to give some short account of my life and conversation, because it hath been reflected upon me that I was a Papist, because I designed to go into France; but I believe there is not any man, whose devotion to the Protestant religion established by law, is greater than mine hath been, or to whom that religion is dearer than to myself.

L. C. J. Holt. You are not accused of any such thing; nobody pretends you are a Papist; but call whom you will.

Ashton. Pray call Dr. Bursh, Dr. Lake, Dr. Fitz-Williams, and Dr. Davenant. There is Dr. Fitz-Williams; I beg the favour of you, Dr. Fitz-Williams, to give the court an account of your acquaintance with me, and particularly about my religion.*

Dr. Fitz-Williams. Will your lordship give me leave, my lord?

L. C. J. Holt. Ay; come, what do you know of Mr. Ashton?

Dr. Fitz-Williams. I suppose, my lord, that he calls me in as a witness to his religion and to his morality, I think so; with my lord's permission I will give the truest testimony I can: I have known him for some time, he used to be frequently at the service of the church in the Protestant part of the family at St. James's, where I was chaplain; during the time I was there, I observed him to be a frequent receiver of the holy communion; and, as far as I could observe, lived answerable to what he professed to be, a sincere member of the church of England, and a serious Christian. For his sincerity and zeal for the Protestant religion, I can give this instance, he had an aunt that had a relation to that family, one Mrs. Du-pee, who he thought did warp a little towards Popery, and he desired me about five years ago to have recourse to her, and desired to know if she were dissatisfied with any point of religion in the church of England, in communion with which she lived visibly, and I would do my endeavour to satisfy her; as I do not doubt but I could. She was desirous to know who was the person that sent me: I told her I came of my own head in the greatest part; but I suppressed the interposition of Mr. Ashton for several reasons, and told her, I had great suspicions of her inclining the other way; and I had great reason for it, because of her husband who was a Papist, and the great resort of Popish priests to their lodgings. She told me then, she was satisfied in every thing, and if she had any dissatisfaction she would send for me to give me an account. Some months after I came to St.

* See, in this Collection, the Cases of lord Russell, vol. 9, pp. 621, et seq.; of Hampden, vol. 9, p. 1099; of Rosewell, vol. 10, pp. 206, et seq.; of Cornish, vol. 11, p. 381, and of Hardy, A. D. 1794, as referred to in the Notes to those Cases.

James's to wait, and observing her to be more than usually before from prayers in the chapel, I went to her, and asked her the reason: she told me, it was because she was making some linen for her master king James, which was to be made in haste: but she then designed to go for Flanders quickly; and Mr. Ashton, about that time, or two or three days after, told me his aunt was gone to France, and spoke it with very great concern, and that he believed, under the pretence of her calling over her younger son, she was gone to declare herself a Papist, and he was very much troubled at it. This I know for his zeal for the Protestant religion.

L. C. J. Holt. When was this, doctor?

Dr. Fitz-Williams. This was, my lord, about five years ago.

Ashton. That is, as to the business of my aunt, I suppose; I know not how he comes to mention it; but as to my life and morals, you can give a later account.

Dr. Fitz-Williams. My lord, I have administered the sacrament to him.

L. C. J. Holt. What questions do you farther ask him, Mr. Ashton? or can you say any more, doctor?

Dr. Fitz-Williams. No, my lord, I can say no more, but that he received the sacrament about half a year ago.

Serj. Thompson. We have not objected any thing, as to his religion, at all.

Ashton. But I know it has been a reflection that has gone about of me, that I am a Papist, therefore I beg leave to prove my religion and conversation.

L. C. J. Holt. Nay, call whom you will, you shall not be hindered, take what course you please.

Serj. Tremain. Pray, doctor, you say he has received the sacrament lately; when was that, and where?

Dr. Fitz-Williams. It was at Ely Chapel, within this six or seven months.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Have you been lately conversant with him?

Dr. Fitz-Williams. Truly, my lord, I have not been very lately.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Pray, what have you heard him say concerning his affection to king William and queen Mary?

Dr. Fitz-Williams. I do not remember any thing at all of that.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Have you heard him say any thing to the contrary?

Dr. Fitz-Williams. No, I cannot remember that.

Serj. Tremain. What have you heard him say about his affection to king James?

L. C. J. Holt. Do not ask him that, there may be a snare in that question.

Juryman. You say, doctor, that he received the sacrament six months ago in Ely chapel: did you deliver the sacrament to him there?

Dr. Fitz-Williams. No, I did not.

Juryman. Pray, doctor, were the prayers that were used at that time altered, as they are now, in the common-prayer-book.

Dr. Fitz-Williams. I cannot say they were.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Did you ever see him drink king James's health?

Dr. Fitz-Williams. I do not use to drink healths, I came here only to do an office of justice and kindness to Mr. Ashton, to testify about his religion and conversation.

Serj. Tremain. But answer the question, did you ever see him drink king James's health?

Dr. Fitz-Williams. I cannot remember I ever did.

Juryman. Was king William and queen Mary prayed for in those prayers?

Dr. Fitz-Williams. I cannot say they were.*

Just. Eyres. But the juryman's question was, Whether king William and queen Mary were prayed for? and whether the prayers were as they are now altered?

Dr. Fitz-Williams. My lord, I say, I don't remember there were any names mentioned, as the prayers are now altered.

Serj. Tremain. That is very well.

Dr. Fitz-Williams. I did neither read the prayers, Sir, nor administer the communion at that time.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. But you were not at the prayers, as they are now altered, I perceive?

Dr. Fitz-Williams. Yes, I have, several times.

Serj. Thompson. Not with that gentleman, Mr. Ashton?

Dr. Fitz-Williams. But I have been an hundred times at the prayers as they are now altered.

Ashton. I desire Dr. Lake, who is there upon the bench, that he may be asked what he knows of me.

Serj. Tremain. But I have one question to ask of Dr. Fitz-Williams before he goes.

L. C. J. Holt. What will you ask him?

Serj. Tremain. I would ask you, Sir, one question. Have you taken the oaths to this king and queen?

Dr. Fitz-Williams. No, I have not, Sir, that is my unhappiness; but I know how to submit, and live peaceably under them.

Ashton. But there is one Dr. Lake that has taken them, he will give you an account what he knows of me.

Dr. Fitz-Williams. If any one can say I have done or acted any thing against the government, I will readily submit to be punished for it.

L. C. J. Holt. Well, Dr. Lake, what say you?

Dr. Lake. My lord, I have known Mr. Ashton above these sixteen years, we lived together in the same family several of them; I always observed him to be a person of exemplary piety, and singular devotion; he duly came to the prayers of the church twice a day, and to the sacrament once a month; he has taken oc-occasion, that I know, several times, both at St. James's and at Edinburgh, to testify his zeal against Popery: and I am apt to think, that he has suffered sometimes for doing so.

Ashton. Dr. Bursh, pray, as to my religion, I beg you to give an account what you know of me; particularly something you may remember of me, of my perhaps over-heat against Popery.

Dr. Bursh. My lord, I have long known Mr. Ashton, the prisoner at the bar, and, till within these two years, frequently conversed with him; and while I did so, I believed him a good Protestant, and I have so many instances of it, and particularly before some upon whom his fortune depended; but as to any thing of late, I can say nothing, because our conversation has ceased.

Serj. Thompson. Dr. Bursh, have you known any thing of Mr. Ashton's conversation for two years past?—Dr. Bursh. No, Sir.

L. C. J. Holt. Have you any thing more, Mr. Ashton?

Ashton. No, my lord, I have nothing more, unless your lordship desire any thing more of this nature.

L. C. J. Holt. Call whom you will.

Ashton. Here is one Mr. Tomlinson.

L. C. J. Holt. Come, what say you, Sir?

Tomlinson. My lord, I waited upon major general Worden when he was sick, and there read the prayers of the church, and Mr. Ashton was a constant attender upon the public prayers at the visitation of the sick, and was very devout; that is all I can say.

L. C. J. Holt. When was this?

Tomlinson. It was in the sickness of major gen. Worden.

L. C. J. Holt. How long ago was that?

Tomlinson. It was about half a year ago.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Were those prayers as they are altered now, or not?

Tomlinson. It was only the Visitation of the Sick, and the Collect for the morning, and Collect for the evening, because the general's sickness was such, that he could not bear long prayers.

L. C. J. Holt. Sir, have you been acquainted with the prisoner any time?

Tomlinson. About eight months.

L. C. J. Holt. Have you any more witnesses, Mr. Ashton?—Ashton. No, my lord.

L. C. J. Holt. Then I would have you to answer me this one thing; why were you so desirous, and used such importunity, that the papers should be thrown overboard?

Ashton. My lord, that is a point I ought to have spoke to, to clear myself.

L. C. J. Holt. It seems material, and I would not have it forgot, if you can answer it.

Ashton. I humbly thank your lordship, and whatsoever my fate is, I cannot but own I have had a fair trial for my life, and I thank your lordship for putting me in mind.

L. C. J. Holt. And take this other thing with it, Why did you desire captain Billop to go along with you where you were going?

Ashton. He has sworn it, my lord, that I did so, but as I hope for salvation, if I were to die immediately, I do not know that I spoke to him of any such thing. How was it possible that I should prevail with him? or how was it likely that I should force him to go along with us, when he had about twelve or fourteen men with him armed, and we unarmed?

L. C. J. Holt. Nay, it was not forcing, it was but persuading him to go.

Ashton. My lord, I do not know any thing of it, I'll assure you; but as for endeavouring to persuade him to throw the packet overboard, I must own I did endeavour to persuade him to it; and, I do presume, there is nobody in court, that had been engaged with a person so unfortunate, that would not have done the same thing for any common friend, not knowing what the contents of those papers were, seeing them in that posture, especially when I saw some body else so near me, so uneasy and concerned to have them seen.

L. C. J. Holt. Then, Mr. Ashton, there's another thing which you opened, which I would have you prove; you say you were to go into France upon the affairs of col. Worden's family; first you say col. Worden had a great account to make up; how will you make that out?

Ashton. My lord, if your lordship please, I will prove here in court, though it is a sort of surprize upon me, that there is a great account depending; I believe I may appeal to Mr. Solicitor himself, who knows that there is a Petition in the House of Commons, now depending, from the queen's tradesmen and debtors, whom she owed 68,000*l.* She did assign the arrears of some growing rents for the satisfaction of this debt: but the king and government have not thought fit to let it be applied to her use, or to the paying of those debts she assigned it to. Nay, it has gone farther: I can appeal to several persons, there is one man by chance in the court, that I believe does know that I promised and engaged, and actually have paid a great part of this debt; for believing that the money was good upon the assignment, I have actually paid some of these men out of my own pocket, and perhaps more than became me to venture; I think it may very well call my discretion in question.

L. C. J. Holt. Who will you have called, Mr. Ashton?

Ashton. My lord, here is Mr. Spalding.

L. C. J. Holt. That the late queen does owe people money, that I believe is true.

Ashton. Pray, Mr. Spalding, will you give the court an account, whether there is any money due from the queen to you?

Spalding. My lords, and you gentlemen of the jury, I have a debt due to me from the late queen, as her coach harness-maker; it is 470*l.* or something thereabouts, and Mr. Ashton has paid me part of this debt; this I do own.

Serj. Tremain. Pray, how long have you been acquainted with Mr. Ashton, Sir?

Spalding. A dozen years, Sir.

Serj. Tremain. Have you any intimacy with him?

Spalding. He and I have been very well acquainted.

Serj. Tremain. Have you seen Mr. Ashton write at any time?

Spalding. Yes, I have.

Serj. Tremain. Do you know his hand?

Spalding. Yes, I think I do.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Pray how came Mr. Ashton to pay you that part of your money?

Spalding. I pressed Mr. Ashton, and told him my necessities, and he did advance me this money.

L. C. J. Holt. How much did he advance?

L. C. J. Pollexfen. When was it he paid it you?—Spalding. Almost a year ago.

L. C. J. Holt. Did he pay it out of his own pocket?—Spalding. I believe so.

L. C. J. Holt. I believe so; or was it money that he had returned to him?

Spalding. I believe it was out of his own pocket, my lord.

L. C. J. Holt. Why do you believe so?

Spalding. Truly I believe it was out of his own pocket.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Pray who was to repay him?

Spalding. About that very time we were petitioning the House of Commons, that we might have our debts secured, and our money out of the arrears of rents due to the late queen, according to her assignment; and we so far pressed the matter that there was a clause inserted into the bill for the securing of our debt; but upon the next day, or the day following, the parliament was prorogued.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Which way did he expect to be repaid?

Spalding. I'll tell you which way, I suppose, my lord.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Did he not tell you which way?

Spalding. No, he never told me.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Mr. Ashton, did you never tell him how you should be repaid?

Ashton. My lord, I hoped to be repaid, and concluded I should, out of the arrears of rent in the tenants hands.

L. C. J. Holt. But you are very kind to pay money out of your own pocket upon such hopes.

Serj. Tremain. Pray, Sir, will you look upon that paper; do you know the hand?

Spalding. No, Sir, I do not.

L. C. J. Holt. I suppose he did compound with you.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. This does shew an extraordinary kindness towards some sort of people.

Ashton. If he discounted the interest to the time that we reckoned it would be paid, you know that prejudice would be to him, and not to me; it may, indeed, prove a prejudice at last, if the debt be not paid, because the receipt is conditional: if it be not allowed him, she shall discount to me again.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Was there no money returned over from the queen, king James's queen that was?

Ashton. No, my lord, directly nor indirectly, not one penny. I believe they are not in a condition to return money.

L. C. J. Holt. Well, Mr. Ashton, what have you more?

Ashton. I have nothing more to say, I submit my cause to your lordship.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Look you, Mr. Ashton, as to some things that you have mentioned, first, there is nobody questions but you are a Protestant; nay, as far as I discern, so they are all that are concerned in this matter. The whole design shews, that they are all so careful of the Protestant religion, that they design to restore and establish it by the king of France; so that it appears they are all protestants concerned in this project.

Ashton. Pray, my lord, who is it that proposes that?

L. C. J. Pollexfen. The papers that were carrying to France, Mr. Ashton, you have heard them read.

Ashton. I hope, my lord, that no doubtful insinuations or suggestions are to affect me.

Serj. Tremain. There is a gentleman that was called to by the prisoner, it may be, he knows his hand; pray, Dr. Fitz Williams, loook upon that paper, you have been acquainted with him many years, do you know his hand?

Dr. F. Williams. No, Sir, I do not know his hand, I never did see him write; I cannot say I ever received a letter from him.

Ashton. I entirely submit my cause to your lordship and the jury.

L. C. J. Holt. Then you have done, Mr. Ashton?—Ashton. Yes.

Just. Eyres. Mr. Ashton, because you cannot reply again upon my Lord Chief Justice, after he has summed up the evidence; there is another thing that I would put you in mind of, that you may give an answer to it. Captain Billop swears, before the papers were found upon you (and it seems to stick upon you) when he was informed by the seamen, that you had put something in your bosom, and he asked you what it was, you said, nothing but your handkerchief: Now, if you knew not what was in the papers, how came you to deny you had any thing in your bosom?

Ashton. For the same reason that I would have endeavoured to have had them thrown over board; out of kindness to the person with whom I happened to be taken.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Consider, Mr. Ashton, what a many strange things you run upon: first, you would have it believed, that you had a mind to go into France upon your own account.—Ashton. I do own that.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Next then, that you hired a vessel for you and Elliot. Why would you have Elliot to go with you into France?

Ashton. I would not have him; he desired the favour of going.

L. C. J. Holt. Who desired my lord Preston to go, or did he desire to go with you?

Ashton. I had not seen Mr. Elliot of three months before I went into the city to hire the boat.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Why would you have my lord Preston go with you?

Ashton. Why would I have my lord Preston go with me? My lord, I hoped to have got my passage free with a person of my lord's quality.

L. C. J. Holt. Then you hired this vessel for my lord Preston?

Ashton. No, my lord.

L. C. J. Holt. Was it my lord's money, or your own that you paid?

Ashton. The money I paid; but how I should be repaid I cannot tell.

L. C. J. Holt. Would you, for your own convenience, pay 100*l.* for a boat to go to France, and yet hope to get your passage free by taking in my lord Preston?

Ashton. Truly, my lord, I cannot tell how it would have been; at the utmost, we could but have paid our share of it.

L. C. J. Holt. But you can tell me if you will; I ask you, how it was agreed amongst you?

Ashton. Truly, my lord, as I hope to be saved, I cannot tell.

L. C. J. Holt. Then there is another thing: Why did you desire one of the seamen to say, that you were to go to Flanders, and not to France, and give him half a crown to say so?

Ashton. I presume, your lordship knows that it is a fault, though it be not a treasonable fault, to go into France?

L. C. J. Pollexfen. But, Mr. Ashton, truth is the thing that we are enquiring after; and that is the thing we would have prevail, and I hope shall in all cases; If you are not guilty we hope it will prevail of your side; if you are guilty, we hope it will prevail on the other side. Now, how likely is it that you should get into this same company by chance, without a previous agreement? You sent something from Burdett's, a hamper and a trunk; and afterwards some other things went from Rigby's, who is your father-in-law.

Ashton. No, there was nothing at all carried from Mr. Rigby's.

L. C. J. Holt. Yes, the leather bag, I believe. But another thing is this, that if it be possible, you will do well to give an answer to: Why did you enquire for a hiding place? Why did you ask the master of the ship, whether there was a convenient place to hide in?

Ashton. As to that matter, my lord, I had heard of divers people, that actually had passes, and were going to Flanders, yet were stopped and brought to town again. I believe my lord Nottingham has bailed many a one, and your lordship knows it to be so, and has bailed many yourself; and therefore I had great reason, upon that account, to endeavour secrecy as much as I could.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Mr. Ashton, as I remember, you said yourself, you were once before a going over, and had the misfortune to be stopt: Now, to venture a second time without a pass, was something strange. Why had you not gone and applied yourself to the secretary for a pass?

Ashton. I had made all the application I could to my lord Nottingham, I cannot say in my own name, because I was sure before hand, I should be denied; but I did by others hands endeavour to have got a pass to have gone into Flanders, because it was of extraordinary consequence to me, as I tell your lordship, to go quickly.

L. C. J. Holt. If you had such an occasion to go, and had made it out to the secretary, and given security, you might have got it, sure.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. One word further: Why should you be so much concerned to have these papers thrown over-board?

Ashton. Perfectly out of friendship; and had I been travelling with your lordship, or any man else that had been so unfortunate, I would have done the same.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Well, have you any more to say for yourself?

Serj. Thompson. Mr. Ashton, call what witnesses you will, and speak as long as you will for yourself, you shall be heard at large.

Ashton. Mr. Serjeant, I thank you heartily, I have no more at present.

L. C. J. Holt. Then the king's counsel desire to speak a word to the jury.

Serj. Thompson. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury: it falls out to be my duty to sum up the evidence that has been given. I opened the cause at the beginning to you, and I opened it at large; and many particulars there were mentioned, and truly, I do not think we have failed in the proof of any one; I know you are men of that observation, that I need not, nor shall take upon me to repeat all the particular circumstances; but as near as I can, I shall touch upon the heads of the evidence, and do it with as equal regard to my duty, and as much tenderness to the prisoner, as any one can do.

Gentlemen, in the first place, you see what the indictment is for; 'tis for a high treason of a very great nature, no less than the deposing the king and queen, and subverting this government, and that by a French power and interest: if inviting an invasion, and giving an account of the weakness, and where the strength of the government lay, carrying papers to solicit the French to come, and to incite this nation into rebellion, that so they might depose this king, and set up the late king James again: if these be high treason, as doubtless they are; then, gentlemen, how far forth the prisoner at the bar had a share in it, I must refer to you from what we have proved.

He is the man, it seems, that made the first step; for you may remember it was proved, that he met this woman at Burdet's, in the city, for the hiring of this ship, and after two or three meetings more, they come to a conclusion, and 93 guineas and sixpence are deposited to make up 100*l.* which was the price agreed upon, and that was actually paid by Mr. Ashton; this is sworn to be so.

The next thing is, to what purpose this money was paid, and the ship hired; that is directly sworn, it was to carry Mr. Ashton, and two or three more of his friends, not naming of them, and they were to go for France; one of the witnesses says, to any port in France, it was not directly declared to what part. This, I say, was the purpose for which the money was paid, and the vessel hired; and this was to carry you, Mr. Ashton, and two or three more friends of his into France.

It is true, Mr. Elliot afterwards did meet Mr. Ashton, and I think was by at the bargain making, or at leastwise, when the money was paid; I will not be positive in that, because I would do him no wrong, he being to make his defence hereafter.

Ashton. No, he was not by; I made the bargain myself.

Serj. Thompson. Then afterwards I remember one circumstance: when he hired this ship, he was to hire a ship that had a place to hide in, and so he must needs know upon what design; I say, by that he must needs know, that there was a matter of great moment which he was to transact, for he was to have such a ship as he might hide in.

After this ship was hired, then they met in Covent-Garden, and there they take order with the man to go down with them to the stairs, where the waterman was called; indeed Mr. Ashton did part from them in the way, but presently after came to them at the stairs; and there came my lord Preston and his man, who, together with Elliot, that was there before, I think before, all embarked in the boat, and were carried to the ship, and made all the haste away they could for France.

When they were there, and came to a place of danger, near a ship of war, there was care taken, according as they had enquired of the master of the ship before, that they should be hid, and hid they were.

Afterwards, when they were past that danger, when they came to the Block-House at Gravesend, there they thought fit to hide again, and did so; and there they concealed themselves, 'till they were surprised in that place by captain Billop.

My lord, after such time as captain Billop had surprised them, he tells you, how he came down after this smack, you see what happened; my lord Preston first came up; and after he had searched my lord Preston, Elliot came up, and he was searched; and after Mr. Ashton was once come up, he went down to fetch his hat, and there was seen to take up this bundle of papers, and there the papers, upon search, were found in Mr. Ashton's breast.

This being so found in his breast, you have heard what applications were made by this gentleman to get these papers cast over-board, and what promises were made to the captain, and what likelihood there was of making his fortune, if he would go along with them, or throw away the packet.

You hear, gentlemen, that after they came to Whitehall, one of the men swear, that this gentleman gave them money, that they should say, they were not hired for France, but for Flanders.

These, gentlemen, are the several circumstances that do appear in this case, which shew the mighty care and diligence that was used to get these papers suppressed that had been thus taken, or to get them again into their own custody; and that is a matter that shews how far this gentleman was concerned in this design; and taking all these things together, I think there can no greater evidence be given, that Mr. Ashton was in this contrivance, that he was concerned in the message, that he was to be sent, and in all this business that was to be done, was as much guilty as my lord Preston, who now stands convicted for it.

And the court will tell you, gentlemen, there are no accessories in treason, all are principals; though it be not actually proved, that this gentleman did know all these papers what they were; yet in case he hired a ship for himself and the lord whose papers they were, to go in, and take such notice of the papers, as to take care of them, to suppress and conceal them, that is an evidence of his knowledge of the importance of them; and if so, he will be equally guilty of the high treason.

L. C. J. Holt. I doubt that.

Serj. Thompson. My lord, I would not willingly press any thing further than the nature of the thing will bear.

L. C. J. Holt. Pray go on, brother; we are only talking among ourselves.

Serj. Thompson. The next thing is this, that is to be considered, that after such time as these papers came to be laid open, what is it that appears among them? Truly, I shall not take upon me to repeat so much as the substance, much less the particulars of the several papers; but, I must say that there does appear to be a formed design of subverting the government, of deposing this king and queen, and of bringing us all into war, rebellion and bloodshed; all this under a pretence of establishing the protestant religion, and our legal government again (though I can see no means they had to depend upon for it), but by a Popish interest, and a French power; and how far that is possible, or probable, to promote such an end, by such means, I leave to your consideration.

Gentlemen, you have heard all the particular papers read; here was the resolution of a consult and conference, where this project was designed; here were heads of a declaration, that was to be framed to make the credulous believe, what mighty things should be done upon their new revolution: you see, what letters have been produced, and cannot but easily apprehend what is the import and meaning of them. I resolve, as I said, not to mention the particulars, but there is scarce one line among them but what is treason, for it all tends to this purpose and design, to depose the king, and alter the present government.

Now, upon the whole matter, gentlemen, what this gentleman has said, I confess to me seems strange; he said indeed at first, that he had no defence at all, or that which was very weak, and so it should seem the truth was, for you see what his defence has been.

He says, that he went into France, that he owns that he was going thither; but what was it to do? It was to settle some accounts with the family of colonel Worden, and to receive a sum of money that was owing to him by a person there.

Gentlemen, if the design had so much innocence in it, certainly he might have had a pass; at least, there was no need of hiring a vessel at such an extravagant rate; there was no necessity of hiding in this secret manner, and no necessity of impossible suggestions, and proffering great rewards for the disposing of, and concealing these papers.

Gentlemen, you will remember many particulars more, which have not slipt your observation; I shall not take upon me to repeat them, but leave them to your consideration.

Only this I must say, that this is a treason of a very high nature, a treason to depose a king that has ventured all he had, even his life has been in danger, and his blood has been spilt to establish this government, and our religion, and our laws, and yet it seems there are men that think this may be better done by a Popish interest and French power, which I think nobody of either wisdom or honesty can imagine, or will engage in, and therefore I leave it to your determination.

L. C. J. Holt. Gentlemen of the jury, you understand, that Mr. Ashton is now tried for high-treason; it is mentioned in the indictment, to be for conspiring the death, and deposing the king and queen, and for that purpose he did endeavour to go into France, and to carry divers proposals in writing, and several memorials to shew how this kingdom might be invaded by the French.

To prove this, the evidence that has been produced and given by the king's council has been long, and consists of two parts; witnesses viva voce, they have told how Mr. Ashton designed a voyage to France, and that he hired a ship for that purpose, and several papers were taken out of his bosom.

In the first place the witnesses tell you, that about the latter end of December last, Mr. Ashton and Mr. Elliot came to Burdett's house, where they met with Mrs. Pratt, and Burdett having before that spoken to her about a smack that she called the Thomas and Elizabeth.

Then there was a meeting appointed between her and Mr. Ashton at the Wonder tavern, where they did treat and debate about the hire of it; afterwards they came back to Burdett's again; and there the agreement was made betwixt the woman and Mr. Ashton, the prisoner at the bar, to have a hundred pounds. Ninety-three guineas and sixpence was fetched down by Mr. Ashton, and told out, and deposited in the hands of Mrs. Burdett; then there was a six-pence broken, and one part Mrs. Burdett had, and the other part Mr. Ashton had; and when either the master, or Mrs. Pratt should bring the part of the six-pence that Mr. Ashton kept, to Mrs. Burdett, the hundred pounds was to be paid.

And this agreement being made, it is positively sworn, that they did ask, whether there was a hiding place in that vessel? An answer was made, there was one; and thereupon a note was given that the master and Mrs. Pratt should go to the Seven Stars in Covent-Garden.

Upon Wednesday night, they went there according to the directions, where meets Ashton and Elliot; but before that there was a boat hired at Surrey Stairs to carry them down to the ship through bridge, over against the Tower; but the tide not serving till about ten o'clock at night, they had agreed with a waterman for half a crown to carry them, and he was to stay till the tide served. And when they went out from Rigby's they parted, Elliot and the master went together, Mr. Ashton did not go with them, but came near about the same time to Surry Stairs, where they took water.

Being aboard, it was observed that all these gentlemen were very timorous, and seemed to be much frightened at the sight of any vessel, from which there was any apprehension of their being taken notice of; and therefore they went down under the quarter hatches; which is a place very inconvenient for such persons, where none could stand or sit upright, but were forced to lie upon the boards, or upon the ballast.

It seems some intimation was given, that some gentleman had an intention to go into France to prosecute some treasonable design: and captain Billop being employed to pursue them, which he did in a pinnace, when he came near the vessel where they were, he called to the vessel, and under pretence of pressing seamen, he went on board: the master of the vessel said he had a protection from the admiralty; so that there was no cause for them to fear pressing; nor indeed was there any for gentlemen to fear it, they being not liable to be pressed.

When the captain came near the ship, and declared his intent of coming on board, these gentlemen were gone under the quarter-hatches again. Captain Billop coming on board, and speaking about pressing of the men, and saying, there was a couple that would make good seamen for the king; the master shewed his protection, and then the captain said he would search further in the ship, and so he did; and then he pulls up the boards, and there he finds all these gentlemen, who were called up one after another, and search'd by the captain.

Gentlemen, there is one of the witnesses tells you, that when they were come up, he saw a packet that lay in this very place under the quarter-hatches, unto which was tied a piece of lead, which Mr. Ashton takes up, and puts in his bosom, with which the captain being acquainted, enquiry is made by him, what Mr. Ashton had there? Mr. Ashton said it was his handkerchief, and nothing but that which he pulled out: but captain Billop puts his hand in his bosom, between his coat and his body, and takes out the packet, and carried these gentlemen on board the George frigate, where they stayed till the tide served to bring them to Whitehall.

But before they came on board the frigate, Mr. Ashton was very importunate with him to throw this packet into the water; when they were on board the George frigate, and in the cabin alone, they continued their importunity.

Now, say they, we have you here, and you are alone, pray will you throw this packet overboard? And particularly Mr. Ashton said, it would do the captain no good to injure so many gentlemen; and Mr. Elliot would have persuaded the captain to take the lead that was tied to the packet, and tie it to some letters that were taken out of my lord Preston's pocket, and throw the packet overboard; and then have informed the king and council, that those letters was the packet taken out of Mr. Ashton's bosom: but the captain very honestly rejected all their motions of that kind.

Truly, gentlemen, my memory will not serve me to repeat all the particulars,* but I question not your Notes will bring them to your minds. Mr. Elliot, it seems, was so mightily concerned at their being taken with these papers, that when they shot London-bridge, he wish'd the bridge might have fallen upon them and knock'd them on the head; and, when they were got through, he wish'd a thunder-bolt would fall down into the boat and sink them: that, indeed, was Mr. Elliot, and not Mr. Ashton; but Mr. Ashton was as much concerned about disposing of the packet as Mr. Elliot.

At Whitehall this packet is opened, and you have several papers produced in evidence, and read to you; you have heard what evidence has been given, that these are the very papers that were in the packet thus taken.

First of all, captain Billop tells you, he carried them to my lord Nottingham, and that they lay there in his office; he withdrew, indeed, while my lord Nottingham examined my lord Preston, but the packet was not opened in the interim, but there was only a paper stuck on the outside, that my lord had taken off before the captain returned into the room, and there the packet remained entire. He says, My lord Nottingham opened the packet, and put up all the papers that were in the packet in his presence into a cover again, and sealed them up with his seal. My lord Nottingham says positively, he did put up all the papers that were in the packet again, all and no more, except the cover, and that he sealed up and delivered it to captain Billop.

Captain Billop says, he took these very papers from my lord Nottingham, and as he received them, carried them without opening to my lord president.

My Lord President says, he locked them up, unopen'd, in a close cabinet in his closet-room, where nobody comes; there they were that night, and the next day he carried them intire to the king, and some of them were read by the king, in the presence of my lord president; and they were all taken away by his lordship, no more nor no less; and my lord president brought them all to the cabinet council, where they were read, and were delivered to my lord Sydney.

My lord Sydney swears, these papers now produced, are the same papers he had from my lord president; and my lord president swears, that they are the same he received by Billop from my lord Nottingham, and my lord Sydney marked them.

So that there can remain no doubt of these being the same papers, that were contained in the packet, that was taken out of the bosom of Mr. Ashton.

Then, as to the matter of the papers, I think it is plain, beyond all contradiction, that the import of them is treasonable: they shew a design of invading the kingdom by a foreign force, and of deposing the king and queen from the government, and of setting the late king upon the throne.

It is agreed, as it is mentioned at a conference between several noblemen and gentlemen, that were of the Whig and Tory party, as they call them, that the late king was to be restored, though by a French power.

It was impossible for them to effect it by going plainly to work, and saying in plain words, the French should invade us. It was to be done in this manner.

The French king must pretend by all means to be our friend, and a mediator betwixt the late king and the people of England, and this was out of design plainly to get a party of the kingdom to join with them, the most credulous and inconsiderate sort of people, who, when they shall be seduced into a belief of the French king's great kindness, it was not doubted but there would be a conjunction between them and the French forces, to restore the late king.

And to procure such a persuasion in the people, the French king was to shew himself kind to the English Protestants, to appear and act another part than he had formerly done; he was to permit them the exercise of the Protestant religion, thereby to persuade many, that his persecution of his own subjects, the hugonots, was not out of any aversion to the protestant religion, but only to their antimonarchical and resisting principles.

Then an inconvenience is to be removed; for they complain, that they are too full of bigotry at St. Germain's, and too bare-faced: for they make an open profession of Popery, and speak truly what they do intend; but say they, if they will have the design take effect, they must be more close and secret; for the folly and bigotry at St. Germain's was a very great obstruction. Therefore, they proposed that some persons might be substituted as agents to correspond here, that understood the temper of the nation, and what would easiest prevail with the people: and a model was to be framed at St. Germain's; the Protestants are to be seemingly caressed, seven or nine to be of the late king's council, that so we might believe, that he was ours in interest again, and that we have a relation to him.

And if things were carried with such cunning and subtlety, they hoped to delude a great many people over into the interest of the late king; but, if they went bare-faced, it would cause such great jealousies, that they must totally despair of success.

Yet they did not hope by these artifices to obtain so many friends here, as might have been sufficient to accomplish their design; and therefore they must have recourse to a foreign force, particularly a French force. For says one of the papers, 'Use foreigners to expel foreigners;' that is, use French to expel Dutch foreigners, who are our allies, and are falsely accused by them to have trampled upon the rights and liberties of the nation.

There is one argument used to encourage people to assist the French in the invasion of their own country, which I cannot omit; namely, That as soon as the French with a considerable expence of men and money, had restored the Protestant religion, the late king to the crown, and the people to their liberties, that he would withdraw all his forces, and reap no profit or advantage by his success. I must confess, this carries so little of persuasion in it, that it is ridiculous to think thereby to impose upon any number of men; but notwithstanding the weakness of their arguments, it is apparent they were in good earnest; the papers give an Account to the French, in what state and condition our forts were, Portsmouth not manned with above 500, and Gosport how weakly fortified.

It was a happy juncture between this and the first of March, when advice is given to make use of the opportunity: for men cannot give, but men may use opportunities, and something was to be done forthwith, and the goods must be got in readiness, particularly linnen, and the copper are mentioned, which are mysterious and dark expressions, and you may put a construction upon them as well as I; for they are written in a style of trade, as if they were a correspondence between two tradesmen, and the linnen and the copper are ordered to be brought before the 10th of March.

But however obscure some of these expressions are, there are others that are more plain, That the French Fleet must be out in April at farthest, and are to come before the conjunction between the English and the Dutch, and Jennings, Strickland, or Trevannion are to come from St. Malo's in one night, and to fight the English Fleet in the chops of the channel, and not to come so high as Beachy, where they came the last year.

And there is an account given, in what condition and state our navy was, how many ships, what rates, how manned, and who the officers; and then as the French were to be in readiness to come in April, so they say our fleet was not to be out till June.

Gentlemen, there are a great many other particulars; but these are enough, nay half of them were enough to make any man guilty of treason, that was concerned in them, or that had a hand in carrying or making use of them.

Besides, there are other letters which can import nothing, but the writer was of the late king's interest; one directed to Mr. Redding, the other to Mrs. Redding; and these were to go to France, to let them know how zealous he was in his duty, and how the interest of the young master increased. The Letters have these expressions; "That though the family were decreased, yet our interest is increased, which is yours, and I speak in the plural number, because I speak the sentiments of my elder brother, and the rest of our relations, and desire them to believe they were zealous and cordial in their duty to Mr. Redding." Now what interpretation you will make of this, I will leave to you.

Then there is another letter to Mrs. Charlton, and another to Mr. Jackson, and divers other things that have been read, and among the rest, have been read the heads of a declaration at large, shewing what should be done, and what methods should be taken in order to the restoring the late king, and deposing this.

And there is also mention made in a paper, how divers persons, who were to be pardoned, as particularly, all justices of the peace actually in commission, are not to be excepted; outlaws are to be pardoned; chimney money to be taken away; and all that come in within one-and-twenty days, are to be forgiven.

So that it is plain these letters import a design to depose the king and queen, and the kingdom to be invaded by foreigners; only a little to colour the matter, nor to lose the Protestant interest altogether, there was to be 5 or 6,000 Swedes to be made use of in the invasion.

Gentlemen, if there was a design of an invasion, be it by Papists, or by Protestants, if any act was done tending thereunto, it is high-treason within the statute of 25 E. 3. For purposing and intending to depose the king and queen, manifested by any overt-act, hath been always held to be high-treason.

This, gentlemen, is the sum and substance of the evidence that has been given against the prisoner at the bar.

Mr. Ashton says for himself, it is true, saith he, my design was to go to France. I was so unfortunate as to have the papers taken about me. I did take them up; but says he, it is not at all proved that any one of the papers that are now produced are my hand; which is true: There is no such proof.

The next thing is, that Mr. Ashton being asked, What occasion he had to go to France? he says, he had formerly a relation to colonel Worden, and did transact, and had the management of his affairs, which were very great. Col. Worden died half a year ago, and he enjoined him upon his death-bed to go into France about settling some accounts of his, and he was desired by the family of col. Worden so to do.

This Mr. Ashton alledges; but he has not proved it. It is very strange, that if Mr. Ashton was to go to France to negotiate that affair for col. Worden's family, none of that family should be produced to prove, that col. Worden gave him such directions; or that the family desired him to go into France upon that account.

Then Mr. Ashton hath endeavoured to give another reason for his voyage into France: he affirms, he had some affairs of his own with relation to the late queen; he was concerned for her, and she did owe monies here, and he paid several debts to tradesmen, particularly 400*l.* she owed to the coach harness-maker; and he having paid it, went over to reimburse himself: The tradesman was produced, and he says, Mr. Ashton did pay the money a year ago; but whether Mr. Ashton had effects from the late queen, or paid it out of his own pocket, does not appear. Mr. Ashton says, he paid it out of his own pocket, which is very extraordinary, that he should be so kind to pay what he was not obliged to pay, and have no security to reimburse himself.

So that, gentlemen, you had best consider whether there be any thing at all said or proved, that can justify Mr. Ashton's going to France. or whether there be any good reason offered for it.

Then Ashton has called witnesses to prove, that he was always a Protestant, though he did live in a Popish family, where they did encourage Papists and discountenance Protestants; for which he had the ill-will of those he did depend upon.

Gentlemen, all that is agreed, and it is not a question in this case, whether Mr. Ashton be a Protestant, or a Papist; but the question is, Whether he be guilty of high-treason? From which the being a Protestant does not secure a man.

But, Gentlemen, if Mr. Ashton had no knowledge upon what design the other persons were to go into France, though he had actually gone into France, it had been a crime in this juncture of affairs, yet not high-treason; but to go into France, and carry a treasonable scheme of a design, and project of an invasion, that is treason.

Now the question is, Whether Mr. Ashton went with such a purpose or not, you are to consider; I would not lead you into any strain of the evidence, but only state it how it stands. It is plain he was concerned all along in hiring the smack, and as the king's counsel observed to you, the price was something extraordinary; they were to pay 100*l.* for the voyage, to which was added some encouragement to the woman, that if she performed this voyage well, she might get 1,000*l.* before Lady-Day, and the money was paid by Mr. Ashton, and he was taken aboard the vessel.

Mr. Ashton was much concerned to secure the papers, by taking them out of the place where they lay upon the ballast under the quarter-hatches; and after they were taken out of his bosom, he was very importunate, and so often, with captain Billop to throw them over-board. And why should he be so earnest and concerned, unless he very well knew, and was acquainted with the contents of those papers? And he gave one of the seamen 2*s.* 6*d.* to say, they were bound for Flanders: unless it was a matter of great importance, he went about, and that was not fit to be known, why should he deny it, or labour to have it concealed? And 100*l.* to be paid for this voyage, was, upon a joint account, as well for my lord Preston, as for Mr. Ashton and Elliot; Mr. Ashton did pay the money, and he does not make it appear whose it was.

Gentlemen, it rests upon you to consider the evidence you have heard, whether it is sufficient to induce you to believe Mr. Ashton was going into France with these papers to carry on the design of deposing the king and queen, and invading the kingdom:* if you are not satisfied in your consciences that he is guilty, then find him not guilty: on the other side, if you are satisfied that he is guilty, I do not question but you will find him so.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Look you, gentlemen of the jury, my lord has rightly repeated and stated the evidence to you; I shall only say but a very few words to it. Mr. Ashton, as at first he did, so in his defence has complained of a very speedy trial, and would insinuate something of favour that he might find for that reason. It does appear he had notice of his trial sufficient, and had time enough to prepare for it: but there is one thing extraordinary has happened to his advantage, which I would desire may be taken notice of. If he had been tried on Saturday, perhaps he had had more reason to complain than now he has; for he has now (and you see he uses it, and wisely enough too) the advantage that happened to him upon my lord Preston's trial; and has had time since Saturday to prepare for this day's work; so that there is no hard point upon him as to that matter, but he has had pretty good fortune therein.

Next, he does insinuate, that he is a Protestant. Gentlemen, the law does not distinguish between a Protestant traitor, and a Papist traitor; if he has committed such an offence, as by the law is high-treason, the law does not distinguish, nor may we. And Protestants may serve Papists designs, though they do not directly intend it. Therefore the evidence to prove him a Protestant is nothing before you; for the matter is only, whether he be guilty of this crime or not.

* See in vol. 9, pp. 845, 846, what Roger North, proposing to liken this Case to that of Algernon Sidney, and to justify the decision in the latter, says. Roger North plays the advocate throughout.

In the trial of my lord Preston, then the labour was, that my lord was not the man that was concerned, as the bearer of this packet of letters or writings wherein the treason is contained; but then it was Mr. Ashton, the packets were found about him; but now it is not Mr. Ashton, but my lord Preston, and this is now the question before you, that he stands upon. But if so be they were all concerned in the carriage and transporting of this business, then they are all alike guilty of treason, and therefore they cannot shuffle it from one to another.

Now there appears some reason why they would not all agree to be tried together; for now it is but turning it from my lord Preston upon Ashton, and Mr. Ashton upon my lord Preston, and Elliot upon either of them, and so by this means all might escape, if this were sufficient to serve their turn.

But the question before you is, Whether all these persons are not all in all equally concerned? and it is the evidence that must be your guide and ours: for it is not Mr. Ashton's affirmation, that he had business to go into France, and he happened unluckily to fall into these men's company, that will be a sufficient excuse, unless he prove it.

It had been an easy matter for him to have proved, if he had been going into France upon business for col. Worden; but at length that is turned off, and then the pretence for going is, to recover some money he had owing to him there, and that he had payed for another person. Had he papers of instructions of this kind? Had he any one witness of this thing?

The merchandize that he carried out with him is of another import. Where were the notes or bonds that he was to recover? Where is the account that he had to make up with any body beyond sea? There is no manner of evidence of any such thing.

Next, Gentlemen, do but consider, if the man were so innocent as he would insinuate, as if he had not gone with the rest upon this errand, how came the man to have so heavy a concern upon him? Why should he go to take up these papers, if they were not his brats? Why should he clap them into his bosom, if he knew nothing what was in them? Why was his concern so great to have them thrown over-board?

Gentlemen, if you expect that the hearts of men should be proved otherwise, than as men guess by one another's meanings, by their actions, it is impossible to convict any man of a crime; for if his own affirmation shall be a defence, he will never want a defence to keep himself from being convicted; but that is not what the law gives credit to; it must be evidence and proof that you are to judge upon. But of all he pretends to, he proves nothing.

How came he acquainted with my lord Preston? Sure he was a man sufficiently known in the world! Why should he go with him and Mr. Elliot? Are they not all known? Are they not persons of the same disposition, and much in the same employment?

He had been taken a little before, he says himself, and was hindered from going; and he had strange ill luck, if there was nothing else in the business than what he pretends.

Gentlemen, in short, if you do find by the evidence, that he was going upon a good and an honest design, and that he knew nothing of the danger that was in these papers, and that these persons were in by reason of these papers, and yet would go about to have these papers concealed; and endeavour to have them thrown away, without knowing what was in them: these are evidences that will be good for you to go by, if you have any such; but to take his affirmation, because he says it, when he proves nothing, that is no evidence to go by.

I leave it to you, as my lord has done. If you are satisfied upon the evidence that he is guilty, I doubt not you know, and will do your duty, and will find him so; and if you have no such evidence, or any to prove the contrary, that he is not guilty, then you ought to find him so too.

Ashton. I beg your pardon for one word.

L. C. J. Holt. What would you say?

Ashton. My lord, I shall reckon it a particular favour, if you will pardon me one word, after your lordship has given the charge.

L. C. J. Holt. Well, what say you?

Ashton. I think with submission, that there is no proof, I knew, or was privy to the contents of any of these papers.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Pray, Mr. Ashton, shew any man any reason, if you can, why did you go down and catch up these papers, if you did not know what was in them? They might be for your advantage to be shewn, for any thing you pretend to know.

Ashton. I did it for my lord Preston's sake, whose hand was proved, and he stands convicted as the bearer of those papers.

Just. Eyres. But you forgot one thing that was plainly proved, Mr. Ashton, that when you importuned capt. Billop to throw away the papers, you used this as an argument, 'It would do him no good to injure three honest gentlemen.'

Ashton. I did not say so, my lord, that I know of, though indeed he has sworn it.

L. C. J. Holt. Look you, Mr. Ashton, you have been heard as long as you did desire to speak, and were asked over and over again, whether you had any more? You are not now saying any new matter; if you could urge any thing that had been omitted, which made for your advantage, I believe the court would indulge you, though it be against the course.

Ashton. My lord, I say there is nothing under my hand, there is no privity proved. Does supposition condemn a man? And is there any thing but supposition against me? There is not my hand proved in any of the papers. I beseech your lordship and the jury to observe that.

L. C. J. Holt. Your being in the company, and being so concerned, and importunately endeavouring to have thrown them overboard; the hiring the vessel to go with these treasonable papers to an enemy's country, and the papers found about you, is fact proved, and is left to the gentlemen of the jury to consider of.

Ashton. But does all this amount to more than suspicion?

L. C. J. Holt. Look you, Mr. Ashton, if you speak after we have charged the jury, you will give us an occasion of speaking to answer you; the gentlemen of the jury are men of understanding; they have very well observed the evidence, and I perceive they have been very extraordinary intent upon it; they will be able to make a right judgment, no question of it.

Ashton. All that I desire, is; there is nothing proved upon me, of my knowing what was in these papers.

Just. Eyres. And there is that which is very considerable too, that it is plain, what you say about col. Worden's account, is but a pretence; for when you were searched, there was not one paper, nor one bit of account found about you, nothing but this bundle of treasonable papers and letters.

Ashton. My lord, I humbly beg you will observe what is for me, as well as what is against me.

L. C. J. Holt. Gentlemen of the jury, do you think you shall stay out any time? The court desires to know it, because they will order themselves accordingly.

Juryman. My lord, we do not know till we come together.

L. C. J. Holt. Nay, take your own time, only the court would comply with your convenience in the adjournment.

[Then the Jury withdrew, and the Court adjourned for half an hour, and when they were returned, the Jury came in to give their verdict, and being called over, answered to their names.]

Cl. of Arr. Gentlemen, are you all agreed of your verdict?—Jury. Yes.

Cl. of Arr. Who shall say for you?

Jury. Our foreman.

Cl. of Arr. John Ashton, hold up thy hand. [Which he did.] Look upon the prisoner; how say you? is he guilty of the high treason whereof he stands indicted, or not guilty?

Foreman. Guilty.

Cl. of Arr. What goods or chattels?

Foreman. None that we know of.

Maj. Richardson. Look to him, he is found guilty of high treason.

Cl. of Arr. Then hearken to your verdict, as the court has recorded it, You say, That John Ashton is guilty of the high treason whereof he stands indicted, but that he had no lands nor tenements, goods nor chattels, at the time of the high treason committed, nor at any time since, to your knowledge, and so you say all?—Jury. Yes.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Gentlemen, I think truly you have gone according to your evidence, which the law requires you to do, and that it is which will preserve us all. And though it be truly a thing that falls hard upon the particular men that are concerned in such things; yet notwithstanding, we must have more consideration of the general good and preservation, and the support of the government, and that the law have its due course, than of any particular man's case, as to the hard point of it: we must look to these things, or there will be no living in the world.

Sir W. Hedges. My lord, we humbly desire of your lordship, that we may be dismissed from further attendance this sessions.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Aye.

Cl. of Arr. Gentlemen, you are dismissed, and the court thanks you for your service.

[Then the Court adjourned for an hour, and then the Lord Mayor and Deputy Recorder, with several of the Justices and Aldermen, returned into the Court, and after proclamation for silence, order was given to bring the lord Preston and Mr. Ashton to the bar, which was done, the lord Preston standing without the bar, and Mr. Ashton within.]

Cl. of Arr. Sir Richard Grahme, hold up your hand. [Which he did.] John Ashton, hold up your hand. [Which he did.] My lord Preston, you stand convicted of high treason, for conspiring the death of the king and queen's majesties, for adhering to the king's enemies, and endeavouring to subvert the government: what can you say for yourself, why the court should not proceed to give Judgment against you of death, according to the law?

Lord Preston. It is true, my lord, the jury have found me guilty of the treason assigned in the indictment. My lord, it is a treason of a very heavy and black nature; it is of such a nature, that if I had been conscious to myself to have deserved, I should be very willing to undergo that judgment that is like presently to pass upon me. It is to endeavour to bring in the king of France to conquer and invade this kingdom; it is a thought I always abhorred; I love my religion, my family, my country too well to attempt or endeavour any such thing; I must appeal to your lordship, though now perhaps it is too late, whether the treason that is laid against me has been perfectly proved; for in the case of proving hands, and particularly in the case of colonel Sidney, it was disallowed that comparison of hands should be evidence; there ought to be at least one, if not two, evidences to prove the writing of it. My lord, I know this is too late, I should have offered this to the jury before, but being in the crowd, and in great disorder by standing so long, I had not strength or ability enough to urge it as I should. I have nothing more to say in the case, but submit to that judgment that the law has assigned.

Deputy Recorder. My lord Preston, your lordship knows the proceedings of the law in such cases; there is no averring against the verdict of the jury; they have found your lordship guilty, and the law says, that judgment must be given upon you according to that verdict.

Lord Preston. Mr. Recorder, I do not aver against the verdict. I own it is too late; I should have offered it before, and I must submit to the judgment of the law.

Cl. of Arr. John Ashton, hold up thy hand. [Which he did.] You are in the same case with the prisoner last before you. What can you say for yourself, why judgment should not be given against you to die according to law?

Ashton. My lord, I would humbly desire I might have a sight of my indictment; I have some reason, perhaps, to believe that I am found guilty upon an erroneous indictment; and if it be so, I would desire to have counsel to argue the errors of the indictment.

D. Recorder. You have heard it twice read in English and once in Latin, and that is all that is allowed to any one in your case; I never knew the record of any indictment shewn to any prisoner at the bar.

Ashton. Suppose there be any error in it?

D. Recorder. I am not to suppose any such thing; if there is any, it has been read to you, assign it, and the court will consider of it.

Ashton. If I can assign the errors in the indictment, may I have the advantage of it then?

D. Recorder. If there be errors, you will have the advantage of them, if you will assign them; if there be none, you can have none.

Ashton. Then I say, if there be words in the indictment, that there are no such words in nature, then, Sir, I am told it is a vicious and erroneous indictment, and that is enough to viciate the indictment.

D. Recorder. No such words in nature! It is hard to tell what you mean by that; perhaps there are terms of art in the law, which, though you are not acquainted with, we are.

Ashton. Then there are such words in nature.

D. Recorder. That is an insensible expression, 'words in nature!'

Ashton. I am informed that even a letter in an indictment is enough to viciate it, or if it be false Latin, that will make it an erroneous indictment.

D. Recorder. No; that is not so; but if you will tell me what that letter is, I'll tell you what I say to it; it may, or it may not be material.

Ashton. We know it was lately disputed in a case of this nature at this place, and I am informed the court were of opinion, if it had been in the body of the indictment, it had been an error.

D. Recorder. If you please to tell me wherein the error in your indictment consists, I may be able to give you a good answer to it, or you will have the advantage of it.

Ashton. I say it consists in this; the word Cymba is written with an S in the indictment, whereas it should be with a C.

D. Recorder. How do you know it?

Ashton. It is no matter how I know it; I have some reason to know it, it may be.

D. Recorder. Mr. Hardesty, look upon the record.

Ashton. With submission, that is an error, for there is no such word as Cymba with an S.

Cl. of Arr. It is a long indictment; will you please to ask him whereabouts it is?

D. Recorder. Mr. Ashton, will you tell me where it is written?

Ashton. In the indictment, when you come to speak of Cymba a boat.

D. Recorder. By the sound I cannot distinguish whether it be S or C.

Ashton. Sir, I hope you will do me the justice to examine the indictment itself.

D. Recorder. The clerk is looking upon it: how is it, Mr. Hardesty? is it with an S or a C?—Cl. of Arr. It is with a C.

D. Recorder. The clerk has read it, and he certifies me it is in both places with a C, which is true Latin.

Ashton. Is it in all places with a C?

Cl. of Arr. I have looked in two places, and it is right; I'll look further, if you please.

Ashton. Pray do. [Which he did.]

Cl. of Arr. It is with a C in all places.

D. Recorder. The clerk tells me it is the same, and right in every place, and he has looked over all the indictment as to the matter.

Ashton. Then, Sir, I submit to it.

D. Recorder. Make proclamation for silence. [Which was done.]

D. Recorder. My lord Preston, or rather sir Richard Grahme, and Mr. John Ashton, ye have been indicted, arraigned, and convicted of high treason against their present majesties king William and queen Mary, whom God preserve. Ye have had a long, a fair, and favourable trial, as any persons that ever have been tried at this bar.

The Jury that has passed upon your lives and deaths has convicted you; and the Court are now to do their last act, which is to pronounce that Sentence that the law does inflict upon such crimes as ye stand convicted of.

It is a great trouble to me to pronounce a Judgment that is so heavy upon you; but I must say, the evidence that has been given against you was so clear, and, I suppose, not only convincing to the twelve men that tried you, but to all bystanders, that I can do it with that satisfaction that becomes one who is entrusted with the king's justice, that the law may obtain, and that there should be no interruption of justice. And the Sentence that the law has declared should be pronounced in this case, is this :

‘ That ye do respectively go to the place from whence ye came ; from thence to be drawn upon a sledge to the place of execution, to be there hanged up by the neck, to be cut down while ye are yet alive, to have your hearts and bowels taken out before your faces, and your members cut off and burnt. Your heads severed from your bodies, your bodies divided into four quarters, your heads and bodies respectively to be disposed of according to the king’s will and pleasure ; and the Lord have mercy upon your souls.’

Then the prisoners were conveyed away to Newgate, the place from whence they came. Lord Preston obtained a pardon ; but Mr. Ashton was executed on the 28th of January.

The queen having remitted that part of the sentence, as to drawing and quartering, he went in a coach, with two divines, to Tyburn, where he was executed, and his body given to his relations to bury. He delivered this Paper to the sheriff :

Mr. Sheriff ; Having observed that the methods of making Speeches at the place of execution, were not always attended with the designed successes ; and thinking it better to employ my last minutes in devotion, and holy communion with my God, I have prepared this paper to leave in your hands, as well to assert my principles, as to testify my innocency.

As to my religion, I profess, by God’s grace, to die in the faith in the which I was baptized, that of the Church of England, in whose communion (nothing doubting of my salvation, through the merits of my Saviour) I have always thought myself safe and happy. According to her principles, and late much esteemed doctrine (though now unhappily exploded) I have regulated my life ; believing myself obliged, by my religion, to look upon my rightful, lawful prince (whatever his principles were, or his practices might be) as God’s vicegerent, and accountable, (if guilty of maladministration) to God only, from whom he received his power ; and always believing it to be contrary to the laws of God, the Church, and the realm, upon any pretence whatsoever, to take up arms against him : and let all the world take notice in this belief I die. But I have more particular obligations to the king, my master, whom I had the honour to serve, and received many signal favours from him, for 16 years past ; so that gratitude (a thing not much esteemed at this time) as well as duty and religion, commanded the utmost service I could pay him. And when I add these considerations, that we were born his liege subjects ; that we had solemnly professed our allegiance, and often confirmed it with oaths ; that his majesty’s usage, after the prince of Orange’s arrival, was very hard, severe, and (I may say) unjust ; and, that all the new methods of settling this nation, have hitherto made it more miserable, poor, and more exposed to foreign enemies ; and, that the religion we pretend to be fond of preserving, is now, much more than ever, likely to be destroyed : there seemed to me no way to prevent the impending evils, and save these nations from poverty and destruction, but the calling home our injured sovereign ; who, as a true father of his country, has (notwithstanding all his provocations and injuries,) a natural love and tenderness for all his subjects. And I am so far from repining at the loss of my life, that had I ten thousand, I should rather think myself obliged to sacrifice them all, than omit any just and honest means to promote so good and necessary a work. And I advise and desire all my fellow-subjects to think of their duty and turn to their allegiance, before the severe judgments of God overtake them for their perjury and rebellion : but certainly the good and interest of these nations, abstracted from all other considerations, will ere long convince them of the necessity of doing it.

Having thus frankly declared my principles, I know the inference will be, that I have acted accordingly, and consequently, that I am now justly condemned ; but, as I ingenuously own the inference, so I as positively deny the consequence ; for whatever my inclinations or actings have been, yet, as to the matter I was sentenced to die for, I declare myself innocent. And I will appeal, even to the judges themselves, whether or no, upon my trial, there appeared the least proof that I knew a tittle contained in the papers ; but presumptions were with the jury thought sufficient to find me guilty, though I am told I am the first man that ever was condemned for high treason upon bare suspicion or presumption ; and that contrary to my lord Coke’s, and other eminent lawyers’ opinions. The knowledge of my own innocency, as to the indictment and charge against me, was that that armed me with so much assurance, and occasioned my casting my life upon the first twelve men of the pannel, without challenging any. But though I have, I think, just reason to complain of the severe charge given by the judges, and hard measure I have received ; not to mention my close imprisonment, the hasty and violent proceedings against me, nor the industry used in the return of fitting persons to pass upon me ; the denying me a copy of the pannel, &c. Yet, as I beg for pardon and forgiveness at the hands of God, I do most heartily pray for, and forgive them, and all my enemies, all the world ; nay, even that judge and jurymen who did so signally (contrary to common justice) expose themselves to destroy me. But let the will of God be done, I rely wholly upon his mercy, and the merits of my blessed Saviour, for salvation ; I do cheerfully and entirely resign myself into his hands, as into the hands of a faithful Creator, in sure and certain hopes of a happy resurrection.

Bless, protect and strengthen, O Lord God, my good and gracious king and master ! In thy due time let the virtue, goodness, and innocency of the queen, my mistress, make all their enemies blush, and silence the wicked and unjust calumnies that malice and envy have raised against her. Make her and these nations happy in the prince of Wales; whom, from unanswerable and undoubted proofs, I know to be her son. Restore them all, when thou seest fit, to their just rights, and on such a bottom as may support and establish the church of England, and once more make her flourish, notwithstanding what she hath received of late from her prevaricating sons. Forgive, forgive, O Lord, all my enemies; bless all my friends; comfort and support my dear afflicted wife, and poor babes; be thou a husband and a father to them; for their sakes only I could have wished to have lived; but pardon that wish, O good God, and take my soul into thy everlasting Glory! Amen.

J. ASHTON.

A TRUE COPY of part of that PAPER, which Mr. Ashton left in a Friend's hands; Together with a LETTER in which he sent it enclosed.

[The Paper begins with the Speech already published; immediately after which he adds:]

Thus much is contained in the Paper that I design to leave with the sheriff. But being suddenly to give up my accounts to the Searcher of all hearts, I think it a duty incumbent upon me to impart some things farther, which neither the interest nor iniquity of these times will, I conclude, willingly bear the publication of, and therefore not fit to be inserted in the sheriff's paper.

Some time after the prince of Orange's arrival here, when it was expected, that pursuant to his own declaration, and the king's letter to the convention, an exact search and enquiry would have been made into the birth of the prince of Wales, there was a scheme drawn up of that whole matter, and of the proofs that were then, and are still, ready to be produced, to prove his royal highness's legitimacy; but no public examination being ever had, and the violence of the times, as well as interest of the present government, not permitting any private person to move in it, those papers have ever since lain by: But it being now thought adviseable by some to have them printed and published, and (as at first they were designed) addressed, at their next meeting, to the lords and commons, entreating them to enquire into that weighty affair, and to call forth, examine, and protect (for who else dares to appear) the many witnesses to the several particulars therein offered to be legally proved, &c.

I was ordered to carry those papers to the king my master, for his view, that his leave and approbation might go along with the desires of his good subjects here; and they being taken with me, with some other papers of accounts, &c. in a small trunk, and amongst my linnen, and other private things of my own, and not in the packet, (my lord Preston being altogether a stranger to the whole proceeding,) by this means fell into the hands of our present governors; who though they wisely waved the producing them as evidence at my trial, yet have I just reason to believe my greatest crimes were contained in them; and do therefore conclude and hope, that I only am designed to be sacrificed, who only knew of them. Nor am I surprized at it, since nothing, I think, can be more prejudicial to some persons present interest, than the exposing of those papers to the public, which will set that pretended mystery of darkness in so clear a light, that all mankind must be convinced of his highness's being born of the queen, and of their wickedness, who have maliciously and designedly asserted that innocent prince to be an impostor. The love and compassion that I have for my native country, as well as charity, obliges me humbly to implore Almighty God to be merciful to it, and not to charge this great sin to the public account, and that we may not farther provoke his justice, by our wilfully continuing in error and mistake. I beseech him to put it into the hearts of the lords, &c. at their next meeting, to examine into that whole matter, and (if before that time this be published) to enquire after, call for, and if possible, retrieve those papers that were taken with me; whereby the obstinate will most certainly be convinced, and the ignorant informed, the doubtful confirmed, the eyes of all opened, and a sacred most important truth made apparent to the whole world.

What I have next to impart, is not less material, &c.

[But I do not think it a proper time to publish what follows next, and therefore, according to the will and desire of my dead friend, expressed in his following letter, it is reserved to a fitter opportunity; and shall now only insert what he wrote to me relating to Mr. Elliot.]

But I must not end this Paper till I have done one act more of justice, as well as charity, in behalf of my fellow sufferer, Mr. Elliot, who was, as I do most sincerely believe, altogether ignorant, not only of the contents of the papers, but even of the papers themselves, and no way concerned, but as a passenger; and yet, if Providence had not prevented our being all tried together, as was intended, that innocent gentleman had most certainly shared in our fates; for the proofs, even at my trial, lay stronger against him than myself: for captain Billop did then, upon oath (unnecessarily, I think) declare him to be much more concerned and importunate than I was, to have the packet thrown overboard; and yet singly from my being concerned, and speaking to him on that subject, a presumptive evidence (sufficient, as it proved, with that jury to find me guilty upon) was drawn, that I knew what was contained therein. But I do most heartily forgive them, and pray to God, that this poor gentleman, by gaining of time, may escape better, and that his innocent blood may not be shed: and I hope these words of a dying man (though no legal proof) may have some weight with an impartial, conscientious jury (if such a jury he can get,) whenever he is brought to his trial.

JOHN ASHTON.

This Paper, &c. came inclosed to me from Mr. Ashton, before his execution, in the following Letter:

"Sir; Knowing your friendship and fidelity, to your, and your only, as unto safe and secure (though distant) hands, I recommend the inclosed papers; what chiefly relates to myself, being the first part, I design to leave with the sheriff; nor shall I be anxious about his disposal of it: but the following paragraphs, that concern the prince of Wales, and ———, I beg you to preserve as jewels, and publish them, either part or all (chiefly that about the prince), whenever time or occasion seems to permit or require. And as to the fitness of either, you may be pleased to consult A. B.'s advice; I doubt not but sooner or later they will all be useful: and that you may the more value them, I do most solemnly protest, I have been as careful in what I have asserted for truth, as if I were now at God's dreadful tribunal; where I expect suddenly to appear, and by his mercy hope to hear that ravishing sound, Come, ye blessed, &c."

What relates to Mr. Elliot, though I design to declare as much to some, who at his trial may give it in evidence, yet I thought it just to leave a record of his innocence under my hand.

I have nothing to add, but to request your prayers, that God, of his infinite mercy, would support and strengthen me in my last moments, and take to himself, Sir, yours, Newgate, Jan. 27, 1690-1. JOHN ASHTON.*

366. *Proceedings in Parliament upon the Case of JAY and TOPHAM; and the Defence made by Sir Francis Pemberton and Sir Thomas Jones, for their Judgment given therein: 1 WILLIAM & MARY, A. D. 1689.

MR. TOPHAM,† Serjeant, attending the House of Commons, having by his Petition complained, That he had been a great sufferer by several prosecutions at law for executing the Orders of the House; and that having pleaded those Orders to the jurisdiction of the Court of King's Bench, his pleas had not been allowed, but judgment was given against him: the House referred the examination and consideration of this matter to the Committee of Privileges. Accordingly the Committee met and examined the matter.

July 6, 1 Will. and Mar.

Col. Byrch reported the fact as it appeared to the Committee, with the opinion of the Committee thereupon, with which the House agreed, in these words:

* With respect to Privilege of Parliament, see in this Collection, the Cases of Shirley and Fagg, vol. 6, p. 1121; of the Earl of Shaftesbury, on a Habeas Corpus, vol. 6, p. 1269; of Richard Thompson, vol. 8, p. 1; of John Wilkes, A. Parl. Deb. p. 850.

† Concerning this Topham, see an Extract from North's 'Examen,' given in vol. 8, p. 12, of this Collection.

Resolved, "That the House doth agree with the Committee, That the Judgment given by the Court of King's Bench in Easter Term, 34 Car. 2, Regis, upon the Plea of John Topham (at the suit of John Jay) to the jurisdiction of that court; and also the judgments given against the said Mr. Topham, at the suit of Samuel Verdon, John Hiliard, Thomas Staples, Richard Blyth, John Nelson, Thomas Herbert, Nathaniel Reading, and Richard Harnage, are illegal, and a violation of the privileges of parliament, and pernicious to the rights of parliament."

The House being informed, That sir Francis Pemberton and sir Thomas Jones were Judges of the King's Bench at that time, ordered them to attend upon Wednesday next following.

July 10, 1689.

The House being informed, That sir Francis Pemberton and sir Thomas Jones attended, pursuant to the Order of the House; sir Francis Pemberton was first brought in, and Mr. Speaker spoke to him to this effect:

Mr. Speaker (Mr. Henry Powle). The House has been acquainted, there was an action brought in the King's Bench in Easter Term, 34 Car. 2, by one Jay against Serjeant Topham. To which action he pleaded the jurisdiction of this House; and that it proceeded to a demurrer, and the Plea was over-ruled by you as Chief Justice; so the House has sent for you to know upon what ground you did it.

Sir Francis Pemberton. Sir, I know nothing of this action, I have been out of the Court now six years this vacation. If I saw the pleadings, it may be I might give you some account of it, but I cannot remember so many thousand actions as were brought at that time. But if you will let me know what the charge is, I do not doubt but I can give you a good account of it. You say, Sir, he pleaded the jurisdiction of this House.

Mr. Speaker. That is, there was a Plea to the jurisdiction of the Court of King's Bench, That it was done by Order of this House; so it concerns the jurisdiction of this House.

Sir Francis Pemberton. This is quite new to me, for I know not what I was sent for. You were pleased to summon me to attend, but I did not know for what, nor do I remember any such action brought by Jay; I remember only an action was brought by Verdon* against Topham. And I remember there was a motion made to us for a new trial in the case, where there was 500*l.* damages given. And we did give them a new trial, for we thought it monstrous and unreasonable damages.

Mr. Speaker. There were several actions brought, but that which the House would be informed of, is the action that was between John Jay and John Topham.

Sir Francis Pemberton. Under favour, I can say nothing to this action; but this I can say, if the defendant should plead he did arrest him by the command of this House, and should plead that to the jurisdiction of the court of King's Bench (I can say nothing to this particular action, but) I think, with submission, I can satisfy you, that such a plea ought to be over-ruled, and I take it, the law is very clear as to this; but as to what is laid to my charge, with respect to this particular action, if you please to give me some time to look into the records of the court.

Mr. Speaker. The House will consider of it, if you please to withdraw, and then give you their resolution. [Sir Francis Pemberton withdraws.]

Sir Thomas Jones brought in.

Mr. Speaker. Sir Thomas Jones, the occasion the House sent for you is this: They have been acquainted, that in the time of king Charles the Second, in the thirty-fourth year of his reign, there was an action brought by one Jay against Mr. Topham, that then was, and now is, Serjeant of the House of Commons. To which he pleaded, That what he did was by Order of the House, and this he pleaded to the jurisdiction of the Court of King's Bench at that time; they desire to know if you gave the Judgment, and upon what reason?

Sir Thomas Jones. 'Tis so long ago I do not remember it, it is above seven years ago; and I had not notice at all of the cause I was commanded to attend you upon; whether I did give any such judgment or no, it will appear by the record itself.

Mr. Speaker. We have examined the officers, and they give us an account, that sir F. Pemberton was chief justice, and you another judge then.

Sir Thomas Jones. I was a judge of the court at that time, but I cannot certainly say, we did give judgment to over-rule the plea; I hope, if we did, it was according to law.

Mr. Speaker. Well, Sir, you may withdraw, if you please. [Sir Thomas Jones withdraws.]

Sir Francis Pemberton brought in again.

Mr. Speaker. Sir Francis Pemberton, the House took notice when you were in before, you said, when an order of this House was pleaded to the jurisdiction of the King's-bench, you conceived by the law it ought to be over-ruled; and that you could give those reasons that would satisfy the House it was so; they expect you should give them now.

Sir F. Pemberton. Mr. Speaker, as to this question concerning this particular case I know nothing; I know not what the pleading was.

Mr. Speaker. The House does not expect any thing of your answer as to this particular case; but you seemed to make your assertion general, and therefore they desire to hear what you can say as to your general assertion.

Sir F. Pemberton. To satisfy the House of all together, I would desire to look into this particular case; for I do not know whether I was judge or not then: if they will give me some time, I will give them an account of the whole.

Mr. Speaker. The House expects to have some account now of what you said, that a plea to the jurisdiction of the court of King's-bench ought to be over-ruled.

Sir F. Pemberton. If they please, since they charge me with this particular case, I will answer to the whole together.

Mr. Speaker. Well, Sir, if you please to withdraw. [Sir Francis Pemberton withdraws.]

He is brought in again.

Mr. Speaker. Sir Francis Pemberton, the House did take notice that you did affirm here, that if an order of this House was pleaded to the jurisdiction of the court of King's-bench, that it ought to be over-ruled, and that you take the law to be clearly so, and that you thought you could satisfy the House in that point. This is a general assertion, and they require nothing as to the particular case; but they do require you, that you would give them your reasons why you maintain this opinion.

Sir F. Pemberton. The question that was put to me by yourself was a new question to me: I heard nothing concerning it; nor did I know what it was that would be put to me. I did tell you my present apprehensions of the case you put; I did not speak of an order of the House in general, but the order that was in this case, of the order of taking him into cus-today: that was the question proposed to me. I had no reasons to speak of the orders of the House in general, I can give no account of them; but 'tis quoad hoc, whether the order for taking him into custody was pleadable to the jurisdiction? I did apprehend by the law it was not pleadable: if I was understood in any other sense, I beg your pardon, for I spake it quoad hoc. The case of Jay it is, I think, which was, it being the order of the House to take him into custody, that being pleaded to the jurisdiction of the court of King's-bench, whether that ought to be allowed or no? Therefore if it be looked upon as if I spake in general, I did not adapt my words as I should, but that is my meaning.

Mr. Speaker. That comes much to the same purpose, under favour: you say, an order of this House being pleaded in this particular case to the jurisdiction of the King's-bench, that order ought to be over-ruled.

Sir F. Pemberton. I beg your pardon, the plea.

Mr. Speaker. Ay, the plea.

Sir F. Pemberton. It must be in cases of like nature. I do not make such a general assertion, (but speak as to this particular case) I do not know how far that may go; and I hope the House won't desire my opinion in that, I did not dream of it; we were upon this single point. And I must tell you, I did not apprehend any such thing would be put unto me. As to the justification of this, I can't, may be, upon the sudden, be prepared with such reasons as will satisfy the House; if they put it upon me to tell my present apprehensions, that is another thing.

Mr. Speaker. I believe the House will be willing to hear your present apprehensions.

Sir F. Pemberton. That may be with some prejudice to the law, I only tell you my present apprehensions: if you will give me time to give you my reasons, I will give you my reasons as well as I can, but you cannot expect I should be furnished with such reasons now, as I may upon further thought. I must premise this to you, that the jurisdiction of this house I do not take to be in question, nor the validity of their orders. I think there is no judge that understands himself, but will allow the privileges of this house; they are the privileges of the nation, and we are all bound to maintain them as much as any member of the house. But the question is here now de modo. It is agreed on all hands, the taking him into custody is justifiable; but the question is (de modo) whether pleadable by way of jurisdiction, or in bar? And therefore I do not look upon the privileges of this house as at all in question; I only state what I apprehend the state and matter to be. If the house press me to declare my present opinion of it, I must desire I may enlarge myself, if there be occasion for it; it cannot be expected I should be prepared to answer all things.

Mr. Speaker. There is no doubt the house will not tie you up.

Sir F. Pemberton. The question is of the manner of pleading this order of the house; and the question is, Whether it may be to the jurisdiction of the court, or not? And, under favour, I have always taken it, that such a plea could not be pleaded to the jurisdiction of the court, but it is a good plea by way of bar. Any man that understands the law of England, makes a wide difference between the pleading to the jurisdiction, and in bar: and I must tell you, that I take it, that nothing which is pleadable in bar is pleadable to the jurisdiction, there are several manners of pleading. The justification here is a proper matter of bar, and it is a good justification; but whether the court shall be excluded their jurisdiction, that they shall not know whether this be true or no, is the question? For if this be pleaded to the jurisdiction, there is an end of it. Whether Mr. Topham had such an order or not, cannot be a question upon a plea to the jurisdiction, for the hands of the court are tied up; and therefore whenever there is a plea to the jurisdiction, because the court cannot examine the fact, they swear to their plea.

Now here it is allowed by all people living, I think no judge ever denied it, that the order of this house was sufficient to take any one into custody. No judge, I presume, ever thought otherwise; but if this be pleaded to the jurisdiction here, the hands of the court are closed: so that whether he had such an order or not, is not to be enquired of by the court. But if it be pleaded in bar, so it is a good bar, and he will have as much advantage as any, and all people must allow it is a good bar. Therefore I would pray you that you would consider, that in this case here is nothing of your privileges, nothing of the jurisdiction of this court is called in question, but only the manner of making use of it. There are acts of parliament; he that does any thing under an act of parliament, does it under as high an authority, as he that acts under the authority of this house, for that is the authority of this nation. Yet in those cases, though you are tender that none be prejudiced acting by that authority, yet you have never made any provision that it might be pleaded to the jurisdiction. In the case of the commission of Sewers, where they justify by your authority, and the whole nation's, though you have allowed them as beneficial a way of pleading as can be, yet it is by way of bar, not to the jurisdiction of the court. They say it is done by the authority of the commission of the sewers, but they do not plead it to the jurisdiction. This I did in pursuance of the late act for sewers, and therefore you are to examine it no further. This never was allowed, nor the parliament designed no such thing.

In this case, if Mr. Topham comes and pleads this by way of bar, no court will deny but it is a good justification, he has answered to the thing, and justified what he has done. Your authority will be allowed; but the question is, whether this shall stop the court that they shall not examine it? For any man living may plead such a plea. Now the putting him to plead this by way of bar, is only to see whether what he hath pleaded is true? As to all other cases, when you allow that where they do any thing in prosecution of an act of parliament, they shall give the general issue in evidence, this is by way of bar, you do in no case oust the court of its jurisdiction. The King's-bench hath a general jurisdiction to examine the things that are done, whether fairly or not. This plea is allowable, and ought to be allowed to any action of trespass to be brought. But, under favour, I must submit it to you: I take the law to be manifestly plain, that by way of plea to the jurisdiction it cannot be, but it ought to be over-ruled, to put him to plead it by way of bar, where he will have as full advantage. This is my present apprehension.

Then Sir Francis Pemberton being withdrawn, a question was put for adjourning the debate, and it passed in the negative; and the house

Resolved,

"That the orders and proceedings of the house being pleaded to the jurisdiction of the court of King's-bench ought not to be over-ruled."

And sir Francis Pemberton, and sir Thomas Jones were ordered to attend again, to give what further reasons they could for the maintenance of their judgment.

July 19, 1689.

Sir Francis Pemberton and Sir Thomas Jones attending, Sir Francis was first brought in.

Mr. Speaker. Sir Francis Pemberton, the house appointed you to attend formerly (but they have been prevented by other business) to give the reasons of your judgment int^r Jay & Topham.

Sir F. Pemberton. Mr. Speaker, this case was an action of trespass, and it was brought by Jay against Topham, for arresting and detaining him in prison by the space of ten days, and keeping him till he paid him 30*l*. to let him out of prison, by which means many of his affairs were lost, and left in that time undone, which is a common action at common law.

To this the defendant he comes and pleads, that there was an order of this house, made in March, 32 Car. 2. (the action is in the 34 in May) for taking of this Jay into custody, and to bring him to the bar of the house; and says, that by virtue of that order he took him and detained him, with an intention to bring him to the bar of this house. And this he pleads to the jurisdiction of the court, that the court had nothing to do with it, nor ought further to examine this matter. And upon that there was a demurrer, and upon the demurrer it was by the court adjudged, that he should answer over: that is, that he should plead in bar of the action; and this is all that I can discern by the case.

Now, Sir, as to the reasons, since this house is pleased to command me, I will shortly tell you what my apprehensions were, and upon what account we went in this case. When this action was pleaded to the jurisdiction of this court, I considered, and could find no judgment at all against the jurisdiction of this court in any such case, nor any vote of this house, or any thing or order against it at all. The case that came nearest it, was the case of sir John Elliot, where there was an information for some misbehaviour in this house, against sir John Elliot, and others: They did there plead to the jurisdiction of the court, and there the court over-ruled it. It is true, afterwards, upon the return of king Charles 2, there was a writ of error brought upon that judgment, and errors assigned in the lords house, and the judgment was reversed; but there was no error assigned in over-ruling the plea to the jurisdiction of the court, but only this, that it was in the body of the information said, that they did speak some words in parliament, which the court of King's-bench could not try, because by the judgment of the lords house they were not cognizable at law; for the members of this house have always had a freedom of speech here: and upon that account it was reversed. But I must tell you, that in my lord Vaughan's report he did allow, that as to the miscarriage that was alledged in laying hands upon the speaker, the court of King's-bench had a jurisdiction.

And finding no footsteps of law, nor any thing of this honourable house that could direct us, I did consider then what was reasonable and fitting to be done; I knew we had a jurisdiction in the case of such an action as this is, and I found the objection against it was only one, That this house was a superior court, of a higher nature than the King's-Bench, and of a greater authority; and that the King's-Bench had nothing to do to inspect the actions of this house, or to examine what was done by virtue of any order of this house. And then, on the other side, I considered, if the courts of law could not examine it, that there would be a cause struck off by a bare allegation, without any more to do: for if we had no cognizance of it, if we could not examine the matters that were done in pursuance of the order of this house, how could we impanel a jury, and to what purpose should we try it? For if it were found against him that he had exceeded his authority, if we could not give damages for it, what should we examine for? I thought that the consequence of this would be, that that which was alledged to be a disorderly execution of the vote, must be struck off by a bare allegation.

Sir, This coming before us in a judicial way, and we being to do something in it, either throw out the cause, or over-rule the plea to the jurisdiction; I thought it most reasonable that this thing should be examined in that court.

Then I considered, that where justifications are made by virtue of acts of parliament, and every body most acknowledge that court is of a higher nature than the King's-bench, yet that was not enough to exclude the king's courts from their jurisdiction.

I considered in cases where justification is made by act of parliament, there is a justification by as high an authority as this is, that will be allowed on all hands; for there are not only the orders of this house, but the authority of the house of lords. You have in those cases fenced the matter as well as can be imagined, and taken as much care to protect them; given some power to plead summarily, others to plead not guilty, and justify by giving the special matter in evidence; but I never heard that there was any provision made for the pleading to the jurisdiction, though it was done by a higher authority: therefore I thought that the high authority and high nature of this court, could not exempt the King's-bench, being a court of law, to examine, whether what was alleged to be done, was done in pursuance of your authority, or not?

Then I did consider with myself, that if this plea should be over-ruled, the defendant was at no prejudice, for the same matter might be pleaded by way of bar. And it would have been admitted a good bar if true, and he could have no manner of prejudice that I know of by pleading as the court directs. We did not question the legality of your orders, nor the power of them; but the great business was, whether he had pursued this order of the house of commons, and that was the thing properly examinable? But on the other side it would be a monstrous mischief to the plaintiffs if such a plea was allowed to the jurisdiction; for it would be agreed on all hands, if Mr. Topham had abused his authority, and done any outrageous thing; if, when he had an order to bring a member to the bar of this house, he had kept him extravagantly, and not brought him thither, but exacted money of him; if the case in fact was so, it is certain he ought to have been punished, and to return damages to the person injured.

Then in this case, you know, Mr. Speaker, That this house sometimes hath a recess, and parliaments have intervals. When this court hath a recess, and the parliament is dissolved, (as there are many years sometimes when there is no parliament) then in the recess of parliament, (supposing there was a good order, and a man had a damage by the abuse of this order in the mis-execution of it) it is reasonable this man should be satisfied. But peradventure a parliament may not come in three or four years, perhaps six or seven years, in that case he would lose his action.

But that is not all, for in this case, if we could not examine it, the man would be without any remedy in the world. So that if one of your officers should abuse your orders, the person that he hath abused could have no help, if the courts of law could not help him. This was my apprehension: this court we know may examine their officers so as to punish them for it; but I never heard nor understood that this court could go in such a method as to give damages; for first in this case, the method of the law would be precluded: we know what are the methods of a man's obtaining damages; first, he must prove his fact by witnesses; I never heard this honourable court did condescend so far as to give any oath; next they must be assessed by a jury: there is no other way as I know at all; I never knew this court take upon them to assess damages at all.

In the next place, if they could arrive at the matter of damages, I never knew any judgment given, or execution awarded for damages by this honourable court. So that my apprehensions were, that unless the courts at law had jurisdiction of all such actions as these were, this man must be remediless if he had wrong: on the other side, he would have recovered no damages, if he had none. No man would have said, that the house should not have made such an order, or he should not have executed it such a way as you intended it.

Mr. Speaker; These were my apprehensions in this case; I considered it as well as I could, and did see a great mischief on one side, if the ordinary courts of law had no jurisdiction, and could apprehend none if they had, in seeing whether the orders of this house were fairly executed or no, when I am confident that none of this house would allow there should be any cause of their order.

These being my apprehensions as a judge of the court, I did think that I was bound to over-rule the plea that was to the jurisdiction of the court. If I was mistaken in this case, it was an error of my judgment, I had no mind or design to meddle with the affairs of the house, nor to pry into what was done here; my design was to do justice. What weight these things have with others, I must leave with this honourable house: but this was that that induced me to give my opinion for the over-ruling of the plea.*

Mr. Speaker. Did you deliver these reasons in open court, when you gave judgment?

Sir F. Pemberton. No, we very rarely give any reasons in such cases.

Mr. Speaker. Because if you had given these reasons, it would have been some light to the serjeant to have pleaded afterwards.

Sir F. Pemberton. I do not know truly what he did afterwards; but this I am sure he was told, that he might have pleaded this matter in bar, and this would have been a good bar, and this I thought direction enough.

Mr. Speaker. Is it not usual in cases of great moment, as this was, to argue the point in giving judgment?

Sir F. Pemberton. It is so if they will argue it; but if the counsel on both sides let it go, we examine no further. [Sir Francis Pemberton withdrew.]

Sir Thomas Jones brought in.

* The contrast of the conduct of Pemberton upon this occasion, with that of Chief Justice Holt, upon the claim of Knollys to be earl of Banbury, (see the Case, 1693, post) is remarkably striking.

Mr. Speaker. The occasion I suppose you know of your being sent for; 'tis to know upon what reasons you over-ruled the plea to the jurisdiction between Jay and Topham.

Sir Thomas Jones. Mr. Speaker, in the first place, I seriously profess before God and this honourable house, that I never designed to interfere with the authority and privileges of this house. I have had the honour to be an unworthy member of it in two several parliaments; and truly I did always conceive, that for any thing transacted in this house, no other court had any jurisdiction to hear and determine it: and therefore I was always of opinion, that the judgment given in the case of sir John Elliot and my lord Hollis, was a very erroneous and unjustifiable judgment; and the rather, because I knew that there was an act of parliament, that for any thing done in this house, by speaking, debating, or any reasoning whatsoever, there ought to be no suit in accusation or condemnation concerning it, 'tis utterly void.

But, Sir, when I did give this judgment, I do confess I did think there was a difference to be taken in matters that were merely transacted by this house, and may be complicated of the authority and commands of this house, and of the execution of the authority and commands of this house abroad; and that was the case that was before us in the King's Bench.

Mr. Topham was complained of, that he had not only imprisoned the plaintiff Jay, but kept him in prison till he had paid him 30*l*. Now I did humbly conceive that this declaration ought to be answered, and not to be put off with a plea to the jurisdiction of the court.

'Tis true, as I did say, where the intire matter is transacted in this house, there a plea to the jurisdiction of the court is proper; but in the present case I did conceive, that jurisdiction was most proper that could try and determine the whole merits of the cause between both the parties, especially where the privileges of this house would no way suffer nor be injured. Thereupon I think Mr. Topham was advised and told, that he ought to plead this matter in bar, wherein there would be full consideration, and perfect regard given to the commands and authority of this house, and all imaginable reverence: if he had but produced a copy at most of your journal, that had been sufficient, and no judge would have been so silly, or imprudent at least, to have said, that had not been a good and sufficient authority. But Mr. Topham thinks it not fit at all to answer in this plea to the taking the 30*l*. for which, if it was extortion upon the subject, I am sure that whosoever has a care of the rights of the subject, as you have, would not have suffered the subject to have gone without remedy and satisfaction.

Sir, as to what may be said in this case, that upon complaint to you, you would have punished Mr. Topham; give me leave to say, that I think at that time, when Mr. Topham had this prisoner in custody, you were risen.

But besides, to let that go, I do conceive, and I never found it in my experience, when I was an unworthy member of this house, that you have ever given damage to a party that was injured by your officer. 'Tis true, you would punish your officer for the injury, but I never knew the party injured have any satisfaction.

Sir, another reason is this, the authority of this court argues very great; but with all reverence be it spoken to the authority of this House, the authority of an act of parliament is greater than the authority of this court: For although for the most part in acts of parliament you have the first production and formation of the acts of parliament, yet without the consent of the Lords, without the royal assent of the king, it is no law. But when it is a law by all these authorities, not only by yours, but by the consent of the Lords; in case one man does any thing by virtue of a command of such an act of parliament, suppose it be under the commissioners of sewers, or in the executing of a rate for the poor, or raising your poll-act; if any other man shall be so hardy as to question his doing his duty according to your commands, the party so questioned is either to plead in bar especially, or, which indeed you have provided for the ease of pleading in many cases, he may plead it generally, and give in evidence the special matter: But it never was known that any man should offer to say, I was an officer by act of parliament, and therefore demand, whether you will take cognizance of the matter, having done what I did by act of parliament.

And if it be so in cases of acts of parliament, as nobody will deny, then I thought it might be so when there was only a command of the House to do such a thing (the reverence to which would have been perceived if there had been a plea in bar), and there was an abuse of your order, in the exacting 30*l*. complained of: And I thought the rather so, because of the act of parliament I mentioned, 4 H. 8, c. 8, which does provide, that there shall be no prosecution or suit for any trouble or grievance that is done in this House, and makes it void. But it goes further, (it orders no plea indeed one way or other, either in bar, or to the jurisdiction, but) in the close of the act it says, That if any the persons thereafter should be vexed, troubled, or otherways charged for any cause as aforesaid, then he, or they, so troubled for the same, should have an action of the case against every such person or persons so vexing and troubling them, and recover treble damages and costs. And upon these reasons, Sir, I did give my opinion at that time, that the plea to the jurisdiction of the court should be over-ruled; which, if not agreeable to your judgment, I must humbly beg your pardon for it.

Mr. Speaker. Did you deliver these reasons in court, when you gave judgment for over-ruling the plea?

Sir Thomas Jones. Truly, Sir, I cannot say we did, nor cannot say we were demanded our reasons, nor cannot say any thing was moved in arrest of judgment, or shewed to us why we should give our reasons; but I believe Mr. Topham will not say but he was advised, that it was proper for him to plead it in bar, and then all right would have been done to the authority of this court, and to Mr. Topham, as well as to the plaintiff.

Mr. Speaker. It would have been a satisfaction to Mr. Topham and the whole kingdom, if you had given your reasons; and we take it, that upon demurrers of great consequence, the court uses to give the reasons of their judgments.

Sir Thomas Jones. Truly it is so long ago, I am not able to say whether we did or did not; but it is not usual for judgment to be given seriatim, if all the judges of the court be agreed in the thing, as they were in this case.

Mr. Speaker. Where the judges agree, the Lord Chief Justice gives the opinion of the court; but then in matters of this moment, he usually gives the reason.

Sir Thomas Jones. As far as I told you before, we did give the reason, that it was more proper to be a plea in bar, than to the jurisdiction of the court.

Then sir Thomas Jones withdrew, and the House, after a debate,

Resolved, "That sir Francis Pemberton, giving judgment to over-rule the plea to the jurisdiction of the court of King's-bench, in the case between Jay and Topham, had broken the privileges of the House." And also,

Resolved, "That sir Thomas Jones giving judgment to over-rule the plea to the jurisdiction of the court of King's-bench, in the case between Jay and Topham, had broken the privileges of the House."

And by Order of the House, both sir Francis Pemberton and sir Thomas Jones were taken into custody for the said Breach of Privilege, and lay till there came a prorogation.

367. The Trial of HENRY HARRISON at the Old Bailey, for the Murder of Andrew Clenche, Doctor of Physic: 4 WILLIAM & MARY, A. D. 1692.

Wednesday, April 6, 1692.

Judges present { Lord Chief Justice Holt, Lord Chief Baron Atkins,
Mr. Justice Nevil.

THE Keeper of the prison of Newgate did, according to order of the Court, being then sat, bring up the body of Henry Harrison, gent. to the Sessions-house in the Old Bailey, London, who being at the bar, was arraigned upon an indictment of felony and murder, found that day by the grand jury for the city of London, in manner following:

Cl. of Arr. Henry Harrison, hold up thy hand. [Which he did.] You stand indicted by the name of Henry Harrison, late of London, gent. for that you, not having the fear of God before your eyes, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, the fourth day of January, in the third year of the reign of our sovereign lord and lady, king William and queen Mary, of England, &c. about eleven of the clock in the night of the same day, with force and arms, &c. at London, viz. in the parish of St. Peter, Cornhill, in the ward of Lime-street, in London aforesaid, being in a certain coach with one Andrew Clenche, doctor of physic, and a certain man yet unknown, in and upon the said Andrew Clenche, in the peace of God, and of our sovereign lord and lady, the king and queen, then and there being, violently, feloniously, and of your malice before-thought, did make an assault. And that you the said Henry Harrison, with the help and assistance of the said man unknown, with a pocket handkerchief, with a coal in the same being put, of the value of two-pence, about the neck of him the said Andrew Clenche, then and there, feloniously, voluntarily, and of your malice before-thought, did put, fasten and bind; and that you the said Henry Harrison, with the said handkerchief with the coal aforesaid in it by you the said Henry Harrison, with the help and assistance of the aforesaid man unknown, about the neck of the said Andrew Clenche then as aforesaid, put, fastened and bound, him the said Andrew Clenche, then and there with force of arms, &c. feloniously, voluntarily, and of your malice before-thought, did choak and strangle; by reason of which choaking and strangling of the said Andrew Clenche by you the said Henry Harrison, with the handkerchief aforesaid, with the coal as aforesaid put in it, he the said Andrew Clenche instantly died: so that you the said Henry Harrison, with the help and assistance of the said man unknown, him the said Andrew Clenche, the said fourth day of January in the year aforesaid, at the parish and ward aforesaid, in manner and form aforesaid, feloniously, voluntarily, and of your malice before-thought, did kill and murder, against the peace of our sovereign lord and lady, the king and queen now, their crown and dignity.

How say you, Henry Harrison, are you guilty of this felony and murder whereof you stand indicted, or not guilty?

Mr. Harrison. Not guilty in thought, word nor deed.

Cl. of Arr. Culprest, how will you be tried?

Harrison. By God and my country.

Cl. of Arr. God send you a good deliverance.

Then the said Mr. Harrison was taken away from the bar by the Keeper of Newgate. And afterwards the same day, about eleven o'clock in the morning, the said Henry Harrison was brought to the bar, and he desired the Court that he might then be tried, which was granted, and those persons who were returned upon the Jury were called over twice, and their appearances recorded.

Cl. of Arr. You Henry Harrison, these men that you shall hear called, and personally do appear, are to pass between our sovereign lord and lady, the king and queen, and you, upon trial of your life and death; if therefore you will challenge them, or any of them, your time is to challenge them as they come to the book to be sworn, and before they be sworn.

L. C. J. Holt. Mr. Harrison, you may challenge such of the Jury as you shall think fit before they be sworn.

Then the Jury was called and sworn, and then were counted; and the twelve sworn were these whose names follow: John Roll, Nathaniel Houlton, Michael Pindar, James Hulbert, Joseph Howe, Richard Chewne, John Lawford, Nicholas Wildeboare, Robert Williamson, William Merriden, Thomas Simpson, Thomas Pakeman.

Then proclamation for Information and Evidence was made as is usual.

Mr. Harrison. My lord, I have made no challenges, because I do believe the jury to be honest men.

Cl. of Ar. Henry Harrison, Hold up thy hand. [Which he did.]

Gentlemen, you that are sworn, look upon the prisoner, and hearken to his cause. He stands indicted by the name of Henry Harrison, late of London, gent. &c. [he reads the Indictment.] Upon this indictment he hath been arraigned, and thereunto hath pleaded not guilty; and for his trial hath put himself upon God and his country, which country you are. Your charge is to enquire whether he be guilty of this felony and murder whereof he stands indicted, or not guilty. If you find that he is guilty, you are to inquire what goods and chattels, lands or tenements he had at the time of the felony and murder committed, or at any time since. If you find him not guilty, you are to inquire whether he fled for it. If you find that he fled for it, you are to inquire of his goods and chattels, as if you found him guilty. If you find him not guilty, nor that he did fly for it, you are to say so, and no more; and hear your evidence.

Mr. Darnell. My lord, Mr. Harrison's agents or friends have, since the last sessions, made or conveyed away a young man that was a principal evidence against him.

L. C. J. That is a very ill thing, and if it be proved, it will no way conduce to Mr. Harrison's advantage.

Harrison. My lord, I know nothing of it. But, my lord, one of my witnesses, that would have been material for me, is lately dead, sir Edward Hungerford's son.

Mr. Darnell. May it please your lordships, and you gentlemen that are sworn: I am of counsel for the king and queen against the prisoner at the bar, who stands indicted for the murder of Dr. Andrew Clenche, which was as barbarous a murder as any that hath been committed in this age. And considering it was done in the dark, I think there will be given as clear an evidence of it against Mr. Harrison, the prisoner, as can be expected. And it was upon this occasion; One Mrs. Vanwicke a widow (between whom and Mr. Harrison there was a great kindness) prevailed with Dr. Clenche, to whom she was indebted 20*l.* to lend her so much more as would make it up 120 pounds, and to take a mortgage of a house of hers in Buckingham court near Charing Cross for his security; and Mr. Harrison was present with Mrs. Vanwicke at the lending of the rest of the money, and executing of the mortgage, as he was wont to be at the management of her affairs; but when the time came that it was to be repaid, the doctor could not get his money, and Mrs. Vanwicke having but an estate for life in the house, and having long delayed the doctor, he brought an ejectment for the recovering of the house, upon which the prisoner came to Dr. Clenche, and abused him with very scurrilous language, and his passion growing higher, he laid his hand upon his sword, and would have drawn it, and if it had not been for one Mr. Johnson, it was thought he would have killed the doctor at that time; so that the doctor desired Mr. Johnson to take the business upon himself, and to act in his own name, he was so much afraid of him. And it will be proved further to you, that at another time the prisoner said, that Dr. Clenche was a rogue and a villain, and deserved to have his throat cut. And some time after this, Mrs. Vanwicke would have borrowed some more money of the doctor, but he refused to lend it her; whereupon she acquainting the prisoner with it, he said, leave him to me, madam; I'll warrant you, I'll manage him; he is a rogue, and deserves to have his throat cut. And afterwards, about St. Thomas's day last, the prisoner went to Mrs. West the tenant, who dwelt in the house mortgaged to Dr. Clenche, and desired of Mrs. West to have some money for Mrs. Vanwicke, and it should be discounted in part of the then next Christmas rent. But the said Mrs. West refused to pay him any, telling him, that she and her husband were forbid by Dr. Clenche and the ground landlord, to pay any more to Mrs. Vanwicke; and thereupon the prisoner expressed his further malice against the doctor, and said, he is a great rogue, and a villain, and deserves to have his throat cut, and will not die in his bed. And, gentlemen, soon after the prisoner began to put his malicious design against the doctor in execution, and the method he took was first to change his lodgings; for on the day before Christmas Eve last, he took new lodgings at one Mr. Garway's in Threadneedle-Street, near the Old Exchange, attended by a foot boy, pretending himself to be a parliament man, and that he was just then come out of the country, and lay in his lodgings there every night, until the first day of January following, but lay out that night, and the two next nights following. And whilst he lodged at this Mr. Garway's this matter happened, which does conduce somewhat towards the discovery of this murder. One evening the prisoner being in his chamber there, and one Mrs. Jackson, the daughter of Mrs. Garway, making a fire for him, he did take out his handkerchief, and held it before the fire to dry it, which she took great notice of, because it was coarse and dirty, and not fit for his quality (as she thought), it being made of ordinary Indian stuff, like her mother's maid's apron. And, gentlemen, this very handkerchief was the same with which the murder was committed, and this Mrs. Jackson will swear it to be the same; for it is a very remarkable one, and it will be produced to you. And we shall shew you further, That on the 3d day of January (being the day before this murder was committed) he caused a sham letter to be left for him at his lodgings at this Mr. Garway's, as written from a friend of his that was sick in the country, earnestly pressing him to come quickly down to him: And we shall prove, that the same evening, he being with Mrs. Vanwicke in Woodstreet compter, did again threaten Dr. Clenche, and said, that he was a rogue, and he would have his blood. And upon the fourth day of January last, he again changed his lodgings and took new ones at one Mr. Jones's, a cane-chair maker in St. Paul's church-yard, and there he pretended himself to be a country gentleman, just then come out of Cumberland, and brought in a portmanteau trunk thither: And the same day he sent a letter to Mrs. Garway, where he had lodged before, acquainting her, that he was gone out of town for a week or ten days. And, to give you farther satisfaction, we shall prove, that upon the same fourth day of January, in the night of which this unfortunate gentleman was murdered, the prisoner was at one Mr. Robert Humston's lodgings at the Golden Key in Fleet-street, over-against Fetter-Lane end, at near nine of the clock at night; and being asked by Mr. Humston to stay and sup with him, he said, he could not, for he had been about earnest business that day, which was to be done that night, and that a gentleman stayed for him in the street, to go with him about it, and so he went away. And soon after, about nine of the clock the same night, two men standing in Fleet-street, at Fetter-Lane end, called for a coach, and asked the coachman if he knew Dr. Clenche, who dwelt in Brownlow-street in

Holborn; and the coachman replied, he did know the street, but not the doctor: whereupon they went into the coach, and ordered him to drive to the end of Brownlow-street; and when they came thither, one of them called to the coachman, and bade him go to Dr. Clenche's and tell him, that two gentlemen in a coach, at the end of the street, desired him to go with them to a patient that was very sick; which the coachman did. And he found the doctor in his night-gown and slippers, and just a-going to bed; but he immediately dressed himself, and went to them into the coach. And it fell out very happily for the further discovery of this murder, that while this coach stood at the end of Brownlow-street, a young gentlewoman standing at her door near it, and fancying that while the coachman went on the errand, the gentlemen would slip out of the coach (I think they call it bilking) she watched them. And a lamp that lighted cross Holborn, over-against Brownlow-street end, and another about the middle of Brownlow-street, gave such a light into the coach, that she plainly saw one of the men that sat in it, and see him look out of the coach after the coachman, and heard him swear at the coachman, because he made no more haste in going to the doctor's house; and she is very certain that the prisoner at the bar is the same person that looked out of the coach, and that did swear at the coachman, and is more confident of it from the remarkableness of his voice. For she hearing of this murder, and remembering these circumstances, she went to Newgate to see the prisoner, and hearing his voice in another room, before she saw him, she declared to the persons that were then with her, that the voice she then heard, was the person's voice that she saw look out of the coach, and that did swear at the coachman; and afterwards, when she came into the room where the prisoner was, though with several other men, she pointed to him as the person, and she hearing him then speak again, declared to the persons with her, that both by his voice, and by his countenance, she knew him to be the same man. And, my lord, after those gentlemen had gotten the doctor into the coach, one of them called to the coachman, and bade him make haste and drive them to Leaden-Hall-Market, and when they were come within Holborn-Bars, one of them called to the coachman, and bade him drive faster; whereupon the coachman drove them very fast through Holborn to Leaden-Hall-Market-Gate; and when he came there, one of them bade him drive to the Pye without Aldgate (before which time, without doubt, the murder was committed upon the doctor, for his hat was found next morning in Holborn, near Fetter-Lane end; but the driving so long about after, is supposed to be done, lest the doctor might recover;) and when they were come without Aldgate, one of them ordered the coachman to ask there for one Hunt, a chyrurgeon, which he did, and being answered, that no such person was there, he ordered the coachman to drive back again to Leaden-Hall, and when they came there, one of them called the coachman, and gave him three shillings and six-pence, and bad him go into the market there to one Hunt, a poulterer, and buy them a couple of fowls, but the coachman could not find any Hunt, a poulterer; but however he bought a couple of fowls for three shillings, and when he came with them to his coach, the two gentlemen were gone, and the doctor left in the coach, murdered, with a handkerchief tied fast about his neck, with a coal in it (which will be proved to be the prisoner's handkerchief.) Besides, there was a boy in the street there, who took notice of the coachman's being sent of an errand, and saw the two persons come out of the coach in great haste, and he going towards the coach before they went out of it, one of them did swear at him to be gone, and of him the boy took most notice, and was as positive as any man can be to the person of one that he never saw before, that the prisoner now at the bar was one of them, and was the person that did then swear at him; but this witness is spirited away, and cannot be heard of, although he hath been described in the Gazette, and diligent search and enquiry has been made after him. But we have his examination upon oath before the coroner; and we must submit to the court how far that shall be admitted as evidence. Gentlemen, we will call our witnesses; and if they prove all this matter, I believe every man here will be satisfied; that the prisoner at the bar is guilty of this base murder. Pray call and swear Mr. George Wigmore. (Who was sworn with others.)

Mr. Darnel. Pray, Mr. Wigmore, tell my lord and the jury what you know of any money that was lent by Dr. Clenche, and to whom.

Wigmore. May it please your lordship, there was a draught of a mortgage from Mrs. Vanwicke to Dr. Clenche, made by a gentleman of Grays-Inn, for the sum of 120*l.* and I ingrossed it; and I paid, by the doctor's order, above threescore pounds of the money, and the rest of it was satisfied before; and upon sealing of the mortgage for the money, Mr. Harrison and one Mr. Rowe fell out about their dividend of the money, and called one another ill names; and Mr. Rowe produced a bill of what he had done and laid out for coach-hire and other things for Mrs. Vanwicke; and Mr. Harrison and he had high words about it, and called one another rogues; so I told them, if they could not agree, I would put the money up again, and carry it home; but Mrs. Vanwicke and they did agree at last, and sealed the mortgage, and I paid the money; and Mrs. Vanwicke and Mr. Harrison took out 20*l.* of the money, and paid it to Mr. Rowe; and after Mr. Rowe was gone, they desired me to go with them to the Young Devil tavern, and they both used hard expressions there against Mr. Rowe.

L. C. J. Who was the mortgage made to?

Wigmore. My lord, it was made to Dr. Clenche for 120*l.*

Harrison. Pray, Sir, will you tell the jury how much money the gentlewoman had; and if Mr. Rowe had not stept between me and her, I had not been in question.

Wigmore. Mrs. Vanwicke acknowledged, that the money I paid her made up 120*l.*

L. C. J. What did you hear the prisoner say against Dr. Clenche?

Wigmore. My lord, I do say that he was very troublesome to the doctor.

L. C. J. Were there any reproaches cast upon the doctor at that time?

Wigmore. No, my lord, only upon Rowe, because he was a trustee.

Mr. Darnel. Did you hear him say any thing against the doctor?

Wigmore. Indeed, I cannot particularly say.

L. C. J. He is upon his oath, and he is sensible, and understands the question.

Wigmore. He did say very ugly words; and when I met him afterwards in the highway, he was very huffy, and I thought he would have drawn his sword upon me.

L. C. J. What did he say of the doctor?

Wigmore. I cannot say particularly what he said.

L. C. J. Stand down.

Mr. Darnel. Call Mr. Thomas Johnson. (Who was sworn, and stood up.)

Mr. Darnel. Sir, Pray give the court an account what you know concerning this matter.

Johnson. My lord, I believe I shall say nothing that Mr. Harrison will contradict. I was attorney for Dr. Clenche between him and Mrs. Vanwicke; and I sued Mr. Rowe, that was bound with Mrs. Vanwicke in a bond to perform covenants for re-payment of the money lent her by Dr. Clenche upon mortgage; and I advised the Dr. and told him, do not let us trouble the tenant, but let us take Rowe first; and I sued Rowe, and had him arrested; and after some time, I saw that the mortgage must do our business, for Rowe could not pay the money; whereupon I caused a declaration in ejectment to be delivered against Mrs. Vanwicke's tenant of the house mortgaged by her to Dr. Clenche; and then Mr. Harrison came to me, and he expressed himself against the doctor after a strange rate, and laid his hand upon his sword; so, my lord, I said to him, What a fool do you make of yourself! Must none go to law, but they must ask your leave? I suppose Mr. Harrison cannot deny this. Then Mr. Harrison preferred a petition to the lords commissioners of the Great Seal for Mrs. Vanwicke, and thereby suggested to their lordships, that she was wronged in the purchase, and in the mortgage-money, and that 20*l.* of it was a former debt of her husband's; and he finding she could have no relief before them without payment of the mortgage-money, he grew troublesome; yet says I, Mr. Harrison, What she hath done, I cannot help; but if she would pay the rest, I told him I would abate her 20*l.* and the interest money also.

Mr. Darnel. Pray, Sir, did the doctor desire you to act for him in your own name, because he had no mind to meet with Mrs. Vanwicke and the prisoner?

Johnson. The doctor did find himself too deeply concerned with them, and he did not care to have to do with them; whether it was that he was afraid of his life, I cannot say; but he said to me, Pray, Sir, go on, I will put all into your hands. and I will trust you with all the affair; and let them come to you, and not trouble me; own it to be your own; and I told him I feared none of them; and the doctor gave out, that he had made over all to me, although he had not; and upon this, I fear, comes this unfortunate business, and the doctor's lady must look after it herself.

L. C. J. What did he say when he had laid his hand upon his sword in your study?

Johnson. He said the doctor had cheated the widow; and he said, That he would be revenged on him, as near as my memory will serve me; I suppose he will not deny it; whether he did this in a passion, or to affright the doctor or no, I cannot tell.

L. C. J. Was that before you offered to abate the 20*l.*?

Johnson. It was before I offered to abate it.

Harrison. How long was it before Dr. Clenche was murdered?

Johnson. I think it was about a fortnight, or three weeks, or a little more.

Harrison. I never threatened the doctor in my life; but I said, Rowe had been a villain, and a cheat, and he and Rowe were the men; and I shall make it appear, that the doctor never wronged the widow.

L. C. J. How came Rowe to be intrusted or concerned with the money?

Johnson. My lord, Mr. Cornelius Vandinker, a merchant, gave a legacy of 500*l.* to the widow Vanwicke and her children; and Mr. Rowe was a trustee on the purchase, and had by that the management of the affair.

Darnel. Call Mr. George Howard. (Who being sworn, stood up.)

Mr. Darnel. Mr. Howard, Give the court an account of what you know concerning the prisoner's threatening Dr. Clenche.

Howard. My lord, I was at Joe's Coffee-house, near Warwick-House in Holborn, some considerable time before Dr. Clenche was murdered, where Mr. Harrison used several virulent expressions against Dr. Clenche; among others, one was, that he was a rogue and a rascal, and deserved to have his throat cut. Mrs. Vanwicke was then in company, and they both said, that they then came from Dr. Clenche's.

Mr. Darnel. You are sure he said that Dr. Clenche deserved to have his throat cut?

Howard. Yes: he said, that Dr. Clench deserved to have his throat cut.

Harrison. Who was I talking to?

Howard. You were talking to Mrs. M. Sheriff.

Mr. Darnel. Call Mrs. Mary Sheriff. (Who was sworn, and stood up.)

Mrs. Sheriff. My lord, Mrs. Vanwicke came to my house with Mr. Harrison, and desired me to go with her to Dr. Clenche's house; and when we came there, she desired him to let her have 20*l.* more, and he said, No; if his house were full of money, he would not lend her any more, so long as she kept Mr. Harrison's company, for he would spend it; and he advised her to be a gentleman's house-keeper, and he would help her to a place; and told her withal, that she owed him 120*l.* for which he would take 100*l.*; and we left Mr. Harrison behind us at my house, and did not take him with us, because we were afraid he might anger the doctor, and fall out with him; so when we came back, Mr. Harrison asked Mrs. Vanwicke, what Dr. Clenche said: why, says she, he saith, that he will not lend me any more money while I keep you company, for you will spend it, and that I must go to service. To service! said Mr. Harrison; God damn him! Have a person of your quality go to service! He deserves to have his throat cut; let me alone, I'll manage him as never any man was managed; and so away they went together.

Harrison. Did not you say, that as you hoped to be saved, that I was innocent of the thing?

L. C. J. She does not accuse you of doing the fact, but gives an account of some expressions that passed from you.

Mrs. Sheriff. You were always talking against Dr. Clenche; and you said, God damn him, he was an old rogue, and that Mrs. Vanwicke was almost starved to death.

Harrison. Rowe, Rowe, I meant, my lord.

The Prisoner then being in a passion.

L. C. J. Mr. Harrison, do not fall into a passion; it may be more to your advantage in the making your defence, if you keep your temper.

L. C. J. Witness, what were the words that he said against doctor Clench?

Mrs. Sheriff. Why, he speaking of doctor Clenche, said to Mrs. Vanwicke, God damn him would he have a person of your quality go to service! He deserves to have his throat cut. Well, madam, says he, be contented; I'll manage him as never any man was managed.

Harrison. What had you for your swearing?

Coroner for the King and Queen. Witness, he asketh you, if you had any thing for your swearing against him?

Mrs. Sheriff. No, I had nothing, neither have I need of any thing; I had not so much as my coach hire.

Mr. Darnel. Call Mrs. Elizabeth West. [Who was sworn.]

Mr. Darnel. Mistress, give an account to the court, what you know about the prisoner's coming to demand rent of you, and what passed.

Mrs. West. May it please your lordship, this gentleman, the prisoner, came to me two or three days before St. Thomas's day last, and desired me to give him some rent for Mrs.

Vanwicke; and I told him I had no power to pay him, because I was warned by Dr. Clenche to pay no more: says he to me again, Dr. Clenche and Rowe are great rogues, and great villains. Sir, says I to him again, I believe that the doctor is a very honest man. No, says Mr. Harrison, he is a great villain, and he will never die in his bed; which of them he meant, Mr. Rowe or Dr. Clenche, I cannot tell. And Mrs. Vanwicke and Mr. Harrison, a little time before that, pressed me to let them have some shop goods in part of her rent, to grow due; and she made great complaint, that her children were ready to starve; and I then told them, that Mr. Johnson had fore-warned me to pay no more rent to Mrs. Vanwicke, and if I did, I should pay it again; and therefore I would not pay any more rent to her, or deliver her any goods, until she had agreed with Mr. Johnson; and then Mr. Harrison said, that Mr. Johnson was a great villain and a great rogue, and that they had all combined together to cheat the widow. And Mr. Johnson being at my house, Mrs. Vanwicke fell upon him in a great rage, and said, she would tear his throat out, and laid hold on him; and Mr. Johnson got from her, and went away in great haste. And the last time I saw Dr. Clenche, I pressed very hard upon him, to let Mrs. Vanwicke have more money: and the doctor said, that she would never do any good with it, for she spent it all upon Mr. Harrison; and I wished him to let her have 20*l.* more; and he said, that he advised her to go to service, and that he had wished her to a service of 20*l.* a year, and she abused him for it.

L. C. J. What cloaths had the prisoner on?

Mrs. West. My lord, he had an old threadbare black cloth suit of clothes on, which looked very shabby.

Harrison. What religion are you of, mistress?

Mrs. West. I was born and bred a Protestant.

Harrison. I believe you are a Papist, and will swear any thing; you keep Roman Catholics in your house, they have murdered Dr. Clenche, for aught I know.

L. C. J. Did Mr. Harrison ever lodge in your house?

Mrs. West. No, my lord, I have none but persons of quality lodge in my house, and they belong to the present government.

Mr. Darnel. Call Ann Watson. [Who was sworn.]

Mr. Darnel. Pray, tell my lord and the jury, what you know of Mr. Harrison's taking of lodgings at Mr. Garway's house, and when it was.

Anne Watson. He came about six o'clock at night, the day before Christmas-eve last, to my master's, Mr. Garway's house, and told us, that he was newly come out of the country; and lodged there that night, and so he did until and upon the last night of December; and on the first day of January he went out, and staid out that night; and on the Sunday, the 3rd of January last, at night, he came again with a person with him, and fetched away his portmanteau-trunk and things, and paid for his lodging; and in his absence there was a letter left for him, which I gave him, and he said, it came out of the country, and that he had a friend sick in the country, and did intend to go down to see him, being one from whom he expected a legacy, and he left that letter on the kitchen window, and on the Monday after, being the 4th day of January last, he sent a letter, signifying he was gone out of town.

Then the Letter was produced, marked with the Penny-post mark.

Mr. Darnel. Who knows Mr. Harrison's hand? Mr. Johnson, take that letter and look upon it, and tell the court if you think it to be Mr. Harrison's hand.

Mr. Johnson takes the letter and looks upon it.

Johnson. My lord, I believe it to be Mr. Harrison's hand.

Mr. Darnel. My lord, I desire that the letter may be read.

L. C. J. Mr. Clerk of the Peace, read the letter; and the subscription first.

Cl. of the Peace reads:

To Mrs. Garraway, at the Hand and Apple in Threadneedle-street, near the Royal Exchange, Present.

"Mrs. Garraway,

"I am sorry it should be such an inconvenience to you, as it is. I have left with your maid, three half-crowns, and if it is not enough, I will give you more. I am gone out of town for a week or ten days, and as soon as I come again, I will wait on you; which is all till I see you, from your friend and servant, 4th Jan. 1691. H. HARRISON."

Mr. Darnell. Call Mr. Henry Garway and his wife. [Who were called and sworn.]

Mr. Darnell. Mrs. Garway, take that letter, and look upon it, and tell the court when you received it. [Then she takes the Letter which was produced, and read as before, and looked upon it.]

Mrs. Garway. My lord, I received this Letter on Monday the 4th day of January last.

L. C. J. Watson, when did he leave the lodgings, say you?

Anne Watson. He went away the 1st of January last, about nine o'clock in the morning, and returned not that night; but on the 2nd of January last, he was at my mistress's shop again (as my mistress told me), and he came about five a'clock on the next Sunday night (being the 3rd of January last) with a person with him, to my master's house, and fetched away his portmanteau-trunk and things, and left three half-crowns with me for his lodgings, which I gave to my mistress.

Mr. Darnell. Call Mrs. Catharine Jackson. [Who was sworn.]

Mr. Darnell. Pray, tell my lord and the jury, what you know concerning Mr. Harrison's coming to lodge at Mr. Garway's, and when he went away, and what you know of any handkerchief he had.

Mrs. Jackson. He came on the day before Christmas-Eve, to lodge at my father's, Mr. Garway's house, and lodged there several nights, and went away the 3rd of January at night, with his things, but was absent some nights between his coming and going away; and whilst he lodged there, I observed a handkerchief in his hand, as I was making a fire for him in his chamber, and the more, because he had said he was a parliament-man, and I thought it more like a seaman's handkerchief, than a parliament man's, and our maid had an apron of the same kind of stuff. [Then the handkerchief was produced in court by the coroner, and the coal in it, wherewith Dr. Clenche was strangled.]

Mr. Darnell. Mrs. Jackson, I desire that you would look upon that handkerchief, and tell the court what you know of it.

Mrs. Jackson. This is the handkerchief, that I saw Mr. Harrison hold to the fire, when I was making of it in his chamber, or very like that handkerchief, for I observed it to be very like my mother's maid's apron. [Then a piece of the maid's apron was produced, and they being compared, were very like.]

Harrison. Did you hear me say, I was a parliament-man?

Mrs. Jackson. Yes, I heard you say so.

Harrison. Perhaps you might hear my boy say so.

Mrs. Jackson. Your foot-boy said, you were a parliament man: and you said so yourself.

Mr. Darnell. Call Mr. Garway again. [He appeared.]

Mr. Darnell. Where is the letter you received from Mr. Harrison, since he was a prisoner?

L. C. J. What do you say about a letter that came to your house from the prisoner?

Mr. Garway. My lord, I had this letter from him last Saturday, directed to my wife, and I believe it to be his hand. [He produceth the Letter.]

Mr. Darnell. My lord, I desire that the Letter may be read.

L. C. J. Read the letter, Mr. Tanner. [Clerk of the Peace reads.]

"To Mrs. Garway at the Hand and Apple in Threadneedle-street, behind the Royal Exchange, Present.

"Mrs. Garway,

"I was informed yesterday, that you are to appear against me at next sessions. I am sure you never heard me mention Dr. Clenche, in all your life; and if you do, it will look like malice. My Lord Chief Justice is sensible of the wrong done me. This is all from your servant, HENRY HARRISON."

L. C. J. Mr. Harrison, did I ever tell you, that I was sensible of it? [To which he made no reply.]

Mr. Darnell. Call Mr. John Cartwright. [Who was sworn.]

Mr. Darnell. I would have you declare, what you heard Mr. Harrison say concerning Doctor Clenche.

Cartwright. My lord, upon the 3rd of January last, Mr. Harrison came to Woodstreet Compter; it was on a Sunday in the evening, about five or six o'clock, I was standing in the gate, and I let him in. As soon as he came in, he asked how poor Mrs. Vanwicke did; says he, She hath been wronged of 500*l.* within these 12 months: Then I let him into the court, and he went into her chamber; and about half an hour after, I was sent by my master, to require some chamber-rent of Mrs. Vanwicke, and I heard Mr. Harrison and she at high words, and in a great passion, and I heard Mr. Harrison swear, God damn his blood, he would be revenged of that rogue, and named Clenche or Winche, I cannot tell which, and he would have his blood, ere it were long.

Harrison. Where were you?

Cartwright. My lord, I was at the chamber door, and there was no body on that side of the house, but Mr. Harrison, Mrs. Vanwicke, and myself.

Mr. Darnell. Call Mrs. Mary Jones. [Who was sworn.]

Mr. Darnell. Now, my lord, I will call one to prove, where he took a new lodging, the very day the murder was done.

L. C. J. Cartwright, was that in Mrs. Vanwicke's chamber that you heard him swear so?

Cartwright. Yes, my lord, in her chamber, and none was with her, but he only.

Mr. Darnell. You, the last witness, Mrs. Jones, when did Mr. Harrison come to lodge at your house?

Mrs. Jones. He came on a Monday.

Mr. Darnell. What day of the month was it?

Mrs. Jones. I can't tell what day of the month, for I did not set it down.

Mr. Darnell. Was it the Monday before he was taken?

Mrs. Jones. Yes, it was the Monday before.

Mr. Darnell. Whence did he pretend to come?

Mrs. Jones. He said, that he was come out of the country, and had formerly lodged in Fleet-street, and that where he had lodged formerly, they had left off house-keeping, and were gone into the country.

L. C. J. Where is your house?

Mrs. Jones. In St. Paul's Church-yard, at the sign of the Golden Ball.

Mr. Darnell. Call James Howseman. [Who was sworn.]

Mr. Darnell. Do you tell what you know about Mr. Harrison's being at Mr. Jones's house.

Howseman. My lord, he came in about eight o'clock at night, and brought a porter with him, and a portmanteau trunk; and after that, the porter went out a little before him, and then he followed him, and went out after.

Mr. Darnell. Did you hear him say, from whence he came?—Howseman. No, I did not.

Mr. Darnell. Call Anne Evans. [Who did not appear.]

Mr. Darnell. Then call Mr. Robert Humston. [Who was sworn.]

Mr. Darnell. Mr. Humston, I desire you will give the court an account of Mr. Harrison's being at your house that night Dr. Clenche was murdered.

Humston. My lord, I met Mr. Harrison on Monday the 4th of January last, and he told me, he was going to the Compter, to a gentleman that was much oppressed, and that he wanted money to get her released; upon which, I gave him some money, and after some discourse, I desired him to bring home my gown, that I formerly let him, and seemed angry with him, for that he had several times promised me to bring it home, but had failed therein; and thereupon he promised, that I should have it that night: and that evening about nine of the clock, he came to my lodgings, and brought home my gown; and when he came, I asked him if he had gotten Mrs. Vanwicke released: and Mr. Harrison answered, no. Upon which, I blamed him for neglecting an old friend; and Mr. Harrison excused it, telling me, that he had met with some persons upon earnest business, which prevented him. And then I asked Mr. Harrison to stay and sup with me, but he refused it, saying, that he had been about extraordinary business that day, which must be done that night, and that a gentleman stayed in the street for him, and they two were going to do it.

L. C. J. Where do you live? And how long stayed he at your house?

Humston. I lodged then at the Golden Key in Fleet-street, over against Fetter-lane end: he came to my lodgings about nine of the clock at night, and stayed there but a little time.

L. C. J. What manner of cloaths had he on?

Humston. My lord, he had a cloak on, but I cannot tell what cloaths he had under it, he brought my gown up under his cloak.

Mr. Darnell. Swear Esther King. [Who was sworn.]

Mr. Darnell. Do you know what time Mr. Harrison was at Mr. Humston's lodgings?

Esther King. It was on Monday the 4th day of January last, about nine of the clock at night, as near as I can guess, the shop was shut up, and I let him out.

Mr. Darnell. Where was it?

Esther King. At the Golden Key in Fleet-street, over against Fetter-lane end.

Mr. Darnell. What cloaths had he on?

Esther King. I cannot tell well, but he had a cloak on, I do not know what cloaths he had on besides.

Harrison. Was it eight or nine o'clock?

Esther King. It was near nine, as near as I can guess.

Mr. Darnell. Swear John Sikes the coachman. [Which was done.]

Mr. Darnell. Give an account to the court what you know about carrying two men in your coach, and how you found Dr. Clenche murdered.

John Sikes. My lord, on the 4th of January last, being Monday, I was at the Play-house, and there I took up a man and a woman, and carried them into the city; so I brought the gentleman back again to the Green-Dragon tavern in Fleet-street; and then, he said he would pay me by the hour; he said that it was but much about nine o'clock. Then I left him, and was driving up the street, towards the Temple, and two men stood in Fleet-street, about Fetter-lane end, and they asked me, if I knew Dr. Clenche, who dwelt in Brownlow-street in Holborn? I told them, that I did not know Dr. Clenche, but I knew the street. So they went into my coach, and one of them bade me drive thither, and I did, and stopt at the street's end; because the gate at the other end was shut, so that I could not turn my coach: and one of them bid me go and tell the doctor that there were two gentlemen in a coach at the street's end, that would desire him to go with them to see one that was not well. The doctor asked me if I could not tell who they were? Or, who it was, that he was to go to? I told him that I could not tell. The doctor was in his night gown and slippers, and he dressed himself: and when he came to the coach, one of them removed from his place, and gave him the hinder part of the coach, and told him that they had a friend that was not well: and one of them bid me drive to Leadenhall-market; and when I came about Holborn-bars, one of them called to me, and asked me, why I drove so slowly? and bid me drive faster; so I drove fast, and came to Leaden-hall: and then one of them bade me drive to the Pye tavern without Aldgate, and there ordered me to stop. And when I had stopped there, one of them called to me, and told me that I need not stir out of my coach box; but call to the boy at the tavern, and ask for one Hunt a chyrurgeon, which I did do: and when the boy came to me again, he said there was no such man. Then one of them bade me drive back again to Leaden-hall; and in the time I stayed there, and turned my coach, Aldgate was shut; and when I came to the gate, one of them gave sixpence to the watch, and the gate was opened, and I drove to Leaden-hall gate. And when I came there, I stopped again, and one of them gave me half-a-crown, and bade me go and buy a fowl of one Hunt a poulterer; but after I had gone a little way from the coach, he called me again, and said, here, coachman, you had as good take another shilling, and buy a couple: so I went and bought a couple of fowls, but could find no such poulterer as Hunt; so I bought them of another, and I gave three shillings for them. And when I came back to the coach side, I found Dr. Clenche (as I thought) sitting against the fore seat, with his head against the cushion: I pulled him, and cried, Master, master, for I thought he had been in drink, but I could not get one word from him ; and then I went to the watch, who were near ; and when they came, we found him strangled, with a handkerchief about his neck, and a coal in it, placed just upon his windpipe, but the other two men were gone.

L. C. J. Had one of the two men a cloak on?

J. Sikes. I cannot remember that.

L. C. J. What kind of habit had he? Had he black cloaths on?

J. Sikes. My lord, I cannot tell justly what cloaths he had on.

L. C. J. You have heard him speak : what said he?

J. Sikes. My lord, he never spoke to me ; it was the other man.

Harrison. What kind of man was the other? was he less than I, or taller?

J. Sikes. He was taller than you, with his own hair.

Mr. Darnell. Can you be positive that the prisoner at the bar is one of those two persons?

J. Sikes. My lord, one of those two persons had a perriwig on, of a light-coloured hair : and I do verily believe, that the prisoner at the bar is the same person ; I cannot be positive he is one of them, but as near as I can judge of a man whom I have seen but once, he is one of them.

Harrison. My lord, I desire your lordship to observe the time that he took the two men up, and what time it was they ran out of the coach.

L. C. J. Coachman, what time was it they left your coach?

J. Sikes. About half an hour past ten, and it was about a quarter of an hour past nine, when I took them up.

Mr. Darnell. Pray let's ask the coachman one thing more. Coachman, look upon that handkerchief, do you know it, and where did you see it? [The handkerchief was produced by the Coroner.]

J. Sikes. I do believe that is the same handkerchief that was about Dr. Clenche's neck when he was found murdered.

L. C. J. Call the coachman. Hark you, in what posture did you find Dr. Clenche when you came back to your coach?

J. Sikes. My lord, he was sat in the bottom of the coach, leaning on one side, with his head against the cushion.

L. C. J. Was a handkerchief then about his neck?

J. Sikes. Yes, my lord, I untied this handkerchief, and this is the same ; and here is the coal that was lapt in it : it was lapt in the middle of it, and it laid against the doctor's windpipe.

Mr. Darnell. Call Mr. Rebone and Mr. Marriott. [Who were sworn.]

Mr. Darnell. Mr. Rebone, tell what you know concerning the handkerchief, and how you found the doctor.

Rebone. This handkerchief was about the doctor's neck, and the coal in it. And it lay just upon his wind-pipe, when I saw him dead in the coach. The coachman came to Mr. Marriot's house, and asked for a constable, and we went to the coach-side, and there we found him lying along ; and we took him, and carried him to the Bull-Inn, and there he was let blood on the arms, and the chyrurgeon took about half a spoonful of blood out of his right arm ; and he was let blood on the other arm, but that did but just trickle down, and we could not get him to life again ; and we found a silver ink-horn in his pocket, and that, and the rest of his things, were secured. This is all I can say to the matter.

Mr. Darnell. Call Mrs. Elianor Ashbolt. [Who was sworn.]

Mr. Darnell. Pray tell my lord and the court, what you know of any persons you saw in a coach at Brownlow-Street end, that night Dr. Clenche was murdered.

Mrs. Ashbolt. May it please your lordship, I went out of an errand for one madam Anwell, a gentlewoman who lodges at my mother's house ; and coming home again, I saw a coach stop at Brownlow-street end, between nine and ten o'clock at night, and the coachman went to the side of the coach : and one in the coach bade him go to Dr. Clenche's, and tell him, that there were two gentlemen stayed for him in a coach ; and as he went up the street, he went slowly, and looked back two or three times : whereupon one of the persons leaned out of the coach, and did swear at the coachman to make haste ; and I went round the coach, and could discern Mr. Harrison's face ; and I stayed, and saw Dr. Clenche go into the coach, and one of them gave his place to the doctor.

Mr. Darnell. Why were you so curious, mistress, and what did you observe further?

Mrs. Ashbolt. I thought they might give the coachman a slip. I well observed Mr. Harrison, but do not know the other man. There were two lamps burning, one in Brownlow-street, and the other in Holborn over against the end of Brownlow-street, and they lighted quite through the coach ; and the men pulled themselves backwards, when they saw me look on them : it was that night that the doctor was murdered. I went to Newgate afterwards. Madam Clenche desired me to go and see Mr. Harrison ; and when I came to Newgate, it seems he was writing letters, so I staid before I went into the room : and there were two men with me, and Mr. Harrison was talking very loud ; said they to me, who is that speaks now? why says I, it is one of the persons that was in the coach when Dr. Clenche was murdered.

L. C. J. Who are those two men that were with you?

Mrs. Ashbolt. One of them was one Mr. Jones, a coach-maker in Holborn, and the other was madam Clenche's coachman.

L. C. J. Did you know the prisoner when you saw him in Newgate, to be one of them that were in the coach?

Mrs. Ashbolt. Yes, I did ; I knew him to be the same man, as soon as I saw him : and he changed countenance as soon as he saw me.

Harrison. My lord, this woman is certainly hired by the villains that are against me. Pray, ask her, my lord, why she did not make a discovery sooner ?

L. C. J. Mistress, What say you to that ?

Mrs. Ashbolt. I acquainted madam Anwell what I had seen and observed, and then she told madam Clenche, after last sessions ; and then she desired me to go to Newgate to see Mr. Harrison, and I went accordingly ; and I should have told it to madam Clenche sooner, but my mother was loth I should be concerned about such a thing.

Mr. Darnell. My lord, we have some witnesses who can give your lordship an account, that one of our witnesses, whom I mentioned to your lordship before, is spirited, or withdrawn from us, by a gentleman that said he came to him from the prisoner, and desired him to be kind to the prisoner ; which witness is since absent, and not to be found : his name was Andrew Bowsell, a youth, and an apprentice to one Mr. Tims, a shoemaker.

L. C. J. You must prove upon him, that he made him keep away.*

Mr. Darnell. Call Barnabas Smith. [Who was sworn.]

Mr. Darnell. Give my lord and the court an account, what you know of this matter.

Mr. Smith. My lord, this Andrew Bowsell, which the counsel for the king speaks of, was sent to Leadenhall-street of an errand, to the Bull-head ale-house there. And as he was going along, a gentleman met him, and asked him, if he was not an evidence against Mr. Harrison : and being told by the boy that he was, he desired him to be kind to him ; and pulled out a piece of money, and offered it him, desiring him to be kind to Mr. Harrison. Upon which the youth replied, that he owed him nothing, and nothing he would take. Then the gentlemen told him, that he would come again at another time, and send for him near to his master's. So the boy said, and told me : and said further, that if he could have gotten him to have gone to the Bull-head ale-house, he would have seized him.

Mr. Darnell. What is become of the boy ?

Smith. Truly, we do not know what is become of him, we never heard of him since the 6th day of March last.

Mr. Darnell. Call his master, Mr. Richard Tims. [Who was sworn.]

Mr. Darnell. Tell my lord and the court, what you know of this matter, and what is become of your apprentice, Andrew Bowsell.

Tims. My lord, he went away from me on the 6th day of March last ; he was inticed away by three soldiers that night, and on the morrow-morning one of them came and demanded his coats, shirts, and neckcloths : says I to him, who sent you, and who is your captain ? and he answered, Why, captain Harris : he huffed, and said, That if I would not give him the clothes, he would send his officer ; and then I told the soldier, I would have him before a justice of the peace ; so he went away, and never came to me again : and I could never hear of my apprentice since, though I have made great enquiry after him.

L. C. J. Did your servant tell you of any money that had been offered him by the before-mentioned gentleman ?

Tims. No, my lord ; he did not tell me, but he told Mr. Smith, the witness that was last examined, as he told me.

Mr. Darnell. My lord, I desire that Andrew Bowsell's examinations before Mr. John Browne, the coroner of London, upon oath, may be read.*

[Which being proved by the Coroner, were directed to be read.]

Cl. of the Peace reads :

" 12 Januarii, 1691. Andrew Bowsell, servant to Richard Tims, shoemaker, sworn and examined touching the death of Andrew Clenche, doctor of physic, deceased, saith, That he, this informant, being sent to Mr. Parker's, at the Bull-head ale-house in Leadenhall-street, on Monday last was se'nnight, being the 4th of this instant January, between the hours of ten and eleven o'clock in the evening, saw a coach standing against Leadenhall-market ; and heard

* See the Resolutions in the Case of lord Morley, ante, vol. 6, pp. 770, 771.

In the Settlement Case of the King against Eriswell (3 Term. Rep. 707), the Pauper was insane, and the question was, whether the examination upon oath of the pauper taken before his insanity should be read in evidence. In answer to the objection, that it was taken in the absence of the parties to be affected by it, Mr. Justice Buller likened it to " the case of a deposition before a coroner, which," said he, " has been long settled to be good evidence, 1 Lev. 180. Kel. 55, though the person accused be not present when it is taken or ever heard of it till the moment it is produced against him." Mr. Peake (Law of Evidence, chap. 2, sec. 2) observes, that " certainly nothing of the kind appears in those books, nevertheless the practice has been to admit them after the death of the witness, without inquiry whether the party was present or not ; and, notwithstanding the objection of counsel, they were received by Mr. Baron Hotham in the case of King and Purefoy, Maidstone Summer Assizes, 1794." some person that was in the coach say, Make haste: and this informant says, that according to the best of his remembrance he heard him talk of a poulterer's. And this informant says, That soon after the coachman was gone into the market, this informant saw two persons go out of the coach, one whereof had, as this informant believes, a black coat on; and that this informant saw the same person, as soon as he came out of the coach, fling a cloak over him: and then both the persons went through the market on the west part. And this informant saith, That this informant going to look into the coach, the person that had the cloak on him, cry'd damn him; and this informant saith, That he, this informant, thereupon going away, went to Mr. Parker's, and told them, that two persons had cheated a coachman, or to that effect."

"And Bowsell being further examined the 23d day of January, 1691, touching the death of Andrew Clenche, saith, That he hath seen Henry Harrison, now a prisoner in their majesties gaol of Newgate, and believes he was one of the persons that came out of the coach at Leadenhall, a little after ten o'clock at night, on Monday the 4th of this instant January; and believes he knows him by his voice. And soon after, this informant understood that the said Andrew Clenche was murdered in a coach, being the same coach which the said Harrison, and another person unknown, a little before went out of."

L. C. J. Mr. Harrison, What have you to say against that which hath been proved against you? what defence can you make?

Harrison. My lord, I did attend Dr. Clenche about a mortgage that was made him by Mrs. Vanwicke, and Dr. Clenche did pay 100*l.* but this gentlewoman would pay, or allow Rowe but 15*l.* and we did not know how to get the money from Rowe, so we petitioned the lords commissioners about it, which was above six months before Dr. Clenche was murdered; and Mr. Fairbeard wondered that I would put Dr. Clenche's name into a petition with such a rogue as Rowe; and I do positively say, that I had not seen Dr. Clenche in a month before, and if Dr. Clenche had died in his bed, it had been the same thing to me; and, my lord, Mr. Johnson and I had never any angry words between us; and I have the Report in Chancery, which I had from sir John Hoskins, which I will read, if your lordship pleases.

L. C. J. Let's see it.

Harrison. My lord, that is the original, which if your lordship pleases to remember, I had Rowe before you twice about; and it is Rowe that hath been the rogue, and therefore what occasion had we to be angry with Dr. Clenche?

[Then the Report was perused by the Lord Chief Justice, and returned to him.]

L. C. J. Mr. Harrison, this will do you no good, not being to the present purpose; therefore proceed in your defence.

Harrison. Now, my lord, I have some witnesses to prove where I was at the time that the coachman says the murder was done. Crier, call Thomas Turner, a porter, and Mr. Maccaffee.

[Who appeared, but were not sworn, and examined apart, at the request of Mr. Darnell, the king's and queen's counsel.]

Harrison. My lord, I shall prove by these witnesses, that I was elsewhere when the coachman said he took up those two men, a little after nine o'clock. Pray, Mr. Turner, give an account to the court, what time it was I called you to carry my trunk.

Turner. My lord, I was, about seven o'clock in the evening the 4th day of January last, at the Two Kings and Key in Fleet-street, over against Salisbury-court; and I was told, that a gentleman at Joe's Coffee-house in Salisbury-court, wanted a porter; and I presently went to him thither, and it was this Mr. Harrison; and he bade me take up his trunk, which I did, and carried it to the Two Kings and Key, and he went with me; and he asked me to get some linen washed for him against the next day at noon; and he gave me some linen, which I carried to my wife to wash for him, and returned to him again presently; and I went with him from thence, and carried his trunk to his lodgings in Paul's Church-yard; and when I had delivered his trunk, I left them there; and then it was about eight o'clock at night.

L. C. J. At whose house was it you delivered the trunk?

Turner. My lord, it was at Mr. Jones's house in Paul's Church-yard.

L. C. J. And did he stay within?

Turner. No, my lord, he went out presently after me.

L. C. J. Were you any where else with him that night, besides at the places you have mentioned?—Turner. No, my lord.

Harrison. My lord, I will prove that Mr. Humston mistakes an hour.

Humston. I cannot mistake an hour, because the shop is shut up about nine o'clock, and it was shut when you came first to my lodgings.

Harrison. My lord, there stands in court one Thomas Johnson, apprentice to Mr. Pemmel; he can tell what time a night it was I came to Mr. Humston's, he let me in: I desire he may be called.

Mr. Darnell. Swear Thomas Johnson. [Who was sworn.]

L. C. J. What time of the night was it that Mr. Harrison came to speak with Mr. Humston, on that night Dr. Clenche was murdered?

Johnson. My lord, on the 4th of January last at night, Mr. Harrison came to my master's house, and knocked at the door; and I went to the door, and opened it, for I had shut up the shop ; and he asked me if Mr. Humston was within ? and I told him, he was : and he came in, and went up to Mr. Humston's chamber ; and it was then about nine o'clock, as near as I can guess.

L. C. J. Where is your master's house ?

Johnson. My lord, it is the Golden Key in Fleet-street, over against Fetter-lane end.

Harrison. Pray call Adam Maccaffee, Mr. White, Mr. Carden, and John Allen.

[Who appeared. And Mr. Maccaffee stood up.]

Maccaffee. Upon Monday the 4th day of January last, the prisoner was at my house, and staid from nine o'clock till past eleven, and played at cards with one Mr. Baker, and one Mr. White and his wife ; and he stayed till it had struck eleven o'clock.

L. C. J. Where is your house, Sir ?

Maccaffee. My house is in Chancery-lane, over against Serjeants-inn.

L. C. J. Did he tell you where he had been before ?

Maccaffee. He said, that he had been towards the city, and was very cold.

L. C. J. Did he say any thing of Mr. Humston ?—Maccaffee. No, my lord.

Mr. Darnell. Pray what room were you in ? did you play at cards in the kitchen ?

Maccaffee. Yes.

Mr. Darnell. Were they up stairs ?

Maccaffee. No, my lord.

Lord Mayor. At what time a night did they come in ?

Maccaffee. Betwixt nine and ten o'clock, my lord.

L. C. J. What made you take notice of the day of the month, and hour of the day ?

Maccaffee. My lord, I heard that Dr. Clenche was murdered, and that Mr. Harrison was taxed with it ; and that made me take notice of the day.

L. C. J. Call Mrs. Maccaffee. [Who stood up.]

L. C. J. Mistress, what time did Mr. Harrison come to your house on the 4th of January last at night ?

Mrs. Maccaffee. My lord, it was near nine o'clock as any thing can be, when he came in first.

L. C. J. How long did he stay there ?

Mrs. Maccaffee. I cannot tell how long he staid, but there were two accidents happened ; one was, our playing at cards ; and the other was, that there was a pick-pocket carried by to be pumped at Lincoln's-inn ; it was from nine to eleven before he went away, and there were Mrs. White, Mr. Baker, and one Mrs. Fairelesse.

L. C. J. Did any one come with the prisoner to your house ? in what humour did he seem to be ?

Mrs. Maccaffee. No, my lord, there was no one came with him, and he never stirred out, neither did he seem to be disordered ; he was neither too merry, nor too melancholy.

L. C. J. Where did he say he had been ?

Mrs. Maccaffee. He said that he had been in the city.

L. C. J. Did he use to frequent your house ?

Mrs. Maccaffee. Formerly he did ; but I had not seen him in half a year before.

Mr. Darnell. How many were there, do you say ?

Mrs. Maccaffee. There was one Mrs. Fairelesse, and one Mrs. White, and myself, and my husband was upon the bed, and Mr. White came for his wife about ten o'clock, to come home.

Mr. Darnell. Do you remember that Mr. Baker was there ?

Mrs. Maccaffee. Yes, he was there.

L. C. J. Pray, Mistress, did Mr. Harrison come in, and find them at cards ?

Mrs. Maccaffee. No, we went to cards afterwards.

L. C. J. Where was your husband ?

Mrs. Maccaffee. He was upon the bed in the kitchen.

L. C. J. Call Mr. Baker. [Who stood up.]

Baker. This gentleman, the prisoner, is a stranger to me ; but here is a letter that he sent me two or three days afterwards. I came into Mrs. Maccaffee's house about half an hour after nine o'clock, with two women more : Mrs. Maccaffee owed me money, and I had been in Lincoln's-inn, for I do some work there for sir Thomas Cook, and the women asked me to play at cards ; and I said, that I did not care to play, because I had been abroad, and could not get any money, which made me out of humour. My lord, I never saw the man in my life before.

L. C. J. Who were they that played at cards ?

Baker. It was one Mrs. Fairelesse, the woman of the house, and Mr. Harrison, and myself.

L. C. J. Who were together ?

Baker. Mrs. Fairelesse and I, and the woman of the house and Mr. Harrison the prisoner, and we played for a penny a corner. I cannot say any more to it, my lord.

L. C. J. How long did he stay ?

Baker. I left him after ten o'clock, and, as I hope for mercy, I never saw him but once before, and I had not known him again, but by a particular token.

Harrison. Were there not some accidents happened at that time ?

Baker. Yes, there came a vintner's boy to ask for a woman, one Mrs. Frances, and he was in great haste, and a pick-pocket was carried up the lane to be pump'd at Lincoln's-Inn pump.

Harrison. Call Mrs. Fairlesse, call Mrs. Whipple. [Neither of whom appeared.] Call Mr. Sutton. [Who appeared.]

L. C. J. Where do you live, and what is your name ?

Sutton. My lord, my name is Sutton, and I live in Stone-cutter-street.

Harrison. Mr. Sutton, what time was it that I was coming by, when one Mr. Russel and you were drinking.

Sutton. My lord, it was about eleven a-clock at night, at the King's Head Tavern at Chancery-Lane end.

Harrison. What had I on, a cloak and a muff?

Sutton. Yes, I think you had a cloak on.

Mr. Darnell. What time was it? before or after eleven o'clock?

Sutton. It was about a quarter before eleven.

Lord Mayor. What day of the month was it?

Sutton. It was the 4th of January.

L. C. J. Where was he going? Which way went he?

Sutton. He was going towards Fleet-Bridge, my lord, and I called after him, but could not make him hear at first; but afterwards he came to us.

Harrison. Pray call Mr. Russel. [Who appeared.]

Russel. I can't hear, my lord, but if you please to permit Mr. Sutton to speak to me, I can hear his voice better than any man's.

L. C. J. Speak as loud as you can, Sir, and we will let you hear us; Mr. Sutton must not speak for you.

Harrison. Pray, Mr. Russel, what time of night was that you saw me go by you, when you were drinking at the King's Head Tavern?

Russel. I can't tell, my lord, I have not heard a clock these three years.

L. C. J. Where were you going at that time of night?

Russel. I was going to Wild-street to the Chyrurgeon's-Arms, to receive some money.

L. C. J. How came Mr. Sutton to go with you?

Russel. He had been with me all that day, and I desired him to go with me; and, my lord, I did expect that the money would have been brought to me, but it was not, so I went for it.

L. C. J. Well, and what then?

Russel. While we stayed at the King's-Head tavern door to drink wine, Mr. Sutton sent the drawer to call Mr. Harrison.

L. C. J. What had you been doing before that time?

Russel. We had (I suppose) been drinking together.

L. C. J. Where had you been before you came to the King's Head tavern?

Russel. We had been at the Horseshoe Tavern in Chancery-lane.

L. C. J. Did you request Mr. Sutton to go with you?—Russel. Yes, I did, my lord.

L. C. J. You say your business was to go to Wild-street, to receive some money?

Russel. Yes, it was, my lord, and I did receive it.

L. C. J. When was it that you met Mr. Harrison, the prisoner?

Russel. My lord, I cannot positively say, but by computation of the night, I believe it was about eleven o'clock.

L. C. J. Did you meet Mr. Harrison before you went to the Horseshoe Tavern, or after?

Russel. Afterwards, my lord, I saw Mr.

Harrison turn at the corner of Fleet-street, towards Fleet-Bridge.

L. C. J. At the time when Mr. Sutton and you went first out, did you agree of your going to the Horseshoe tavern?

Russel. We went thither to send for the gentleman out of Wild-street.

L. C. J. When you had been drinking all the afternoon, how came you to stop your coach at the King's head?

Russel. We stopt there, whilst Mr. Sutton sent for somebody to come to him.

L. C. J. You said just now, that Mr. Sutton sent for Mr. Harrison.

Russel. No, my lord, I do not remember that; but Mr. Sutton said, Harry, or Harrison, where art thou going, when he went by us.

Harrison. My lord, this man is a stranger to me. Call John Allen, drawer at the King's Head tavern. [Who appeared.]

Harrison. John Allen, what time of night was it that Mr. Sutton and Mr. Russel came to your house in a coach?

Allen. I believe it was about eleven o'clock.

L. C. J. How much wine had they?

Allen. Two half pints of Canary.

L. C. J. What night was it? What day of the month was it?

Allen. My lord, I cannot remember what day of the month, but it was that night that Dr. Clenche was murdered.

L. C. J. Did you see Mr. Harrison there?

Allen. I cannot tell that, I never saw him, till I saw him at prison.

Harrison. Did not you go to Mr. Maccaffee's house?—Allen. Yes, I did.

Harrison. Did not one strike you with a muff?

Allen. Yes, but I cannot remember who it was.

Lord Mayor. Look upon that man, do you know him to be the person?

Allen. No, my lord, I do not know him to be the person.

Mr. Darnell. Who sent you to Crown-Court?—Allen. Mr. Russel.

Mr. Darnell. For what?

Allen. For a servant maid; and he bid me tell her, that he had a desire to speak with her.

Mr. Darnell. How long did you tarry at the house?—Allen. I did not stay at all.

Harrison. Call Mr. Carden, drawer at the King's Head tavern. [Who appeared.]

Harrison. What time did Mr. Sutton come to your house? Did you see any one stand at the coach side? and what cloaths had he on?

Carden. I saw one stand at the coach side, and he had a hanging coat, or a cloak on; it was about the hour of eleven, to the best of my knowledge, and I saw a man go into the coach, and come out again.

Coroner. What time of night do you shut your doors, especially on Monday nights? and were they shut when Mr. Sutton called in the coach?

Carden. We shut them commonly about eleven o'clock at night, but on Monday nights usually later; they were shut when Mr. Sutton called, and I opened them for him.

L. C. J. Can you say that the prisoner was the man that drank with Mr. Sutton?

Carden. To the best of my knowledge (looking on the prisoner) that is the man, I cannot be positive, my lord.

L. C. J. Well, have you any more witnesses?

Harrison. No, my lord, unless Mr. Essington be here; he promised to be here to give an account of me. My lord, there is a gentleman that is in the Press-Yard, one Mr. Butler, I desire he may be sent for, if your lordship please.

L. C. J. Let him be fetched down. [Which was done.]

L. C. J. But in the mean time, it behoves you to give an account of these things. First, Why did you say that you were a parliament-man? Secondly, Why did you leave your lodgings and take other lodgings in Paul's-Church-Yard? Thirdly, Why did you say that you had extraordinary business? Give some account what your business was, and who that gentleman was, that staid for you in the street; when Mr. Humston desired you to stay and sup with him, what hindered you from accepting his invitation? Now we would have you to consider of these things, and give an answer to them, for it much concerns you so to do.

Harrison. My lord, first, as to the first, I do declare, that I never went for a parliament-man, nor never said so: secondly, that night I was to go out of town, I had left word at several coffee-houses, that I was going out of town upon earnest business, and with above twenty people besides, that I was going out of town, and I was about to go to Basing-Stoke, to a gentleman that owed me money, one Mr. Bulling; but I could not get money to go.

L. C. J. Prove that you were to go into the country.

Harrison. My lord, I cannot prove that now, except I could have sent to Basing-Stoke.

L. C. J. That you should have done before now; why did you not stay with Mr. Humston, when he invited you to sup with him? You might have been better entertained there, than by going among strangers to play at cards for a penny a corner, at an ale-house.

Harrison. My lord, I was unwilling to stay, because he had strangers with him.

L. C. J. What if he had? You are not such a bashful man that you could not sup with strangers.

Harrison. My lord, Mr. Rowe was accused with me.

L. C. J. What if he was? He was under some suspicion, and he hath made it appear where he was at the time the fact was committed, and now he is discharged.

[Then Mr. Butler was brought into court from Newgate, attended by a keeper.]

Harrison. Mr. Butler, pray tell the court what Mr. Fairbeard said to you about me.

Butler. My lord, Mr. Fairbeard asked me, what I could say about what Mr. Harrison had said to me concerning the murder of Dr. Clenche? I told him, I could not tell what to make of his broken and rambling speeches and discourses, they being most of them spoken when he was in his drink. This is all that I know, my lord.

L. C. J. This is not a witness for your turn.

Mr. Darnell. Call Mrs. Anwell.

[Who was sent for from her lodgings in Brownlow-street in Holborn, and appeared, and was sworn.]

Mr. Darnell. Madam, pray give an account what Mrs. Ashbolt told you concerning any man's being in a coach at Brownlow-street end.

Mrs. Anwell. I know nothing of my own knowledge; but the night that doctor Clenche was murdered, I sent Mrs. Ashbolt of an errand; and at her return, I blamed her for staying so long; and she told me, that as she was returning home, a coach stopt at Brownlow-street end, with two men, with cloaks on, in it, and that one of them bade the coachman go for Dr. Clenche, and desired him to come to them; and in his going several times looked back, as if he suspected the men would leave the coach, and so she stayed until Dr. Clenche came and went into the coach, and that one of the men gave the doctor his place; and that one of them had a fair perriwig, and a sanguine complexion.

Mr. Darnell. What discourse had you with her when you heard that those men had murdered Dr. Clenche?

Mrs. Anwell. She told me, that one of those men had a fair perriwig, and a sanguine complexion, and that one of them had a cloak on.

L. C. J. Did she say that she observed either of their faces?

Mrs. Anwell. Yes, my lord, she said the one of them had a round face, and a big voice.

L. C. J. Did she say, she could know him again?

Mrs. Anwell. No, my lord, she did not say so, but she said, that she could know his voice again. And after the last sessions, I told Mrs. Clenche of it, and that if she would send for the young woman, she would inform her further of it.

L. C. J. Madam, pray what was the reason that she did not discover it sooner to Mrs. Clenche?

Mrs. Anwell. Why truly because Mrs. Ashbolt, her mother, was unwilling she should concern herself in such a matter.

Mr. Darnell. Call another witness, Mr. Jones, coach-maker. (Who was sworn.)

Mr. Harrison. Pray, my lord, take notice, that now she says, that those gentlemen had cloaks on, that came in the coach to Brownlow-street end.

L. C. J. Yes, we heard her what she said.

Mr. Darnell. My lord, I will ask this witness, Mr. Jones, a question.

Mr. Darnell. Pray, Sir, tell my lord and the jury, what Mrs. Ashbolt did at Newgate.

Jones. My lord, I went with her to Newgate, together with Dr. Clenche his coachman, and when she came to Newgate, before she saw Mr. Harrison, (only stood at the chamber door, and heard him speak), she said, That, to the best of her thoughts, he was the man that put his head out of the coach to look after the coachman, and swore at him, for she knew his voice. And when she came to see him, she said, that she knew his face, and declared that was the man that put his head out of the coach.

L. C. J. Did he look out of the coach, Mrs. Ashbolt?

Mrs. Ashbolt. Yes, my lord, he put his head out of the coach, and looked after the coachman, to see if he went right to Dr. Clenche's door, and did swear at him, because he went no faster.

L. C. J. How could you discern his face?

Mrs. Ashbolt. By the light of two lamps that were near, which did shine into the coach.

L. C. J. Can you take it upon your oath that the prisoner is the same person?

Mrs. Ashbolt. Yes, my lord, I can, both by his voice and face.

Mr. Darnell. Now, my lord, we shall shew your lordship somewhat in relation to the credit of those witnesses that the prisoner hath brought here; particularly as to Mr. Baker, we shall prove that he hath been convicted for a cheat. And as for Maccaffee, he keeps a very disorderly house, where ill people commonly resort.

Mr. Darnell. Cryer, call Mrs. Martha Whelstead, and Mr. Thomas Cole.

L. C. J. Mrs. Jones, what time did Mr. Harrison come to your house, to his lodging, that night that the murder was committed?

Mrs. Jones. I think it was about eleven o'clock, or little before eleven.

L. C. J. What time on the Monday did he hire the lodging of you?

Mrs. Jones. It was some time after dinner.

L. C. J. It was before night, was it not?

Mrs. Jones. Yes, my lord, it was before night.

Mr. Darnell. My lord, I desire that Mr. Tanner may read the Record against Mr. Baker, whereby it will appear, that he was indicted and convicted at Hicks's-Hall for cheating the parish of St. Giles in Middlesex, when he was scavenger there, by altering the figures in the book, and rating the sums of money higher upon divers of the parishioners, than they were in the parish book, and then collecting and extorting the money, so by him increased, from them.

[Mr. Tanner reads the Indictment aforesaid, by which it did appear to the Court, and to the Jury, that the said Mr. Baker was indicted for the offence aforesaid and confessed the indictment, and was fined for it twenty shillings.]

Baker. My lord, I was wrongfully indicted, and traversed the indictment, and was acquitted.

L. C. J. Mr. Tanner, give me the record. [Lord Chief Justice peruses the Record.] Mr. Baker, I have read the material parts of the record, and do find that you were indicted for that offence, and that you confessed the indictment, and was fined for it.

Baker. My lord, I was acquitted of it, and can prove it by captain Cannon, who knows me and my reputation, and he is in court.

L. C. J. Mr. Baker, the record testifieth the truth, and cannot err, therefore you have great confidence to aver against it; yet I will hear what capt. Cannon saith.

Baker. Call captain Cannon. (Who appeared.)

L. C. J. Captain Cannon, do you know this Mr. Baker?

Capt. Cannon. Yes, my lord, very well.

Mr. Darnell. My lord, I desire that captain Cannon may be sworn.

L. C. J. Mr. Tanner, swear captain Cannon. (Who was sworn.)

L. C. J. Sir, do you know that Mr. Baker was indicted for falsifying of the scavenger's book when he was scavenger, and acquitted, or convicted, and what do you know about it?

Capt. Cannon. My lord, I am an inhabitant of the parish of St. Giles's in the fields, and so I was when Mr. Baker was scavenger, and do well remember, that some of the inhabitants of that division where he was scavenger were troubled, and complained that they were charged more than usually they had been to the scavenger's rate; and it was discovered that several figures of the book, by which Mr. Baker collected the money to the scavenger's rate, were blotted and altered, and did not agree with the parish leidger book, but the sums in his book so blotted and altered were razed; whereupon it was ordered, that he should be indicted for it: and it was done accordingly, and he was fined for it, and, to the best of my remembrance, he confessed that indictment.

L. C. J. Captain Cannon, pray tell the court and the jury, of what reputation Mr. Baker is now.

Capt. Cannon. My lord, he is now of none of the clearest reputations.

Capt. James Patrich, of the same parish, being in court, offered himself, and gave the same account of Mr. Baker that captain Cannon did.

Mr. Darnell. Cryer, call Mr. Francis Bramton, Mrs. Martha Whelstead, and Mr. Thomas Cole.

(And Mrs. Whelstead and Mr. Cole appeared, and were sworn.)

Mr. Darnell. Mrs. Whelstead, pray give the court and jury an account what disorderly house Mr. Maccaffee keeps.

Mrs. Whelstead. My lord, I dwell in Crown-Court in Chancery Lane, over against Mr. Maccaffee's house; and he and she are very ill people; and keep a very evil and scandalous house; and such as are reputed to be house breakers, pick pockets, and lewd women, do use and frequent the house; and there is commonly at late hours in the night, persons calling out murder, and whore and rogue, and such sort of language, disturbing their neighbours; and their house hath been several times searched by several constables for stolen goods, and for the persons that have stolen them; and upon such searches, there have been stolen goods found there: And I have seen great lewdness there between men and women; and the neighbours do account it a house of an ill fame, and do avoid going thither.

Mr. Cole. My lord, I do not know Mr. Maccaffee and his wife; I do dwell over against his house, and they are reputed to keep an ill house, and most persons that frequent it are reputed to be persons of lewd and evil lives and conversations; and it is amongst the neighbourhood noted for a scandalous house, and several constables have several times searched there for stolen goods.

L. C. J. What have you more to say, Mr. Harrison?

Harrison. I cannot say any thing more; you may deal with me according to my deserts in this manner.

L. C. J. You may assure yourself that we will do you no wrong; have you any more to say? (He made no reply.)

Mr. Darnell. My lord, we have another witness come now, who was not here before. Cryer, call Mr. Charles Whitfield. (Who was sworn.)

Mr. Darnell. My lord, this gentleman can give your lordship an account what the prisoner said of his being just come out of the country, upon the 5th day of January last. Pray tell my lord what you know, Sir.

Whitfield. My lord, upon the 5th day of January last, being the day after Dr. Clenche was murdered, I went to Joe's coffee house in Salisbury court, and there was Mr. Harrison sitting by the fire side. Says I to Mr. Harrison, where have you been for a long time that I have not seen you? Says he, I have been in the country. Where, says I? Says he, about 20 miles off, in Kent; and I want a laundress and a lodging. Says I, Do you hear the news, Sir? What news, says he? why, said I, of Dr. Clenche's being murdered: I cannot tell the occasion, said I, but he was found dead in a coach last night in Leadenhall-street. Then says he, I did love him very well once, but of late he hath been a barbarous rogue to a gentlewoman, a friend of mine, and she is in the Compter now; And Mr. Harrison said it was a just judgment of God upon the doctor for being so great a villain to the gentlewoman; therefore I will write to her presently, and give her an account of his death. And, my lord, the contents of his letter were these, as near as I can remember.

'Madam,

'I am just now going to Lambeth; but 'hearing of Dr. Clenche's murder, I do hereby 'give you an account of it, and can impute it

'to no less than a just judgment of God upon 'him for his baseness shewed to you. And if 'you think fit to send to madam Clenche, it 'may be, she may send somewhat towards your 'relief, she now being a widow as well as you.
'Madam, I am yours to command,

'HENRY HARRISON.'

My lord, after this came into the same coffee-house another person, one Mr. Ravenscroft, of whom Mr. Harrison asked some question about Dr. Clenche; who replied, that he heard that Dr. Clenche was murdered, and that it was committed by a bully of the town that belonged to a gentlewoman in the compters, who was laid in there upon Dr. Clenche's account; at which he was much startled: Says he again, there is no person familiar with that gentlewoman but myself; for I know and am concerned in all her affairs: Perhaps then I may be taken up about it; Or, my lord, he used words to that effect.

Harrison. My lord, this woman was not in the Compter upon Dr. Clenche's account.

L. C. J. No, the witness don't say so; but that it was the discourse of the town that she was, and the town did suppose her so to be. What did he say further, Sir?

Whitfield. My lord, he said, That he had been in Kent about twenty miles off: and he said, That he wanted a laundress, because he had some foul linen to wash; which he produced. This was on the Tuesday, and the murder was committed on the Monday night before: And, my lord, there were two more gentlemen that heard him as well as I, that he said, That he had been about twenty miles off in Kent, and that he was newly come to town. Now, my lord, I could not imagine for what reason this man should say, that he had been out of town about a fortnight or three weeks, when he was in that house but the Monday night before; that is, the night the murder was committed.

Mr. Darnell. Cryer, call Mr. Bishop. [Who appeared and was sworn.]

Bishop. About three years ago the prisoner came to my master's shop to cheapen some linen, and when—

L. C. J. Hold, what are you doing now? Are you going to arraign his whole life? Away, away, that ought not to be; that is nothing to the matter. Have you done, prisoner?

Harrison. Yes, my lord, I have done, I refer my cause to your lordship.

L. C. J. Gentlemen of the Jury; The prisoner at the bar, Henry Harrison, stands indicted for the wilful murder of Dr. Andrew Clenche, who was barbarously murdered on the fourth day of January last: You have heard the witnesses that have been sworn; and upon their testimony, it doth appear, that two persons came to Brownlow-street end in a coach, after nine o'clock at night, and sent the coachman to the doctor's house, under pretence to get him to a patient, a friend of their's, that was sick. By this contrivance, they got him into their coach, which they had brought for that purpose, and then they ordered the coachman to drive to Leadenhall-street; and when they came about Holborn-bars, one of them asked the coachman, why he drove so slow, and bade him drive faster. When they came to Leadenhall-street, then they bade him drive to the Pye Tavern without Aldgate; where one of them bade the coachman ask for one Hunt; but he not being there, one of them bade the coachman return back, and gave sixpence to the watch to come through the gate, which was shut in the mean time; and when they came to Leadenhall-market, one of them gave the coachman three shillings and sixpence, and sent him to buy a couple of fowls; which the coachman did buy, and brought them to the coach; but when he came back, he found the doctor in the body of the coach, leaning against the fore-seat of the coach, a handkerchief being tied about his neck with a coal in it, placed upon his wind-pipe; which handkerchief and coal have been produced in court.

The question is, gentlemen, Whether the prisoner at the bar be guilty of this base and barbarous murder? To prove which, there hath been a very long evidence given, some positive, some circumstantial. It has been proved that Dr. Clenche had some dealings with a woman named Vanwicke, and had lent her one hundred and twenty pounds, and had taken a mortgage for it. This prisoner, Mr. Harrison, was a great acquaintance, and very intimate with this woman; and did concern himself in the management of her affairs: and because Dr. Clenche did refuse to lend the woman more money, therefore he had an animosity against Dr. Clenche. The money not being paid to the doctor as he did expect, he did call it in; and therefore this gentlewoman did oftentimes repair to Dr. Clenche to desire farther time of forbearance, because she could not raise or procure the money elsewhere. That about Michaelmas last, it seems, she came to a coffee-house near Warwick-house in Holborn, and there was Mr. Harrison; where they consulted what to do. And it was agreed, that the mistress of the house, and Mrs. Vanwicke, should go to Dr. Clenche's; but Mr. Harrison should stay behind, for it was not thought convenient that he should go, lest he should provoke the doctor. When they came to the doctor, Mrs. Vanwicke was very importunate to have more money; but the doctor would lend her no more. And when they returned to the coffee-house again, Mr. Harrison enquired what passed between the doctor and Mrs. Vanwicke. She told him, that the doctor would not furnish her with any more money, although she had pressed him to do it, and urged her great necessities, but advised her to go to service. Damn him, says Harrison, does he say that a woman of your quality should go to service? He is a great rogue, and deserves to have his throat cut; but let me alone, I will manage him.

VOL. XII.

At another place there was a discourse betwixt Mr. Harrison and one Mr. Johnson; and that the prisoner did then speak very hard and ill words of Dr. Clenche: And that Mr. Harrison came frequently to him; and one time laid his hand upon his sword, using some menacing words, but what they were he cannot tell: But he likewise says, That at several times he did expostulate with him, and told him, That he would not do any good with such discourses as these are, &c. That the mortgage money not being paid, it was thought fit, that there should be a prosecution made to get possession of the mortgaged estate, and that the tenants should be forbid to pay their rents. And Mr. Harrison went to Mrs. West, the tenant, some few days before St. Thomas's day last, and demanded the rent of her. To which she made answer, That Dr. Clenche had forbid the payment of the rent to Mrs. Vanwicke. Thereupon Mr. Harrison grew very angry, and answered, That Dr. Clenche was a rogue and a villain, and bid her that she should not pay him any rent. And the witness saith further, That the doctor being pressed to let her have some more money, refused to do it, because she would spend it all upon Harrison.

Then the counsel for the king called some witnesses, who gave you an account of the prisoner's shifting his lodgings the day before the murder was done. He takes a lodging at Mr. Garway's in Threadneedle-street, on the 23rd day of December, and there he continued till about the 1st of January. The 2nd of January he was at Garway's shop; and on the Sunday night he came and fetched away his things. The Monday after, being the day that this barbarous fact was committed, he sent a letter to Mrs. Garway, to acquaint her that he was gone out of town; but he left three half-crowns with her maid to pay for his lodging. But as to his going out of town, it was false, for he never went into the country; but took a lodging at Mr. Jones's in St. Paul's church-yard. It is observable also, that he went for a parliament-man when he lodged at Mr. Garway's, and had his footman to attend upon him, &c. There it was that he was seen to have an ordinary handkerchief, and to hold it to the fire; which was taken notice of by Mrs. Jackson, the daughter of Mrs. Garway, which was not suitable, as she thought, to a parliament-man's quality, but rather fit for a seaman; for it was like the apron of the maid of the house: which hath been shewed in court, and compared with the handkerchief that was tied about Dr. Clenche's neck. She saith it is the same, or very like that which she did see Mr. Harrison hold in his hand.

Cartwright, the officer at the Compter, he tells you that the Sunday night, the day before the murder, Mr. Harrison came to Woodstreet compter, and enquired for Mrs. Vanwicke, and that he only was in her chamber, and no other body on that side of the house but Mrs. Vanwicke, the prisoner; and this Cartwright the keeper, who stood at the door, and heard Harrison say, that he would have the blood of that rogue, and named Clenche or Winch.

Harrison. My lord, he was not in the room.

L. C. J. No, he was not ; but there were none on that side the house but you, Cartwright, and Mrs. Vanwicke.

Now, on the Monday, on which this fact was committed, he having taken a lodging at Jones his house, he came thither with a porter, who brought his portmanteau-trunk about eight a-clock at night ; and after he had been there a little while he went away.

And you are told by a gentleman that lodges at the Golden-Key against Fetter-Lane end ; that he had some acquaintance with the prisoner ; that he had lent him a morning-gown ; and that about nine o'clock that very night, he came to his lodging in a cloak ; and then the gentleman asked him for his gown ; and he told him that he had brought it with him. Thereupon the gentleman invites Mr. Harrison to stay and sup with him. Mr. Harrison said, he could not stay, for he was engaged ; he must be gone, for that a gentleman staid in the street for him to go about extraordinary business.

The coachman tells you, that near about that time two men in Fleet-street, near Fetter-lane end, hired his coach of him to go to Brownlow-street to Dr. Clenche's ; but he cannot positively say, that the prisoner at the bar was one of them, but he swears he does verily believe that he was one of them.

Harrison. He said before your lordship, that he could not remember what I had on.

L. C. J. Well, well, he doth not remember it now ; but being hired to go to Dr. Clenche's, he drove to the street-end, and no further, because the gate at the lower end was shut up, and he could not turn his coach in the street ; but he was sent by them to the doctor's, to desire the doctor to come out to them, and they sat in the coach in the mean time. The doctor made haste, and went to them immediately, and they drove away to Leadenhall, and then to Aldgate, and they called at the Pye-tavern, and enquired for one Mr. Hunt a chyrurgeon, as I mentioned to you before : he not being there, they returned to drive through Aldgate, gave the watch six-pence, and passed through the gate without any manner of notice taken ; but if the watch had done their duty, it might have been better discovered. But further, the coachman tells you, that when he came to Leadenhall-street they called to him, and directed him to buy one fowl ; and after that he had been gone a little way from the coach, they called him back, and bade him take some more money and buy two fowls. So he went and bought the fowls ; but when he came back, the two gentlemen were gone, and he found the doctor still in the coach ; and he not stirring, he thought he had been in drink ; but upon further examination, and calling the watchman with his candle, it appeared that the doctor was strangled with a handkerchief and a seal.

There is one Mrs. Elianor Ashbolt, who lives in Brownlow-street with her mother, and had been sent of an errand ; and between nine and ten of the clock at night, she saw the coachman in Brownlow-street, and thought that those men in the coach might have put a trick upon him, by going away without paying him his fare. And she says further, that by the help of the lamps, she did discern the face of this Harrison in the coach ; he had a cloak on, with a light perriwig, and looked out of the coach, and did swear at the coachman ; and by this means she knew him when she saw him again, to be the same man both by his face and voice. This woman, indeed, was not before the coroner, and she gives you this reason for it, because her mother was not willing she should be concerned in such a matter as this was ; and what she could say, was not known to Mrs. Clenche until after the second sessions ; and when he was in Newgate, she saw him there, and declared he was the same man.

There was another piece of evidence, viz. That of the boy's, who does not appear ; he was examined before the coroner. There has been evidence given of ill practice to take him out of the way, and therefore his affidavit is read for evidence : he swears he saw two gentlemen come out of the coach when it stood in Leadenhall-street, and that having seen the prisoner in Newgate since, doth believe him to be one. This, gentlemen, is the sum and substance of the evidence for the king, to prove that the prisoner was one of those that committed the murder.

You have heard likewise what the prisoner says for himself ; he does undertake to prove that he was in another place ; (that is) that he should come into Maccaffee's house in Crown-court, over against Serjeant's-Inn, in Chancery-lane : and Maccaffee, he tells you, that there were some other company there, and that Harrison came in very cold, and that they went to cards, and played for one penny a corner at whist ; and that he did continue there from nine till eleven a-clock ; and if he was there then, it is impossible he should be guilty of this fact, for the fact was done between the same hours.

Maccaffee's wife tells you the same, and they both tell you who were there besides, and who played together, and are positive that the prisoner was there.

Baker says, that he went away about half an hour after ten at night, and left Harrison behind him. To confirm this evidence, they have called two other witnesses, besides the drawers at the King's-head-tavern, viz. Mr. Sutton the chyrurgeon, who lives in Stone-Cutter's-street, and Mr. Russell. Mr. Sutton says, they had been at the Horse-Shoe-Tavern in Chancery-lane, and called for half a pint of sack at the King's-Head-tavern when they came by ; and as they sat in the coach, Mr. Harrison came by accidentally, and one of them looking out of the coach cries Harry or Harrison ; and he went to them, and they drank together another half pint of sack.

As to their meeting with Harrison, and as to other passages there, Russel says the same: but as to the time of night he is not positive. And they sent one of the drawers to a house in Crown-court to enquire for somebody there.

The drawers at the King's-head-tavern say, that Mr. Sutton and Mr. Russell did call there about that time; and that they drank two half pints of wine: and that when they were drinking, a man came by with a hanging-coat or cloak on, and drank with them. And one of the drawers went to call somebody in Crown-court; and one of the company up with his muff, and gave him a slap in the face.

Now this is the sum and substance of the evidence that you have heard on the behalf of the prisoner, to induce you to believe that he was not the person that was concerned in the murder of Doctor Clenche.

To which evidence, an answer hath been offered;

First, as to those witnesses, Maccaffee and his wife; divers witnesses have been produced to prove, that they are people of doubtful credit; it seems they keep an house of ill fame.

Harrison. I am glad, my lord, that I was there.

L. C. J. Well, well, gentlemen, the people of the house are not of very good reputation; they keep a naughty and disorderly house, (if you believe the witnesses) you may consider of their credit.

And as to Mr. Baker; about nine years since he was convicted of an arrant-cheat, which is no less than forgery, for altering the scavenger's rate for St. Giles's parish, and therefore the less credit is to be given to his evidence; for now it appears, that he is a knave upon record: and the very record itself was produced against him, which is true without doubt, notwithstanding his pretence of innocency. What is said by Mr. Russell and Mr. Sutton, I must leave to your consideration; they had been a drinking, and the drawer says, they were at the King's-head-tavern at eleven of the clock at night. Mr. Harrison, the next day after the murder, met a gentleman at Joe's coffee-house in Salisbury-court; and though he had taken a lodging in Paul's church-yard, yet he said, that he was newly come to town, and had been in Kent, and had remained there about three weeks; and that he wanted a laundress and a lodging, although he had not been out of town, and had taken a lodging but the day before; and then he told the witness, who discoursed with him about the death of Dr. Clenche, that he had formerly loved him, but he said he had been of late a barbarous rogue to a poor gentlewoman, a friend of his; and that the just judgment of God had fallen upon him for so doing, and that he would write to her to give her an account of it, and advise her to write to Mrs. Clenche, and to tell her, that she was a widow now as well as Mrs. Vanwicke; and he thought by that means to move Mrs. Clenche to pity her, being a widow as well as herself, and that whilst they were talking thus, one Mr. Ravenscroft tells him, that Dr. Clenche was murdered, and that a bully of the town, that belonged to a gentlewoman in the compters, one Mrs. Vanwicke, was suspected. At which Mr. Harrison was much startled, and said, that no one was concerned with that gentlewoman but himself; and for aught he knew, he might be taken up for it. This is that which he said.

Now what said Mr. Harrison further for himself? Why, says he, this gentlewoman is not in prison at the prosecution of Dr. Clenche, and was not so affirmed, but so reported; and whether it were so or no, is no great matter. Gentlemen, you ought to consider of the evidence that you have heard against him, and also to weigh well the evidence he hath brought for himself.

It is most plain, if you believe the witnesses, that Mr. Harrison was concerned for this woman Vanwicke, and hath threatened Dr. Clenche, called him rogue and rascal, and said, that he deserved to have his throat cut; that Harrison went under a disguise for some time before the murder. You have had an account of the handkerchief, what kind of handkerchief Harrison had, and what handkerchief was taken about Dr. Clenche's neck you have seen: and you heard what evidence was given by Mr. Humston; how the prisoner was with him about nine a-clock that night; and how he refused to stay and sup with Mr. Humston. If Mr. Harrison had no earnest business, one would have thought he might have staid with Mr. Humston, better than to have gone to an ale-house in Crown-court, and played at cards at one penny a-piece a corner; he might have had better fare, no doubt.

The witnesses for the prisoner say for him, That he came to Maccaffee's house about nine a-clock at night, and staid till eleven: that is contrary to that evidence given for the king, viz. That he was in the coach at Brownlow-street end; for if he was at Maccaffee's house all the time they mention, it is impossible he should be guilty. All these things are under your serious consideration. You had best go together, and if you are not satisfied upon the evidence you have heard, that he is guilty, then you ought to acquit him; but if you are satisfied that he did commit this murder, then you ought to find him guilty.

Then the Jury withdrew, and the Court adjourned for half an hour; and when they were returned, the Jury came to give their verdict; and being called over, answered to their names; and Mr. Harrison was brought to the bar.

Cl. of Arraign. Gentlemen, are you all agreed of your verdict?—Jury. Yes.

Cl. of Arraign. Who shall say for you?

Jury. Our foreman.

Cl. of Arraign. Henry Harrison, hold up thy hand. [Which he did.] Look upon the prisoner. How say you? Is he guilty of the felony and murder whereof he stands indicted, or not guilty?

Foreman. Guilty of wilful murder.

Cl. of Arraign. What goods or chattels, &c.

Foreman. None that we know of.

Major Richardson. Look to him, he is found guilty of wilful murder.

Cl. of Arraign. Then hearken to your verdict, as the court hath recorded it. You say that Henry Harrison is guilty of the felony and murder whereof he stands indicted; but that he had no lands or tenements, goods nor chattels, at the time of the felony and murder committed, nor at any time since, to your knowledge: and so you say all?

Jury. Yes.

Then the prisoner was remanded to Newgate, until the last day of the sessions; and then he was brought to the bar, to receive sentence of death.

Cl. of Arraign. Henry Harrison, hold up thy hand. [Which he did.] Henry Harrison, You stand convicted of felony and murder, for the murder of Dr. Andrew Clenche: what can you say for yourself, why judgment should not be given against you, to die according to law?

Deputy Recorder. Mr. Harrison, you have been indicted, arraigned, and convicted of felony and murder, for the murder of Dr. Andrew Clenche; you have had as long, and fair, and favourable a trial, as any person that ever hath been tried at this bar. The jury that has passed upon your life and death hath convicted you, and the court are now ready to do their last act, which is to pronounce that sentence that the law does inflict upon such crimes as you stand convicted of.

Harrison. I expect no mercy here, therefore I humbly desire you would intercede to the queen, that I may have twelve days allowed me, in order to my better preparation for death.

D. Recorder. Well.

Harrison. I must needs acknowledge, that I was tried before the best of judges, my lord chief justice Holt; but one thing I think strange, that my witnesses should be examined singly, and not the king's.

D. Recorder. That is no more than what is usual; the counsel for the king and queen requested it, and you did not.

Harrison. I begged that I might have timely notice of my trial, and I had not: there were seven people in my company at that time when this black and bloody murder was done, and I could not get them to be here.

D. Recorder. You have had a long time to get them ready, and you pressed on your own trial, which you should not have done if you had not been ready.

Harrison. I humbly submit.

Then the usual Sentence of Death was pronounced against him, and he was remanded to Newgate.

The EXAMINATION of HENRY HARRISON, this 6th day of January, 1691.

"This Examinant being asked where his lodgings are, answereth, That he lodgeth at the Golden-ball in Paul's church-yard, and came to lodge there on Monday night, about eleven of the clock, or half an hour after, but took the lodgings in the morning, the master of the house being one Mr. Jones, a cane-chair seller; and before that time this examinant lodged at the Hand and Apple near the Exchange, which said lodgings he left on Saturday last in the morning, and paid for them on Sunday afternoon: and this examinant saith, that on Saturday night last he lodged at the White Balcony in Old Southampton-Buildings, the mistress of the house being one Mrs. Pitts, and this examinant lodged there on Sunday night also. And this examinant saith, That he was at the King's-Head in Crown-court in Chancery-lane upon Monday last, from between seven and eight of the clock at night, and stayed there until eleven, playing at cards with the man and woman of the house, and other persons unknown. And being asked where he dined on Monday, and how he spent his time on Monday in the afternoon, he saith, he cannot give an account. And this examinant saith, That on Tuesday last Mr. Hartly of Old Southampton-Buildings, discoursing concerning the murder of Dr. Clenche, said, That this examinant was suspected to be guilty of that murder. And this examinant further saith, That he wore the same cloaths he hath now on upon Monday last; and hath worn them a great while, having no other cloaths to wear.

"Capt. et Cognit. 6 Die HEN. HARRISON.
Jan. 1691; Coram, J. HOLT."

He was afterwards executed, pursuant to the sentence, and died asserting his innocence to the last.

A True Account of the Behaviour, Confession, and Last Dying Speech, of Captain HARRISON: Together with the PAPER writ by his own Hand, and delivered to a Minister at the Place of Execution, on Friday the 15th of April, 1692. [By Samuel Smith, Ordinary of Newgate.]

HENRY HARRISON found guilty of the wilful, barbarous murder of Dr. Clenche. He was bred up a lawyer's clerk; afterwards he listed himself to be a trooper in the lord Dartmouth's regiment. Upon the 10th of January last, he offered to discourse with me upon the cause of his confinement: I desired that whatever he said, he would do it in the presence of the heart-searching God, and as if he were at the point of death: he did profess he would do so. He said, that he had been arraigned before for murder; but it was only found Manslaughter: that he did not after this walk so circum-spectly as he ought, but was guilty of prophaning the Sabbath, and many gross sins, which he lived in very securely; but that God by this distress had awakened him to call to mind those great sins which he had committed, saying, that God had strange ways to bring sinners to repentance. Upon this I advised him sincerely to justify God, as righteous, in finding him out in his iniquities; or else death would be more terrible, and his eternal state very hazardous, if he now trifled with God, and did not ingenuously confess his sinful course of life. Hereupon he spoke very vilely of himself, as having been of a dissolute life; that he seldom minded the public worship of God, nor the private duties of religion; that he was a common swearer in ordinary discourse, and guilty of notorious sins; that he never received the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, because it is an obligation to amend an evil life; which he being accustomed unto, he forbore the Sacrament, that he might not aggravate his sins and future condemnation. I told him, that his being unwilling to come under such a sacred tie of reformation, exposed him deeper into Satan's snares of temptation.

After this he freely acknowledged, that he had some acquaintance with Dr. Clenche, and too much familiarity with the woman to whom the doctor lent money; and that upon his not liking of the security given for the repayment, the doctor would not forbear any longer: Harrison said, this did fret him, yet he used no threatening words; and said, that if his son had been accessory to so barbarous a murder, and himself knew it, he would discover him. Harrison made frequent appeals to God, that he knew nothing of this crime, in thought, word, or deed. I replied, That if he made any false appeal to God, it would very much hazard his salvation; yea, that this would bring swifter destruction upon him; and that his persisting to deny the murder, would make him to be less credited; because two persons who lately murdered their wives, imprecated themselves if they knew any thing of it, and yet, after an hour's denying of it at the place of execution, confessed it at last. I told Mr. Harrison, that he would be an inveterate Atheist, if he should dare to die with an execrable lie in his mouth: he said, after all advice, that he would at his death deny that he knew any thing of the murder of Dr. Clenche: he confessed, that he could not reflect on the justice of the court nor the integrity of the jury in their verdict, who had proceeded according to what was deposed against him; and that he expected that the sentence of death would pass upon him; yet he blames the witnesses for their being so positive in their allegations against him, when himself is clear of murder in his conscience: he said, that God had justly suffered a shameful death to befall him, because he lived so long in an habituated course of viciousness, without any remorse for it till now.

This is all the Account I can give of Mr. Harrison; though I frequently, with others, solicited him to an ingenuous and free confession of his crime, assuring him, that if he durst die in the denial of it, by any mental reservation, or equivocation, he would merely ruin his soul eternally.

A COPY of the PAPER writ by Captain HARRISON's own Hand, and delivered to a Minister at the Place of Execution.

Now I am come here to die, the people expect a speech and confession; for the words of dying men always ought to be believed by the survivors. I thank God, I am not an Atheist, nor a man that makes equivocations or mental reservations; but was educated in the Protestant religion. The greatest grief I have (next unto my offending my great and gracious God) is that of my relations; for no disaster was ever in the family before, (but I pray God give them comfort) being all of them people of reputation, as is well known to a great many in this town, I having had some differences with some of them. I do own I lived for some time an irregular life, which was displeasing to them; God forgive me for it: and it was for my sins God thought fit, out of his infinite justice, to suffer this heavy affliction to come upon me; which I firmly believe tends for my everlasting salvation, through the merits and mediation of Jesus Christ my Saviour, who came into the world to save sinners, and me the chief, as I have acknowledged and reputed myself; I assuredly now hope for mercy at his hands, being innocent of this black, bloody, inhuman murder I now die for, in thought, word, or deed, heartily forgiving those that were the authors of it; as also pray to God to forgive them, as I humbly beg of those I have in any wise wronged to forgive me; desiring all that see me this day to live a godly, righteous, and sober life, to the end that they may attain everlasting life, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

God bless the king and queen, and the present government, my judges and jury; the rest I refer to a small treatise I have left with my friends, concerning the occasion why I was suspected to be one of the murderers of Dr. Clench; which I have desired them to publish very suddenly after my death. Farewel, in the name of God. Amen.

God reward all those worthy divines who have assisted me in my heavenly journal since my condemnation.

368. The Trial of JOHN COLE, at the Old-Bailey, for the Murder of Andrew Clenche, Doctor of Physic : 4 WILLIAM & MARY, A. D. 1692.

Judges present { Mr. Justice Dolben, and Mr. Justice Powel.

THE keeper of Newgate did, according to order of the Court, on Friday the 2d day of September, 1692, bring up the body of John Cole to the sessions-house in the Old-Bailey, London; who, being at the bar, was arraigned upon an indictment of felony and murder, found against him by the grand jury for the city of London, for the murder of Dr. Andrew Clenche.

Cl. of Arr. John Cole, hold up thy hand. [Which he did.] You stand indicted by the name of John Cole, of London, labourer, for the murder of Dr. Andrew Clenche, &c. and the Indictment is in such manner as that against Mr. Henry Harrison. How say you, John Cole, are you guilty of the felony and murder whereof you stand indicted, or not guilty?

Cole. Not Guilty.

Cl. of Ar. Culprest, how will you be tried?

Cole. By God and my country.

Cl. of Ar. God send you a good deliverance.

And afterwards the said John Cole was brought to the bar upon his trial: and those persons who were returned upon the Jury were called over twice, and their appearances recorded.

Cl. of Ar. You, John Cole, these men that you shall hear called, and personally do appear, are to pass between our sovereign lord and lady the king and queen and you, upon trial of your life and death; if therefore you will challenge them, or any of them, your time is to challenge them as they come to the book to be sworn, and before they be sworn.

Then the Jury were called, and sworn, and then were counted, and the twelve sworn were these whose names follow: John Clay, Edward Sherlock, John Ruddyer, Benjamin Evans, George Bestow, Archibald Wilson, Cuthbert Lee, Thomas Watson, Thomas Milburne, Thomas Applebury, Nicholas Harris, Ralph Cates.

Then Proclamation for Information and Evidence was made as is usual.

Cl. of Ar. John Cole, hold up your hand.

[Which he did.]

Gentlemen, you that are sworn, look upon the prisoner, and hearken to his cause. He stands indicted by the name of John Cole, late of London, labourer, &c. as in the indictment. Upon this indictment he hath been arraigned, and thereunto hath pleaded not guilty; and for his trial hath put himself upon God and his country, which country you are. Your charge is to inquire whether he be guilty of this felony and murder whereof he stands indicted, or not guilty. If you find that he is guilty, you are to inquire what goods or chattels, lands or tenements he had at any time of the felony and murder committed, or at any time since. If you find him not guilty, you are to inquire whether he fled for it. If you find that he fled for it, you are to inquire of his goods and chattels, as if you found him guilty. If you find him not guilty, nor that he did fly for it, you are to say so, and no more; and hear your evidence.

Cl. of Ar. Crier, call Mary Milward, Joseph Dudley, John Dudley, Jane Warren, Sarah Duely, Anne Gunn, Anne Gesson, Anne Warren, Elizabeth Harper, Mary Edwards, John Gamble, John Sykes, Robert Rebone, Richard Eades, Richard Marryot, Samuel Revet, Henry Milward, Squire Dalley, William Brown, Francis Hobbs. Who were all sworn.

Cl. of Ar. Set Mary Milward up.

Just. Dolben. What have you to say, woman, against Cole the prisoner, concerning the murder of Dr. Clenche?

Mrs. Milward. My lord, my husband declared to me, that he and Mr. Cole were in the coach with Dr. Clenche, and that they two killed Dr. Clenche.

Just. Dolben. That is no evidence at all, what your husband told you; that won't be good evidence, if you don't know somewhat of your own knowledge.

Mrs. Milward. My lord, I have a great deal more that my husband told me to declare.

Just. Dolben. That won't do; what if your husband had told you that I killed Dr. Clenche, what then? That will stand for no evidence in law: we ought by the law to have no man called in question, but upon very good grounds, and good evidence, upon oath, and that upon the verdict of twelve good men. Have you any body that can prove any thing against Cole, or does it all arise barely from your husband's report?

Mrs. Milward. My husband declared that he and Mr. Cole were to go under a pretence to rob the doctor, and so take their opportunity to kill him; and the first time they called at Dr. Clenche's he was not within, but the second time they went he was within, and then they did the murder.

Just. Powel. When died your husband, mistress?

Mrs. Milward. The 23d of May last, Sir.

Just. Dolben. Here hath been two or three sessions since that time, why did not you take up Cole about it before now?

Mrs. Milward. I did not know where to find him.

Just. Dolben. Why then you should have gone to a magistrate, and told him of it, and taken some advice about it.

Mrs. Milward. I did, as soon as I had found Mr. Cole.

Just. Dolben. Your business had been to have discovered this to Mrs. Clenche, and she should have looked after Cole. Is Mrs. Clenche here?

Sir W. Ashurst. Here is her brother-in-law.

Just. Dolben. Do you prosecute Cole upon this indictment?

Mr. Wise. No, my lord, I do not. Mrs. Milward is the prosecutor, and she charged Mr. Cole with the murder of my brother, Dr. Clenche; and she told my sister Clenche, that Mr. Milward, her husband, confessed and said some time before his death, that he and Mr. Cole murdered Dr. Clenche in a coach: and Mrs. Milward said, that she had sufficient evidence against Mr. Cole for it. And my sister Clenche told Mrs. Milward, that Mr. Harrison murdered Dr. Clenche in a coach, together with another person, which my sister Clenche said she believed was the said Mr. Milward, husband of the said Mrs. Milward; and that she had a warrant against him, the said Mr. Milward, upon suspicion for it, but could not take him; and that she suspected that there were other persons contrivers or concerned in it, who were set down at the Blue Boar's-head alehouse near Clement's-inn, by Mr. Gamble, a coachman, out of his coach, together with the said Mr. Milward, in their return from Dr. Clenche's house that night he was murdered. And, my lord, by my sister Clenche's order, I went with Mrs. Milward to all her witnesses, and took notes of their evidence; and I went with several of them to my Lord Chief Justice Holt's chamber, before whom they gave in their informations upon oath about it: and when I had done it, I told Mrs. Milward I could find no evidence that she had against Mr. Cole, more than that he was at Dr. Clenche's house, and at the said Blue Boar's-head alehouse, with Mr. Milward, and another person, that night Dr. Clenche was murdered; and so he might be concerned in the contrivance of it; whereupon Mrs. Milward was dissatisfied, and said, she was not able to prosecute him for it: so my sister said to Mrs. Milward, that she might, if she would, prefer an indictment against him for it, and that she would pay for it, and other charges about it, which she did. And Mrs. Milward hath a note of the names of all her witnesses, and may call them,

Sir Rob. Clayton. Did you not lie at Cole's house, mistress?

Mrs. Milward. Yes, Sir, I did.

Just. Dolben. Why did you not take him then?

Mrs. Milward. Because he absconded himself, and gave out that he was gone to sea.

Just. Dolben. Was there no quarrel between Cole and you about your goods?

Mrs. Milward. No, my lord, I had no quarrel with him.

Just. Dolben. Because you did not do it sooner, have you not been troubled with your husband's ghost? tell the jury the story; we have heard on't: but I am afraid they will laugh at you.

Mrs. Milward. That was very true, my lord.

Just. Dolben. Well, if you have any thing else to say that is material, speak; otherwise, my brother and I are of opinion, that what you have already offered is no evidence.

Mrs. Milward. My lord, here is a coachman or two that can acquaint your lordship of the matter of fact better than I can.

Cl. of Arr. Crier, call John Gamble, the coachman. [Who stood up.]

Just. Dolben. You, coachman, do you know the prisoner?

Gamble. No, my lord, I do not know him.

Just. Dolben. Look upon him, do you know him or no?

Gamble. No, truly, my lord, I do not know him.

Just. Dolben. Why, look you, woman, he does not know him! You, coachman, the story is well known; therefore I ask you again, upon your oath, if that prisoner at the bar be one of the three persons that you carried to the Blue Boar's-head on the backside of St. Clements, that night Dr. Clenche was murdered?

Gamble. Indeed, my lord, I cannot be positive whether he be one of them or no: I took up in Cheapside three men into my coach, and set one of them down at Gray's-inn, and drove the other two to Dr. Clenche's house, that night he was murdered, and he was not at home; and afterwards the man I had set down came in again, and I set them all down at the Blue Boar's-head alehouse near Clement's-inn Gate, about eight o'clock at night.

Cl. of Arr. Set up William Brown, servant at the Blue Boar's-head.

Just. Dolben. Hark you, is this one of the three men that the coachman set down at your master's house, that night Dr. Clenche was murdered?

Brown. Yes, my lord, it is.

Just. Dolben. What time did they come to your house?

Brown. They came about eight o'clock at night, and this man and the other staid till after eleven o'clock: only Milward went out and returned presently; and then immediately he went out again, which was before nine o'clock, and returned not until eleven o'clock after.

Just. Dolben. What time was Dr. Clenche killed?

Brown. About ten o'clock, or betwixt ten and eleven, as I think.

Just. Dolben. Who went out first, only Milward?

Brown. Only Mr. Milward, my lord: but this man staid all the time, till eleven o'clock at night; and another, who went by the name of Harper, as I am since informed.

Just. Dolben. Why then this man could not be in the coach when Dr. Clenche was murdered, so Harrison and Milward killed the doctor in all probability; for he says, this man at the bar, and another, staid at his master's house till after eleven o'clock.

Brown. My lord, when Milward came back, he brought a couple of men with him, in soldiers habit, about eleven o'clock at night.

Mrs. Milward. My husband told me, that Mr. Cole and he went out of the house, and left Mr. Harper behind.

Just. Dolben. But this man swears, that the prisoner did not go out of the house till eleven o'clock at night, and they were set down about eight o'clock, and Dr. Clenche was found killed a little after ten at night; and that Milward went out, and then came in again about eleven o'clock, and brought two men with him: it is to be feared he had been killing Dr. Clenche in that time; have you any more to say? if this man says true, nothing can be said more.

Mrs. Milward. Speak what was done when they came to drink the pot of ale, Mr. Brown.

Just. Dolben. I would fain know, mistress, who set you upon this business? is there not some money promised you? it was not the fear of your husband's ghost that put you upon it, I am afraid.

Mrs. Milward. I am much wronged, my lord, I know nothing of any money offered me.

Just. Dolben. What say you more?

Brown. My lord, Mr. Milward being at my master's house that night Dr. Clenche was killed, desired me to make a fire in the same room the next morning, and that he would come again then; and I made a fire accordingly, but he came not then, nor afterwards at any time to my knowledge; but on a Sunday night about a fortnight after, came the two persons that came with Mr. Milward in the coach to my master's house that night Dr. Clenche was murdered, and my master being above stairs, I sent him word, that the two men were there who were there that night the Doctor was murdered, and they inquired for Mr. Milward, saying he promised to meet them there, and he not being there, before my master could come down, they paid for the pot of drink, and went away.

Just. Dolben. When they came together to the Blue Boar's-head, they had some evil design, no doubt, but if it be true that those two men staid from eight o'clock till eleven, then it could not be this man that murdered Dr. Clenche; but hark ye, fellow, you say, there were three persons, whereof Cole was one, and Milward the other, who was the third?

Brown. I do not know his name, my lord, otherwise than as I have since heard.

Mrs. Milward. The other man's name was Harper.

Just. Dolben. You know nothing but what your husband told you, and it is most probable that Harrison and he did the murder, for that it appears that the prisoner at the bar is not the man that killed the Doctor, that's plain. Have you any more?

Mrs. Milward. About a fortnight after the murder was done, they came to inquire for my husband at the Blue Boar's Head, and whilst the tapster went to tell his master, they left their money for the drink and went away, and would not be seen.

Just. Dolben. What if they had run away, what then? If they were at the Blue Boar when Dr. Clenche was killed, they could not kill him.

Mrs. Milward. His master says, that they were in the house, and out of the house, very often. Call Mr. Dalley the master. [Who appeared and stood up.]

Dalley. My lord, two of them were not out of the house all the night, I am not positive that this is the man that came in with Milward, but those two men that came in with him, never went out at all until after eleven o'clock at night, but only Milward went out between eight and nine, and returned about eleven o'clock.

Just. Dolben. What do you say to this, woman? your husband told you that the prisoner was one of the two; this witness cannot say he was one, but says positively those two men never went out till eleven o'clock, and from St. Clement Danes to Leadenhall-street is not to go in and out, they must take a great deal of time to go thither and back again. Hark you, Mr. Dalley, you say that those two men that Milward left, never went out of your house till after eleven o'clock; you are sure on't?

Dalley. No, my lord, they did not go out.

Mr. Wise. Mrs. Milward hath two witnesses that can tell somewhat more of the matter concerning her husband's being concerned in the murder.

Mrs. Milward. My husband told me, that the coachman took them up not far from Chancery-lane end, and that Mr. Cole laid hands upon the doctor in the middle of Holborn.

Cl. of Ar. Cryer, call John Sikes the coachman. [Who stood up.]

Sikes. My lord, I took up two men in Fleet-street, about Fetter-lane end.

Just. Dolben. What manner of men were they? What cloaths had they on?

Sikes. My lord, one of them had a light-coloured perriwig on, and the other was in sad-coloured cloaths, and lank hair, but I cannot be positive that this is one of them. They asked me if I knew Dr. Clenche of Brownlow-street? I told them, that I did not know the doctor, but I knew the street; and they bid me drive thither; and when I came to the street's end, they sent me to the doctor's house, and bid me tell him, that two gentlemen were at the street's end in a coach, who desired him to go with them to one that was not well; so the doctor came presently after me, and when he was in the coach, they bid me drive to Leadenhall-street; and when I came about Holborn-bars they bid me drive faster; and when I came to Leadenhall-market, they bid me drive to Aldgate, and I drove through the gate to the Pye tavern, and when I had turned my coach, they bid me ask for one Hunt a chyrurgeon, but he was not there; and then I told them the gate was shut, and one of them put his hand out of the coach, and gave the watchman sixpence to open the gate, and then I drove back again to Leadenhall-market, and there they bid me stop again, and one of them gave me half-a-crown to buy a fowl; and I went a little way from the coach, and one of them called me back again, and gave me a shilling more, and bid me bring a couple; and he bid me ask for one Hunt a poulterer; I went all over the market, but I could find no such man, so at length I bought the fowls of another man, and would have had the man gone with me to my coach, but he would not; then I came to my coach-side, and found the door open; and I found the doctor sitting at the bottom of the coach, with his head against the cushion, and the two men gone, and one of them seemed to be in drink when I took them up, and I thought him to be that man fallen asleep, and that the doctor and the sober man were gone to the person that was not well; so then I called the watch, and found the doctor dead, and then it was about half an hour after ten o'clock at night.

Just. Dolben. Then I ask you, was that one of the men?

Sikes. I cannot say it, my lord; I don't know him.

Just. Dolben. What time of night was it that you took them up at Fetter-lane end?

Sikes. It was about nine o'clock, somewhat after.

Just. Dolben. Why then, they say, that this man never stirred out of the house from 8 o'clock till eleven; this man can't be concerned.

Cl. of Arr. Set up John Dudley. (Which was done.)

Mrs. Milward. Mr. Dudley, what did my husband say concerning the doctor to you in the country?

Dudley. He came into the country presently after the death of the doctor, and he sent for me, and was very much concerned; I asked him what was the matter with him, and he told me, that he was come out of town about the murder of Dr. Clenche; I told him, that I hoped he was not concerned in it; he told me, No, but there was a warrant out against him upon account that he quarrelled with the coachman that night that he carried him to Dr. Clenche's; and he said, that Mr. Harrison had sent to him from Newgate, and told him, that he would give him 20*l.* if he could make his trial easy.

Just. Dolben. Mistress, this makes it out, that he told you one story, and to this witness another, which contradicts your story fully; he told him, that he came away for fear, and that he was innocent of the murder; and since that he told you, that he was guilty. Well, what else did he say to you, Mr. Dudley?

Dudley. He was much concerned to enquire after the Gazettes, and letters, if he were in them, about the doctor's murder, and to enquire if Mr. Cole and Mr. Harper were taken up about it.

Just. Dolben. You hear what is said against you; what do you say to it, Mr. Cole?

Cole. My lord, I know nothing of it.

Just. Dolben. No! I doubt you do; you were one of the three that was set down on the backside of St. Clement's church, at the Blue-boar's-head, where all things were consulted.

Cole. My lord, there was not one word spoke about killing of Dr. Clenche in my company.

Just. Dolben. Were not you acquainted with Milward?—Cole. Yes, my lord.

Just. Dolben. Were you not with Harrison?

Cole. No, my lord, I never saw him with my eyes.

Just. Dolben. Well, have you any more to say?

Mrs. Milw. Call Mr. Hobbs. [Who stood up.]

Hobbs. I met Mr. Milward in York-buildings, and he asked me how I did; and he went from me a little way, and then came to me again, and asked me if I would drink: so we went to the George in York-buildings, and there we drank a pot or two; and he asked me, if I heard that he was accused about the murder of Dr. Clenche; I told him, no; but he never told me any thing of this man at the bar.—Just. Dolben. What was Milward?

Hobbs. I do not know how he got his living.

Just. Dolben. Have you any body else, mistress?

Mrs. Milw. No, my lord, I know no more.

Just. Dolben. Gentlemen of the jury: Cole, the prisoner at the bar, stands indicted for murdering Dr. Clenche; who, as it now appears, was murdered in a coach by two persons that were therein together with the doctor. The question now before you is, whether Cole was one of these two?

Gamble the coachman swears, That the night Dr. Clenche was killed, he took up three men in Cheapside, set one of them down at Gray's-inn, and drove on to Dr. Clenche's house; the doctor was not at home; then the third man came in again to the coach, and he drove to the Blue-bear's-head, an alehouse by Clement's-inn, and set those three men down there, and 'twas then about eight of the clock.

Sikes the coachman swears, He took up two men at Fetter-lane end in Fleet-street, and by their direction drove to Brownlow-street, where the doctor lived, whom they got into the coach, and he drove as far as Aldgate, and through the gate, and then came back to Leadenhall; was sent by the two men in the coach to buy a fowl; when he returned they were gone, but the doctor found dead in the coach; and 'twas now half an hour past ten.

The question now, as I said before, is, whether Cole, the prisoner at the bar, was one of these two men?

The woman tells you, Milward her husband told her, that he and Cole were in the coach with Dr. Clenche, and that they two killed Dr. Clenche.

She likewise tells you, her husband told her, that Cole and her husband went out from the Blue-boar's-head near Clement's-inn, and left only Harper behind.

The court hath already declared to you, that her evidence, being only what her husband told her, is no evidence in law to take away a man's life, especially when it is single, without any circumstance to confirm it, as here 'tis. But that is not all; there is a very great evidence that what she says her husband told her, is false.

He told her, she says, that he and Cole went from the Blue-boar's-head and killed the doctor, leaving only Harper behind.

The master of the house, and his servant (witnesses which she produceth) both swear, that her husband went out alone, and left two men behind, who both staid in the house till Milward returned, which was about eleven of the clock. The master, 'tis true, cannot say that Cole is one of the two, but the servant is very positive he is; and both are positive that two men that Milward left behind, continued in the house till Milward returned at eleven of the clock. These two men's depositions do plainly contradict her story; and if they swear true, Cole the prisoner was not one of the persons that killed the doctor.

You have all heard, I am sure, that one Harrison hath been convicted by a jury in this place for the murder of Dr. Clenche: if he was one of the two, then Milward, by his own confession (if his wife swear true), was the other: but this you cannot take notice of; the record is not produced, neither hath the prisoner taken notice of it. The question is only, Whether Cole be guilty of the murder? which I leave to you upon the evidence you have heard.

The Jury having considered the verdict, returned, that the prisoner was Not Guilty.

369. Proceedings before the House of Lords, between the Duke and Duchess of NORFOLK, upon the Duke's Bill, intituled, "An Act to dissolve the Marriage," &c. 3 WILLIAM & MARY, A. D. 1692.*

January 7, 1692.

THE said Bill was lodged in the House of Lords.

Jan. 8. The duchess of Norfolk having received intimation, that the duke of Norfolk

* Bishop Burnett, in treating of the transactions of the year 1694, says:

"The Tories began in this session, to obstruct the king's measures more openly than before; the earls of Rochester and Nottingham did it in the House of Lords, with a peculiar edge and violence: they saw how great a reputation, the fair administration of justice by the judges, and more particularly that equity, which appeared in the whole proceedings of the court of chancery, gave the government; therefore they took all occasions, that gave them any handle to reflect on these. We had many sad declamations, setting forth the misery the nation was under, in so tragical a strain, that those who thought it was quite otherwise with us, and that under all our taxes and losses, there was a visible encrease of the wealth of the nation, could not hear all this without some indignation.

"The Bishops had their share of ill humour vented against them: it was visible to the whole nation, that there was another face of strictness, of humility and charity among them, than had been ordinarily observed be-was this day offering a Bill to the House of Lords, for dissolving the Marriage between them, and that the same was under debate before their lordships; she was advised to present the following Petition:

fore: they visited their dioceses more; they confirmed and preached oftener, than any who had in our memory gone before them; they took more care in examining those whom they ordained, and in looking into the behaviour of their clergy, than had been formerly practised; but they were faithful to the government, and zealous for it; they were gentle to the dissenters, and did not rail at them, nor seem uneasy at the toleration. This was thought such a heinous matter, that all their other diligence was despised; and they were represented as men, who designed to undermine the church, and to betray it.

"Of this, I will give one instance: the matter was of great importance; and it occasioned great and long debates in this, and in the former session of parliament: it related to the duke of Norfolk, who had proved his wife guilty of adultery, and did move for an act of parliament, dissolving his marriage, and allowing him to marry again: in the later ages of popery, when marriage was reckoned among the Sacraments, an opinion grew to be received, that adultery did not break the bond, and that

To the right hon. the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled: the humble Petition of MARY Duchess of NORFOLK,

Sheweth, That your petitioner being informed, that the duke of Norfolk is at this time offering a bill to your lordships, for dissolving the marriage between him and your petitioner, Your petitioner humbly prays she may be heard by your lordships, before such bill be received. And your petitioner will ever pray, &c. M. NORFOLK.

Upon which Petition, their lordships were pleased to make the following Order, viz.

Die Veneris 8 Januarii, 1692.

A Bill having been offered to this house, on the behalf of the duke of Norfolk, to dissolve the marriage between the said duke and his duchess; it was ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that her grace shall have notice thereof, and may be heard by her counsel, at the bar of this house, on Tuesday next at twelve of the clock, what she hath to object against the receiving the said Bill: at which time the said duke may also be heard by his counsel, for the said Bill, it could only entitle to a separation, but not such a dissolution of the marriage, as gave the party, that was injured, a right to marry again: this became the rule of the spiritual courts; though there was no definition made about it, before the council of Trent. At the time of the Reformation, a suit of this nature was prosecuted by the marquis of Northampton: the marriage was dissolved, and he married a second time; but he found it necessary to move for an act of parliament, to confirm this subsequent marriage: in the reformation of the ecclesiastical laws, that was prepared by Cranmer and others, in king Edward's time, a rule was laid down, allowing of a second marriage, upon a divorce for adultery. This matter had lain asleep above an hundred years, till the present duke of Rutland, then lord Roos, moved for the like liberty. At that time a sceptical and libertine spirit prevailed, so that some began to treat marriage, only as a civil contract, in which the parliament was at full liberty, to make what laws they pleased; and most of king Charles's courtiers applauded this, hoping by this doctrine, that the king might be divorced from the queen. The greater part of the bishops, apprehending the consequence that lord Roos's act might have, opposed every step that was made in it; though many of them were persuaded, that in the case of adultery, when it was fully proved, a second marriage might be allowed. In the duke of Norfolk's case, as the lady was a papist, and a busy Jacobite, so a great party appeared for her. All that favoured the Jacobites, and those who were thought engaged in lewd practices, espoused her concern with a zeal that did themselves little honour. Their number if he shall think fit. Matth. Johnson, Cler' Parliamentor.'

Jan. 12. After hearing counsel this day, at the bar, what they could object for her grace the duchess of Norfolk, against the receiving of a Bill offered by his grace the duke of Norfolk, to dissolve the marriage between him and his duchess; as also the counsel of his grace the duke of Norfolk for receiving the said Bill. And after consideration of what was offered by counsel, on either side, and a long debate thereupon: this Question was put, Whether the duke of Norfolk's Bill should be received? It was resolved in the affirmative. Which Bill is as followeth:

An ACT to dissolve the Marriage of HENRY Duke of NORFOLK, Earl Marshal of England, with the Lady Mary Mordant, and to enable the said Duke to marry again.

"Forasmuch as Henry duke of Norfolk, and earl marshal of England, having been married to the lady Mary Mordant, hath made full proof that his said wife is guilty of, and hath committed, adultery on her part: and forasmuch as the said Henry duke of Norfolk hath no issue, nor can have any probable ex-was such, that no progress could be made in the bill, though the proofs were but too full, and too plain. But the main question was, whether, supposing the matter fully proved, the duke of Norfolk should be allowed a second marriage: the bishops were desired to deliver their opinions, with their reasons: all those, who had been made during the present reign, were of opinion, that a second marriage in that case was lawful, and conformable, both to the words of the Gospel, and to the doctrine of the Primitive church; and that the contrary opinion was started in the late and dark ages: but all the bishops, that had been made by the two former kings, were of another opinion; though some of them could not well tell why they were so. Here was a colour for men, who looked at things superficially, to observe that there was a difference of opinion, between the last made bishops, and those of an elder standing: from which they inferred, that we were departing from the received doctrine of our church; and upon that topic, the earl of Rochester charged us very vehemently. The Bill was let fall at this time; nor was the dispute kept up, for no books were writ on the subject of either side."

Concerning the marriages of persons divorced for adultery, see the speech of Horsley, bishop of St. Asaph, in the House of Lords, A. D. 1800; and the other speeches in that debate. See, also, Paley's Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy, book 3, part 3, c. 4, 7, 8. It appears (See vol. 11, pp. 1144, 1145), that the Duchess proceeded against her husband before the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and that they ordered her 1,500*l.* per annua for her maintenance.

pectation of posterity to succeed him in his honours, dignities, and estate, unless the said marriage be declared void by authority of parliament, and the said duke be enabled to marry any other woman: The king and queen's most excellent majesties, upon the humble Petition of the said Henry duke of Norfolk, having taken the premises into their royal consideration, for divers weighty reasons, are pleased that it be enacted, and be it enacted, by the king and queen's most excellent majesties, and by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That the said marriage between the said Henry duke of Norfolk, and the said lady Mary his wife, shall from henceforth be null and void; and is by authority of this present parliament declared, adjudged, and enacted to be null and void, to all intents, constructions, and purposes whatsoever. And that it shall and may be lawful to, and for the said Henry duke of Norfolk, at any time or times hereafter, to contract matrimony, and to marry (as well in the life-time of the said lady Mary, as if she were naturally dead) with any other woman or women, with whom he might lawfully marry, in case the said lady Mary was not living: and that such matrimony, when had and celebrated, shall be a good, just and lawful marriage, and so shall be adjudged, deemed and taken, to all intents, constructions and purposes. And that all and every children and child born in such matrimony shall be deemed, adjudged and taken to be born in lawful wedlock, and to be legitimate and inheritable, and shall inherit the said dukedom of Norfolk, office of earl Marshal of England, and all other earldoms, dignities, baronies, honours, and titles of honour, lands, tenements, and other hereditaments, from and by their fathers, mothers, and other ancestors, in like manner and form, as any other child or children, born in lawful matrimony, shall or may inherit, or be inheritable, according to the course of inheritances used in this realm, and to have and enjoy all privileges, preeminences, benefits, advantages, claims and demands, as any other child or children born in lawful wedlock may have or claim by the laws or customs of this kingdom. And be it further enacted, that the said Henry duke of Norfolk shall be entituled to be tenant, by courtesy, of the lands and inheritance of such wife, whom he shall hereafter marry: and such wife as he shall so marry shall be intitled to a dower of the lands and tenements of the said Henry duke of Norfolk, and of such estate whereof she shall be dowable, as any other husband, or wife may, or might claim, have, or enjoy: and the child or children, born in such marriage, shall and may derive and make title, by descent, or otherwise, to, and from any their ancestors, as any other child or children may do, any law, statute, restraint, prohibition, ordinance, canon, constitution, prescription or custom, had, made, exercised, or used to the contrary of the premises, or any of them, in any wise notwithstanding. And be it further enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that the said lady Mary shall be, and is hereby barred and excluded of, and from all dowers and thirds, and of and from all right and title of dower and thirds, unto, or out of any the honours, manors, lands, or hereditaments of the said duke; and that all conveyances, jointures, settlements, limitations and creations of uses and trusts, of, into, or out of, any honours, manors, lands or hereditaments, at any time heretofore made by the said duke, or any of his ancestors, or trustees, unto or upon, or for the use or benefit of the said lady Mary, or any the issue of her body, or for raising, discharging, or counter-securing any the manors, lands, or hereditaments of the said lady Mary, or any of her ancestors, shall be from henceforth utterly void, and of none effect: and all and every the said honours, manors, lands or hereditaments of the said duke, or any of his ancestors or trustees, shall from henceforth remain and be to, and for, the use and benefit of the said duke, and such other person or persons, and for such estates and interests, and in such manner and form, as if the said lady Mary was now naturally dead, without any issue of her body. And also, that all limitations and creations, of any use, estate, power or trust, made by any of the ancestors of the said lady Mary, unto or for the use or benefit of the said duke, his heirs or assigns, out of any the manors, lands, or hereditaments, of any of the ancestors of the said lady Mary, shall be from henceforth void, and of none effect.

REASONS offered to the Lords in Parliament, for receiving the before-mentioned Bill of Divorce, on the behalf of his grace the Duke of NORFOLK.

The not having a Sentence for separation from the ecclesiastical court, is thought to be no objection against the receiving or passing the duke of Norfolk's bill, for these reasons, viz.

1. The House proceeds, in this case, in their legislative and in their judicial capacity; and in their legislative, all things must proceed originally by bill.

2. That a sentence in the ecclesiastical court can give the duke no relief, as to what he seeks by his bill, viz. To dissolve his marriage, and enable him to marry again; but that relief must spring originally from the parliament, without relation to the ecclesiastical court.

3. That in case there was such a sentence, yet it would afford no assistance in this case: For the parliament, in cases of this nature, do not rely upon any such sentence for a satisfactory proof of the fact; but hear witnesses viva voce, and thereupon proceed.

4. That there are witnesses now living to prove the fact, which may be examined viva voce, whereas, if they die during the tedious proceeding in any inferior court, then there can be no other proof but depositions taken in writing.

5. That Mrs. Wharton's case was received originally in parliament.

January 13. The duke of Norfolk's Bill aforesaid having been yesterday received and read, the duchess of Norfolk presented the following Petition to their lordships this day :

To the right hon. the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled : The humble Petition of MARY Duchess of NORFOLK,

Sheweth,

That your petitioner being married to the duke of Norfolk fourteen years and upwards, never had or received from her husband any intimation of a misdemeanor, on her part, against him ; which, joined to her innocency of the crime mentioned in the Bill, makes this proceeding before your lordships very surprising to her : Her person, estate, and honour, which is more dear to her than her life, being now brought in question :

Your petitioner humbly prays she may have a copy of the particular charge against her, with the names of the witnesses, and reasonable time allowed her, to answer the same, before any farther proceedings upon the Bill.

MARY NORFOLK.

Upon which Petition the following Order was made.

Die Mercurii 13 Januarii, 1692.

Upon reading the petition of Mary Duchess of Norfolk, It is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that sir Richard Reynes, sir Charles Hedges, and Dr. Oxenden, do attend this House to-morrow at ten of the clock in the forenoon.

MATTH. JOHNSON, Cler. Parl.

Jan. 14. After having heard the civil lawyers, the following order was made :

Die Jovis 14 Januarii, 1692.

After hearing this day the civil lawyers, pursuant to the order yesterday, upon reading the duchess of Norfolk's petition, It is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that his grace the duke of Norfolk shall bring in the charge against his duchess, and particularly to the person, time and place, by Saturday next, at twelve of the clock. MATTH. JOHNSON, Cler' Parliamentor.

Jan. 16. The duke of Norfolk brought in the following charge against his Duchess :

The CHARGE which HENRY Duke of NORFOLK, Earl Marshal of England, doth exhibit against his wife, MARY Duchess of NORFOLK, before the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, pursuant to their Lordships Order of the 14th of January, 1692, is for the crime of Adultery.

The person charged to commit the said crime with the said duchess, is John Germaine, of the parish of St. Margaret's, in the liberty of Westminster.

The times when the said crime was committed, were between the months of June and December, 1685, and several times since.

The places where the said crime was committed, are at Whitehall, Windsor, and within the parishes of St. Margaret's Westminster, St. Martin's in the Fields, St. James's, St. Ann's within the liberty of Westminster : And in the parish of Lambeth, in the county of Surrey. NORFOLK, and Marshal.

Upon which the following Order was made :

Die Sabbati, 16 Januarii, 1692.

Upon reading, this day, the charge, which Henry duke of Norfolk, earl marshal of England, hath exhibited against his wife, Mary duchess of Norfolk, for the crime of adultery : It is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That her grace the duchess of Norfolk do attend this House on Monday next, or some person on her behalf, then to receive a copy of the charge against her.

MATTH. JOHNSON, Cl. Parl.

19 Januarii, 1692.

The ANSWER of MARY Duchess of NORFOLK, to the Charge exhibited against her by the Duke of NORFOLK, before the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled.

This respondent is advised, that the charge exhibited by the duke of Norfolk into this honourable house against her, as to time and place, is too general, and is not pursuant, nor doth answer the end of your lordships order of the 14th instant, made upon the humble petition of this respondent. Wherefore she doth humbly hope, and pray, your lordships will not oblige her to make any further answer, till the duke shall bring in a particular and certain charge, as to time and place, against her.

And this respondent doth the rather humbly insist, That your lordships would please to require the duke to be particular, and certain in these material circumstances of his charge against her ; for that it appears, by his own shewing therein, that the supposed crimes objected to her, and alledged to be committed, were above six years before the bill was offered to this honourable house : During most of which time, at the advice, and by the approbation of the duke, she was, and continued beyond the seas, to ease him in his charge and part ; he frequently declaring, that when he should be more easy in his fortune, they should live together.

M. NORFOLK.

Upon which answer the following order was made. And the duke's second charge delivered in the same day.

Die Martis, 19 Januarii, 1692.

It is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that her grace the duchess of Norfolk shall have a copy of the duke's charge delivered this day against her; and that she, or sir Thomas Pinfold, do attend this house to morrow at 11 of the clock in the forenoon, to answer the said charge.

MATTHEW JOHNSON, Cl. Parl.

Which Copy is as followeth:

The CHARGE which HENRY Duke of NORFOLK, Earl Marshal of England, doth exhibit against his wife, MARY Duchess of NORFOLK, before the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, pursuant to their Lordships Order of the 14th of January, 1692, is for the crime of Adultery.

The person charged to commit the said crime with the said duchess, is one John Germaine, of the parish of St. Margaret's, Westminster.

The times and places when the said crime was committed, were at Whitehall, in the months of June, July, August, some, or one of them, in the year 1685. At Windsor, in the months of July, August, or September, some, or one of them, in the said year 1685. In the parish of St. Margaret's, Westminster, March, April, May, June, some, or one of them, in the year of our Lord, 1690. And in the said parish of St. Margaret's, Westminster, in the months of July or August, 1690. In the parish of Lambeth, in the county of Surrey, in the months of May, June, July, August, some, or one of them, in the year 1691.

NORFOLK, and Marshal.

Served by Thomas Bowen, Jan. 19, before six o'clock.

Upon which, the next day, the duchess of Norfolk presented the following Petition:

To the Right Honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled,

The humble PETITION of MARY Duchess of NORFOLK.

That your Petitioner was served with an order of this honourable house, late last night, to attend your lordships this day, by eleven of the clock, either in person, or by sir Thomas Pinfold, to answer to a new charge brought in against her, by her husband the duke of Norfolk.

Your Petitioner is advised, That, for her just defence, it is necessary to alledge in her answer several special matters relating both to the duke and herself.

That in this short time appointed by your lordships, your Petitioner finds it impossible to instruct counsel to prepare such an answer as she is advised is necessary to put in.

Wherefore your Petitioner humbly prays your lordships, she may have convenient time to put in her answer to the said charge. And your Petitioner will ever pray, &c.

M. NORFOLK.

Upon which the following Order was made:

Die Mercurii, 20 Januarii, 1691.

Upon reading the Petition of Mary duchess of Norfolk, praying that she may have convenient time for answering to the charge put in against her, by his grace the duke of Norfolk, yesterday: it is ordered by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that her grace the duchess of Norfolk shall peremptorily answer, by herself, or proctor, to the said charge, to morrow at eleven o'clock in the forenoon.

MATTH. JOHNSON, Cler' Parliamentor'.

Accordingly, January the 21st, the duchess of Norfolk delivered in the following Answer:

I Mary duchess of Norfolk, under protestation, That the pretended charge of adultery given against me, in the honourable House of Peers, was, and is general, insufficient, and such as, I humbly conceive, I am not bound by law to give answer unto. Yet knowing my own innocency, and that I am not guilty of the pretended crime, this protestation being sacred to me, I shall, and do, under the matters and qualifications hereafter mentioned, answer, and say, hereby affirming, that having been married to his grace the duke of Norfolk for near 15 years, he never did (till this pretended charge given against me) in the least pretend, or intimate unto me, that I had ever injured his bed; but did always treat me with great kindness and respect. And about the year 1685, at his request and desire, I did go with him from London to France, and there continued with him for some time; where his grace, being under an indisposition, and continuing so for some time, he shewed such affection to me, and put so great trust and confidence in me, that all such things that were administered to him, in order to his recovery, he did not, nor would receive any of them but what came from my hands; and I did with great care attend him: and being recovered, he told me his occasions required him to go for England, but he would return to me in France within some short time, and bring me home to England; and at his parting with me, he shewed great affection to me, and in great passion of love, with tears in his eyes, said, He had ten thousand pardons to ask me, desiring my patience, and that I should return into England to him in some short time. And after his grace's return into England, he having notice from me that my lodgings was inconvenient, and desiring his leave to change the same, he wrote me word very affectionately, that God forbid he should constrain me to any inconveniency, and left me to my liberty therein. And before his parting with me, in France, as a testimony of his love and affection to me, he ordered 400*l* yearly to be paid unto me, out of his own estate, by quarterly payments, over and above the separate maintenance settled upon me by my father, upon my marriage with him. And that after his arrival in England, he made several visits to my mother, the countess of Peterborough; and with great observance and respect, asked her blessings, and told her, he had left me well and safe in France; and said, that his own debts were pressing upon him; but if her daughter (meaning myself) would consent that the manor of Drayton, and other places, should be settled upon him and his heirs, he should thereby be made a happy man. And I coming into England, his grace having put off house-keeping, and dwelling in the countess of Peterborough's lodgings in St. James's for about two years; and I suing him for alimony (the said 400*l.* a year not being paid unto me), he did not, during that suit, object any crime against me, which had been proper for him to have done, to avoid alimony, if I had been guilty. And I, the said Mary duchess of Norfolk, being at Drayton in Northamptonshire, his grace did write very affectionately to me. And that disturbances happening in those parts, in November, 1688, I left Drayton; and, with the consent of the duke, went beyond seas, and there continued till sent for by my father and mother, and then returned, which was in or about October, 1691, with the duke's consent. And then applications being made to me by the duke my husband, to join with him in the sale of Castle-Rising, and other estates: But I being advised this must be injurious to me, could not join therein, which I humbly apprehend to be the true cause and occasion of this proceeding against my honour, on the duke my husband's part.

And I the said Mary duchess of Norfolk, adhering to my protestation of my innocency, and denying that I am guilty of the pretended crime charged against me, and being unwilling to impeach my husband of any crime whatsoever; yet being advised, That, by the laws of the land, a husband suing a divorce for the adultery of his wife, he ought not to obtain any sentence of divorce, if he be proved guilty of the same.

Wherefore this Respondent doth aver, and is ready to prove, that the duke her husband was, and is guilty of adultery, and hath continued in the course of adultery for these ten years last past, and doth so continue.

My Lords,

It is my misfortune to be thus accused. I had rather stand charged for high treason before your lordships, than with this ignominious crime. In the charge for high treason, the manner of trials, and the ways of proceedings are known; so is the punishment in this case against me.

Your lordships are now creating new ways of proceeding against me, and a new law to punish me; and this for a crime supposed and alledged to be committed seven years past, in another reign, after public indemnities in the sessions of parliaments, many sittings of parliaments, and dissolutions of others, without mentioning this crime against me. My counsel are to seek how to advise my defence in the proceeding, being altogether strange, and without precedent, or example.

I find my prosecution now to be very violent, and my proceeding to be very swift upon me, having had but one night to prepare my Answer to this general Charge. I do in this place publicly declare, I am innocent of what is objected to me, and am not guilty of defiling my husband's bed: I am not guilty of the crime charged against me. I hope (being thus accused) I may, without vanity and vain-glory, say, what is well known, that I am not only the duke of Norfolk's wife, but also born and descended from parents and ancestors of the ancient nobility: That your lordships ancestors, and my ancestors, who sat in this House, knew no such proceeding: It is with regret that I bring this answer for myself, and against my husband, but it being my defence, I hope you will excuse me.

And if your lordships shall, in your great wisdom, proceed farther in this matter, I hope, and do most heartily pray, that I may hereafter have convenient time to make my proofs, and full defence; and then I doubt not of your lordships justice to me, as well as for my husband, who sits and votes with your lordships.

M. NORFOLK.

Upon the delivering the said Answer, the next day the following Order was made:

Die Veneris, 22 Januarii, 1692.

It is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That his grace the duke of Norfolk shall produce his Witnesses, to-morrow at ten o'clock in the forenoon, to be sworn. And that her grace the duchess of Norfolk do attend this House, by herself, or proctor, at the same time; and may have orders for witnesses, if she pleases.

MATTH. JOHNSON, Cler' Parl'.

Accordingly, January 23, the duke's Witnesses were produced; and whose names are as followeth: Margaret Ellwood, Ann Burton, Rowland Owen, Thomas Hudson, Simon Varelst, Peter Scriber, John Reynolds, Thomas Lloyd, John Hall, Mary Hall, Richard Owen, William Miles, Andrew Anderson, Thomas Foster, Margaret Foster, Jane Wadsworth, Mary Boyle, Rice Jones, Ann Jones, John Hoskins, William Baily, John Wood, Henry Dagley, John Colvin.

After these several Witnesses were produced, on behalf of the duke of Norfolk, and had given in their several places of abode, &c. the following Oath was administered to them:

"You shall true answer make to all such questions as shall be asked you by this honourable House, in relation to the charge of adultery, brought in by the duke of Norfolk, against the duchess of Norfolk, with John Germaine; you shall declare your whole knowledge of this matter, and shall speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, as well upon the matter you shall be examined on behalf of his grace the duke of Norfolk, as upon such interrogatories as shall be exhibited on behalf of the duchess of Norfolk, without favour or affection to either party. So help you God, and by the contents of this book."

After the Oath administered, as aforesaid, the following Order was made:

It is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the duchess of Norfolk's proctor shall have a copy of what was taken upon swearing the duke of Norfolk's witnesses at the bar; and that the duke's witnesses shall give in their evidence at the bar, on Tuesday next, at ten o'clock in the forenoon; and that the duchess of Norfolk, by herself, proctor and counsel, shall attend, together with the duke's proctor and counsel, at the same time. MATTH. JOHNSON, Cler. Parl.

Jan. 26. After Examination of Witnesses, on behalf of the duke, the following Order was made:

After hearing this day, the witnesses on the behalf of his grace the duke of Norfolk; it is ordered by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that Friday next, at ten of the clock in the forenoon, shall be, and is hereby appointed, for her grace the duchess of Norfolk to make her defence by her proctor or counsel; and that his grace the duke of Norfolk's counsel and proctor be then present, and the witnesses who this day delivered their evidence, or oaths, on his grace's behalf: and that the duchess may have an order for such witnesses, as she shall think fit to make use of, on her grace's behalf.

MATTH. JOHNSON, Cler. Parl.

Upon which Order, the Duchess was advised to present the following Petition:

To the Right Honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled:
The humble Petition of MARY Duchess of NORFOLK,

Sheweth, that since the examination of witnesses before your lordships against your Petitioner, upon Tuesday last, the utmost endeavour and diligence hath been used, to prepare for her defence against the time appointed by your lordships.

That your petitioner is very much concerned, that, for the necessary defence of herself, she should be forced to lie under the charge sworn against her, one moment beyond the time given her by your lordships.

But, upon a consultation with her counsel and solicitor last night, she is advised, that it is absolutely necessary for her to address to your lordships for time, until Monday next, to bring in her defence, some of her most material witnesses being remote from London; and though she has sent for them, and used all means possible to get them ready by the time appointed, she cannot be able to have them here before Monday next.

Wherefore your petitioner humbly prays your lordships, (it being a case of the highest concern and utmost importance to your petitioner) to give her time 'till Monday next, to bring in her defence. And your Petitioner shall ever pray,

M. NORFOLK.

Upon which Petition the following Order was made:

Die Veneris, Januarii 29, 1692.

Whereas this day was appointed for her grace the duchess of Norfolk to make her Defence; upon reading the Petition of her grace the duchess of Norfolk, praying, (it being a case of the highest concern, and utmost importance to her) to give her time, until Monday next, to bring in her defence; after hearing her counsel at the bar, and upon oath made that some of the duchess's material witnesses are out of town, it is ordered by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that her grace the duchess of Norfolk hath hereby time given her for making her defence, until Monday the 1st day of February next, at eleven of the clock in the forenoon.

MATTH. JOHNSON, Cl. Parl.

Feb. 1. The duchess of Norfolk began her Defence; and the following Order was made:

It is ordered by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That on Wednesday next, at eleven of the clock in the forenoon, the house shall proceed in hearing the duchess of Norfolk's evidence; and that all the witnesses that have been sworn on either side, do then attend the house.

MATTH. JOHNSON, Cl. Parl.

Feb. 3. Which they did, and the following Order was made:

After having this day heard several Witnesses on behalf of her grace the duchess of Norfolk, as also for his grace the duke of Norfolk, it is ordered by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that her grace the duchess of Norfolk's counsel shall proceed in the grace's defence on Saturday next at twelve of the clock.

MATTH. JOHNSON, Cl. Parl.

Feb. 6. They proceeded accordingly, and the following Order was made:

After having this day heard several witnesses on the behalf of the duchess of Norfolk, it is ordered by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the counsel for his grace the duke of Norfolk shall proceed to examine witnesses, on Tuesday next at twelve of the clock.

MATTH. JOHNSON, Cl. Parl.

Feb. 9. Which accordingly they did, and the following Order was made:

After hearing some witnesses this day on the behalf of his grace the duke of Norfolk, it is ordered by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the counsel for his grace the duke of Norfolk, as also the counsel for her grace the duchess of Norfolk, shall be heard on Thursday next at twelve of the clock, to sum up the evidence on either side; and that

Mrs. Sawbridge, and Mrs. Stourton, do then attend to be heard.

MATTH. JOHNSON, Cl. Parl.

Feb. 11. The Counsel attended accordingly, but not heard; and their lordships were pleased to make the following order:

It is ordered by the lords spiritual and temporal, in parliament assembled, that the counsel for his grace the duke of Norfolk, as also the counsel for her grace the duchess of Norfolk, shall be heard to-morrow at one of the clock in the afternoon, to sum up the evidence on either side; and that Mrs. Sawbridge, and Mrs. Stourton do then attend to be heard.

MATTH. JOHNSON, Cl. Parl.

Feb. 12. After Evidence summed up, this following Order was made:

After hearing this day the counsel, and a civilian, for his grace the duke of Norfolk; and also counsel, and a civil lawyer, for her grace the duchess of Norfolk, who summed up the evidence for their graces severally, It is ordered by the lords spiritual and temporal, in parliament assembled, That on Tuesday next, at twelve of the clock, this house shall proceed in the debate of this business; and that then no other business whatsoever shall intervene: and that all the lords in and about the town shall be summoned then to attend, and that the officers that summon them, give the house an account of what lords they summon.

MATTH. JOHNSON, Cl. Parl.

Feb. 16. The matter was accordingly entered upon; and, after some previous debates by their lordships, they were pleased to adjourn until the next day, when they proceeded. The Depositions taken at several times before, on the behalf of his grace the duke of Norfolk, as also those taken on the behalf of her grace the duchess of Norfolk, were read at the table, by the clerk, and are as followeth, viz.

THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE LORDS UPON THE EVIDENCE.

Rowland Owen examined on the behalf of the duke of Norfolk, against the duchess of Norfolk.

Rowland Owen saith, That Mr. Reyner, about six years since, being the duke of Norfolk's butler, ordered him to carry the things out; the lodgings being open, he saw Mr. Germaine in bed with the duchess of Norfolk, the duchess leaped out of the bed, and put on a morning gown, and Germaine hid himself in bed; this was between five and six o'clock in the evening, about a fortnight before Bartholomew day; he did not tell the duke: he is sure it was Germaine; he saw him often, twice or thrice a day; the outward door of the lodgings was shut, but he opened it with a key he had.

Rowland Owen examined a second time, saith he never had the key of the lodgings but once, that Mr. Reyner gave him the key, when he went (as he told him) to the Blue Posts in the Hay-Market, to bespeak the duchess's supper; he saith he saw not Frances Knight then in the lodgings, nor any other woman but the duchess of Norfolk; he saith, he hath seen Reyner often open the outward door of the lodgings, when he hath been by, without calling Frances Knight: he saith, that he himself opened the first door with the key, the second door was not close shut, and the third door was open: he saith, two of the doors are straight forward, and the third turns a little on the right hand; he said he was gone in at the third door when the duchess leaped out of bed. (a)

VOL. XII.

(a) The following OBSERVATIONS were published with the above Proceedings, in 1692; by her Grace's Friends.

Observations upon the foregoing Evidence.

We are in the first place to consider, and compare the evidence on both sides. Secondly, To examine the credit of the witnesses. Thirdly, The reasonable probability of the matters sworn, according to the common course and practice of the world.

Owen swears, That being sent by Henry Reyner, the duke's butler, to carry the things out, and the lodgings being open, he saw Mr. Germaine and the duchess in bed; and to countenance the story, he says, That two of the doors are straight forward, giving to understand that the doors being open, and one against another, a body may see the bed out of the first room into the third; that Reyner gave him the key of the outward door, and upon the unlocking of it he made this discovery.

Frances Knight encounters this evidence with a deposition, that she kept the key of the outward door herself, and delivered it to nobody, but now and then to my lady Peterborough's house-keeper: that Owen never went into any of the inner rooms, and that the doors are sideways.

Henry Reyner saith also, That he himself could not get into the lodgings but by Frances Knight; that he never gave Owen the key, nor never had it in his possession; that he never saw Owen beyond the passage room, nay, that Frances Knight never gave him the key, but that he still went to her to open the door, and that he never had any key to the lodgings; that whenever he sent Owen with plates, spoons, and the like, from the duke's house to the lodgings in Whitehall, he was either there himself to receive them, or directed Owen to deliver them to Frances Knight.

Now, if these two witnesses speak truth, Owen was never in the inner rooms at all; he never had the key of the outward door, and the doors are not straight forward as Owen swears they are, which is a matter of fact easily cleared.

As to the credit of Rowland Owen, Edward Sylvester, John Jones, and Edward Cooke are Witnesses produced to the credit of Rowland Owen.

Edward Sylvester saith, He hath known Rowland Owen three or four years, and he hath trusted him in business, and he hath ever been very faithful; he hath trusted him in stores to the king, and he might have embezzled, but ever found him honest; and he hath had three or four thousand pounds worth of goods that he might have embezzled, and hath had opportunities of doing ill things, but he never did: he hath trusted him with every thing he hath; he hath had more than 20*l.* embezzled by others, but he never embezzled a half-penny: he knows not well who recomproduced in his favour. The first swears, he never knew him steal or cozen, as if the case were pilfery. The second, That Owen might have done him wrong, and did not, and thence infers that he would not take a false oath. The third, That he knows nothing to the contrary of his being an honest man. So that here are three surmises for the reputation of Owen, which are just nothing to the purpose, on the one hand; and two point-blank proofs, upon oath, against him on the other; and not one syllable all this while to disparage the testimony of either Knight or Reyner; though there are several pinching passages in the evidence, that, if they were false, might be detected by hundreds of witnesses. And for an instance of Reyner's tenderness of an oath, he has own'd some things, upon the close of his examination, to the seeming prejudice of the duchess herself. This is meant of their going by borrowed names; but as things stood at that time with many persons of honour, under her grace's circumstances, it was no scandal to conceal either their names or their abodes. But as to the true reason of the 'duchess's' retirement, and living in a manner so incognito: the earl of Peterborough falling desperately sick in the Tower, her grace came over upon it, from beyond the seas, to be within distance, in case the sickness should have proved mortal. The duchess had at that time nothing to live upon but an exhibition from her father, and one half of that was made over too for the payment of her debts; so that not being in a condition to appear answerable to her quality, she thought herself bound in honour, prudence, and justice to retrench her expences, which she could not better do, than by such a retreat.

It is in the next place to be observed, how Owen interferes with himself; the lodgings, he says, being open, he saw Mr. Germaine in bed with the duchess of Norfolk, the duchess leap'd out of bed, &c. This must naturally be understood to have been upon the opening of the first door; and to the end it should be taken so, he says that the two first doors were straight forward, and that the third turns a little. Now if so, how could he see the bed out of the first room into the third? And then he forgets himself again, in saying that the second door was mended him to him; he hath an hundred men now, and he knows not that three of them were recommended: he hath trusted him with goods an hundred and an hundred times that he might have embezzled; and others that he hath so trusted have cozened him, and he hath lost 20*l.* in a month's time by them; he works at our work, and that better than twenty that he hath had, and he is no porter: he saith he knows not Mr. Negus, nor was not acquainted with him until yesterday.

John Jones saith, he hath known Rowland Owen above three years, and that he is a very honest man, and that he ever found him faithful; that he lodged in his house, and that he might have done him injuries if he would, and not close shut, and the third open; so that he has now doubled the difficulty: there was no seeing into the bed-chamber, both because the second door was almost close, and because the third was sideways. It is to be noted also, that the bed stands quite out of sight of the bed-chamber door, which is sufficient of itself alone to overthrow Owen's testimony. But upon second thoughts, he takes himself tripping, and instead of mending the matter, makes it worse; it comes into his head by this time, that there was no seeing them in bed out of the first room, and so thinks to help it out with a flam at the wrong end of his information, that indeed he was in at the third door when the duchess leap'd out of her bed. Now, to take the tale his own way, can any body imagine, that Owen should unlock the outward door, lay down his lumber, pass these two rooms into the third, the duchess and Mr. Germaine both awake too, and all this noise not give them the alarm?

To come now to the probability of the thing, Reyner gave him the key, he says, only for once, it seems, for he never had it either before or since. Has not this the face now of a contrivance, calculated for a particular turn? Is it not highly improbable again, that a pitiful, drudging fellow, that earn'd his bread by doing porter's work for the family, should have the duchess's bed-chamber lain open to him? And so for the morning-gown, and Germaine hiding himself in the bed, had they no other cloaths or garments lying by them? That Owen should have luck to see just this, and nothing else. But his lesson was to swear Nudus cum Nuda, and Solus cum Solâ, to bring the proof up to the straitness of the law, and that was the part he had to play. Or, to take the case yet another way: if Owen had seen them out of the first room, can any body think he would have ventur'd after that into the bed-chamber? Or if he did not see them in the first room, what had he to do in the other room at all? But over and above all the rest, for an amour of this quality, to be carried on thus in the face of the sun, the doors and the curtains open; let any man ask his own conscience, if he does not look upon it as an imposture, without a precedent from the creation to this day.

he hath been employed elsewhere, and he never heard any ill of him; he believes he is a man of a better principle than to take a false oath.

Thomas Cooke saith, That he hath known Rowland Owen five years, and knows not but that he is an honest man, and saith that he maintains his family by his labour; he is his neighbour, and never heard him taxed with any misdemeanour.

Witnesses sworn on behalf of the Duchess, for invalidating the testimony of Rowland Owen, viz.

Frances Knight saith, She knows Rowland Owen, as he was a fellow-servant in the duke of Norfolk's house; she hath known him a year, he was running porter, to carry up coals and wood; he was not trusted with any keys; she was trusted with the keys to the lodgings, and she always kept the key to the outward door to the lodgings, and there was no other key; and that she never delivered it to any body, but sometimes left it with the lady Peterborough's house-keeper; she never let this Owen have that key, or any other key to the lodgings, it was below her to do it; he never went into the inner rooms, no farther than the steps to the outward room; he is a pitiful, beggarly fellow, he laid the steward's cloth, and had no other livelihood; she lived with my lady six years and upwards, and all the while had the key to the outward door: she saith, you must first come into the room called the footmen's waiting-room, then enter the dining-room, then enter the bed-chamber, the doors are side-ways: she made the duchess's bed constantly; she locked the door, and kept the key in her pocket; she had the key of the rooms until the countess of Westmoreland had the lodgings, which was not till the duke and duchess left them, which was ten or twelve days before Bartholomew-tide, six years ago.

Henry Reyner saith, That he knew Rowland Owen, street-porter; he saith, that he (this witness) could never get into the lodgings, but when he had the key from Frances Knight; he saith, Owen never came into the lodgings, but had a key to a house where the empty bottles were, which was without the lodgings; and he himself could not get into the lodgings but by Frances Knight; he never had the key in his own possession; he never saw Owen farther than the passage-room; he saith, that the doors are not opposite to one another: he saith, Frances Knight never gave him the key; he always found her there to open the doors, or in the room: he never had any key that would open the lodgings; Owen never told him that he caught the duchess in the manner as is said; he knows not of any livelihood he had, besides laying the steward's cloth: Owen had wages from the duke, and lodged at the duke's house in St. James's; he sent bottles, pewter plates, forks and spoons, bread, and linnen sometimes by him, from the duke's house to the lodgings in Whitehall: when he was not there to receive them himself, he gave him directions to deliver them to Frances Knight, or gave him the key of the cupboard. Being asked whether he hath ever gone by another name than Reyner? He desired to be excused, and refused to answer; he refused also to answer, whether he had known any lady go by the name of Bateman: afterwards he said, he did know one to do so. He saith, she went by the name of the duchess of Norfolk: he saith, it was the duchess of Norfolk that went by the name of Bateman, and she went so he believes for a year; it was at Lambeth, but he knows not at whose house there; he never saw Germaine there; it was a year, or half a year since, he knows not certainly; the house is called by the name of Scriber's house, a dyer; he never saw Mr. Germaine at Scriber's with the lady Bateman; he saith, he himself went by the name of Goodman, when he lived with this lady Bateman; he saith, that he knows not that Germaine was ever at Lambeth, by that name, or any other: he saith, he never paid any rent for the house at Lambeth, nor knows that Germaine paid any for it; but he saith, he was a servant to the duchess at Lambeth, but knows not what office he was in, but she paid him his wages.

Henry Reyner, examined to what Rowland Owen said at his second examination, saith, he never gave him the key of the lodgings, and saith, he never had the key of the lodgings.

Margaret Ellwood examined on the behalf of the Duke of Norfolk, against the Duchess. (b)

Margaret Ellwood saith, she had a company to see the lodgings at Windsor, in the first (b.) Observations upon the foregoing Evidence.

Here's a foul and a suspicious story in this deposition of Margaret Ellwood, wherein she stands singly upon the credit of her own testimony, without any colour or corroborating evidence to support it: only capt. Charles Potts, John Faucet, and Lawrence Purcell, are produced to speak to her personal reputation. The first says, she behaved herself well and prudently in the duke's house; the second and third, that they know no ill by her.

There were produced on the behalf of the duchess, and to invalidate the testimony of Margaret Ellwood, these six witnesses, Michael Haddon, Joyce Heath, Mary Trevis, Mary Jones, Anne Ross and Mary Ross. Mary Trevis, Mary Jones, and Anne Ross, do all depose, that about Christmas last, speaking of the duchess, and Mr. Germaine, Margaret Ellwood told each of these witnesses respectively, that she never saw or knew any thing of ill by the said duchess; and yet Ellwood's accusation bears date in the first year of king James. Mary Trevis swears farther, that upon the next Sunday after Christmas last, Ellwood told her, upon borrowing a scarf of her, that it might be five pounds in her way, for the duke was to be divorced from the year of king James's reign, about three or four of the clock in the afternoon; a woman told her that my lady was not there, but she opening the door, saw my lady upon the stools in an ill posture, Mr. Germaine's breeches were down; he pulled them up, and laid his hand on his sword, saying, 'God damn you for a whore, how have you the impudence to come here?' My lady bid him kick me down; he scattered some concerns, that is, man's nature, on the boards; she saw no nakedness but her knee, or a little above. Another time after, she found Germaine's handkerchief and ruffles in my lady's bed; my lady's woman said there was Germaine's name upon them. Another time, she saw Mr. Cornwall let Mr. Germaine out of my lady's closet: she saw Germaine's duchess, and he had sent his chariot for her, and she was to be a witness. Anne Ross speaks also to the same effect, how Ellwood told her there would be a divorce, and the duke had sent for her to be a witness; and likewise saith, that Ellwood's husband told her, that his wife was to have 30*l.* per annum settled upon her, and live at Windsor, and have the shewing of the castle.

Mary Ross speaks to the same purpose also, with the witness above, as to what Ellwood's husband said of Windsor, the settlement, and the divorce; adding also, that the duke was to have a great fortune (according to the common rumour then about the town); Mary Ross's father was by, and heard all this: it was about a week before the date of the information that discourse had passed.

Nay, the duchess was so clear in the matter, that she sent for Ellwood a little before Christmas last, and bid her speak the truth; as Ellwood herself owned to Mary Jones and Anne Ross.

To come now to the quality and credit of Margaret Ellwood. Haddon says, she was his tenant at an alehouse in Windsor, in 1659, carried off her goods by night, and went away in his debt.

Heath saith, she lived in a cellar, led an ill course of life; her husband was a cobbler in a stall.

Anne Ross says, that she had five children, and that she had but sixpence a day maintenance for herself and them.

This was her condition till near Christmas last, when all on a sudden, as Anne Ross deposes, she was taken into the duke's house, the children new cloathed, and tricked up with good frocks and top-knots, (which were till then all in rags,) lodgings provided for them at four shillings a week, and a maid to look to them, and no visible means of doing all this. But, in fine, the change was not wrought by miracle, and leans much toward the discourse before mentioned, that Anne and Mary Ross had with Ellwood's husband.

The question, at last, is briefly this: whether is to be believed a woman under so many scandalous circumstances, and one that swears legs within her's when she came the first time into the room, and his breeches were about his heels. The first time was in Bartholomew-fair time; Mrs. Knifeton told her it was Germaine's linnen.

Witnesses produced to the credit of Margaret Ellwood.

Captain Charles Potts saith, he hath known Margaret Ellwood six or seven years, and that she was servant to the duke of Norfolk, and that she behaved herself well and prudently there; her husband was a soldier in his company, and was, as he hath heard, a shoemaker.

John Faucet saith, he knew Margaret Ellwood, while she was the duke of Norfolk's servant, about two or three years; he never for herself too; or six witnesses against her of so unquestionable probity, that not so much as one of them could be impeached by the other party?

To pass now to the palpable unlikelihood of the story barely in itself; Ellwood was carrying company, she says, to see the lodgings at Windsor, and opening the door, she saw and heard as in her deposition. How came it, now, that none of this company should be produced, or so much as named to second Ellwood? For 'tis to be presumed, they must needs hear and see what passed upon this adventure, as much as she herself did; or if she had but named the woman, who, she says, told her my lady was not there, it might have served as a collateral inducement for the giving of some sort of credit to it. But in a matter of this importance, to have so many witnesses within reach of being found out, and none to appear, looks very ill on their part, that were so much concerned to produce them: and so for Germaine's threatening her, and the duchess's bidding him kick her down, no people in their right wits but would have tried to stop her mouth with fair words and a good bribe in such a case as this, rather than provoke her, by menaces and ill language, to run open mouth to the duke with the story, in revenge, when she had the duchess's honour and estate so absolutely at her mercy.

As to the business of Mr. Germaine's handkerchief and ruffles, and his being let out of the closet, the contrivance is all of the same piece with the rest; for why were not the persons named in her deposition produced to prove the particulars therein mentioned, as well as Ellwood? It is most certain, that the prosecutors could easily have done it, and that it was properly their business and interest so to do; for what signifies Ellwood's single testimony, under her circumstances, without corroborating proofs? She tells us a tale, of company to see the lodgings; a woman that told her so and so; and another woman and a gentleman that said and did this and that, and yet not one creature at last to second her deposition, nor any pretence of an exception to the evidence on the other side.

heard any scandal, or disgrace of the woman, but that she carried herself civilly; he knows not whether she kept an alehouse in Windsor.

Lawrence Purcell saith, he knows Margaret Ellwood, she lived in his house in Brooks-market, next Easter will be two years: he knows nothing amiss of her; she took care for her living; he never knew her keep ill hours; she took a room in his house, some of the rent is behind, he thinks thirty-two shillings, her husband and the woman gave him a bond for it.

Witnesses sworn on the behalf of the Duchess, for invalidating the Testimony of Margaret Ellwood.

Michael Haddon saith, he had been acquainted with Margaret Ellwood, four, five, six, or seven years: when he first knew her, her husband was a soldier in the duke's company, and she was, as he hath heard, an under housekeeper; he believes she was turned out of the duke's service; afterwards she sold drink in a house of his at Windsor, and went away in his debt by night, without paying him; she took her goods with her; this was in 1689.

Joyce Heath saith, she knows Margaret Ellwood; she lived in a cellar of her's, and in a back-house of her's, but not at the same time, three quarters of a year, in Brooks-market, about Michaelmas last; she paid the landlady but eleven shillings and sixpence: her course of life was not good; she was in an inferior condition, her husband was a cobbler in a stall, and she had five children.

Mary Trevis saith, she hath but a slender acquaintance with Margaret Ellwood; but the said Ellwood sent to borrow a scarf of her the Sunday after Christmas last; and saith, that going the next day for her scarf, she, the said Ellwood, desired it for a longer time, for it might be five pounds in her way, for she was to be a witness for the duke of Norfolk, who was to be divorced from his duchess, and that the duke sent his chariot for her: I told her there could be no separation in marriage, except adultery could be proved; and that I could not think it reasonable to believe, that so mean a servant as she could be a spectator to so ill an action as that was. She thought she could do the duke no kindness in going, for she never saw any other harm by the duchess, than that she saw gentlemen come to and fro to the house; but the duke had sent for her, and she must go.

Mary Jones saith, she knows Margaret Ellwood, who she heard say, the lady duchess sent for her a little before Christmas last, and said, Margaret, I desire you to speak the truth, I would not have you disoblige my lord in the least. Margaret Ellwood said, she never knew no harm by her grace. The duchess demanded the keys of her, and she gave them her; and the duchess gave them to her, the said Ellwood, again the next morning: The discourse was a few days before Christmas last.

wood, who came to her house, and told her, about two months since, that the duke of Norfolk sent for her to witness, for there would be a divorce between the duke and duchess; and I asking her what she could say, she answered she could say little, but that she knew no ill by the duchess; but that she was a good, generous spirited lady, and she never knew any ill action by her in her life; I bid her have a care what she went about, for that would do the duke but little kindness. The duchess, she said, called for the keys of her lodgings, but gave her them back the next morning. She saith, that last week she went to her to demand a debt, and she promised to come and pay it her. She saith, she went to the porter at the duke's to ask for her; but the porter said she was not within; but meeting with her child there, she said she was within, and brought her, the witness, to her in the duke's house, and she made her very welcome, and sent her husband with her, the witness, to see her children's lodging in the Green Mews, near the duke's house: She saith, Ellwood's husband told her, upon asking how the cause went, that his wife was to have 30*l.* per annum settled on her, and to go to Windsor to live, and to have the shewing the castle: She saith, that upon her going to see the children, and commending their lodgings, that Ellwood's maid, or woman, told her they paid four shillings a week for the lodgings: She saith, the children were well cloathed, with good frocks and top-knots, and they used to be ragged, and that her husband used to allow her but sixpence a day for her and her children: She saith, that Margaret Ellwood told her she had been with the duchess, and that her grace bid her do nothing to disoblige her lord, but speak the truth.

Mary Ross saith, she knows Margaret Ellwood; she saith, she heard Ellwood's husband say, that the duke of Norfolk had taken care of his wife and children and settled 30*l.* per annum on them, and her habitation was to be at Windsor Castle; and said, that my lord duke would be divorced, for he was to have a great fortune of 20,000*l.* a year: This discourse was the last week, and her father was present, and her mother was just gone out.

Thomas Hudson examined on the behalf of the duke of Norfolk, against the Duchess. (c)

Thomas Hudson saith, That the duke of Norfolk being at Portsmouth, he was butler at

(c) Observations upon Thomas Hudson's Evidence.

Hudson swears himself the duke's butler at Windsor. William Purchase swears that Hudson was never the duke's butler.

Hudson says, that they went to play, and that he over-heard Mrs. Gwin out of a closet, saying as in the evidence. Mrs. Gwin is a dead witness, and Hudson but a closet witness, which is little better; now Purchase says again, that Hudson was never suffered to Windsor, when Germaine, and the duchess, and Cornwall went to play; Germaine sent his footman for clean linnen, which he brought the next morning. Mrs. Gwin said to the duchess, the dog would have lain with me, but she would not lay the dog where the deer laid, for she knew my lady duchess would accept of him; after that, he saw a shirt and a waistcoat in the closet, which my lady's woman and Anne Burton took away. My lord being absent, we murmured amongst ourselves, that my lord was wronged: I told my lord; whereupon my master Cragg had me to my lord Peterborough's lodging, and threatened me, that he would prefer me to his brother Richards, who turned me off in Germany. This was, he thinks, in December, or September, 1685. Mrs. Gwin spoke this in the Green Room, and he was in a closet hard by, and the door open, and so heard it.

Witnesses sworn on the behalf of the Duchess, for invalidating the testimony of Thomas Hudson.

William Purchase saith, That he knows come into the room where the duke or duchess were at play.

Hudson says likewise, that the servants murmured amongst themselves, that my lord was wronged, and that he told my lord of it. Colonel Jacob Richards deposes, that he himself telling Hudson of a talk, that he had betrayed the duchess, and speaking of a noise of the adultery; Hudson made answer, that it was a false accusation, and knew nothing of it.

Now, as to Hudson's credit, he was colonel Richards's footman, who turned him off as a tricking fellow, and not fit to be trusted. Mr. Negus, the duke's servant, both then and now, was of the same opinion too, and advised by letter the putting of him away, as a dangerous fellow.

The story of Mr. Germaine's sending his man for clean linnen over-night, and the bringing it next morning, has little in it, even supposing the fact to be true. First, The order was given bare-faced, and consequently no mystery in it. Secondly, There was a set-company at play, and that was not an opportunity for a love intrigue. Thirdly, It is no new thing for people to sit up all night at play, and change their linnen next morning, without any offence to honesty or good manners, where they may have a privacy so to do it. And if my lady's woman and Anne Burton took away the shirt and waiscoat, as he says they did, there is no great hurt in that neither; though it is much to have three such confidants to such a secret, an under footman privy to the intrigue of Germaine's man going and coming, and raking in the women's closet among the linnen.

But still the only proper witnesses are kept behind the curtain: Anne Burton indeed is produced, and we shall see what kind of evidence she proves herself in the next place.

Thomas Hudson, who, he says, was never butler to the duke of Norfolk, either at Windsor, or any other place: He, the witness, was under butler himself, Reyner was butler in 1685, and the witness was under butler. He saith, Hudson waited on the gentleman of the horse and the steward; he was not the duke's servant, nor waited at the table that he knows of; he was never suffered to come into the room when the duke or duchess was at play. He saith, he, the witness, was not at Windsor at the time when the duke of Norfolk was at Portsmouth, but he was sent to Drayton in Northamptonshire, and was then the duke's servant as under butler; he knows not that Reyner was; he saith, he is now servant to the lord Peterborough.

Col. Jacob Richards saith, That he knows Thomas Hudson, he was his servant, he was recommended to him by Mr. Cragg, he was his footman; he believes he was in his service four months, he parted with him, because he found him a tricking fellow; he told him his brother Cragg was to be killed by one Curry, and another Irishman: He, the witness, writ to his brother Cragg, and he advised the witness to part with him, for he did not think him fit to be trusted in his travels; whereupon he paid him his wages, and gave him money to bear his charges to England, and sent a trunk by him. One Mr. Negus travelled with the witness; and his father, who then, and now lives with the duke of Norfolk, writ to us, that he did not think it fit for us to keep such a servant, for he was a dangerous fellow, or to that effect. Hudson never owned any thing of the adultery to the witness, but positively declared to him he knew nothing of it: This was in January, 1685. He saith, that Cragg writ him word, that Hudson must needs be a tricking knave. He negligently told the witness this of the adultery; curiosity made him ask it of him, for he had lived with the duke and duchess, and it was natural for him, the witness, to ask such a question. He saith, he believes Hudson saw some of his letters: He saith, there were printed papers in the trunk he sent, but nothing of any considerable value: He saith, Hudson never cheated him of any thing that he knows of: he hath trusted him with 100*l.* at a time: The trunk was delivered in England, and he believes he knew what was in it. He saith, that asking Hudson whether he knew any thing of the adultery charged on the duchess of Norfolk? Hudson said, he knew nothing of it. He, the witness, told him, that it was said, that it was he that had betrayed the duchess; he said, it was a false accusation, for he knew nothing of it.

Anne Burton saith, She was servant to the (d) Observations upon Anne Burton's Evidence.

Anne Burton has the story over again of duke and duchess of Norfolk: when the duke was gone to Portsmouth, she was at Windsor, when my lady went to London with Germaine. When my lady came home, after supper she was in great haste to go to bed; when she was undrest, she said she would lock us out, because she would not be disturbed before eleven o'clock the next morning, though the king and queen should come. Hudson told her Germaine was still in the house, whereupon we laid chairs on the back stairs, that we might hear him if he came down; the chairs were not removed the next morning; when Germaine's man came with linen, he said his master was there. My lady ordered a fire to be made in my lord's room, where, when she was come, Mrs. Nelly Gwin came in, and asked her how she liked her night's rest? And being asked for Germaine, she said she knew nothing of him. My lady complaining of her hair being out of order, Nelly answered, It was a hot night with her, enough to put her hair out of powder and curl too. Quickly after, Cornwall came in, and asked for Germaine; and my lady saying, she knew nothing of him, Nelly the shirt and waistcoat, and of Mrs. Gwin's discourse, to which enough is said already, and more needs not be said upon the evidence of a person so manifestly forsworn. In her first oath, she swears herself a single woman, and that she was never married; but upon witnesses appearing to prove the contrary, she was called to the bar again, and owned herself to be married, and that her husband's name was Benskin.

This Anne Burton had been a lodger sixteen weeks to Susan Wheatcroft, as appears by Wheatcroft's deposition; she conveyed her goods privately out of the house by parcels, and slipt away seven pounds fifteen shillings in her debt; she told Wheatcroft that she was to be a witness against the duchess, and that she should have money; her husband saying also, that his wife was to be a material witness against the duchess, and he himself should have a commission, and more than that too.

Mary Sheriff says, That pressing Anne Burton for three pounds that she owed her, her answer was, That she was to be a witness for the duke against the duchess, and that in a short time she should have money, and then she would pay her.

William Purchase swears, that about a year and half after the report concerning the duchess and Mr. Germaine, Anne Burton told him the duchess was wronged, and she hoped to see her accusers punished; and that he himself hath often spoke of this passage to several, and particularly to Mr. Welborne. Take notice, that these depositions for the duchess, as well as the former, have passed without any contradiction: that Germaine's man is neither produced nor named; the linnen (if any) brought as openly as it was sent for. No Mrs. Knifeton appears, and the whole deposition rests upon the credit of a forsworn woman.

Gwin said, I question not but he will come out by-and-bye like a drowned rat; with that, while I was cleaning the dining-room, Mrs. Knifeton called me, and shewed me in a closet Germaine's shirt and waistcoat, and afterwards making my lady's bed, saw there were two prints where two had laid. The shirt and waistcoat were sent by the duke to the lord Peterborough's: She saith she is a single woman, and was never married; this was about Bartholomew-tide, six years since: She supposeth the bed was stained both by a man and woman.

Witnesses sworn on the behalf of the Duchess, for invalidating the Testimony of Anne Burton.

Anne Burton against herself: Upon seeing several witnesses come in, to prove her to be a married woman, (though she had sworn the contrary), was called to the bar of the Lords, and there saith, She was not married when she was at Windsor; since that she hath been married. Anne Burton was her maiden name; her husband's name is Benskin.

Susan Wheatcroft saith, That she knows Anne Burton, and that she lodged in her house sixteen weeks, with her husband, Robert Benskin; and she said, she should have a parcel of money to be a witness for the duke of Norfolk, against his duchess; this was about March two years since. Her husband said, he should have a commission from the duke of Norfolk, and he should have a great deal more from him, for his wife is to be a material witness against his duchess. They did not pay her, the witness, when they went away, nor since; they owed her 7*l.* 15*s.*; she hath been seeking after them, and could not find them; she left a trunk with rags in it, and went away privately, carrying away her goods by parcels.

Mary Sheriff saith, That she lives next door to Warwick-house, in Holborn, and hath kept house there near seven years, and hath known Anne Burton two years; she lived with my lord Clare: While she was there a soldier courted her; they used to come every day for a fortnight or three weeks to her house to drink; she owed her about 3*l.*: She hath told her several times since, that she was to be a witness for the duke of Norfolk against his duchess, and she was to have money for speaking: She heard Mrs. Tod bid her always keep in a story, and she would do well: She, the witness heard them talk of 30 or 40*l.* Mrs. Burton should get by being a witness; she is not paid the 3*l.* nor knows not whether she shall be paid; but last winter she found her in Henrietta-street, and she desired her, the witness, not to take notice of her name, nor what she said to her, for she, the witness, should have her money in a short time, when the trial was over. She told her the same a little before that, when she lived at major Wildman's; she takes it to be this winter was twelvemonth; she thinks it was the duke of Norfolk's trial:

She, the witness, keeps a coffee-house, called Joe's coffee-house.

William Purchase saith, That he knows Anne Burton; she declared to him about a year and a half after the duchess was charged with lying with Mr. Germaine, that she knew nothing of it, and that the duchess was wronged as much as ever any woman was, and that she hoped to see those punished that were the cause of the accusation. He saith, he went to see her as a fellow-servant, and he was not sent by any one, and going to drink together, they fell into this discourse: He hath talked of this matter several times (particularly to Mr. Welborne) since this business was spoken of, having heard she was to be a witness against the duchess.

Simon Varelst examined on the behalf of the Duke of Norfolk, against the Duchess. (e)

Simon Varelst saith, That he was at Windsor to draw the duchess of Norfolk's picture about

(e) Observations upon the foregoing Evidence.

There needs no more to the overthrowing of Varelst's evidence, whatever, it is, than the testimony of John Rothmell, to prove him non compos; witness his outrage upon Rothmell, the fantastical freak of sending at midnight for six rods to whip his sister-in-law; and another fit, for a matter of six weeks, when Dr. Tenison made him several visits to compose him, his frenzy being so violent upon him, that he broke loose from his keepers in a frosty night, and ran up and down the streets in his shirt, till he was taken up by the watch. This is the sum of Rothmell's testimony, and not one word opposed either to the credit of the witness, or the truth of the depositions. But it may not be amiss, after all this, yet to speak a few words to the likelihood of what Varelst has here deposed.

Mr. Germaine came to see him, he says, with a letter from the duchess, which he read to him, and in the name of the lord and lady Peterborough, desired him to say, the shirt and waistcoat were his; but not one word all this while of the contents of the duchess's letter. He says again, that the shirt and waistcoat were known to be his; now if they were known to be Mr. Germaine's, what good could Varelst do by taking the matter upon himself; when he saw fair words would not do, there was a purse of gold offered him, and that would not work neither. The duchess and Mr. Germaine were wonderfully altered, sure, in this case, from what they were in the business of Owen and Ellwood; there was no purse of gold, or duchess's letter to smother the matter, but, on the contrary, Ellwood was threatened, provoked, and defied, instead of cajolling her. And what was all this for at last, but only to remove a jealousy, and most ridiculously, at the same time, to condemn themselves by a confession out of their own mouths, and improve the suspicion into a certainty. Can any six years since, and had the duke's closet to put the pictures in: When he had done, and had been at home two or three days, Germaine came to him much concerned, and said, You can do the duchess an extraordinary kindness, and will oblige the lord and lady Peterborough in the highest degree; then he shewed me a letter of the duchess to me, and read it to me: before that he told me there was a shirt and waistcoat, and they are known to be his: He said, I desire you to save the duchess's honour; I desire you will be so much a gentleman as to own them to be yours, and that you left them there: I answered, I was much concerned there should be such a trouble, but I desired to be excused, I could not do it without prejudice. He told me the lord and lady Peterborough had discoursed the duke of Norfolk upon it, and if it were owned but to be my linen, their discourse had wrought so much upon him, that if there came any evidence to assist them, he would leave off the pursuit. I refused still; he offered me a purse of gold, and told me I should make my fortune by it; but I still refusing, Mr. Germaine went away very much discontented: My wife being in the next room, over-heard the discourse between Germaine and me, and told it, and spoke of it, or else I had not been here now.

John Rothmell sworn a witness on the behalf of the Duchess of Norfolk, for invalidating the Testimony of Simon Varelst.

John Rothmell saith, That he lives in Crown-court in Covent-garden, and is a tailor: He saith, he knows Simon Varelst, and that he, the witness, married his half-sister: He saith, that about a quarter of a year after the business of the duchess happened at Windsor, he was at Varelst's house about eleven o'clock in the night, and Varelst locked the door, and told him, he had disparaged him by marrying his sister, and said, he would be his death, and drew his sword, and commanded him to strip, that he might slash him at his pleasure; and the said witness did strip for fear of his life, knowing his frenzy; and he struck the witness above a dozen times with his sword, and threatened still to have his life, if he, the witness, did not fetch his wife down that night, which was about twelve o'clock, and which was about six weeks after she lay in; and he was to bring her to be whipt, and to bring six body imagine that they would not have done more to have suppress Owen and Ellwood's evidence, than Anne Burton's, or Simon Varelst's, who swears farther, that his wife heard all this discourse betwixt Germaine and himself in the next room, and told of it? Why was she not produced then, or the persons to whom she told it? But Rothmell swears, that Mrs. Varelst said, the duchess had ill people about her, and was much wronged, and that she herself could clear her about the scandal of the linnen; so that it is plain, Mrs. Varelst was not an evidence for the present turn.

rods with him: Upon his, the witness's promise to do this, he let him go, and he hath not seen him since, but in the street. He had half a year before that been distracted for six weeks, and he, the witness, fetched Dr. Tenison to him once, and the doctor came several times afterwards to him. One night in that sickness, he got from the woman that watched him, and run about two hours in his shirt and waistcoat, in a frosty night, and cut his feet, and was brought home by the watch: He saith, his, the witness's wife, was to have been here this day as a witness, and was here, but not having an hour to reckon, and being ill, is gone home with her midwife: He saith, he never durst go near Varelst since he abused him: He saith, that Mrs. Varelst, after she came from Windsor, said, That the duchess had ill people about her, and that she believed her to be much wronged, and said, she could clear her about the scandal of the linen that was found; for whether it was, or was not Mr. Varelst's linen, she could do it; and said, supposing I had brought my husband's linen down to be washed, and the laundress fetching of it, she might take it up, and leave some of it behind.

Thomas Foster examined on the behalf of the Duke of Norfolk, against the Duchess. (f)

Thomas Foster saith, That he was coachman to Mr. Germaine, and carried the duchess of Norfolk often, about two years since, in his coach, and brought her home, and the footmen have had four half-crowns given them; and Marting, a Dutchman, his helper, called it hush-money: It was by night, against a light, that he saw her face in the coach; it was about seven or eight of the clock at night, about this time a-year; he had seen her face once in the day-time, she looking out of a sash-window, two stories high, in Mr. Germaine's house, in Park-street; he knows her face well enough; he hath seen her before, and since she was married.

Witnesses sworn on behalf of the Duchess of Norfolk, for invalidating the Testimony of Thomas Foster.

John Hall saith, that he lives at the Coffin in Tuttle-street, and is a joiner; he saith he hath known Thomas Foster two years; and that about three weeks since, they being drinking together, and talking concerning the duke and duchess of Norfolk, he said, Mr. Germaine had done ill things by him, in turning him off in Ireland, and in turning him off here; and he was resolved to be revenged of him.

(f) There is not one word in Foster's evidence, true or false, that is worth the hearing, only it is levelled, upon the main, at the duchess and Mr. Germaine, and John Hall gives the reason of it; for this same Foster, he says, was Mr. Germaine's coachman, who, he said, would turn him off, and he would be revenged of him. Hosea Grimsley testifies also, that some three days before Foster was turned away, he said, he thought it no more sin to kill his master, than to kill a louse. So that the evidence he gives, was grounded on the malice he bore his master for turning him off.

VOL. XII.

Hosea Grimsley saith, he lives with Mr. Germaine, and that he hath known Thomas Foster above a year and three months in Mr. Germaine's service; he heard him say, in the last week of December last, in Mr. Cook's house, about three days before he was turned away, that he thought it no more sin to murder his master, than it was to kill a louse; he saith he hath lived with Mr. Germaine about a year and a half, and that he never saw the duchess of Norfolk with him; and that he hath, ever since he came to him, lived with him in the place where he now lives: he saith, he never saw Mr. Germaine with a woman that was called the lady Bateman, nor knows any such name, or person.

Thomas Lloyd examined on the behalf of the Duke of Norfolk, against the Duchess. (g)

Thomas Lloyd saith, He knows one that went by the name of the lady Bateman, at her house at Vaux-hall; one Germaine, a wine-merchant, took the house; she came thither about Midsummer, 1689. She was off and on there until last Michaelmas. He hath seen the person that went by the name of the lady Bateman, and it is the duchess of Norfolk. Goodman was her chief man, and his real name is Reyner. Her brother, as was pretended, which he hath heard was Mr. Germaine, was the chief man that came there; sometimes he came once or twice a week, sometimes oftener; he is certain, as the servants said, it was captain Germaine that came there; every body said it was he: he knows him not by his name; by hearsay; if he could see him now, he could tell whether it was he; he believes Germaine was there every month in both the last summers; he cannot say that Goodman was ever there when Germaine was there; he saw him

(g) Lloyd's deposition is nothing at all to the purpose; or if it were never so pertinent, the falsities in it are sufficient to spoil it: for, in truth, his evidence, as to Mr. Germaine's being at Vaux-Hall, is only grounded upon hear-say and report, and yet he ventures to swear him to be there every month in both the last summers; and particularly, that he was several times there in May, June, July, and August, 1691. Whereas Alexander Herman swears, that Mr. Germaine went to Ireland in the summer 1690, on the last of May, or the first of June, where he stayed about four months, and that himself saw and served him there; and says farther, that he was at Brussels in May last. Anthony Morée says also, being Barber to Mr. Germaine, that he went beyond seas, and the campaign was almost over when he first shaved him, after he came back from Flanders, which is a flat contradiction to Lloyd's evidence.

several times there in May, June, July and August, 1691. Germaine's own hair was then pretty long: he cannot positively swear he was captain Germaine; he supposes, if he saw him now, he could know him.

Witnesses sworn on behalf of the Duchess of Norfolk for invalidating the Testimony of Thomas Lloyd.

Alexander Herman saith, That he served Mr. Germaine; he hath left his service a year and a half about eight weeks after he came from Ireland with the king; he served him a year and a half: Mr. Germaine was in Ireland with the king, in the summer, in the year 1690. He went to Ireland two days before the king that summer; he continued there four months: he believes he went the last of May, or the first of June; he came back with the king. He, the witness, served him all that while in Ireland, and saw him every hour and every day, and never stirred from him; he came from Ireland in the same ship with the lord Villers, the earl of Manchester, and Mr. Felton; and he went to Ireland in the Monmouth yacht, with the envoys of Holland and Brandenburg, and the marquis Mompavillon. He saith, Mr. Germaine was at Brussels in May last: he saw him there, and spoke with him there: he saw the lord Villers and the lord Lumley there with him; he lodged in the same tavern there with him, for four days, and saw him not after: he, the witness, coming then for England, left him there. He never knew him wear his own hair; his own hair is dark brown: he never knew him appear abroad without a wig; his hair is about half a finger long; he wore a fair perriwig: he saith, he, the witness, was quartered in a little tent behind him in Ireland; he could not stir but he heard him: he saith that four weeks after he saw him in Brussels, he saw him walking in St. James's Park.

Anthony Moree saith, He was barber to Mr. Germaine; the first time he shaved him was about five or six years since; his own hair is brown; he shaved his head very often; he shaved him before he went to Holland, and since he came home: he never saw his hair long enough to cover his ears; nor saw him ever wear his own hair, but a perriwig; he shaved him for a year and a half, before and since he went for Ireland; he shaved him always at his own house near the park: he or his man shaved him ever since he came from Holland to this day: he or his man shaved him the night before the king went for Holland: he saith, that Mr. Germaine, when he went away, said it would be a month or two before he should come back, but he knows not how long it was: This was at his house next door to the Cock-pit; he shaved him generally since the king came into England: he saith the campaign was almost done when he shaved him, after he came from Flanders.

The next witnesses produced by the duke of Norfolk, were Peter Scriber, Andrew Anderson, Robert Hemming, John Reynolds, and Margaret Foster. (h)

Peter Scriber saith, That he let an house, at Vauxhall, to Mr. Daniel Germaine, Midsummer was two years, viz. 1689, at 24*l.* per annum. He told him, that two ladies that were to come from Holland were to live there; one was Mrs. Bryan, the other the lady Bateman; they went by the name of Daniel Germaine's and captain Germaine's sisters. The ladies came to the house about ten days after it was let; one Goodman, that attended them, was off and on there all the time that the lady Bateman lived there, which was off and on till September last: this Goodman is the same man that was heard here the other day, as Henry Reyner; he remembers not, nor can be positive, that he hath seen captain Germaine there at any time; he cannot say he knows him; he hath not seen him seven or eight years. He saith, he, the witness, is generally absent in the day-time; Goodman, he saith, came off and on to the lady Bateman's, from the time she came thither till the time she went away.

Andrew Anderson saith, He knew one that went by the name of the lady Bateman a year and half ago, at Vauxhall, from last spring was twelve-months till near last Michaelmas, but hath not seen her since; he knew one that went by the name of Goodman that used the house; and that Goodman is Reyner: he knew a gentleman that lived by the Cock-pit, that went by the name of my lady's brother, which he used to take into his boat at Channel-Row, and carry to Mr. Scriber's house at Vauxhall. He carried him several times backwards and forwards; since Midsummer he hath carried him twice; he used to carry him to the back stairs of Scriber's house: the same day he fetched him, in the forenoon, from the parliament stairs, or Channel-Row, he carried him back in the afternoon: he had a light wig. He, the witness, hath carried wood from Scriber's house, from the person that went by the name of the lady Bateman, to the house by the Cock-pit; one Nicola used to receive it into carts, at the Wool-stable. This Nicola was, he supposes, servant to the gentleman that lives in that house on the other side the Cock-pit; he hath been at the door, but never in the house: he saith he bought the wood of the

These testimonies are all foreign to the charge against the duchess; her grace's being at Vaux-Hall, and the going under borrowed names, is all acknowledged, and the reasons already given; besides, the mistakes in them are so few and trivial, that it is not worth while to detect them.

bargemen, by the person's order that was called the lady Bateman.

Robert Hemming saith, He knew one that lived near the dye-house at Vauxhall, that went by the name of lady Bateman; he saith, he was gardener to the house near two years since, after Midsummer next will be three years; he knows not the lady, otherwise than by the name of lady Bateman; he hath seen gentlemen come there, but he knows not their names; he knew his servant Goodman; Mr. Knolles, that waited on the lady, and was chief gardener, paid him his wages; he knew Goodman by no other name.

John Reynolds saith, That he saw the lady that went by the name of madam Bateman, several times walking in her garden, living concealed; that is, she lived privately, and had but little conversation amongst her neighbours. The sixth of November last, being invited to dine at a friend's at Westminster, he met between the lord Peterborough's and the ferry, a lady whom he believed was the same lady Bateman; and because he would not be under a mistake, he enquired of one that followed her, and he told him, it was the duchess of Norfolk; his business is at the next door to Scriber's house: he hath seen a gentleman walk with the lady in the garden, that his, the witness's servants have told him, was Mr. Germaine; he hath known the lady live in that place above two years and half. He knew Goodman, that lived there, who now goes by the name of Reyner.

Margaret Foster saith, She knows one Nicola, he is Mr. Germaine's gentleman, that lives next house to the Cock-pit. Mr. Germaine hath lived there two years; her husband was his coachman; it is the Royal Cock-pit, in Park-street, or Carteret-street; Mr. Germaine sent for her on Sunday fortnight, to enquire for her husband, who, he told her, was a witness against him; and his brother (who was present) told her, that his brother did not send for her to bribe her, but to tell her husband he should not forswear himself, for there was a pillory.

Jane Wadsworth examined on the behalf of the Duke of Norfolk, against the Duchess. (i)

Jane Wadsworth saith, That she sold drink; and going into Mr. Germaine's house, a little

(i) Observations upon the Evidence of Jane Wadsworth.

Jane Wadsworth swears, She saw the duchess at Mr. Germaine's, and what discourse she had afterward with Herman, Mr. Germaine's footman, and that a Dutchwoman sent her up stairs for a pint pot, by which accident she saw the duchess: she says also, that she saw Welch Frank deliver a letter to Mr. Germaine. Frances Knight being produced, Wadsworth swears that is the woman that was called Welsh Frank, and that she saw her give another letter once to Mr. Nicola, Mr.

before the king went into Ireland, for a pint pot, she saw a Dutchwoman, who bid her go up stairs for it; and going up for it, she met the duchess of Norfolk in a night-gown, one side lapt over the other side, with Flanders-laced night-cloaths on her head, without a hood on: about two hours after, Herman, footman to Germaine, came into her house, and she saying to him, you have got the duchess of Norfolk at your house: he said, no duchess of Norfolk: I said it was she, for I had seen her some hundreds of times: he said, it was his master's lady, and his master's duchess, no

Germaine's gentleman; there are also four witnesses produced for her credit, that say they know no ill by her.

But then Grace Cook, on the other hand, swears, That Jane Wadsworth told her, that she thought she had seen the duchess at Mr. Germaine's; but was now satisfied that it was not she, and cursed herself and her children, if she would take her oath that it was the duchess; this was upon her receiving a subpoena, to appear and give evidence. Hosea Grimsley, John Hall, and Margaret Condry, were present at this discourse.

John Hall swears, That she said that she saw the duchess of Norfolk at captain Germaine's, but upon a farther sight of her, she finds she was mistaken.

Hosea Grimsley swears to the discourse, the very words of the curse, and the persons that were in company; all agreeing with the deposition of Grace Cook. Margaret Condry swears to the very same particulars.

Alexander Herman deposes, That he never saw Wadsworth in his master's house, nor ever had any discourse with her concerning the duchess; and he being a person turned away in disgrace from his master, would have made no scruple to publish any secret of that kind, at least, to swear the truth, when upon his oath.

Mary Pennington says, That Jane Wadsworth was her servant a while, but was not honest, and that she had filched some of her's and her husband's linnen, and was going away with it.

Frances Knight denies the knowledge of Wadsworth or any discourse with her: she never saw her at Mr. Germaine's, nor ever carried any letters thither.

But here are two witnesses brought in now to arraign the credit of John Hall, which is as much as to say, that they had no exceptions to any of the rest, or, which is all one, to the truth of the matter; for John Hall's evidence is by them confirmed over and over. And what is it that these two witnesses have to say at last? Henry Dagley says, that he believed it was the duchess he saw at Mr. Germaine's, but could not affirm it. And John Hoskins says, that they said it was the duchess, but he could not speak it of his own knowledge; which amounts to no more than a bare hear-say.

duchess of Norfolk; why should not my master have a duchess as well as the duke of Norfolk? She hath known Mr. Germaine three years next Midsummer, having lived there so long. Herman enquiring where I saw her, I said, upon the stairs; he told me, I should not have gone up the stairs: I told him, the Dutchwoman bid me go up; it was about eleven o'clock in the day-time that she saw her: he bid me say no more of it; for if his master knew it, he would kill the Dutchwoman. She saw Welch Frank, about two months since, deliver a letter to Mr. Germaine, and she hath seen her go to the house often; she hath known the duchess ever since, and before she was married.

Francis Knight (examined before for the duchess) being called in, the witness saith, This is the woman that was called Welch Frank, whom she hath often seen at Mr. Germaine's; she saw her, about the time the king came home from Flanders, give another letter to Mr. Nicola, Mr. Germaine's gentleman.

Witnesses produced by the Duke of Norfolk, to speak to the Credit of Jane Wadsworth.

John Prince saith, He hath known Jane Wadsworth twelve years, to be a good, honest, poor woman, and of good reputation, to the best of his knowledge; and that she takes care to maintain her family; he believes her to be an honest woman, and that she would not take a false oath; he knew her at the Horse-ferry, and in Carteret-street.

Emery Arguis saith, That he hath known Jane Wadsworth thirteen or fourteen years; he never knew her but of as good reputation as any in the parish; she is poor, but he believes she would not take a false oath.

Robert Elmes saith, That he hath known Jane Wadsworth twelve or thirteen years; he thinks her a very honest woman; he never heard but she was an honest poor woman, that endeavoured to live and maintain her family; she is of good reputation.

Charles Read saith, He hath known Jane Wadsworth twelve years, and something better; he never knew her to do an ill thing, but she was always a careful, industrious woman; he hath known her married all that time, and she never was a servant in that time.

Henry Dagley, senior, saith, That he hath known Jane Wadsworth sixteen or seventeen years; she was always a very civil woman, and he never heard other by her.

Witnesses sworn on the behalf of the Duchess of Norfolk, to the invalidating the Testimony of Jane Wadsworth.

Grace Cook saith, That she knows Jane Wadsworth; she hath lived near her four years; she came into the witness's house with a paper in her hand, and asked her, who left it? saying, she knew nothing of it: she said, that she had said, that she had seen the duchess of Norfolk in Mr. Germaine's house, but she had not seen her a great while, and now that she had seen her, she was satisfied that it was not her; and she wished, that she might burn in the fire, and never go home to her children, if she would take her oath of it. The paper was to warn her to this House; it was the first night the papers came out that she said this; Hosea Grimsley, John Hall, and Margaret Condry were present when she said this: she saith, she lives next door but one to Jane Wadsworth.

John Hall saith, That he hath known Jane Wadsworth above a year: About a fortnight since, she came into Mrs. Cook's, with an order in her hand, but knew not who left it; and said, she could say nothing to it: Mrs. Cook saying again, you must say something to it, else you had not had this order from the House; then she said, she had been at the duke of Norfolk's, and had told the duke, that she had chanced to go into captain Germaine's house for a pint pot, and she chanced to see the duchess of Norfolk; but she said she might be mistaken, for she had not seen her in seven years before, but she had seen her once or twice since she came out of France, and that was none of the duchess of Norfolk which she saw on captain Germaine's stairs; whereupon Hosea Grimsley asking her, if she were sure it was not she? she said, she was sure it was not; she wishing that she might burn, and never go home to her children, if she would swear it, for she could not swear it. Hosea Grimsley, Grace Cook, and two other women, were present in Grace Cook's house when this discourse happened, which was the very night the order came out. He saith, he wrought in Mr. Germaine's house; he saw twice or thrice ladies there in masks: one of the ladies in the mask gave order to take down a partition: she was reported to be captain Germaine's sister.

Margaret Condry saith, She knows Jane Wadsworth, who came into Mrs. Cook's the first time she was subpoenaed, and asked, who left the paper in her hand for her? she said, she went to Mr. Germaine's for a pot, and she thought she saw the duchess of Norfolk there; but she saw her since her coming from France, and was satisfied it was not her, and wished she might never see her children, and burn, if ever she saw her there.

Alexander Herman saith, That he knows Jane Wadsworth well; he never had any discourse with her concerning the duchess of Norfolk's being in Mr. Germaine's house; he saith, he hath drank often at Wadsworth's house, but he never had any discourse with her concerning the duchess of Norfolk, nor never saw this woman in his master's house in all his life: he waited on his master at table, and in his chamber, all the time of his service, which was a year and a half; he never saw a lady in a mask in his master's house.

Mary Pennington saith, That she knows Jane Wadsworth; she was her servant, but not long, for she was not honest. She, the witness, being gone out, at her return, she met her going away with her the witness's linen, and her husband's, bundled up : This is about 11 years since.

Frances Knight saith, That she knows not Jane Wadsworth, nor never discoursed with her, nor never saw her at Mr. Germaine's house, nor did the witness ever carry any letters thither.

Witnesses examined on the behalf of the Duke of Norfolk, against the Credit of John Hall.

Henry Dagley, junior, saith, That he knows John Hall ; he was a workman at Mr. Germaine's, when he, the witness, wrought there ; and Hall hath often said to him, that he believed it was the duchess of Norfolk that was there in the mask, and that gave him directions in his work there ; this was at Mr. Germaine's house in Park-street : he could not affirm it to be true, because she was masked, but really believed it.

John Hoskins saith, That John Hall was employed by Mr. Germaine, and a lady that was masked ; the lady was the first that ever shewed him his work what he was to do, and the first work he did was to take down a partition ; we talking amongst ourselves, that it was the duchess of Norfolk. John Hall has said, that that lady was the duchess of Norfolk ; not that he could say so of his own knowledge, but that he hath been often told it was so : he saith, that Hall told him, the day he the said Hall was examined here, that if he had been asked more, he could have said more.

Witnesses sworn on the behalf of the Duchess of Norfolk, intimating a seeming Reconciliation. (k)

Mrs. Judith Stourton saith, That she was servant to the duchess of Norfolk, when the (k) Observations upon the Depositions of Mrs. Judith Stourton, Edith Sawbridge, Elizabeth Camell, Mr. Matthew Scott, and Mr. Robert Welborne.

The reader will find this discourse about Mr. Germaine and the duchess, to be a scandal of a matter of six years standing ; Hudson, a cast footman, has sworn to the shirt and waistcoat, and that he immediately told my lord of it. Anne Burton swears likewise (with another false oath between her teeth) that this shirt and waistcoat were sent by the duke to the lord Peterborough's. It follows now to be noted, what course has been taken from the first to the last, for a thorough discovering of the truth of this matter, and how it comes to pass, that the thunderbolt should hang in the air so many years after the breaking of the cloud.

Mrs. Stourton is here upon her double oath, first under the shrift of the duke and my lord Peterborough, who took her privately, and adjured her, as ever she hoped to see God in Heaven, to declare what she knew as to the duchess being an adulteress ; she purged herself upon her hopes of salvation, that the report was of the duchess and Mr. Germaine, which was about a week before the duke and duchess went to France : she was asked by the lord Peterborough, in the presence of the duke of Norfolk, in the duke's house in St. James's-square (where they shut the door), as she would answer it to the face of Almighty God, if she did know whether his daughter was an adulteress : her answer was, That as she hoped to see God in heaven, the duchess was as virtuous as any woman alive, for aught she knew. She saith, that what she then said is true ; and if she should pretend to say more, she should wrong her. She saith, That no one was present, besides the lord Peterborough and the duke, when they examined her ; and that she saw no shirt or waistcoat at that time ; and that she doth not remember she said to Mrs. Webb any thing concerning the duchess and Mr. Germaine, and thinks she never spoke with Mrs. Webb ; and she was not at Windsor when the duke was at Portsmouth : she saith, there was a report of scandals, which she was sorry for.

Edith Sawbridge and Webb, produced on the behalf of the Duke of Norfolk, to discredit the Testimony of Mrs. Stourton (l) duchess was as virtuous as any woman alive for aught she knew : she swore the same thing over again at the bar of the House of Lords ; and being interrogated about the shirt and waistcoat before spoken of, she swore likewise, that she saw no shirt or waistcoat at that time.

(l) Edith Sawbridge was now produced against the credit of Mrs. Judith Stourton, and lays the stress of her evidence upon what Mrs. Knifeton said, which has been the very pinch of the question throughout the whole cause, and the prosecution has still been at a fault when it came to any material point ; that is to say, only the hear-say witnesses are produced, and those that can speak upon knowledge, and positively to the fact, are withdrawn, or concealed, contrary to the practice and reason of all judicial proceedings.

Mrs. Stourton is called in again to confront Edith Sawbridge, and denies every article in her deposition, one by one, that is of any moment ; but at the same time there appears no exception, on the other hand, to the credit of Mrs. Stourton : neither is it to be imagined that any woman should dare to swear false, in a case where two such witnesses should be privy to the perjury.

It follows now to be noted what course has been taken for a thorough discovery of this intrigue, according to the usual methods of honour and justice. The examination of Mrs. Stourton by the duke and my lord Peterborough, was as solemn, strict and private as the case required ; and it was while the clamour was fresh too : so that there was no the duchess of Norfolk, Mrs. Stourton came into her chamber, and she telling her what had happened at Windsor, Mrs. Stourton replied, this is nothing but what she expected before now: The witness replied, That if she, the witness, had been as near the duchess as the said time lost when they entered upon the scrutiny. It will be seen in that which follows, by what degrees the heat of this calumny cooled, and what brought it on again.

The duke and duchess went for France together, about a week after the breaking out of this clamour, and Elizabeth Camell waited upon the duchess, who swears, that they went lovingly together, and parted with tears on both sides; my lord telling her grace at parting, that he would fetch her away suddenly. They eat and drank together every day, and were frequently together in private; but she cannot say they lodged together. So that thus far, in all outward appearance, the misunderstanding seemed, in some measure, to be composed.

Mr. Scott speaks only to the matter of monies and accompts, which is little or nothing to the purpose in this place, except only as to the 125*l.* mentioned to be paid by him for the duchess's use; which was a quarterly payment out of 500*l.* per annum, adjudged, and ordered by the high-commission court to be paid to her, in lieu of alimony.

But Mr. Robert Welborne comes to the very merits of the cause, and the present state of the question. He deposes, That in November last the duke sent for him, and told him (among other things by the bye), that the duchess had some pretensions upon Castle-Rising, and also upon Billing; and thereupon ordered the witness to give her grace to understand, that if she would consent to the sale of those estates, and make the duke easy in that particular, let her but consider wherein he himself might make the duchess easy too, and upon those terms he would do it.

His grace told the witness farther, That there being one or two-and-twenty Catholic heirs to the family, before one Protestant heir, if (says his grace) I would bring a bill of divorce, (I do not say it to threaten her) I could obtain it on that account. The witness acquainted both the duchess and the lady Peterborough, the very same day, with the substance of this message, her grace taking it very heinously to be told of a divorce; and the next day the duchess shewed the witness a letter she wrote to the duke upon this occasion, declaring, that for Castle-Rising and Billing she would never part with them.

It appears from hence, That upon the examination of Mrs. Stourton, and other necessary enquiries into the grounds of this scandal, the violence of the first impression was so far taken off, that according to the evidence of Elizabeth Camell, my lord was pleased to treat the duchess with all instances of tenderness and respect, both upon their passage into France,

Mrs. Stourton, she would have prevented all this. To which Mrs. Stourton answered, Would you have had me whipt at the cart's-arse? The discourse we had was, that Mrs. Knifeton told her, when I came from London on Friday night, that she told me she was glad and upon the places there, those of the bed only excepted. In this state matters have continued some five or six years now, without any speech, or thought of a divorce, that ever the duchess heard of, until the middle of November last, in a message by Mr. Welborne from the duke, and that was but a certain condition neither: however it was improved afterwards into a bill, that upon the 7th of January following was formally brought into the Lords house.

The reader will need no other light to a true understanding of the strait her grace was in upon this surprise, and the disadvantages she was exposed to, than what he has here before him, in the order of the journal itself: where he will find the duchess so scanted for time to produce witnesses, and prepare her defence, that it was a wonderful providence she should do so much as she did; though in the mean while, her grace has lost the benefit of several considerable witnesses, for want of time to find them out, and bring them together. Now as for Mr. Welborne's deposition, it carries the countenance rather of a treaty than an accusation; the duke's part is only a calm, deliberate discourse, consulting the reciprocal ease both of himself and the duchess. Terms are proposed and promised, and not one word or glance of reproach from one end to the other of it. Mr. Welborne, (upon the duke's asking him, at the Lords bar, if by his discourse he understood an inclination to live with the duchess) it is true, did not gather from his words, as if he had any thought of living with her; the only hard thing said, was that about his catholic heirs, which seemed to turn the case of adultery into a case of religion. Let any creature judge now, whether the duchess durst to have stood it out thus, if she had been guilty of so foul a crime, when she might have been safe and free, as appears by the proposal, upon terms so much more easy.

To make a short summary now of the whole, a word first to the character and quality of the witnesses.

There is Owen, a street-porter, brought in as a witness to the privacies of the duchess's bed-chamber, besides several unanswerable exceptions to the particulars of his evidence. There is Ellwood, a cobbler's wife, and a jilting little slut, that is as palpably detected of falsity as the other. Hudson, a poor tricking footman, that was turned off for his ill behaviour. Burton, a beggarly wench, that cheated her landlady, and forswore herself in this cause at the Lords bar. Varelst, a painter, and by intervals a madman. Foster, a coachman that was turned off by his master, and swore to be revenged of him. Lloyd, under several manifest mistakes, but nothing to the main cause.

I was come, for she expected her throat to be cut every night since my lord duke went to Portsmouth; I asked her the reason of her fear; she answered, Germaine had laid with my lady duchess ever since my lord duke went to Portsmouth; that when he came home he would hear of it, and he would kick her for a bawd; and if she should tell my lord, Germaine would cut her throat. I bid her have a care what she said, for these were dangerous words: How can you prove this? she said, it was very true. The witness asked her (Mrs. Knifeton) how she knew this? She said, Germaine, instead of going home, went into the closet: The witness cannot say, that she said all this to Mrs. Stourton, but the greatest part she did say. Mrs. Stourton said, this was nothing but what she expected before. This was the Tuesday after my lord duke came from Portsmouth; this was about Bartholomew-tide, in the first year of king James's reign.

Mrs. Stourton called in, to confront this Edith Sawbridge, and examined.

Mrs. Judith Stourton further saith, That she saw Mrs. Sawbridge once in the duke's house in St. James's-square, and they talked of the slander of Germaine and the duchess of Norfolk: she saith, she, the witness, never heard Mrs. Sawbridge say, that Mrs. Knifeton Scriber, Anderson, Hemming, Reynolds, and Margaret Foster, say not one word to the purpose. Wadsworth, a pilfering servant, that robbed her mistress, and her evidence most notoriously exposed.

Now, as these witnesses are of very little value upon the stock of their own credit, so the witnesses against them cannot be denied to have a fair reputation, on the other hand. And it is very extraordinary, that after the naming of so many persons in their depositions, that said, or did, or heard, or saw this; that the prosecutors have not brought in so much as one creature to second the swearing evidence; though it is sufficiently known, they could have found them, if they would have ventured the cause upon that stress. It is to be considered once more, what a difference there has been betwixt the demeanour of the one side and the other, towards the evidence. What promises, flatteries, and engaging obligations on the one hand, and not so much as one word or deed, directly or indirectly, that looked like a practice or a prepossession on the other part of the duchess.

should say, that Germaine laid with the duchess every night at Windsor: she denies that she said to Mrs. Sawbridge, that she expected to hear that before now; she never said to Mrs. Sawbridge, would you have had me whipt at the cart's-arse? She saith, she remembers not that Mrs. Sawbridge told her, that Mrs. Knifeton said, that she was afraid that her throat would have been cut when the duke was at Portsmouth: she remembers not that she asked Mrs. Sawbridge the reason of Mrs. Knifeton's fear, or that she told her any thing of Mrs. Knifeton saying, that Mr. Germaine had laid with my lady every night at Windsor: she saw Mrs. Sawbridge, and discoursed with her; but she cannot say what discourse she had with her.

Mrs. Elizabeth Camell saith, That she went with the duke and duchess of Norfolk into France; they went together very lovingly, and parted so: she thinks the duke staid with her about a fortnight; the duke's eye was ill, and my lady went often to him; and when she did so, we retired: my lady drest his eye; they eat and drank together every day; they did not lodge together that she knows: my lord told her at parting, at the grate in the monastery, that he would fetch her away suddenly; and they parted kindly: Mrs. Lawson was in the monastery with the duchess, the witness continued there about seventeen months; my lord exprest a great deal of kindness to my lady in going, and while he was there; there were tears on both sides at parting: when my lord and lady were together in the house called l'Hotel de Terrau, in Paris, we used to withdraw, not knowing what they had to say together.

Mr. Matthew Scott saith, That he paid several sums to the duchess from the duke: in May, 1688, he paid 125*l.* for the duchess to Mr. Cragg: he paid 2 or 300*l.* into France, when the duke and duchess were there: he cannot say that he remitted any money into France after the duke came home: he knows not that any money was paid to Mr. Mourton for my lady by the duke's order.

Mr. Robert Welborne saith, that about the middle of November last, the duke of Norfolk sent for him by Mr. Scott, to meet his grace in his room, by the Lords house, which accordingly he did: his grace told him, there had been some messages and proposals by sir Robert Clayton and sir Robert Howard; but he looked on them both to be men of great business, and could not attend on such matters, and therefore he sent for him, knowing him to be willing to do any services between them. The first thing his grace desired, was to acquaint his wife, and the lady Peterborough, and he thinks he named the lord Peterborough, that he expected to be indemnified from the duchess's equipage; for, says he, I hear she is setting up for a great equipage, and I desire to be free from being obliged to pay for any of that: he told his grace, that he thought he was misinformed, for all the equipage he saw, was a coach, coachman, two footmen, a pair of horses, and two or three more servants. But, says his grace, I formerly paid money for her to one Mourton, and should be unwilling to do so again. I presume, my lord duke, said he, that was a debt contracted while your grace and the duchess lived together. But, says his grace, pray do you acquaint them of it, for this is what I expect.

Next, says his grace, my wife has some pretensions upon Castle-Rising, which I could sell without her consent, by losing two thousand, or two thousand five hundred pounds: and besides, I find she hath also a pretension upon Billing, which I never knew till very lately, when I was upon selling of that reversion; but I should have been an ill man to pretend to do that, if I had known of any such incumbrance; therefore, I would have you tell my wife, that if she will consent to the sale of those estates, and make me easy in that particular, let her consider wherein I may make her easy, and I shall do it: I know she was a great lover of Drayton, and I suppose is so still; and she did once offer me a considerable sum of money for my life in it: therefore let her consider of this matter, and if she can propose any thing for her ease and quiet, on these terms I shall comply with her.

I do not say it to threaten her: but I am told, that for the reason of there being either one and twenty or two and twenty Catholic heirs of my family, before one Protestant one, if I would——(here his grace stopt,) says his grace, you understand me: making no answer, his grace was pleased to say again, if I would bring in a bill of divorce, I should obtain it on that account. He told his grace he would be sorry to hear of any such thing; but in obedience to his grace's commands, he should acquaint the duchess with it. Accordingly he did, the same day, and lady Peterborough both. Her grace was very angry at the message, especially at that part that mentioned a divorce; and he was sent the next morning to Mr. Scott, to desire him to acquaint the duke, that as he was my lord Peterborough's servant, it was not fit for him to receive nor bring such messages: but if his grace had any thing to say, it was most proper by a servant of his own, or to send for one of her's. I carried the message the next morning to Mr. Scott, and at my return home, the duchess shewed me a letter she had writ to the duke to the same purpose, and which was sent to his grace, but not by him; the duchess did declare, when he proposed the sale of Castle-Rising and Billing, as the duke had desired, that she would never consent to it. By any of this discourse it did not appear to him that the duke shewed any inclinations to live with the duchess, nor did he understand it so.

The evidence being ended, after a long debate thereon, the question was put:

'Whether the Bill, intituled, an Act to dissolve the marriage of Henry duke of Norfolk, Earl Marshal of England, with the lady Mary Mordant, and to enable the said duke to marry again, shall be read a second time?'

It was resolved in the negative.

MATTH. JOHNSON, Cler'. Park.

370. The Trial between HENRY Duke of NORFOLK, Plaintiff, and JOHN GERMAINE, Defendant, in an Action of Trespass on the Case, at the Court of King's-Bench, at Westminster: 4 WILLIAM & MARY, A. D. 1692.

THE Declaration was in Trinity Term, the 4th of William and Mary, king and queen. To which the defendant pleaded not guilty within six years. And it is replied, That it is within six years; whereupon issue was joined, and a Jury of twenty-four knights and esquires being returned, twelve did appear at the bar, and were sworn, viz. sir Michael Heneage, of St. Andrews, Holborn; sir Thomas Grantham, of Sunbury; sir Charles Humfrevill, of Westminster; sir William Hill, of Teddington; Ralph Hawtry, of Ryslip, esq.; Robert Sheffield, of Kensington, esq.; John Pagett, of Drayton, esq.; Hugh Squire, of Westminster, esq.; John Coggs, of St. Clement Danes, goldsmith; Charles Pryor, of Highgate, esq.; Richard Craddock, of Hornsey, esq.; and William Withers, of Cripplegate, esq.

After the Jury were sworn, the counsel for his grace the duke opened the cause.

Mr. Banister. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, this is an action brought by Henry duke of Norfolk, against one John Germaine. The plaintiff sets forth, That the first of April, in the second year of the reign of the late king James, the defendant did, by unlawful ways and means, entice away his duchess, by which means he had not the benefit of her society; and, by lascivious conversation, committed adultery with her, and caused her to commit adultery: And this he layeth to his damage 100,000*l*. If we prove that he did so, we hope you will give us good damages and costs.

Att. Gen. (Sir John Somers). May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, this is a very melancholy thing to be told; yet it is fit the age we live in may know it, so as the offender may be punished. The duke of Norfolk is the first duke in England; installed knight of the most noble order of the garter; lord high marshal of England, and one of the lords of their majesties' most honourable privy council: and he to be thus abused, perhaps none found any such cause to come before any court. It is a hard thing, as this case is, for us to produce strong and pregnant evidence: but our proofs are such, as I am ashamed to repeat them; but desire the witnesses may tell your lordship, and the gentlemen of the jury, what they know. It was not kept secret, but it was known so publicly, as all the kingdom did ring of it; and how the defendant had the duchess frequently to his house; and how they lived in adultery: My lord, we will take that method that is most plain; therefore it will be necessary to give your lordship an account of something of the beginning of this matter.

L. C. J. (Holt). As to the time.

Serj. Tremain. They would make this a sort of a running account.

Sir W. Williams. It must be within six years; before the 26th of May last, if they will prove any adultery; before, it is nothing.*

L. C. J. If the witnesses be not heard, it is impossible to tell whether it be within the statute of limitation.

Just. Eyres. If we hear it, and find it out of time; then when we have heard it, we can tell the jury how it is, whether it be within the time; and they are to take notice, if they open evidence that goeth beyond six years, I hope your lordship will not suffer them to do that.

Serj. Thompson. Here are anticipations, directions, and what not.

Att. Gen. We will call our witnesses, if your lordship please.

Court. Rowland Owen, do you know the duchess of Norfolk?—Owen. Yes.

Att. Gen. Do you know John Germaine?

Owen. Yes, very well.

Att. Gen. Pray tell my lord and the gentlemen of the jury what you know of him.

Owen. I have seen him several times dine and sup at my lord duke's house.

Att. Gen. Tell what familiarities you have seen pass between the duchess and Germaine.

Owen. I was ordered by one Henry Reyner, to go down to Whitehall with plates and a table-cloth, and he would go to the Blue Posts for some things, and there was a supper to be that night: then to go down to Whitehall: when I came there, at my lord duke's apartment, I opened the door, and afterwards going into a room, I saw Mr. Germaine and the duchess in bed together; and the duchess pushed me out, and asked me how I durst be so impudent as to come in, and chide me.

L. C. J. Who chide you?

* If the action for crim. con. be trespass, the limitation will be 4 years; if case, 6 under 21 Jac. c. 16. It seems to be considered to be case (Cooke v. Sayer): but in either way of considering it, the plea of 'not guilty within 6 years,' not being specially demurred to, is a good bar. Macfadzen v. Olivant, 6 East, 387.

Att. Gen. He saith, my lord, the duchess of Norfolk.

Serj. Tremain. Pray when was this?

Owen. About seven years since.

Serj. Tremain. Owen, you speak of something of a supper, and that you went down to Whitehall; who gave you the key?

Owen. One Henry Reyner.

Sir Tho. Powis. What, are you a street-porter?—Owen. I was usher of the hall.

Att. Gen. You were servant to the duke, were you not?—Owen. Yes.

Sir Tho. Powis. Were they at supper that night?—Owen. I cannot tell.

Sir Tho. Powis. You carried down plates?

Owen. Yes.

Sir Tho. Powis. This you say was seven years ago; who did you tell it to?

Owen. To the housekeeper.

Sir Tho. Powis. Who was she?

Owen. One Mrs. Webb.

Sir Tho. Powis. Did you tell nobody else?

Owen. No, indeed, I will not lie.

Att. Gen. We will call another witness. Margaret Ellwood, do you know the duchess of Norfolk?—M. Ellwood. Yes, my lord.

Att. Gen. Do you know John Germaine?

M. Ellwood. Yes, my lord, about seven years since; but I do not know whether I know him now.

Att. Gen. Pray tell my lord and the jury what you know.

M. Ellwood. It was my business, being house-keeper, to look after my proper affairs, and I being called down, I saw my lady and Germaine; and saw my lady in an ill posture upon the stools, and my lady said to Germaine, 'Kick her.'

Serj. Thompson. Tell how you saw her.

M. Ellwood. Why, when I saw her, I saw her bare knee, and Germaine was near to her; and then I came away, she being angry, and so he came from her.

Court. Were his breeches down?

M. Ellwood. His breeches were down, and his hat and sword lay upon the table.

Att. Gen. What posture was the duchess in?

M. Ellwood. I saw her bare knee, and he—

Att. Gen. Was she lying down?

M. Ellwood. Yes; and the Saturday after I did see Mr. Germaine come in, and he laid his hat on the table, and unbuttoned himself, and went to bed to her.

L. C. J. How do you know that?

M. Ellwood. I opened the drawing-room door, and looked through the key-hole of the other door where they was, and saw them go to bed.

L. C. J. How do you know he was in bed with her?

M. Ellwood. Why I saw them, for there was a wax candle in the chamber, and I could see them easily.

L. C. J. What time was this you say you saw them in bed? Had they no curtains?

M. Ellwood. Yes, my lord, they had; though they were drawn on both sides the bed, they left them open at the foot.

Court. Did you ever pretend this before?

M. Ellwood. Yes, I did.

Court. Did you ever swear this before?

M. Ellwood. Yes, my lord, in the parliament I did.

Sir Tho. Powis. You have lived in several places since; did you never tell any body's servant?

M. Ellwood. To nobody but Mrs. Webb: and my lady gave orders next morning, that I should be put away; but I heard no more of it; but I staid.

Att. Gen. Do you know any thing else?

M. Ellwood. I was making my lady's bed with one Anne Burton, and I found Mr. Germaine's handkerchief and ruffles in the bed, at one time.

Att. Gen. Do you remember any shirt and waistcoat that was found?—M. Ellwood. Yes.

L. C. J. Did you find his handkerchief and ruffles in my lady's bed?—M. Ellwood. Yes.

L. C. J. Did you never see him come down stairs?—M. Ellwood. No, my lord.

L. C. J. It is very much you never saw him come down stairs.

M. Ellw. We set traps for him to fall over; but he never came down to fall over them.

Serj. Tremain. Do you know any thing but in the first year of king James?

M. Ellwood. No, my lord, not I.

Att. Gen. We will call another witness, Mrs. Benskin. I think, Mrs. Benskin, you are married?—Mrs. Benskin. Yes.

Att. Gen. Pray tell my lord and the jury what you know.

Mrs. Bens. My lord, I was house-maid and servant to the duchess, in the first year of king James's reign: about Bartholomew-tide, my lady the duchess went to London with Germaine, Nell Gwin, and some others, and we did not expect them to come home that night, but she did, and after they went to supper, after that they went to cards; and then my lady duchess had a great mind to go to bed, and bid us to make her a fire, and so we did; and my lady went to bed, and said, Though the king and queen should send for me, I would not rise till 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. So the candles were put out, and two footmen stood to wait because Mr. Germaine used to be generous to the servants; and they waited until two o'clock in the morning. I asked them whether Mr. Germaine had come down? and they said, No, for they had been there all the while; and if he came, he could not go, for they said, We have laid chairs and stools in the way, that if he come, he might fall over them; and the next morning I saw a man with a paper-box in his hand, and he asked me for Mr. Germaine's chamber, or lodgings; I told him I knew none he had there. My lord, the next day my lady duchess ordered me to make her a fire, and Mrs. Knifeton was combing her head, and Nell Gwin came in, and said, Good morrow to your grace; how did you rest last night? she said, very well. Then colonel Cornwall came in, and said to my lady duchess, How doth Mr. Germaine do? And she said, Why do you ask me? And col. Cornwall said, He did not lie at home last night. Then Nell Gwin said, We shall see him come out by and-bye like a drowned mouse. And so I went to make my lady duchess's bed, and found a handkerchief and ruffles. And Mrs. Knifeton came and said, Come hither, and I will shew you a sight: and when I came there lay a shirt and waistcoat, and I took them away, because it was a place where any body, as they came, might see them. And my lord duke was not in town.

Att. Gen. How came you to take notice of the ruffles and handkerchief?

A. Bens. Why, Mrs. Knifeton said it was a man's ruffles.

Sir T. Powis. How long was this since? In 1685? Had there not been an appeal?

A. Bens. Yes, there was.

Serj. Birch. Was there any thing remarkable in the bed?—A. Bens. The bed was stained.

Sir T. Powis. What is your name now, Benskin?—A. Bens. Yes.

Sir T. Powis. What was your name?

A. Bens. Burton.

Sir T. Powis. Was you ever married?

A. Bens. Sir, you know I could have no other name if I were not married.

Sir T. Powis. You have lived in several places.—A. Bens. I have lived with my lord of Clare, and my lord Ferrers.

Serj. Birch. Did Germaine go by any other name than he goeth by now?

A. Bens. Not as I know of.

Att. Gen. My lord, we will call another witness. Thomas Hudson, do you know the duchess of Norfolk and Mr. Germaine?

Hudson. Yes.

Att. Gen. Pray what did you observe betwixt the duchess of Norfolk and Germaine?

Hudson. Sir, I was a servant to Mr. Scroggs that was the duchess's steward, and so he going away upon other business, I was left butler at Windsor, and there came two captains to play at cards; one captain asked if Mr. Germaine was there? I told him, no. Now his man, as I heard after, had brought Germaine a shirt and waistcoat, for as soon as his man was gone, we found the waistcoat and foul shirt: and the same day the duchess treated the queen at Windsor.

L. C. J. When was this?

Hudson. It was in the year 1685.

Sir T. Powis. Was this in the year 1685?

Hudson. Yes, it was so, for I took it down in my book.

Mr. Jones. Did you swear all this before the House of Lords?

Hudson. Yes; but only the day of the month I could not well remember then: but I refreshed my memory since.

Serj. Thomp. We will call Mrs. Hastings and Elizabeth Knave. Mrs. Frances Hastings, Do you know the duchess of Norfolk, or Mr. Germaine?

Mrs. Hastings. I knew nothing of them, but that they lay at my house.

Att. Gen. Did you know Mr. Germaine?

Mrs. Hastings. I saw him but once.

Att. Gen. Did you ever see Mr. Germaine lie at your house?—Hastings. Yes.

Att. Gen. When?

Hastings. The first year of king James's reign.

Att. Gen. How long?

Mrs. Hastings. A whole summer.

Att. Gen. We will call another witness. Elizabeth Knave, did you ever live with Mrs. Hastings?—Elizabeth Knave. yes.

Att. Gen. How long?

Eliz. Knave. A whole summer.

Att. Gen. Did you ever see the Duchess of Norfolk?—Eliz. Knave. Never.

Att. Gen. Did you ever see the duchess of Norfolk and Mr. Germaine together?

Eliz. Knave. No, but Mr. Germaine's servantsaid it was the duchess of Norfolk that was with Mr. Germaine; and as he and I were making the bed, I found a handkerchief, marked with an M, and a coronet.

Att. Gen. In whose bed was this?

Eliz. Knave. Why, it was in Mr. Germaine's bed.

L. C. J. How long since?

Eliz. Knave. In the first year of king James's reign.

L. C. J. Woman, did you find the handkerchief?—Eliz. Knave. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. What mark had it?

Eliz. Knave. An M and coronet.

Serj. Thompson. You see how far we are gone.

L. C. J. All without the statute.

Serj. Thompson. We shall shew your lordship, and the gentlemen of the jury, that my lady duchess went by the name of my lady Bateman, and Mr. Germaine went by the name of her brother; and that he did take a house at Vaux-hall, over the water; the man's name was Scriber, and she lived in that place for threequarters of a year and more; and then Mr. Germaine came constantly to her: and it was known to be the duchess of Norfolk, though she went by another name, and her servant, Henry Reyner, also: This Reyner was he, that the first witness swore gave him a key to her chamber at Whitehall.

[Henry Reyner did not appear.]

Att. Gen. Peter Scriber, pray do you know one Mr. Germaine?—Scriber. Yes, Sir.

Att. Gen. Pray, did he come to take any house of you?—Scriber. Yes, Sir.

Att. Gen. How long since?

Scriber. About two years since.

Att. Gen. Who did he take it for?

Scriber. He told me for a couple of ladies that came from Holland, as he told me.

Att. Gen. By what name went they?

Scriber. One by the name of Mrs. Bryan, another's name was madam Bateman.

Att. Gen. Did you know any gentleman, called Mr. Germaine, that lived near the Cock Pit?

Scriber. Indeed, Sir, I know not where he lived: I have seen one walk in the garden, that went by the name of the lady Bateman's brother.

L. C. J. Where is your house?

Scriber. At Vauxhall.

L. C. J. Who paid you the rent?

Scriber. One half year, my lord, was paid by my lady Bateman.

L. C. J. What servants had she?

Scriber. She had one that went by the name of Goodman.

Att. Gen. We will call another witness. Thomas Lloyd, Do you know the lady Bateman and Mr. Germaine?—Lloyd. Yes, Sir.

Att. Gen. How often have you seen Mr. John Germaine at Vauxhall?—Lloyd. Often.

Att. Gen. Who was this lady Bateman?

Lloyd. The duchess of Norfolk.

Att. Gen. How do you know that?

Lloyd. Because I have seen her coming out of the House of Lords; and they said it was the duchess of Norfolk.

Att. Gen. Are you sure of that?

Lloyd. Yes, Sir.

Att. Gen. Did you know one Goodman?

Lloyd. Yes, Sir.

Att. Gen. What is he?

Lloyd. I know not, but I heard after, his name was Reyner; but when he waited on the lady Bateman, he went by the name of Goodman. Before Michaelmas last was twelve month, I saw Mr. Germaine that summer walking with the lady Bateman.

Sir W. Williams. You say you saw Mr. Germaine walking that summer with the lady Bateman. What summer was that?

Lloyd. Yes, that summer was twelvemonth.

Sir W. Williams. Are you sure it was within two or three years?

Lloyd. Yes, that I am sure it was.

Sir W. Williams. Was it the beginning or ending of the summer?

Lloyd. It was about the heighth of summer.

Att. Gen. We will call other witnesses; one Robert Hemingway. Where do you live?—Hemingway. At Vauxhall.

Att. Gen. Do you know one that went by the name of the lady Bateman?

Hemingway. Yes.

Att. Gen. And you are sure that she went by the name of the lady Bateman: Is she duchess of Norfolk?—Hemingway. Yes.

Att. Gen. Do you know one Goodman, that waited upon the lady Bateman?

Hemingway. Yes.

Att. Gen. Was that his right name?

Hemingway. No, his name was Reyner.

L. C. J. Where did you see her?

Hemingway. Near her father's house, my lord Peterborough's.

L. C. J. Why, how did you know this was the duchess of Norfolk?

Hemingway. Why all that ever I knew said she was so.

Att. Gen. Where did you see the duchess of Norfolk?

Hemingway. I have seen her in the house, and out of the house of lord Peterborough.

L. C. J. What occasion had you to observe her?

Hemingway. I have seen her at her father's house by the Millbank.

Att. Gen. He was a gardener employed there. We will call another witness. Andrew Anderson, do you know the duchess of Norfolk?

Anderson. Never otherwise, but by the name of the lady Bateman.

Att. Gen. Do you know a lady that went by the name of the lady Bateman?

Anderson. Yes.

Att. Gen. Do you know one Mr. Germaine?

Anderson. I never knew his name; but he went by the name of my lady's brother: I have carried him oft-times by water to Vauxhall.

Att. Gen. Have you carried that gentleman that lived next door to the Cock-pit by water to Vauxhall?—Anderson. Yes.

Att. Gen. What name did he go by?

Anderson. By the name of my lady's brother.

Att. Gen. What is his name? or what name doth he go by now?

Anderson. You know very well.

Att. Gen. Have you carried any wood from Vauxhall to the Cock-pit?—Anderson. Yes.

Att. Gen. From whence?

Anderson. From my lady Bateman.

L. C. J. When you did carry him by water, where did you take him up?

Anderson. Sometimes, my lord, at Channel-Row, sometimes at one place, and sometimes at another.

Att. Gen. My lord, he saith, he carried from Vauxhall some wood, and it came over, and it was carried to the Cock-pit.

L. C. J. When you saw him then, by what name did he go by?

Anderson. I never knew him then but by the name of my lady's brother.

L. C. J. What name goeth he now by?

Anderson. Germaine: all that know his name know it to be Germaine.

Att. Gen. Did you know one that went by the name of Goodman, that lived at Vauxhall with this lady Bateman?

Anderson. I knew not but that was his right name then; but now I hear his right name is Reyner.

L. C. J. When you did carry him by water, where did you carry him?

Anderson. My lord, sometimes to one place, and sometimes to another, as I am commanded: I must observe.

Att. Gen. My lord, we will prove that the duchess hath been several times with Germaine at the Cock-pit, and that Germaine hath gotten a private door into the Cock-pit yard, and so into the Park, for which he pays forty shillings per annum.

Att. Gen. Mr. Bradbury, where do you live?

Bradbury. I live next door to Mr. Germaine's.

Att. Gen. Where is that?

Bradbury. By the Park wall, next door to the Cock-pit.

Att. Gen. Tell my lord, and the gentlemen of the jury, how it was he had a door.

Bradbury. Why, Mr. Germaine had no way where he could go into the Park, so he spake to my man, that he might have a privilege to go through my door into the Park; so I ordered my man to give him, or his servants, passage. About a year after, he sent a workman to me, that he might make a door out into the Park, and I did agree with him for a buck, or forty shillings in money, which he pleased; and so a door was made; but since he hath gotten a door himself into the Park.

Att. Gen. John Dagley, pray give an account of what you know of the duchess of Norfolk, and Mr. Germaine?

John Dagley. I was at work there, and I saw a gentlewoman going to and fro, up and down stairs, and I asked, who that was? And I was told it was the duchess of Norfolk.—There was a brave curious bed, and I was saying to some of the house, that it was a very fine bed; and asking what it might be worth, they said it cost seven hundred pounds: and I was then just married; said I (I have a mind to bring my wife hither, and give her a flurt upon it); and we laid all our heads together as if we were settling the nation; and then they said, that bed was for the duchess of Norfolk; and I saw a person there, who they said was the duchess of Norfolk.

Serj. Birch. Richard Owen, do you know Mr. Germaine at the Cock-pit?—Owen. Yes.

Att. Gen. What company have you seen with him?

Owen. Why, I saw a lady in a mask I may say a hundred times.

Att. Gen. How often?

Owen. I may say a hundred times in a mask, looking about: another time, I saw my lord duke of Norfolk walking among the trees in the Park, and this lady looking out of the window towards him, in Mr. Germaine's house: this I have seen; I speak what I know.

Att. Gen. Jane Wadsworth, come, tell my lord and the jury what you know; speak out: do you know Mr. Germaine?

Wadsworth. Yes.

Att. Gen. Where liveth he?

Wadsworth. In Park-street, near the Royal Cock-pit.

Att. Gen. Have you ever seen the duchess of Norfolk at Germaine's house?

Wadsworth. Yes.

Att. Gen. Upon what occasion?

Wadsworth. I living next door, going in for a pint pot, with the Dutchwoman that belonged to the house, and asking her for it, she said, there's never a pint pot here; it was above stairs, and bid me go up and fetch it, and so I did; and I met the duchess of Norfolk there, she had a night-gown on, and Flanders-lace, but in night-linnen.

Att. Gen. Was she undressed?

Wadsworth. Undressed, as one may think; she might have a petticoat on.

L. C. J. What occasion had you to go there?

Wadsworth. For a pint pot, my lord, and going up, I saw the duchess of Norfolk going from one room to another: And, my lord, another time, I saw the duchess of Norfolk and Mr. Germaine in a coach together.

Att. Gen. When was that?

Wadsworth. It was in March last; and when I saw the coachman, I asked him who it was that he sat down out of the coach; and he said, an honest gentleman, that gave him two shillings for the carrying him from the Horse-ferry.

Att. Gen. Have you ever seen Mr. Germaine at the duchess's house?

Wadsworth. I did disguise myself, and followed him to see where he would go; and I did see him go into the duchess's house at Mill-bank.

Att. Gen. When was this?

Wadsworth. In May last.

L. C. J. What time of the day?

Wadsworth. My lord, at nine of the clock at night.

Sir Tho. Powis. When you say you went for the pint pot, did you ever say any thing to any body of it, that you had seen the duchess of Norfolk?

Wadsworth. Yes, to one Harman, that I had seen the duchess of Norfolk. How, said he, if my master had seen you to go up stairs, he would have killed the Dutch woman.

L. C. J. Do you know my lady duchess well?

Wadsworth. Yes, my lord, I know her well; she had Flanders horses stood in my stable, when I kept the Bear-Inn, and she came often to see them; I know her very well.

Serj. Birch. Anne Read, do you know Mr. Germaine's house?—Anne Read. Yes.

Serj. Birch. Where is it?

Anne Read. By the Cockpit.

Serj. Birch. Do you know him?

Anne Read. Yes.

Serj. Birch. What company have you seen go there?

Anne Read. In April last I saw a chair go by, and some persons said, That was the duchess of Norfolk, and so I went and saw her in the chair twice.

Serj. Birch. Did you see her with her mask off?

Anne Read. I saw her with her mask off, and saw her set down at Mr. Germaine's house, and go in a-doors, the door being immediately opened for her.

L. C. J. Did you know the duchess before?

Anne Read. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Did you see her before this time?

Anne Read. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. What time of the day was this?

Anne Read. Between two and three o'clock.

Att. Gen. You say you saw her with her mask off, and set down at Germaine's house, and the door was immediately opened?

Anne Read. Yes, my lord.

Att. Gen. Now we will call another witness, one Thomas Foster. Do you know the duchess of Norfolk?—Thomas Foster. Yes.

Att. Gen. How did you come to know her?

Foster. I drove her often in a coach with Mr. Germaine.

Att. Gen. How long since?

Foster. About this time four years.

Att. Gen. Where did you use to carry them?

Foster. Sometimes into Lombard-street, sometimes to one place, and sometimes to another; and I looked back, and saw them with their heads laid together.

Att. Gen. Are you sure it was the duchess of Norfolk?

Foster. Yes, Sir, I knew her before she was married, and I knew her after.

Sir Thomas Powis. Did you see them with their heads together?—Foster. Yes.

Sir T. Powis. When you was on the coach-box, you say you saw them?—Foster. Yes.

L. C. J. Did you look back to see them?

Foster. Yes, my lord, and their heads were laid together.

Serj. Tremaine. Where do you live now?

Foster. With the duke of Norfolk.

Att. Gen. We will call another witness. Mr. Bowtel, pray do you know Mr. Germaine?

Bowtel. Yes.

Att. Gen. Do you know the duchess of Norfolk?—Bowtel. Yes, Sir.

Att. Gen. Have you seen her?

Bowtel. Yes; I saw her come out of Mr. Germaine's house, in a chair, into St. James's Park.

Att. Gen. Was it the duchess of Norfolk?

Bowtel. Yes.

Att. Gen. Did you know her before?

Bowtel. Yes, Sir.

Att. Gen. Had you full sight of her?

Bowtel. Yes, Sir.

Att. Gen. What apparel was she in?

Bowtel. In man's apparel, a blue coat and peruke.

L. C. J. How long have you known the duchess of Norfolk?

Bowtel. These eight or ten years.

Serj. Tremaine. Do you believe it was the duchess of Norfolk?

Bowtel. I do verily believe it.

Serj. Tremaine. Do you take it upon your oath?

Bowtel. I do verily believe it: The duchess being in a chair, the maid came running out of Germaine's house after her with a hand-basket.

Att. Gen. When was this?

Bowtel. In April last.

L. C. J. Are you sure it was the duchess's maid?

Bowtel. She gave in evidence as so in the House of Lords.

Att. Gen. What is her name?

Bowtel. Frances Knight, and she had a hand-basket in her hand.

Att. Gen. What did you observe in the hand-basket in her hand?

Bowtel. I suppose there was cloaths, for I saw the tip of a coat, or gown, hang out.

Att. Gen. My lord, we have brought this down so far—

L. C. J. Why, all is not within the statute. I must direct the jury.

Att. Gen. We have told you when it began. However, we will call another witness.

Serj. Thompson. Mary Hall, do you know Mr. Germaine?—Mary Hall. Yes, Sir.

Serj. Thompson. Do you know where he lives?

Mary Hall. Yes, at the Royal Cockpit, in Park-street.

Serj. Thompson. Did you ever see the duchess of Norfolk in your life-time?

Mary Hall. I cannot tell whether I did or not, for I do not know her, so I cannot tell when I do see her.

Sir W. Williams. They have called about 19 witnesses; for the first five we pass over them, for they did not speak one word of any thing since 86; and for the other, they have not proved any one act in the time of the declaration betwixt Mr. Germaine and the duchess of Norfolk: they have not proved any thing that hath any tendency to it: they have not given any manner of evidence: if there be any thing that hath any tendency, it is that which Jane Wadsworth saith: and what is it that she saith? why, she being a woman that sold ale, she had let a pint pot go to Mr. Germaine's house, so she went for it; and the Dutchwoman that lived there, directed her to go up the stairs for the pint pot. She sweareth, that she saw the duchess of Norfolk, and she had a petticoat on; and this is the evidence that she hath given. She doth not pretend that Mr. Germaine was in the house, or in company with the duchess; and she appeareth to be a stranger in the house, and yet she must run up stairs. As for her reputation, she is one of the vilest of women. She would say something in March or May last, but there is no act proved by her; and she is a vile and incredible witness, we shall call witnesses to shew it.

Sir Tho. Powis. My lord, for this woman Wadsworth, we will not only call the person she spoke to of this, that will contradict her, and tell what she did say, but go to her credit and reputation. So that now, my lord, I believe, upon the whole matter, we cannot do the duke of Norfolk more honour, than to acquit the defendant; for it will be more honour to the duke of Norfolk to have the defendant acquitted, than satisfaction to him by giving him any damages whatsoever.

Sir W. Williams. We will now call our witness, Grace Cook. Do you know Jane Wadsworth?—Grace Cook. Yes, Sir.

Sir W. Williams. Tell my lord, and the jury, what discourse you and Jane Wadsworth have had together.

Grace. I will. She and I had some talk together; and she then said, I could do them no good, for I was mistaken.

Sir W. Williams. When did she tell you this? During the sitting of the parliament?

Grace. Yes: she came in and said, I can do them no good; for, said she, I did go into Mr. Germaine's house, and thought I had seen the duchess of Norfolk, but now I see I am mistaken.

Sir W. Williams. You are a near neighbour to her?—Grace. Yes, Sir.

Sir W. Williams. What is her reputation?

Grace. I cannot say any thing to her reputation.

Sir W. Williams. Who was by?

Grace. There was another woman.

Jane Wadsworth. I had a subpoena, and as I was going to Mr. Germaine's house, there was one of his servants; and I had like to have been knocked down: and there was one Hall; what, said he, you are to go to be witness? what, you will swear that the duchess lay with Mr. Germaine? And another said, I deserved to be at Bridewell.

L. C. J. Who was it that told you that you deserved to be at Bridewell?

Jane Wadsworth. Hosea, his footman. My lord, it was not a fortnight since I was robbed: and it is not a fortnight since there came in persons, and threatened me, and said what they would do to me. It is not two months since, that a person or two did beat me, and had like to have knocked me down; and they ran into this woman's house (Grace Cook's).

Serj. Thompson. You are asked, If those persons that had like to have knocked you down, did not run into Mrs. Cook's house?

Jane Wadsworth. Yes.

Cryer. Call Hall.

Serj. Tremaine. The question is, whether what Mrs. Wadsworth swore was true?

Hall. She said she happened to go for a pint-pot to Mr. Germaine's house, and going up the stairs for it, I thought I had seen the duchess of Norfolk then there, but I saw it was not she: and one Hosea Grimsley asked if she was sure if what she said was true? She said she would not say it for the world.

Att. Gen. What trade are you?

Hall. A joiner.

Att. Gen. Are you employed by Mr. Germaine?—Hall. Yes.

Att. Gen. How long since?

Hall. Why ever since king William was crowned.

Att. Gen. Have you been ever since employed by him?

Hall. No; by times I have been.

Att. Gen. Upon your oath, who did you hear this lady was, that used to come to Germaine's house?

Serj. Levinz. By the oath you have taken, did not you hear it was reported it was the duchess of Norfolk?

Hall. Yes, Sir.

Serj. Birch. Did you not whisper daily in the ear, and say, That you believed her to be the duchess of Norfolk?

Hall. I cannot remember.

Serj. Pemberton. Was that woman in such a condition as she saith she was?

Hall. No; I think that she was in as good condition as she is now.

Serj. Thompson. That could not be, she was fain to be carried in a chair to the house of lords.

Serj. Tremain. Tell my lord and the jury, what you heard Foster, the duke of Norfolk's coachman, say of Mr. Germaine?

Hall. Why, he said Mr. Germaine had done very ill in turning him off in Ireland, and he would be revenged of him.

— Call Foster.

Foster. My lord, Mr. Hall and I were speaking something of the duke and duchess of Norfolk: then I said to him, that Mr. Germaine had done very ill by me, in turning me off in Ireland, but I did not say I would be revenged of him.

Hall. I happened to go to Spring Garden, I saw Thomas Foster carrying water to the horses that were in the stable; and after he and I had spoke to one another; What, says he, will not you make me drink this morning? I told him I did not care if I did, and so we went to drink. Now, said I to him, Thomas, are not you a fine fellow to abuse so good a master, that would give you money when you wanted it? Are not you sorry for it? Yes, but it is too late: But the devil, I think, had possessed me. And he said he was gotten drunk, and when a man is drunk, he will say any thing: And, said he, I remember not a word I said: And said he, I hope my master will pardon me: And he said, that some were promised good employments in the duke's service, but none had gotten any but one, and that is the house-keeper: And he said, she had better be a house-keeper in hell.

L. C. J. Did he say he had wronged Mr. Germaine?

Hall. Yes, he did, and said he was drunk.

L. C. J. He was not drunk when he was in the House of Lords. He said he was sorry that he had wronged his master, and he hoped that he would pardon him.

Serj. Trem. We will call Alexander Harman. Did you ever see that woman, Jane Wadsworth, in Mr. Germaine's house?

A. Harman. No, Sir.

Jane Wadsworth. Pray, my lord, give me leave, and I will tell you how it was, Alexander Harman came into my house, and I told him I had seen the duchess of Norfolk at Germaine's house: I told him I wanted a pint pot that I had sent to Germaine's house; and going thither, asking the Dutchwoman for it, she bid me go up the stairs for it; and so I did, and then I saw the duchess of Norfolk. Said he to me, you should not have gone up the stairs for it; for if my master should know it, he would have killed the Dutchwoman.

Sir W. Williams. We will call another witness. Margaret Condry, What did you hear this woman Jane Wadsworth say?

M. Condry. She came to Mr. Cook's with a paper in her hand, and, said she, I thought I had seen the duchess of Norfolk at Mr. Germaine's house; but now she said she is better satisfied, that she never did see her there.

Sir W. Williams. Did she complain she was beaten and bruised?

M. Condry. Not as I know of.

Serj. Trem. She and others were examined in the Lords House, and the Lords would not believe them.

L. C. J. We do not know what the Lords did believe, or disbelieve, they were examined so far as to enable them to make a law; we must now hear what the witnesses say.

Sir W. Williams. We will call another witness. Frances Knight, pray, was you ever at Mr. Germaine's house?

F. Knight. No, my lord.

L. C. J. The woman said she talked with you there.

F. Knight. She will not say so to my face.

L. C. J. Did you ever carry a letter from the duchess to Mr. Germaine's, or to any person in his house?—F. Knight. No, my lord.

L. C. J. Mr. Bowtell saith, that he saw the duchess and this maid. Was not you there in the summer?—F. Knight. Never.

L. C. J. Never carried a basket?

F. Knight. Never.

L. C. J. Did you ever go with a chair?

F. Knight. No.

L. C. J. Call Mr. Bowtell again. Is this the maid that had the basket of clothes?

Bowtell. Yes, I supposed them to be clothes.

Att. Gen. Did she come out of the house when the chair came?

Bowtell. The chair came first out, and she followed it presently; and then I was near her, and knew her face.

Att. Gen. Is this the duchess's servant?

Bowtell. Yes, Sir; it is the same that followed the chair. She was the duchess's servant, I saw her then.

Att. Gen. When was this?

Bowtell. In April last.

Att. Gen. F. Knight, was you not (upon your oath) in Germaine's house in April last?

F. Knight. I broke my leg then.

Att. Gen. How long ago was it you broke your leg?—F. Knight. It was two years.

Sir W. Williams. Was you in April last in Germaine's house?—F. Knight. No, Sir.

Sir T. Powis. Was this in open day?

Bowtell. Sun was about half an hour high.

Sir T. Powis. We will call another witness, one Mary Pennington. Do you know one Jane Wadsworth? Was she your servant?

M. Pennington. She was, and pretended to be sick; and as I was informed afterwards she was not: For there was a man that gave physic, and I bid him go and look upon my maid, and he did so, and came to me and said, your maid may be sullen, but she is not sick; and coming to her, I found her sullen. And afterwards I met her out of my house; said I, Jane, What do you do here? She made some excuse, and said, she was not well. I told her I would take care of her: And how that they did not deserve servants that would not take care of them when they were ill. I saw her muffled, and her coats trussed up; I walked after her, and, said I, Jane, whither art thou a going? and bid her let me see what she had in her coats; and I thought it was good to have witness. I spake to one, and, said I, Gaffer Hall, come hither; do you take notice that this linnen is all mine. A good while after, I saw this Jane Wadsworth standing at Mr. Bird's, said I, she was my servant several years ago; and my lord, this happened when the difference was betwixt the duke and duchess; for they said, she was a grievous witness against the duchess. Upon this, Mr. Tobson, my lord Peterborough's servant, sent for me. Then I came to be a witness.

Serj. Thompson. How came she to you first of all?

M. Pennington. She was recommended to me first; and she being minded to go away soon after she came, I said, Jane, if you will go, go: And then I observing when she went away, her clothes to be trussed up, I walked after her into Dean's yard: I said to her, Jane, what have you in your coats? and there I found my linnen.

Counsel for the Def. We will call another witness, Mrs. Pennington's maid.

Maid. I saw the linnen that my mistress took from her, as she said.

Att. Gen. Did you see any?—Maid. Yes.

Counsel for the Def. We will call the defendant's man William. How long was your master in Flanders?—Will. A month.

Counsel for the Def. Was you and your master with the king in Ireland?

Will. Yes; I went with him, and came back again with him.

Sir W. Williams. It is said he was in Vauxhall about three years since.

Will. We were out of the kingdom four months.

Sir T. Powis. There is no material evidence but what this woman is. Now we will call another witness. Mr. Welborne, pray tell my lord, and the jury, what discourse you have had with the duke of Norfolk concerning his duchess.

Welborne. My lord, about the middle of December last, my lord duke was pleased to send for me to come to him; and so I came to Mr. Negus, and he carried me into the duke of Norfolk's own room. Said he, there are some treaties betwixt me and my wife; sir Robert Clayton and sir Robert Howard are concerned in them. There is one thing that I find, my wife is setting up to have a great equipage; this I do not like. I hear, said he, she is about to have a coach, horses, and two or three footmen: and this is not all, there is Castle Rising that my wife hath a pretension to, and Billing: now if she will part with her pretensions in them, I shall take it well, and it may be for our good, and we may be reconciled. I know Drayton is a seat that she hath a kindness for: pray tell my wife of it, and let her consider of it; if she be willing to comply with me in this,

I shall comply with her in that. And, said he, I am told, if I bring a bill of divorce into the house of lords, it would take effect. And so I went from the duke of Norfolk to the duchess, and told her what the duke said; and my lord of Peterborough hearing of it, he was angry that I went to the duke.

Sir W. Williams. Did you acquaint the duchess, that if she would part with her pretensions in Castle-Rising and Billing, all things might be reconciled?

Welborne. I did. The bill of Divorce was lodged in the house of lords in January following. There is one thing, my lord, that the duke said, that I had forgotten: he did speak 2,500*l.*, or some other such thing, he could make of Castle-Rising and Billing.

Att. Gen. My lord, we will call some witnesses as to Mrs. Wadsworth's reputation, because they speak against it. Mr. Dagley, senior, Do you know Mrs. Wadsworth?

Dagley. Yes.

Att. Gen. What reputation is she of?

Dagley. Very good reputation.

Att. Gen. Was she ever upon the parish?

Dagley. Never in her days.

Att. Gen. Mr. Prince, pray do you know Mrs. Wadsworth?—Prince. Yes, Sir.

Att. Gen. What is her occupation?

Prince. A pains-taking woman.

Att. Gen. What reputation is she of?

Prince. Of good reputation.

Wadsworth. My lord, I would not live with Pennington any longer, for she kept a disorderly house.

One of the Jury. Pray, what is that she saith?

L. C. J. She saith Mrs. Pennington with whom she lived, kept a disorderly house.

Jane Wadsworth. My lord, I kept a house, and paid 60*l.* a year for the Bear-Inn; and, my lord, my husband lay sick a great while; and he having a mind to go into the country for his health, I had fifteen shillings of the Church-wardens, or Overseers; and that was all that ever I had.

Att. Gen. We will call another witness, one Emry Argus. Pray how long have you known Mrs. Wadsworth?—Argus. Many years.

Att. Gen. What reputation was she of?

Argus. She was always accounted an honest, laborious, pains-taking woman.

Att. Gen. Whether she did keep the Bear-Inn?—Argus. She did.

Att. Gen. Was she ever kept at the parish charge?—Argus. No.

Att. Gen. Was she ever in the poor's book?

Argus. No.

Att. Gen. We have proved by three substantial people, who all say, that she was always accounted an honest, laborious woman.

L. C. J. Do you observe what you have proved? You have proved no lascivious conversation; because you speak of that in the opening of the evidence. You have not proved any lascivious conversation within these six years.

Att. Gen. The court saith, that we have not proved the duchess to go beyond sea. We will call a witness, Mr. Negus. Pray did the duchess go over with the duke? The duke came back; did the duchess come with him?

Negus. The duchess came over again in 1686; after that, she stayed in England some time: and about the time of the revolution, then it was given out that she was gone over again.

Att. Gen. What time was it you heard that she came back?

Negus. In eighty-nine: I can inform the court, if they please; the time when my lord was sued for alimony.

A Letter was then read in court, from the Duke to the Duchess.

Serj. Thompson. This cause hath been in the house of lords: whether they believed, or not believed, was not the question; but they would have some time to make some proofs at law.

Att. Gen. For, as all unlawful conversations must have a beginning, it is necessary we should shew something of that, and the time, and that doth fortify the evidence that is given within the time.

Sol. Gen. Pray, my lord, if your lordship pleases, this is the use we make in giving in evidence some things before, to shew the fact within the six years, their frequent meeting in a lascivious manner; and we make use of that before the sixth year, to explain what use we make of it in matters done within the six years.

Serj. Tremain. I do appeal to your lordship, and all that hear me, whether within these six years they have proved any lascivious action, or any indecent action; so that this will not charge the defendant: for if the duchess will come to his house when he is not at home, he cannot help it. All the proof is without the six years, and no proof within the six years, to charge him to commit such a crime: if they had carried it down, as to have proved acts within these six years, I should have said they had done something.

L. C. J. Have you done?

Gentlemen of the Jury; You understand very well the nature of this action, and the record hath been opened to you, which was to this effect:

That the Defendant, the 1st day of April, in the second year of king James, did entice away the plaintiff's duchess, whereby he had not the benefit of her society; and that he had lascivious conversation with her, lived in adultery with her, and caused her to commit adultery.

The Defendant pleaded, That he did not commit any thing within these six years: what hath been before, is not now to be taken notice of. But the plaintiff's counsel hath given in evidence some acts before, which is not for any damage they expect, but to explain some actions that have been between them. For my part, I must declare, that these matters may be given in evidence to explain, but they are not to be given in evidence to any other purpose.

The first witness is one Owen, and he telleth you, that he was sent to Whitehall, and he saith, that he went into the lodgings there, and then he did see the duchess and Germaine in bed together.

Then there is another witness proves it at another time and place, that is, Margaret Ellwood, and she telleth you in what manner she found the duchess and Germaine, and Germaine was very angry at her; and that his hat and sword lay upon the table: and you are told by her, that looking through the key-hole, she perceived them in bed; she said the curtain at the bed's feet was actually open, and she saw them in bed together, and found Germaine's handkerchief and ruffles in my lady's bed.

The next witness is one Anne Benskin, and she saith, They were in expectation of him one night at Windsor: they stayed up till two o'clock, and laid chairs and stools in his way, that if he came he might fall; but he did not come down that time: all this is about seven years ago, and out of the time mentioned in the declaration. And then after, they come and begin about the year eighty-nine, and they tell you of a lodging at Vauxhall, at one Scriber's house, for a couple of ladies, one went by the name of Bateman, and the other Brian; during that time, the man of the house knew nothing of one that went by the name of Mr. Germaine, but of my lady's brother, he had been seen walking in the garden: they tell you, they have seen the lady that went by the name of the lady Bateman, and that very lady was the duchess of Norfolk. And the waterman saith, that he hath carried him often by water, and he went by the name of my lady Bateman's brother; he hath carried him from the stairs at Channel-row to Vauxhall, where the lady Bateman lodged there; and hath carried wood from Vauxhall, by the lady Bateman's order, to the Cock-pit: and there is no manner of question but Mr. Germaine's house is at the Cock-pit. But then they come to Mrs. Wadsworth, and she is a woman that lived next door; and she had occasion to go to Germaine's house for a pint pot, and there coming, she met with a Dutchwoman, and asked her for the pint pot; she saith, she bid her go up stairs for it, which she did; and then she saw the duchess of Norfolk undressed in a morning-gown: she said, she very well knew her, she had seen her very many times, and she was sure this was the duchess of Norfolk. She telleth you, that at another time, I think it was in May last, she did see Mr. Germaine go to the Mill-bank; she was sure it was him, and she did think he would go there, and thereupon she dodged him from that very place. She said, she told one Harman that she had seen the duchess of Norfolk. How, said he, if my master had seen you, he would have killed the Dutchwoman.

Then cometh one Foster the coachman, and saith, That about four years since he had carried the duchess of Norfolk and Mr. Germaine oftentimes; and one time he driving them, looking back, he saw Mr. Germaine and the duchess of Norfolk lying with their heads together. Then cometh Bowtell, and he telleth you, that in April last he saw the duchess of Norfolk come out of Germaine's house in a chair, and she was the duchess, and in man's apparel: and he said there was an old maid had a hand-basket, with some cloaths, as he believed; she followed the chair: and this was the servant of the duchess of Norfolk. Now, gentlemen, these are the witnesses that prove to you the issue in the time mentioned.

Now, gentlemen, they have called some to discredit these, they begin with Jane Wadsworth; they bring one Condry that should say, that she heard Jane Wadsworth say, That she thought at the first it was the duchess of Norfolk, but she was mistaken. Then they call some more witnesses, that is, Mrs. Penington, that was her mistress twelve years ago; and she said, that she pretended to be sick awhile after she had been with her, and so going away, she seeing her cloaths tuck'd up, went to see what was the matter; she had some of her linen: she said, she lived with her not above a fortnight, and so she parted. She saith she was indigent and poor; and her maid saith the same.

And then they bring another witness against one Foster the coachman, telling him of what he had said against Mr. Germaine: he said, he was gotten drunk, and when a man is drunk he will say any thing.

Then as to Bowtell; whereas he saith, he saw the duchess in man's apparel come out of Mr. Germaine's house, and the maid was there; and the maid cometh and saith, that she was not there, she was ill, and her leg was broke, and denieth that ever the duchess was there, or that she saw her in a chair, or in man's apparel.

Now, for Anne Read; no evidence at all is against her testimony, and she is very positive of what was done in May last.

They have called one Welborne, who saith, that the duke sent for him, and after some other discourse, spoke to him about Billing and Castle-Rising; and he saith the duke sent to him, to let the duchess know, if she would not comply with him, he did not question but to prosecute a bill of divorce in the House of Lords with effect. They tell indeed of Foster, that Germaine had turned him out of his service; that he should say, he would be revenged on him; but he denied that.

And then the duchess's letter in eighty-seven was read: I cannot see what inference you can make of it, but that the duke had no design of shewing an unkindness; you have heard the letter read, and you may make your inference as you will.

Then as to Mrs. Wadsworth; they have brought some persons to speak to her reputation, and they tell you she is an industrious woman, and of fair conversation, and rented a house of 60*l.* per annum. As to what they alledged she was kept by the parish, it is no such thing; but her husband being sick, and about going into the country, the church-wardens helped him with about 15*s.*: that she was never in the poor's rates, or in the poor's books. And then as to Mrs. Penington, what she saith against her, she answereth thus, that why she did live no longer with her, she saith, her mistress kept a disorderly house.

The question will be, What was betwixt the duchess and the defendant within six years; if you are satisfied that there hath been any such lascivious conversation? For if so be that it was only before the six years, to what purpose was their meeting at Vauxhall, and taking a house at Vauxhall; and to what purpose the duchess came to Germaine's house? So that it is left to you, gentlemen, to consider, if there hath been unlawful conversation, and lascivious intercourse between the duchess and the defendant within these six years; if so, you are to find for the plaintiff; but if not, you are to find for the defendant.

The next morning the jury brought in their verdict into court, and being asked, Whether they found for the plaintiff, or defendant? said, for the plaintiff. Being asked what damages? They said 100 marks damages, with costs of court.* Upon which they had a severe reprimand from the court, for giving so small and scandalous a fine.

* "During this session, the town was entertained with the trial of an indecent cause in Westminster-hall. The duke of Norfolk bearing with impatience the suspected commerce which Mr. Germaine had maintained with his duchess, had the last winter lodged a bill of divorce in the House of Peers; but their lordships being unwilling to proceed in that affair, before there were some proofs of the fact made in the course of the common law, his grace did thereupon bring an action of adultery against Mr. Germaine, before the court of King's-bench. This notorious cause was tried on the 24th of November, and upon a full hearing of many obscene evidences, the jury found for the plaintiff, and allowed his grace 100 marks damages, with costs of court: where the slightness of satisfaction was almost as great a reproach as the crime itself." Kennet.

Kennet says, "The duke had lodged a bill of divorce," &c. But by the foregoing proceedings, it appears they examined witnesses, heard counsel, and then flung out the bill. However, in 1700, his Grace obtained an act of parliament for a divorce, and the duchess afterwards married sir John Germaine, bt. See the Proceedings in this Collection, A. D. 1770.

Tuesday, Jan. 31, 1692.

IN the Court erected in Westminster-hall, for the Trial of the lord Mohun for the Murder of William Mountford ;

About 12 o'clock this day, the Lords came from their own House in their robes, in procession in this manner into the court :

First, the Lord High Steward's gentlemen-attendants, two and two.

* See East's Pleas of the Crown, chap 5, s. 135, and the authorities there referred to.

This lord Mohun was again tried for murder in the year 1699. See his Case in this Collection. See, too, 1 Salk, 104 ; Skynner, 683 ; Holt, 84. 479. At length he was killed in a duel by the duke of Hamilton, who also fell. The following passages in Swift's Journal to Stella, relate to this catastrophe :

" London, Nov. 15, 1712.

" Before this comes to your hands, you will have heard of the most terrible accident that hath almost ever happened. This morning, at eight, my man brought me word, that duke Hamilton had fought with lord Mohun, and killed him, and was brought home wounded. I immediately sent him to the duke's house, in St. James's square ; but the porter could hardly answer for tears, and a great rabble was about the house. In short, they fought at seven this morning. The dog Mohun was killed on the spot ; and, while the duke was over him, Mohun shortened his sword, stabbed him in at the shoulder to the heart. The duke was helped toward the Cake-house, by the ring in Hyde-park, (where they fought) and died on the grass, before he could reach the house ; and was brought home in his coach by eight, while the poor duchess was asleep. Macartney and one Hamilton were the seconds, who fought likewise, and are both fled. I am told, that a footman of lord Mohun's stabbed duke Hamilton ; and some say Macartney did so too. Mohun gave the affront, and yet sent the challenge. I am infinitely concerned for the poor duke, who was a frank, honest, good-natured man. I loved him very well, and I think he loved me better. He had the greatest mind in the world to have me go with him to France, but durst not tell it me ; and those he did tell, said ' I could not be spared ; ' which was true. They have removed the poor duchess to a lodging in the neighbourhood, where I have been with her two hours, and am just come away. I never saw so melancholy a scene ; for indeed all reasons for real grief belong to her ; nor is it possible for any body to be a greater loser in all regards. She has moved my very soul. The lodging was inconvenient, and they would have removed her to another ; but I would not suffer it, because it had no room backward, and she must have been tortured with the noise of the Grub-street screamers mentioning her husband's murder in her ears."

" Nov. 16. I thought to have finished this yesterday ; but was too much disturbed. I sent a letter early this morning to lady Masham, to beg her to write some comforting words to the poor duchess. I dined to day with lady Masham at Kensington where she is, expecting these two months to lie in. She has promised me to get the queen to write to the duchess kindly on this occasion ; and to-morrow I will beg lord treasurer to visit and comfort her. I have been with her two hours again, and find her worse ; her violences not so frequent, but her melancholy more formal and settled. She has abundance of wit and spirit ; about thirty-three years old ; handsome and airy, and seldom spared any body that gave her the least provocation ; by which she had many enemies, and few friends. Lady Orkney, her sister-in-law, is come to town on this occasion ; and has been to see her, and behaved herself with great humanity. They have been always very ill together, and the poor duchess could not have patience when people told her I went often to lady Orkney's. But I am resolved to make them friends ; for the duchess is now no more the object of envy, and must learn humility from the severest master, affliction. I design to make the ministry put out a proclamation (if it can be found proper) against that villain Macartney. What shall we do with these murderers ? I cannot end this letter to night, and there is no occasion ; for I cannot send it till Tuesday, and the coroner's inquest on the duke's body is to be to-morrow ; and I shall know more."

" Nov. 17. I was to-day at noon with the duchess of Hamilton again, after I had been with lady Orkney, and charged her to be kind to her sister in affliction. The duchess told me, ' lady Orkney had been with her, and that “Nov. 18. The committee of council is to sit this afternoon upon the affair of duke Hamilton’s murder, and I hope a proclamation will be out against Macartney. I was just now (it is now noon) with the duchess, to let her know lord treasurer will see her. She is mightily indisposed. The jury have not yet brought in their verdict upon the coroner’s inquest. We suspect Macartney stabbed the duke while he was fighting.”

In Nichols’s edition of Swift’s Works, the accounts which appeared in the Post Boy, are exhibited as follows :

“On Saturday morning last, about seven o’clock, the duke of Hamilton and the lord Mohun fought a duel in Hyde-park. His grace’s second was colonel Hamilton; and his lordship’s, major general Macartney. The lord Mohun died on the spot; and my lord duke soon after he was brought home, who received the following wounds; one, on the right side of his leg, about seven inches long; another, in his right arm; the third, in the upper part of his left breast, running downwards into his body, which was looked upon to be the immediate occasion of his death; the fourth wound was on the outside of his left leg. My lord Mohun received a very large wound in his groin; another, on the right side through his body, up to the hilt of his sword; and the third in his arm; and other wounds. Post Boy, Nov. 18.”—In the same publication, Nov. 20, was the following article, evidently written by Dr. Swift: “Major general Macartney went three times to the duke’s house with a challenge from the lord Mohun. On Friday last at four in the afternoon he delivered it to the duke, and was at the bagnio all night with my lord Mohun, who was observed to be seized with fear and trembling at that time. They met at seven the next morning, with their seconds, colonel Hamilton of the footguards for the duke, and Macartney for the lord Mohun. There the duke told Macartney, that his grace knew this was all of his contrivance, but that he should have a share in the dance; for his friend Hamilton resolved to entertain him. On Tuesday last a committee of council sat at the earl of Dartmouth’s office, and the spectators of the duel were examined; and we hear, that my lord duke and the lord Mohun did not parry, but gave thrusts at each other, and the latter shortening his sword, stabbed the duke in the upper part of his left breast, running downwards into his body, which wound, upon probing, was about fourteen inches long) who expired soon after he was put into the coach. Colonel Hamilton received a wound in his right leg, and, going afterwards to the Half-moon Tavern in Cheapside, was dressed by Mr. Woodward the surgeon. His grace is universally lamented by all men of honour and honesty, or who have the least regard for their queen and country, being a faithful subject, a true friend, a kind master, and a loving husband; and, as a just reward for his services and sufferings, was preferred to the greatest honours and employments of the crown. His grace is succeeded in honour and estates by his eldest son, who is about twelve years of age. It is to be remembered, that the lord Mohun was the person who gave the affront, which the duke, observing him to be in drink, disdained to regard. But the faction, weary of him, resolved to employ him in some real service to their cause, and valued not what became of him, provided he did their drudgery: for the dispute at law between the duke and his lordship had continued many years, without any personal quarrel of consequence. But this is the new expedient of the faction, band-boxes and bullies. Macartney is absconded; but it is hoped a proclamation will soon be issued out for apprehending him, in order to bring him to justice.—N. B. This is the fourth person that my lord Mohun had the misfortune to kill. His lordship’s title is extinct.”

At this time Swift was become a Tory, and one of the “ministers or agents of the ministry,” as they are denominated by Johnson, in number at first sixteen, afterwards more, who met weekly at each others’ houses, and were united by the name of brothers.

In the History of the Four Last Years of Queen Anne, Swift says that Macartney stabbed duke Hamilton in the breast after he was wounded by lord Mohun, and in a Note to that work, it is said, that his account is exactly agreeable to the depositions of colonel Hamilton, before a committee of the council. Macartney, it appears, escaped to Holland, but afterwards (June 16, 1716), was tried for the murder at the bar of the court of King’s-bench, and found guilty of manslaughter. Swift, in his Journal to Stella, (December, 26, 1712), relates a curious anecdote of a gentleman, who being set upon by highwayman, told them he was Macartney, “upon which they brought him to a justice of peace in hopes of a reward, and the rogues were sent to gaol.”

Burnet, after relating the fate of Hamilton, says, “I will add no character of him. I am sorry I cannot say so much good of him as I could wish; and I had too much kindness for him, to say any evil without necessity.”

Which words the serjeant at arms repeated aloud.

Lord High Steward, (Marquis of Carmarthen.) My lords, pray be pleased to stand up and be uncovered whilst their majesties commission is reading.

Then his Grace removed from the wool-pack to the chair which was placed upon an ascent just before the uppermost step of the throne, and seated himself in the chair.

Cl. of Cr. Serjeant at Arms, make proclamation.

Serjeant. Oyez.

Cl. of Cr. Chief governor of the Tower of London, return the precept to you directed, together with the body of Charles lord Mohun your prisoner, forthwith into the court, upon pain and peril will fall thereon.

Then the Deputy-Governor of the Tower brought the lord Mohun to the bar, having the ax carried before him by the gentleman gaoler of the Tower, who stood with it at the bar, on the right-hand of the prisoner, turning the edge from him.

The Prisoner at his approach to the bar, made three bows, one to his grace the Lord High Steward, the other to the peers on each hand, and his grace and all the peers returned the salute to him.

Lord High Stew. My lords, my voice will not serve to speak at such a distance, so as to be heard, and therefore I must beg leave of your lordships to come down to the wool-pack again.

Lords. Ay, ay.

Then his Grace came down, and seated himself on the wool-pack.

Lord High Steward. My lord Mohun, I am to let your lordship know, you are not to hold up your hand upon your arraignment; and I am to let you that are counsel at the bar likewise know, that both you and the witnesses are to direct yourselves to the Court, in the style of ‘My Lords,’ speaking to the court.

Then there was a little pause, after which his Grace addressed himself to the prisoner thus.

Lord High Steward. My lord, you are brought here before this supreme court in order to your trial. The charge against you is, for the murder of one of the king’s subjects, which is a crime the king will at no time pass over in the meanest man’s case, without making a strict inquiry into the offence, and causing due punishment to be inflicted on the offender.

This, my Lord, is charged upon you, not by any slight information, but by the grand inquest of this county, made up of gentlemen of good worth and consideration. It is true, that this inquest does not amount to much more than a bare accusation; and therefore it ought not to be made any use of, so as to prejudice your lordship’s trial; but it is that which is the ground of presenting this black crime before my lords your peers, who cannot receive it without some trouble, to find any one of their body suspected to be guilty of an action so dishonourable as this is represented to their lordships.

My Lord, you are a very young man, and therefore it is hoped, you cannot so early have had your hands in blood. And the same reason, because you are so young, may, perhaps, make you conceive, that you are under some greater disadvantage in making your defence, than you would be if your experience had been longer.

But to remove any misapprehension you can have of that kind, it is very proper to put your lordship in mind, that you have the good fortune now, to be tried for this fact in full parliament, where no evidence will be received, but such as must be manifest and plain, beyond all contradiction; so that you have nothing to fear here, but your own guilt.

In the next place, my Lord, you need not be discouraged for want of counsel, for the honour of this court is such, as will take care to inform you of any advantage that the law can give you. And you may be farther assured, that no art or skill in arguing can take any place here, either against your innocency, or divert my lords from doing you exact justice. Nay, I dare presume to say, on the part of my lords, that if there be room for any abatement of severity, you may reasonably expect to find it from their lordships.

These considerations, my Lord, cannot but give you great consolation under your unhappy circumstances, it being most certain, that nothing but your own crimes can hurt you.

But at the same time I must tell you, that your lordship is not to flatter yourself with an expectation or hope, that any favour will be shewed you beyond what honour and justice can allow: and I hope you have well considered, that it is no less than your life, your honour, and your estate, that you are now to defend, insomuch, that I cannot doubt but your lordship has recollected and prepared yourself for the defence of what so very much concerns you.

I will not therefore detain you any longer than to give you some directions in the Order and Method of your Trial; and those are, that your lordship do give attention carefully to the reading of your Indictment: that you give no interruption to the counsel or witnesses when they speak against you; and when the proper time shall come for your witnesses to be examined, and that you are to be heard in your own defence, I will give you due notice of it.

Your lordship may also be certain, that when it shall come to your turn to speak, you shall be heard with all the patience and favour that the matter will bear; and at last, when all hath been heard that can be said on both sides, your lordship needs not doubt, but that my lords will give such a Judgment as will be suitable to the honour, justice and equity of this great court. Clerk, read the Indictment to my lord.

Clerk of the Crown. ' Charles lord Mohun, ' You stand indicted by the name of Charles ' lord Mohun, of the parish of St. Clement ' Danes, in the county of Middlesex, for that ' you, together with one Richard Hill of the ' same parish and county, gentleman, who is ' fled, and withdrawn from justice, not having ' the fear of God before your eyes, but being ' moved and seduced by the instigation of the ' devil, the 9th day of December, in the 4th ' year of the reign of our sovereign lord and ' lady William and Mary, by the grace of God ' of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, ' king and queen, defenders of the faith, &c. ' with force and arms, &c. at the parish afore- ' said, in the county aforesaid, in and upon one ' William Mountford, gent. in the peace of ' God, and our said sovereign lord and lady the ' king and queen, then and there being, ' feloniously, wilfully, and of your malice ' afore-thought, did make an assault. And that ' he the said Richard Hill, with a certain rapier ' made of iron and steel, of the value of 5s. ' which he the said Richard Hill, in his right- ' hand then and there had and held drawn, the ' said William Mountford, in and upon the ' right-side of the body of him the said Wil- ' liam, then and there feloniously, wilfully, and ' of his malice aforethought, did strike and ' thrust, giving unto him the said William ' Mountford then and there, with a sword ' drawn aforesaid, in and upon the aforesaid ' right-side of the body of him the said Wil- ' liam Mountford, near the said right pap of the ' said William, one mortal wound of the ' breadth of one inch, and of the depth of ' twenty inches, of which said mortal wound ' the aforesaid William Mountford from the ' aforesaid 9th day of December, in the year ' aforesaid, unto the 10th day of the same ' month of December, in the year aforesaid, at ' the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, ' did languish, and languishing, did live, on ' which said 10th day of December in the year ' aforesaid, the aforesaid William Mountford of ' the mortal wound aforesaid, at the parish ' aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, died. And ' that you the said Charles lord Mohun, at the ' time of the felony and murder aforesaid, by ' the aforesaid Richard Hill, in manner and ' form aforesaid, feloniously, wilfully, and of ' his malice afore-thought, done and com- ' mitted, then and there feloniously, wilfully, ' and of your malice afore-thought, were pre' sent, aiding, and abetting, comforting, assist- ' ing and maintaining the aforesaid Richard ' Hill, the said William Mountford in form ' aforesaid, feloniously, wilfully, and of his ' malice afore-thought to kill and murder. And ' so that you the said Charles lord Mohun, and ' the said Richard Hill, the said William ' Mountford in manner and form aforesaid, ' feloniously, wilfully, and of your malice afore- ' thought, did kill and murder, against the ' peace of our said sovereign lord and lady the ' king and queen, their crown and dignity.'

How say you, Charles lord Mohun, Are you guilty of this felony and murder, or not Guilty?

L. Mohun. Not Guilty, my lords.

Clerk of the Crown. How will your lordship be tried?

L. Mohun. By God and my peers.

Clerk of the Crown. God send your lordship a good deliverance.

L. High Steward. Will your lordships please that the Judges may be covered?

Lords. Ay, Ay.

Then the Judges put on their caps.

Clerk of the Crown. Serjeant at Arms, make proclamation.

Serjeant. Oyez.

Clerk of the Crown. If any one will give evidence on the behalf of our sovereign lord and lady the king and queen's majesties, against Charles lord Mohun the prisoner at the bar, let them come forth, and they shall be heard, for now he stands at the bar upon his deliverance.

L. High Steward. You gentlemen that are of the king's counsel, will you begin?

Serj. Thompson. May it please your lordships, I am of counsel for the king and queen, against my lord Mohun the prisoner at the bar, who stands indicted for the murder of one William Mountford.

L. Mohun. My lords—

L. High Steward. My lord Mohun, what does your lordship say?

L. Mohun. Do not your lordships think it proper, that I should have pen, ink and paper?

Lords. Ay, by all means.

L. High Steward. Yes, give my lord pen, ink and paper.

Which were carried to him by one of the clerks.

L. High Steward. Go on, Sir, now.

Serj. Thompson. My lord Mohun stands indicted here before your lordships, for the murder of one William Mountford, and the indictment sets forth, that one Richard Hill, who is since fled from justice, did upon the 9th of December last, make an assault upon this same William Mountford, and that the said lord Mohun did likewise make that assault. This Indictment particularly sets forth, that this Hill, by a sword or rapier, which he had in his hand, did give this William Mountford a wound on his right-side, and that Mountford did languish of that wound till the next day, which was the 10th of December, when he died; and that at the time of the giving the wound, my lord Mohun was present, and was aiding, abetting, assisting, and comforting of Hill; and thereupon we do say, he is guilty of this murder, and for this he stands indicted. It is my duty to open the indictment to your lordships, we shall call our proofs, and give you the evidence, and then leave it to your lordships judgment.

Att. Gen. (Sir John Somers.) My lords, the Indictment has been opened, and by that your lordships see, the noble lord at the bar stands charged with the high crime of murder.

My Lords, his peerage gives him a right to be tried in this great and noble court: and as my lord has just reason to put a high value upon this privilege, so on the other hand, their majesties, who are making inquisition for the blood of one of their subjects, have a full assurance, that no compassion for my lord's youth, no consideration for his quality, or regard for one of your own order, will make your lordships unmindful of the heinous nature of the crime, or cause any variation in the steadiness of your justice.

It is true, my Lords, the difference between the trial of a peer and a commoner is very great, but there is no difference in the crime, whether committed by one or the other: it is the same law by which they must be tried and judged; and that fact which would be murder in the meanest subject, is no less than murder, if committed by the greatest peer.

My Lords, it is not insisted upon, that the noble lord at the bar gave the mortal stroke with his own hand; nor is it so alledged in the Indictment: the indictment findeth the wound to have been given by the hand of Richard Hill; but if my lord the prisoner was of his party, if he concurred with him in the thing, if he was present and abetting to the fact, though he did not strike a stroke, though he was no more than a looker-on when the thing was done; the law saith, he is a principal in the murder.

Whether my lord's case will fall within this rule, is the point for your lordships to determine, when the witnesses are heard.

My lords, it is my part to give an account of the nature of the evidence, to the end that your lordships may more easily go along with the witnesses, as they are examined, and more readily make your observations upon what they say.

This I shall do as shortly and as exactly as I can, without pretending to aggravate any thing, which I could never think did become any one in my station; and I am sure, would be to very little purpose before such a judicature as this; for after all, your lordships will found your judgments upon the fact, not as it is represented by us, but as it appears upon the oaths of the witnesses.

The time when the fact for which my lord is to be tried was committed, was the 9th day of December last.

The occasion of it was this:

Captain Hill, the person mentioned in the Indictment, had for some time before made addresses of courtship in the way of marriage, to one Mrs. Bracegirdle, an actress in the play-house; but these proposals were totally rejected. This put Mr. Hill in a very great rage, and he declared, that Mr. Mountford (the person slain) was the only man that stood in his way, and with many execrations expressed his resolution to be revenged upon him: this he did at several times, and before several persons.

The same day the fact was committed, in the morning, my lord, who is now at the bar, and captain Hill, went together to hire a coach to go to Totteridge, and directed the coachman to have six horses ready, but to be waiting for them in Drury-Lane near the Play-house, with only two horses in his coach, about nine o'clock the same night. My lord and captain Hill dined together that day at a tavern in Covent-Garden, and here much of their discourse was about Mrs. Bracegirdle; and both of them did freely declare their opinion, that Mr. Mountford lay with her. But the principal of their discourse was in relation to a design which they had formed for the seizing upon Mrs. Bracegirdle, and forcing her into a coach, and carrying her away somewhere into the country.

This was to be executed that night; and accordingly they were then providing arms for that purpose: Mr. Hill did acquaint my lord, that the soldiers would be ready by the time; and my lord took notice, that the carrying her off would stand Mr. Hill in 50*l.* at least. Thereupon (as your lordships will hear from the evidence) Mr. Hill used this expression, If the villain resist, I will stab him; and then my lord was pleased to say, That he would stand by his friend.

After they had continued there some time, being about to part, Mr. Hill told my lord, That unless he was at the play-house by six o'clock, the thing could not be effected, and he should be undone: but my lord promised to be there at the time.

Accordingly, they both met at the play-house; and after they had been behind the scenes, and informed themselves that Mrs. Bracegirdle would not be there that night, they left the play-house.

But it seems they had got intelligence, that she was to sup that night at one Mr. Page's house in Drury-Lane; and therefore they planted themselves with their soldiers near that place, over-against my lord Craven's house.

Lord High Steward. They! Who do you mean?

Att. Gen. My lord, the prisoner at the bar, and Mr. Hill. After they had continued there for a considerable time (I think till towards nine o'clock), they began to have a jealousy, that they might be under some misinformation; and therefore ordered the coachman to drive them into Howard-street, the place where Mrs. Bracegirdle lodged; and observing some persons walking near her lodging, they said, they doubted they were deceived, and had been betrayed.

But they soon came back again to Drury-Lane, and fixed themselves in their former station. About ten o'clock Mrs. Bracegirdle, accompanied with Mr. Page (at whose house she had been) and with her mother and (I think) her brother, going home; when they came to the place where the coach stood, with the door open, and my lord at the bar placed in the coach, and several cases of pistols by him, the soldiers, together with captain Hill, came up to Mrs. Bracegirdle, seized upon her, and would have forced her into the coach: Mr. Hill endeavoured with violence to force away Mr. Page, who was then leading her, and struck him; but Mrs. Bracegirdle's mother holding her about the middle, they could not readily get her into the coach; and during this struggle there was an opportunity given to Mr. Page to call for help; and several persons coming presently from the houses near, and the people in the street beginning to rise upon them, they found it impracticable to effect their design at that time.

Thereupon the soldiers were dismissed, but my lord and Mr. Hill would not be denied the liberty to wait upon Mrs. Bracegirdle to her lodging; and accordingly, together with Mr. Page and her mother, and other persons, they went together to Mrs. Bracegirdle's lodging, at one Mrs. Browne's house in Howard-street. Mr. Mountford's house was in Norfolk-street, below Howard-street. Howard-street is a cross street, which leads from Arundel-street, and through Norfolk-street to Surrey-street; and so it was not possible for Mountford to come to his own house, but whoever should fix themselves in Howard-street must have the opportunity of seeing him.

As they were going along, Hill swore he would be revenged; but named nobody.

After that Mrs. Bracegirdle and the company were come to her lodging, she and her mother and Page went into the house: my lord Mohun and Mr. Hill staid in Howard-street, and there continued for near two hours together, and for the most part of that time, with their swords drawn.

Mr. Mountford, as it happened, did not come home till late that night; so that their stay being long, my lord and Mr. Hill thought fit to send for wine, and had one or two bottles, which they drank in the street, near Mrs. Bracegirdle's lodgings.

During this time, they were heard to say (that is, one of them was; but which of them, by reason of the darkness we cannot tell) that if he could not be revenged that night, he would the next morning; upon which a boy, who was there with them, (but who the boy was we cannot discover) said, Good my lord, do not do it, alter your resolution. I did observe before, that Mrs. Bracegirdle supped that night at Mr. Page's house, and Mrs. Page having heard of the great outrage and tumult in the street, and that her husband was gone home with Mrs. Bracegirdle, and being under a great concern for his safety, thought fit to follow him thither. At she entered into the house, she saw my lord Mohun and captain Hill near the door; and presently after, before she could have a full relation of what had happened in Drury-lane, Mrs. Browne, the owner of the house where Mrs. Bracegirdle lodged, came into the room, and told them, That my lord Mohun and Hill were waiting for Mr. Mountford, and that she was apprehensive it was with no good intention. Thereupon Mrs. Page thought it requisite to go to Mrs. Mountford's house to give her notice of it, and to desire her to find out where her husband was, and to caution him not to come home, unless he brought a good guard with him.

As she went out, she saw them both with their swords drawn, and she acquainted Mrs. Mountford with it, who sent to several places in search of her husband; but she was so unfortunate, that the messengers could not find him.

Whilst this was doing, the watch came into Howard-street, being alarmed at the report that two gentlemen were drinking in the street, and walking there with their naked swords. The watch demanded of my lord Mohun, why he had his sword drawn. My lord was pleased to return them this answer, That he was a peer of the realm, and bid them touch him if they durst. They then asked Hill, why his sword was out, and my lord made the excuse for him, That Hill had lost his scabbard.

The watch observing the drawer who attended upon them, and knowing that he lived at a tavern in Surrey-street, went to inform themselves, who these persons should be, that were walking in such a manner at that time of night. But they were hardly got into the house before they heard the cry of murder.

The Witnesses will inform your lordships, that as Mr. Mountford, about twelve o'clock, was coming home, my lord Mohun met him, and saluted him. Mr. Mountford said, My lord Mohun, what does your lordship do here at this time of night? and my lord made answer, He supposed Mr. Mountford had been sent for. No, no, says Mountford, I came by chance. My lord said to him again, I suppose you have heard about the lady. Mr. Mountford answered, I hope my wife has given your lordship no offence. No, says my lord Mohun, it is Mrs. Bracegirdle I mean. To this the reply of Mr. Mountford was, Mrs. Bracegirdle is no concern of mine; but I hope your lordship does not countenance any ill action of Mr. Hill.

Upon this Hill came up to them, and said to my lord, It was not a time to discourse of those matters; and as my lord continued to talk with Mountford, Hill struck Mountford first, and, in a manner, at the same instant made a pass at him, and run him clean through the body, and this before Mr. Mountford's sword was drawn. Immediately, upon this, there was a cry of murder, and the watch came with what haste they could, and took my lord Mohun, but Hill was fled; when my lord was taken, his sword was not drawn.

As soon as my lord Mohun was taken, the first question he asked was, If Hill was apprehended? And when he was told he was not, he said he was glad of it, and he did not care if he were hanged for him. And he said, adding at the same time, That he was sorry that Mr. Hill had so little money about him, and wished him all that he had in his own pocket; and he did then also own to the watch, that he had changed coats with Mr. Hill, and had Hill's coat on him at that time.

My lord, this is the substance of the Evidence, and in this order, with your lordships leave, we shall offer the proofs to your lordships; I do not doubt, but your lordships will attend to the evidence with all care, and will determine upon it according to justice and honour. I will detain your lordships no longer, but proceed to call the witnesses to prove what I have opened.

L. H. Steward. Pray call your witnesses together, and let me know who you begin with.

Att. Gen. My lords, we do not know what place is designed for the witnesses; but if they are to be on the other side, and this crowd do interpose between us and them, it will be impossible for us, who are the king's counsel, to hear what they say, or know how to proceed.

L. H. Steward. There must be room made there for the witnesses; where are your witnesses, Mr. Attorney?

Clerk of the Crown. If you please to name them, Sir, we will call them.

Att. Gen. Call Mr. John Hudson, and Mr. George Powell,

L. H. Steward. I know not how this is ordered, but way must be made there by the bar, that the prisoner may see the witnesses, and they him.

Att. Gen. Yes, my lord, by all means.

Serj. Tremain. If your lordships please, the witnesses will be most conveniently heard, if they come and stand by us.

Att. Gen. If your lordships please, it will not be possible either for my lord at the bar, or for us, to hear what the witnesses say, unless they be brought into this place to stand between us.

L. H. Steward. My Lord Great Chamberlain, be pleased to give order for them to be brought in thither.

Then the Lord Great Chamberlain went down to the bar.

L. G. Chamberlain. The witnesses must be brought to this place.

And accordingly, way was made for the witnesses, as called, to stand at the bar between the prisoner and the king's counsel.

L. H. Steward. Give me the name of him that you begin with.

Att. Gen. We begin, my lords, with Mr. John Hudson. [Who came to the bar, and one of the clerks held the book to him, upon which he laid his hand.]

Cl. of the Cr. Hearken to your oath, Sir: The evidence that you shall give on the behalf of our sovereign lord and lady the king and queen's majesties against Charles lord Mohun, the prisoner at the bar, shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth: So help you God. [Then he kissed the book.]

Att. Gen. Mr. Hudson, do you give my lords an account what you know of any applications of courtship made to Mrs. Bracegirdle by Mr. Hill, and what became of it; and what you heard Hill say about her, or about any one else relating to that matter.

Hudson. My lord, I had the honour to be invited to supper with my lord Mohun, at the Rose Tavern in Covent Garden, where I found captain Hill with his lordship.

Att. Gen. When was this, Sir? Tell the time.

Hudson. This was three nights before this unfortunate accident happened; there I found captain Hill, and we supped together; and after supper, captain Hill raised a discourse of Mrs. Bracegirdle and Mr. Mountford; says he, I should not doubt the success of my amour with Mrs. Bracegirdle, if I were not obstructed by Mountford, whom I design to be the death of: this is truth, upon my oath. My lord Mohun was in the company; but I cannot say that my lord made any reply to the thing, or took any notice of it: but this captain Hill did say, not only then, but several times before.

Att. Gen. Did he say it at any other time in your hearing?

Hudson. Yes, several times before.

Att. Gen. Do you know any thing more of this matter?

Hudson. No more, than that my lord Mohun, that very night that Mr. Mountford was killed, and captain Hill, came into the Scene Room of the Play-house, and my lord Mohun had captain Hill's coat on, and captain Hill had my lord Mohun's coat on, and they changed their cloaths in the Play-house, I saw them change their cloaths; but what their design was, I cannot tell.

Att. Gen. When was that, Sir?

Hudson. That very night that the gentleman that is dead, Mr. Mountford, was killed.

Att. Gen. You say, that my lord Mohun was present when that discourse of Hill was, about Mountford at the tavern.

Hudson. Yes; but I cannot say my lord took any notice of it, for he made no reply that I heard.

L. H. Steward. Have you done with this witness?—Att. Gen. Yes, my lord.

Hudson. This is all that I know of the matter.

L. H. Steward. My lord Mohun, have you any thing to say to this witness?

L. Mohun. No, my lord.

Att. Gen. Then our next witness's name is George Powell. [Who was sworn in like manner.]

Att. Gen. Mr. Powell, you have heard the questions that have been asked Mr. Hudson. Pray will you make answers to them; and give my lords an account what you know of this matter.

Powell. May it please your lordships, about five or six days before Mr. Mountford was wounded, I was in company with captain Hill, and he began Mrs. Bracegirdle's health. I told him I would pledge it. Says he, I am sure there is no bar between me and Mrs. Bracegirdle but Mountford; and I am resolved to be revenged on him, one way or another. About three days afterwards I was at supper with my lord Mohun and captain Hill, and another gentleman, and the same discourse arose again, and captain Hill whispered me in the ear, says he, I am resolved to have the blood of Mountford. I told him I did not think it fit for him to speak so behind a gentleman's back, and to me, who was his friend. I said, I would acquaint Mr. Mountford what he said, and I did not doubt but he would give him the satisfaction of a gentleman for any injury he did him. I heard no further discourse at that time, nor do I know more of that matter, till the night that Mr. Mountford was wounded, when I saw him lying upon the parlour floor, and afterwards saw him laid to bed, and sat up all night with him, and about four o'clock in the morning, I asked Mr. Mountford how the thing happened. He told me captain Hill killed him basely; I asked him if his sword was drawn; Yes, says he, but it was after I had received my wound, for whilst my lord Mohun talked to me, Hill run me through.

Att. Gen. At that time, when those words were spoke at supper, That he designed to be the death of Mountford, was my lord present?

Powell. Yes, my lord Mohun was present, but he was talking to colonel Tredenham.

Att. Gen. Did my lord Mohun say any thing to what Hill said?

Powell. I did not hear him make any answer to it at all.

Att. Gen. Do you know any thing else in relation to this fact?

Powell. Nothing else, but that captain Hill did give a letter to be delivered to Mrs. Bracegirdle, but I know not whether it was delivered or not, and he often told me, he would marry her with all his heart.

Att. Gen. You say you had that discourse with Mountford, when he lay a-dying?

Powell. It was about four o'clock, and he died about one.

Att. Gen. Was there any thing said about my lord Mohun at that time?

Powell. Nothing, but that my lord Mohun was talking to him, whilst the other run him through.

L. H. Steward. If I understand you aright, you say nothing against my lord Mohun, but his being by one time at supper when Hill said some words about Mountford; and then the other thing you say is, what Mountford told you after he was wounded, That my lord was talking to him, when Hill gave him the wound?

Powell. Yes, my lord, that is all that I heard.

L. H. Steward. Has your lordship any thing to say to this witness?

L. Mohun. No, my lord.

Att. Gen. The next witness that we shall desire to call is Mrs. Knight. [Who was sworn.]

Mrs. Knight. I have nothing to say to my lord Mohun; but what I have to say, is to Mr. Hill. About four days before Mr. Mountford was killed, Mr. Hill came to me, and spoke to me about Mrs. Bracegirdle: he told me he was satisfied she hated him. I told him I did not believe it; he said, she did love some body, but he had thought of a way to be even with that body. Upon the Wednesday night before Mr. Mountford was killed, he came to me as I was coming out of the dressing-room; saith he, Mrs. Knight, let me speak a word with you; says he, You are very great with Mrs. Bracegirdle, and I desire you to be so kind, as to speak to her for me, and I would beg of you, if you would give me leave, to give her this letter from me: No, said I, Mr. Hill, I beg your pardon; you say she hateth you, and if she hateth you, she will not love any body that speaketh for you; and I am not fond of creating myself enemies in the house, knowing I have some already. What enemies? saith Mr. Hill; Mountford do you mean? and then repeating a great oath, I shall find a way with him speedily.

L. H. Stew. A way with what?

Mrs. Knight. A way with him speedily; Hill said it of Mr. Mountford.

L. H. Stew. What do you call this witness for, Mr. Attorney? what use do you make of her evidence against my lord Mohun?

Att. Gen. My lord, the use that we would make of these witnesses, is to give an account of the whole fact, from the beginning to the end, Hill's malice, and what was the occasion of it, his design in coming there that night, and what he did, and to leave it to your lordships, to judge what influence this will have, how far it will affect my lord Mohun. The next witness is Mrs. Sandys.

L. H. Stew. What is this woman's name?

Att. Gen. Mrs. Elizabeth Sandys. [She was sworn.]

Att. Gen. Mrs. Sandys, give my lords an account, whether you were present with my lord Mohun and Mr. Hill at the tavern that day that Mr. Mountford was killed, and what passed there.

Sandys. I dined with my lord Mohun and captain Hill, at the Three Tuns in Shandois-street, and there arose a discourse about Mrs. Bracegirdle and Hill, and my lord Mohun asked me, If I thought Mountford had lay with her or no. I said I could not tell; presently after, says my lord Mohun, It will cost Hill fifty guineas this design. Saith Mr. Hill, if the villain offers to resist, I will stab him; saith my lord Mohun, I will stand by my friend. When this was done, Mr. Hill desired Mr. Brough to borrow a case of pistols of captain Leister, and he said he would not borrow them himself, for he doubted, if he knew of the design, he would not lend them. When that was done, captain Hill told me, he had a coach and six horses in Witch-street, to seize Mrs. Bracegirdle, and carry her away into the country; and my lord Mohun said he would stand by his friend: and when my lord Mohun went away, Hill said to him, My lord, if you be not there by six o'clock, I am ruined. Saith my lord Mohun, upon my word and honour I will be at the Play-house by six.

L. H. Stew. My lord Mohun, have you any thing to say to that witness?

L. Mohun. Yes, my lord, I desire to have her asked, whether she is a maid, or a married woman?

L. H. Stew. You hear the question; but I do not know what use my lord will make of it.

Att. Gen. You can easily answer, whether you are married or unmarried.

L. H. Stew. That question is very fair; are you a married woman, or a single woman?

Sandys. I am a single woman, my lord.

Att. Gen. Pray, Mrs. Sandys, repeat the words that my lord Mohun said, when Hill said, if the villain resisted, he would stab him.

Sandys. My lord Mohun said nothing in the world, but that he would stand by his friend.

L. H. Stew. Have you any further questions, Mr. Attorney, to ask this witness?

Att. Gen. I have nothing more to ask her, my lord.

L. H. Stew. What say you, my lord Mohun; would you ask her any thing else?

L. Mohun. No, my lord.

L. H. Stew. Then withdraw. [Which she did.]

Att. Gen. The next witness we call is Mr. Rogers. [Who was sworn.]

L. H. Stew. What is this witness's name?

Att. Gen. Rogers, my lord.

L. H. Stew. What is his Christian name?

Att. Gen. John. If your lordships please to remember, that the last witness, Mrs. Sandys, said, that Mr. Hill desired my lord Mohun not to fail of being at the play house by six o'clock, and that he was undone if he did not come; and my lord promised upon his word and honour that he would come: Now we call this witness to prove that they met at the play house according to the appointment on the 9th of December.

Rogers. My lord, all that I know of this matter was, That my lord Mohun and captain Hill were at the play house that night, and that which made me take particular notice of their being then at the play house, though they had been frequently there before together, was that captain Hill had my lord Mohun's coat on, and my lord Mohun had captain Hill's coat on.

Att. Gen. Did you observe any thing else, when they were at the play house.

Rogers. Nothing but only some words that passed between captain Hill and my lord Mohun, when I went to ask them for the overplus of the money for coming in, because they came out of the pit upon the stage; he said, he would not give it me; but if I brought any of our masters, he would slit their noses, or something to that effect.

Att. Gen. What were the words he said when you asked him for money?

Rogers. I asked them for money, that they ought to pay more than the rest that were in the pit, because they came upon the stage, and they would not give it me; but he said, if I brought any of our masters, he would slit their noses, or cut their faces, or to that effect.

L. H. Stew. My lord, will your lordship ask him any questions?

L. Mohun. No, my lord.

L. H. Stew. Call another witness then.

Att. Gen. My lords, with your lordships favour, the next witness that we shall call, is the coachman, William Dixon. (Who was sworn.)

Att. Gen. Mr. Dixon, Do you remember the day when Mr. Mountford was killed?

Dixon. Yes, Sir.

Att. Gen. Pray acquaint my lords, what persons you carried in your coach that day; whether you carried my lord Mohun and Mr. Hill, and to what place, and where you waited for them.

Dixon. If it please your lordships, captain Hill and my lord Mohun came in a hackney coach to my gate, where I live, and I was just a going to set my coaches into the street for hire: They bargained with me for six horses, and I was to have thirty shillings to set them down at Totteridge, on this side Barnet. I asked them, whether they would have me bring all the six horses with the coach. No, they said, a pair would serve to the play house, and the other four should stand at the pound's end. So I went accordingly to the place appointed, over against the Horse shoe tavern in Drury lane, and a footman came, and Mr. Hill and he bid me drive down lower. So I drove to my lord of Clare's door, or thereabouts; and there was some soldiers that would have had me go in, and smoke and drink with them; I told them I did never smoke, and I did not care for drinking any thing at that time. With that my lord Mohun and Mr. Hill came into the coach, and, as they bid me, I carried them into Norfolk street, below the watch house that stood there; they bid me turn about, and stand there; and then they went to the White horse tavern; so I did turn about, and stayed as they bid me, and they tarried a pretty while before they came again, and then they bid me drive back to the place from whence I came, and so I drove into Drury lane, and they bid me stop next to my lord Craven's house, this was about ten o'clock, and it being so late, I went home, and sent a postillion down to take care of the coach, so that what passed afterwards I cannot tell.

L. H. Stew. What day or night was all this you speak of?

Dixon. Truly, my lord, I cannot tell what day it was; it was in December, as I take it, the 9th; and it was Friday, I believe; I do not know justly.

L. H. Stew. Did you hear of the death of Mr. Mountford?—Dixon. Yes, I did.

L. H. Stew. Was it the same day that you heard Mr. Mountford was killed?

Dixon. No, I did not hear it till the next morning.

Att. Gen. You say, you went with my lord Mohun and Mr. Hill into Norfolk street, and there you stayed for them, whilst they went elsewhere?—Dixon. Yes, I did so.

Att. Gen. Do you know to what houses they went?

Dixon. They went to the White Horse tavern, to the hithermost house on this side the strand, and, they went below to a door on this side of a house that is not finished yet.

Att. Gen. Did you hear them use any expressions there?

Dixon. I heard Hill say to my lord Mohun, I think there is a man and a maid talking, it was at the corner house; saith Hill, we are betrayed; damn me, saith he, my lord, let us go and thresh him.

Att. Gen. What did they do then?

Dixon. I did see them do nothing.

Att. Gen. Whither did you carry them from thence?

Dixon. To the place from whence they came in Drury lane.

L. H. Stew. Will your lordship say any thing to this man?

L. Mohun. I desire he may be asked, whether he had not orders to go out of town with us, as soon as Mrs. Bracegirdle was put into the coach.

Dixon. If it please you, Sir, I had order thus, That when we were to go out of town, I must drive down into the Strand, and then round about any way that was readiest and clearest to get to the pound; that order I had, and no other order I had.

L. H. Stew. Who is your next witness?

Att. Gen. My lords, the next witness we shall call, will give you an account what was done in Drury lane, upon their endeavouring to carry her away, and for that we have here Mrs. Bracegirdle herself.

L. H. Stew. What is this gentlewoman's name?

Att. Gen. Mrs. Ann Bracegirdle. (Then she was sworn.)

Att. Gen. Mrs. Bracegirdle, pray give my lords an account of the whole of your knowledge of the attempt that was made upon you in Drury lane, and what followed upon it.

Mrs. Bracegirdle. My lord, I was in Prince's street at supper at Mr. Page's, and at ten o'clock at night, Mr. Page went home with me; and coming down Drury lane, there stood a coach by my lord Craven's door, and the boot of the coach was down, and a great many men stood by it; and just as I came to the place where the coach stood, two soldiers came and pulled me from Mr. Page, and four or five more came up to them, and they knocked my mother down almost, for my mother and my brother were with me. My mother recovered, and came and hung about my neck, so that they could not get me into the coach, and Mr. Page went to call company to rescue me. Then Mr. Hill came with his sword drawn, and struck at Mr. Page and my mother; and when they could not get me into the coach because company came in, he said he would see me home, and he led me by one hand, and my mother by the other. And when we came home, he pulled Mr. Page by the sleeve, and said, Sir, I would speak with you.

Att. Gen. Pray, Mrs. Bracegirdle, did you see any body in the coach when they pulled you to it?

Mrs. Bracegirdle. Yes, my lord Mohun was in the coach; when they pulled me to the coach, I saw my lord Mohun in the coach. And when we came home, Hill pulled Mr. Page by the sleeve, and he said, he would speak with him. As they led me along Drury lane, my lord Mohun came out of the coach, and followed us, and all the soldiers followed them; but they were dismissed, and, as I said, when we came to our lodging, then Hill pulled Mr. Page by the sleeve, and said, he would speak with him. Saith Mr. Page, Mr. Hill, another time will do, to-morrow will serve; with that, when I was within doors, Mr. Page was pulled into the house, and Mr. Hill walked up and down in the street with his sword drawn. He had his sword drawn, when he came along with me.

Att. Gen. Did you observe him to say any thing whilst he was with you?

Mrs. Bracegirdle. As I was going down the hill, he said, as he led me, He would be revenged.

Att. Gen. Did he say of whom he would be revenged?

Mrs. Bracegirdle. He did not name of whom then, but when I was in the house, several persons went to the door, and afterwards Mrs. Browne went to the door, and spoke to them, and asked them, what they staid and walked there for? at last, they said, they staid to be revenged of Mr. Mountford; and then Mrs. Browne came in to me, and told me of it.

L. H. Stew. Who said that?

Mrs. Bracegirdle. Mr. Hill.

Att. Gen. Were my lord Mohun and Mr. Hill both together when that was said, that they staid to be revenged of Mr. Mountford?

Mrs. Bracegirdle. Yes, they were. And when Mrs. Browne came in and told me, I sent my brother, and the maid, and all the people we could, out of the house to Mrs.

Mountford, to desire her to send, if she knew where her husband was, to tell him of it, and she did. And when they came in a doors again, I went to the door, and the doors were shut, and I listened to hear if they were there still; and my lord Mohun and Mr. Hill were walking up and down the street; and by and by, the watch came up to them, and when the watch came, they said, Gentlemen, why do you walk with your swords drawn? Says my lord Mohun, I am a peer of England, touch me if you dare.

L. H. Stew. Repeat that again, for I could not well hear you: do you speak of what you heard from Mrs. Browne, or what you observed yourself?

Mrs. Bracegirdle. My lord, I was within doors, but I was listening at the door, and heard this myself; they came up to them, and said, Gentlemen, why do you walk with your swords drawn?

L. H. Stew. Who asked that question?

Mrs. Bracegirdle. The watch; and says my lord Mohun, I am a peer of England, touch me if you dare. Then the watch left them, and they went away, and a little after there was a cry of murder, and that is all that I know, my lord.

L. Mohun. My lord, I desire this witness may be asked, How long after this passage that she speaketh of, was it that she heard murder cried in the street.

L. H. Stew. You hear the question, Mrs. Bracegirdle; what say you to it?

Mrs. Bracegirdle. My lord, I believe it was about a quarter of an hour after, to the best of my memory.

L. H. Stew. What do you mean, a quarter of an hour after the watch asked the question?

Mrs. Bracegirdle. Yes, my lord.

[Then the Earl of Mulgrave stood up.]

L. H. Stew. My lord Mulgrave.

E. of Mulgrave. My lord, I desire to ask this witness a question. If I heard her aright, I think she said, they threatened to be revenged of Mr. Mountford, I desire to know of her, whether my lord Mohun did threaten him?

Mrs. Bracegirdle. I do not know indeed; but when Mrs. Browne asked them what they staid there for? they said, to be revenged of Mr. Mountford. I did not hear them myself, but Mrs. Browne came in and told me so.

Att. Gen. Mrs. Bracegirdle, I think, if I did not mistake, you said, when the watch came up, they asked them, why their swords were drawn?

Mrs. Bracegirdle. Yes, and my lord Mohun made answer, he was a peer of England, and bid them touch him if they durst, and they went away.

Att. Gen. My lord, the next witness that we call shall be Mr. Gawen Page, at whose house Mrs. Bracegirdle supped that night.

[He was sworn.]

Att. Gen. Mr. Page, I suppose you remember the night, when Mrs. Bracegirdle supped at your house?

Mr. Page. Yes, my lord.

Att. Gen. I pray give an account of your whole knowledge about this matter, what happened that night.

Mr. Page. About ten o'clock at night, on Friday the 9th of December last, going down Drury-lane, with Mrs. Bracegirdle, whom I led, just against my lord Craven's house—

L. H. Stew. Pray, Sir, speak out, and tell us what time it was.

Mr. Page. About ten o'clock at night, on Friday the 9th of December last, going down Drury-lane, and leading Mrs. Bracegirdle, right against my lord Craven's door stood a coach, where two soldiers pressed in between me and Mrs. Bracegirdle, and parted us: I asked what that was for? But they took hold of Mrs. Bracegirdle, and immediately they would have forced her into the coach; captain Hill, whom I saw there with his sword drawn, made several blows at me.

L. H. Stew. Who would have forced her into the coach?

Mr. Page. The soldiers would.

Att. Gen. Pray, go on, Sir, what followed after that?

Mr. Page. I say, captain Hill made several blows at me, and cried, You villain, stand. I received many of them upon my cane, but there was none that hurt me; then I got help, and they were prevented of carrying Mrs. Bracegirdle away. My lord Mohun was in the coach; I saw him in the coach.

Att. Gen. Did you see any arms in the coach?

Mr. Page. I saw no arms, but I saw a bundle in the coach; though I could not tell what it was; and there was one in the coach, that I saw was my lord Mohun. So when we had got help we went down the lane to convey her home, and captain Hill was with us, and my lord Mohun followed at a distance. Captain Hill said to the soldiers, 'Begone, I have no thing more to do with you now.' When we came to the house, and Mrs. Bracegirdle was entering in, captain Hill pulled me by the sleeve, and said he would speak with me. Said I, to-night is not a fit time, to-morrow is better, therefore pray stay till to-morrow morning. But said he, 'God damn me, you will not go home to-night.'

L. H. Stew. You speak so low, that I cannot tell what you say; I did not hear that last that you said.

Mr. Page. My lord, I say, when captain Hill pulled me by the sleeve, and said he would speak with me, I told him that night was not a fit time, to-morrow would do better: well, saith he, 'To-morrow then, but God damn me, you will not go out to night.' I went in a doors, and there my lord Mohun and he staid for an hour and a half, as I was told; I saw them not myself: but Mrs. Browne came in and said, that they said they waited to be revenged.

Att. Gen. Whom did they mean, yourself that they would be revenged of?

Mr. Page. Mrs. Browne said, they waited for Mr. Mountford.

Att. Gen. Did you continue in that house till after the murder was committed?

Mr. Page. Yes, Sir, I did.

L. H. Stew. How long after you came into the house was the fact done?

Mr. Page. About an hour and an half.

L. H. Stew. Did you yourself hear or observe any thing to be said or done, from the time you came into the house, to the time the fact was committed?

Mr. Page. No, my lord, I was in the back-room of the house.

Att. Gen. Pray, Mr. Page, did you see Mr. Mountford after he was wounded?

Mr. Page. Yes, I did.

Att. Gen. Then give my lords an account of what passed at that visit.

Mr. Page. Upon the outcry of murder, I came into the street, where I found my lord Mohun just surrendering himself to the constable; and immediately I went to Mr. Mountford's house, and I found him lying all along in his blood upon the floor; he seeing me, desired me to lift him up, which I did, and thinking he had been dying, I asked him whether he knew me. He said, Yes. Said I to him, Had you time to draw your sword in your defence? He said, 'He was barbarously run through before he could draw it.'

Att. Gen. Is this all you have to say, Sir?

Mr. Page. Yes.

L. H. Stew. Will your lordship ask this witness any questions?

L. Mohun. My lord, I desire he may be asked, whether my sword was drawn when I surrendered myself to the constable.

Mr. Page. No, my lord, your sword was in the scabbard when you surrendered yourself, but I cannot say whether your sword was drawn before or not.

Att. Gen. The next witness that we desire to call is Mrs. Page. [She was sworn.]

L. H. Stew. What is the name of this witness?

Att. Gen. Mrs. Mary Page. Pray Mrs. Page, do you remember the night when Mrs. Bracegirdle supped at your house, and Mr. Mountford was killed? Acquaint my lords with all you did observe that night.

Mrs. Page. Mrs. Bracegirdle supped at my lodging, and my husband went home with her, and staying something longer than ordinary, I sent my servant to know what was the reason of it: he brought me word back, that my husband had like to have been murdered, and Mrs. Bracegirdle carried away. With that I went down myself towards Mrs. Bracegirdle's lodgings, and there I found my lord Mohun, and Mr. Hill walking, Mr. Hill with his sword drawn, before Mrs. Bracegirdle's door, and my lord Mohun's not. So I went in, into the house; and after I had staid awhile there, Mrs. Browne came out to them, and asked them, why they staid there? They made answer, they staid for Mr. Mountford.

Att. Gen. Who made that answer?

Mrs. Page. Mr. Hill.

Att. Gen. Who was with Mr. Hill at that time?—Mrs. Page. My lord Mohun.

Att. Gen. Was there any body besides those two that you observed?

Mrs. Page. No, there was nobody else that I saw?

Att. Gen. Were their swords drawn?

Mrs. Page. Mr. Hill's then was, my lord Mohun's at that present was not: but Mrs. Bracegirdle hearing that they waited for Mr. Mountford, desired me to go over to Mrs. Mountford's house, and speak to her to send to her husband, and desire him to keep where he was, or come home with a good guard. Whilst I was telling Mrs. Mountford what I was desired to tell her—But I should have told your lordships, that when I came out to go to Mrs. Mountford, my lord Mohun had then his sword drawn.

Att. Gen. Were they there when you went out of Mrs. Bracegirdle's lodgings?

Mrs. Page. Yes, they were.

Att. Gen. And are you sure, that at that time when you went out of Mrs. Bracegirdle's house, my lord Mohun had his sword drawn?

Mrs. Page. I am sure of it, that when I went out, my lord Mohun had then his sword drawn; that was the second time.

L. H. Stew. Out of whose house was that you went?

Mrs. Page. Out of Mrs. Bracegirdle's lodgings.

L. H. Stew. Where were they, when you saw his sword drawn?

Mrs. Page. They were walking before Mrs. Bracegirdle's door from one end of the street to the other.

Att. Gen. What street is that?

Mrs. Page. Howard-street.

Att. Gen. Pray describe to my lords that street.

Mrs. Page. They that stand in that street, can see who goeth down to Mrs. Mountford's house, and who goeth up Surrey-street.

Att. Gen. Well, now go on.

Mrs. Page. Whilst I was desiring Mrs. Mountford to send away to her husband, I heard murder cried out; immediately I opened Mr. Mountford's door, and he came in, and fell with his arms round about my neck to support himself, I suppose; and he said Hill had murdered him. I helped him as far as the parlour door, and there down he fell. I went up the street, and called out 'murder,' and my lord Mohun came to me, and bid me take notice he had no hand in the murder, for his sword was not drawn. I told him, I could not tell that, for to my knowledge he had been in Mr. Hill's company with his naked sword just before.

Att. Gen. Call Mrs. Browne.

L. H. Stew. You have nothing to say to that witness, my lord, have you?

L. Mohun. No, my lord.

Att. Gen. Is this all you have to say, Mrs. Page?

Mrs. Page. After this, my lord Mohun resigned himself up to the constable; the constable standing by me, I bid him secure my lord Mohun, which he did.

L. Mohun. My lord, I desire to ask this witness, whether I surrendered myself, or made opposition, or offered to run away?

Mrs. Page. No, my lord, the constable laid hold on you.

L. H. Stew. What answer do you make to my lord's question?

Mrs. Page. I say, my lord, the constable laid hold upon my lord Mohun.

L. Mohun. I desire to ask her whether I did not surrender myself?

Mrs. Page. Not till I had desired the constable to secure your lordship.

L. Mohun. Did I make any opposition, or offer to run away?

Mrs. Page. No, for the constable presently took hold of your lordship.

L. Mohun. I desire she may be asked whether Hill run away.

Mrs. Page. That I know not; I suppose he was gone away out of the street before I came forth.

Att. Gen. Swear Mrs. Browne. [Which was done.]

Att. Gen. Mrs. Browne, you are upon your oath, pray declare to my lords what you know happened upon that night that Mr. Mountford was killed.

Mrs. Browne. If it please your lordships, when Mrs. Bracegirdle came home, I found her crying; I asked her what was the matter? She said, my lord Mohun and Mr. Hill had run her into a coach, with six or seven soldiers, and lifted her into the coach, and she said they were at the door. Upon which, I went to the door, and saw my lord Mohun and Mr. Hill walking along. Said I, Are you the gentlemen that have used Mrs. Bracegirdle in this manner? my lord Mohun answered; 'Madam,' said he, 'I protected her; if it had not been for me, the rabble would have torn her a pieces; for if we had a mind to carry her away, we had six or seven pistols charged in the coach, and could easily have suppressed the tumult.'

L. H. Stew. I do not hear what the witness saith, she speaketh so low.

Mrs. Browne. My lord Mohun said, they had six or seven pistols in the coach, and could easily have suppressed the rabble, if they would have carried her away; but he had no design upon her for his own part, but only to serve his friend; and that Mr. Hill's design was to take her out of town, and keep her a week, and see if he could persuade her to marry him; and saith Mr. Hill, 'I shall light on this Mountford.' Why, said I to him, What hurt hath Mr. Mountford done you? Saith he, 'I have been abused, and I will be revenged.'

L. H. Stew. That was Hill that said so.

Mrs. Browne. Yes. So I went and told Mrs. Mountford of it.

Att. Gen. Pray acquaint my lords what my lord Mohun said to you about this matter.

VOL. XII.

Mrs. Browne. My lord Mohun said he protected her, for if it had not been for him, the mob had torn her in pieces; but if they had a mind to carry her off, they could easily have suppressed the mob, for they had six or seven pistols in the coach: 'but,' saith my lord, 'I had no design upon her myself, but only to serve my friend.' So saith Mr. Hill, 'I shall light upon this Mountford.' 'Why,' said I, 'what hurt hath Mr. Mountford done you?' Saith he, 'I have been abused, and I will have my revenge.' So I went and told Mrs. Mountford of it. About half an hour after, or more, Mr. Mountford came down, and when he came down, I saw him a little before he came to them, and went to him, and would have fain spoke to him, but he would not stay to let me speak what I had to say to him, but going on, presently he met my lord Mohun. Saith he, 'Your humble servant, my lord.' Saith my lord again, 'Your servant, Mr. Mountford.' Saith my lord, 'I have a great respect for you, Mr. Mountford, and would have no difference between us; but there is a thing fallen out between Mr. Hill and Mrs. Bracegirdle.' Saith Mr. Mountford, 'My lord, has my wife disoblged your lordship? if she has, she shall ask your pardon; but as for Mrs. Bracegirdle, she is no concern of mine; and I hope your lordship will not vindicate such an ill man as Mr. Hill in such a matter as this.' Upon that I heard Mr. Hill bid Mr. Mountford draw, Mr. Mountford said, 'That I will;' and drew his sword; but whether he received his wound before he drew his sword, or after, I cannot tell.

L. H. Stew. Speak that last again.

Mrs. Browne. Mr. Mountford and my lord met; saith Mr. Mountford, 'Your servant, my lord;' saith my lord, 'Your servant, Mr. Mountford, I have a great respect for you, and would have no difference between us; but here has been a thing fallen out between Mrs. Bracegirdle and Mr. Hill.' Saith Mr. Mountford presently again, 'Has my wife disoblged your lordship? If she has, she shall ask your pardon. But Mrs. Bracegirdle is no concern of mine: I know nothing of this matter, I come here by accident.'

Att. Gen. Who said they came there by accident?

Mrs. Browne. Mr. Mountford said, 'I know nothing of this matter, I come here by accident. But, I hope your lordship will not vindicate Hill in such actions as these are:' upon that, I heard Mr. Hill bid Mr. Mountford draw; Mr. Mountford said he would, and drew his sword; but whether he received his wound before or after, I cannot tell; it was in the night. [Then the lord Godolphin stood up.]

L. H. Stew. My lord Godolphin.

L. Godolphin. My Lord Steward, I desire this witness may be asked, whether my lord Mohun's sword was drawn when he talked with Mountford, because the counsel opened it before, that the watch came to them, and saw them with their swords drawn when they were walking in the street.

L. H. Stew. Mistress, you heard my lord's question: was my lord Mohun's sword drawn whilst he talked with Mountford, or no?

Mrs. Browne. I do not remember I did see my lord Mohun's sword drawn.

Att. Gen. Were they near together?

Mrs. Browne. They were near together.

L. Mohun. I desire she may be asked whether I went up the street to meet Mr. Mountford, or he came down to me?

L. H. Stew. You heard the question, mistress, what say you?

Mrs. Browne. Mr. Mountford came down to him.

L. Mohun. I desire she may be asked, whether she did not go to hinder Mr. Mountford from coming that way?

Mrs. Browne. Yes, I did go to speak to him, but he did not hear me speak, or did not hearken to me; I took him by the hand, and told him I would speak with him, but he did not hear me, but went on.

Att. Gen. You did not tell him upon what account you would have spoke with him?

Mrs. Browne. No, I had no time.

L. Mohun. I desire she may be asked, whether Mr. Mountford's sword was within his arm, or by his side.

Mrs. Browne. I believe it was by his side.

L. Mohun. I desire she may be asked one question more, whether he could not have went home, without coming to Mr. Hill and me?

Mrs. Browne. He did come out of his way; his way was not by my house; he did come down the street towards them.

L. Mohun. I desire your lordships to take notice that he came out of his way to me. I desire to ask her: did he come as if he was going to his own house, or your's?

Mrs. Browne. As if he was coming to mine.

L. Mohun. I desire to ask her, whether I had any hand in killing Mr. Mountford, or went to hold him, or meddled with him?

Mrs. Browne. Not that I did see.

L. H. Stew. Have you any more to say to this witness?

Att. Gen. No, my lord.

L. H. Stew. Nor your lordship?

L. Mohun. No, my lord.

Att. Gen. Then the next witness we desire to call, is Richard Row. [Who was sworn.]

Att. Gen. Richard Row, where do you live?

Row. In Surrey-street.

L. H. Stew. Where doth he live, saith he?

Att. Gen. In Surrey-street, my lord. Pray how near is that to the place where Mr. Mountford was killed?

Row. About ten or twelve pole.

Att. Gen. Did you observe my lord Mohun and Mr. Hill that night, and where were they?

Row. All that I can say to the matter in that case is, I was in my own house about a quarter after ten a clock, and I heard a noise in the street, and I went out, and saw two gentlemen and two lads about the middle of the channel; one of the lads had one of the gentlemen by the arm, just by the channel, and said, 'Pray my lord, good my lord, don't do it, alter your resolution.' There was an answer made, that they would be revenged that night, or tomorrow.

Att. Gen. Do you know who the boy was that used that expression?

Row. No, my lord, it was very dark.

Att. Gen. Do you not know neither who returned the answer?—Row. No indeed.

Att. Gen. But you are sure you heard those words pass?

Row. Yes, indeed, and I went to the door afterwards, whilst they went to the upper end of the street, and returned again; and I saw capt. Hill's boy following him. My lord, I knew capt. Hill, though he was not in the cloaths he formerly used to come to my house in, and the boy I knew to be his boy.

Att. Gen. Were those persons together that you heard speaking so?

Row. Yes, all four together, in a confusion they seemed to be, for they were pushing to and again, and the boy had hold of one of the gentlemen's arms, when he bid him alter his resolution.

Att. Gen. Repeat those words again that you heard him say.

Row. 'Pray my lord, good my lord, do not do it, alter your resolution.'

L. H. Stew. Has your lordship any thing to ask this witness?

L. Mohun. No, my lord.

Row. I spoke of this same afterwards, and so they brought me here to give evidence: this is all that I can say. I cannot swear to my lord Mohun, that he was one, I do not know that ever I saw him to my knowledge in my life.

E. of Mulgrave. My Lord Steward, I desire he may be asked, whether he knoweth who that boy was that made that answer?

Row. There was no answer made by any boy, but begging and praying, 'That my lord would not do it.'

E. of Mulgrave. Do you know who that boy was?

Row. No, I do not know what boy it was. But when I heard Mr. Mountford was killed, and my lord Mohun was concerned, I told what I had heard and seen, and so they bring me here to evidence it. That is all I can say to the matter.

Att. Gen. My lord, we desire next to call some of the watch, and shall begin with Merry. [Who was sworn.]

L. H. Stew. What is his name?

Att. Gen. William Merry. Mr. Merry, I think you are beadle of the parish.

Merry. Yes, I am.

Att. Gen. Pray acquaint my lords what you observed that night Mr. Mountford was killed, when you saw my lord Mohun and Mr. Hill, the first time; and the second time, when my lord Mohun was taken.

Merry. When I first came down the street, walking the rounds between 11 and 12 a clock, as I turned at the corner out of Surry-street into Howard-street, I saw my lord Mohun and capt. Hill walking, that is, upon the paved stones; my lord was walking towards me, and I asked, Who comes there? Saith my lord, A friend. Said I, What is the meaning of your swords being drawn? Return your swords, and stand off. With that, he returned his sword immediately. Saith he, 'I am a peer of the land; here, will you have my sword?' and he proffered me his sword; but the constable was not there then, and I did not take his sword; but, said I, God bless your honour, my lord, I know not what you are, but I hope you are doing no harm; No, saith he. With that, the constable came immediately, and he proffered the same to him; there were two candles in some maids or women's hands at a door hard by, and I went to ask them if they knew the meaning of it; and there being a neighbour's man leaning with a bottle and a glass against the wall, whom I knew. I think they told me one of them had a sweetheart there; and my lord said, he was drinking a lady's health, and as soon as his bottle was out, he would be gone. That is all I heard of the matter.

Att. Gen. Was Mr. Hill there?

Merry. Yes, he was.

Att. Gen. Was his sword drawn?

Merry. Yes, his sword was drawn, and I asked what made that gentleman with his sword drawn; and my lord Mohun said, he had lost his scabbard; but seeing this neighbour's man stand there, I went to the house.

Att. Gen. Were both their swords drawn at first?

Merry. Both their swords were drawn when I came first into the street; but my lord put up his sword, and the other continued drawn, by reason as they said, he had lost his scabbard. And so seeing, as I said, my neighbour's man standing there, we went to that house to enquire if they knew what their business was; we were not got into the house, I am sure not a stone's cast within the house, but murder was cried out, and we came back again, and my master being nimbler of foot than I, because he was a younger man, came first into the place, and seized my lord before I came; how the seizing was I do not know.

Att. Gen. Our next witness is Thomas Fennell. [Who was sworn.]

Att. Gen. Fennell, you was one of the watch that night when Mr. Mountford was killed.

Fennell. Yes, Sir.

Att. Gen. Give my lords an account what you observed that night, in relation to my lord Mohun and Mr. Hill.

Fennell. The constable and his watch going the rounds, divided themselves into two parts; I went down Surrey-street with one party; the constable he went down Strand-lane with the other party. We were four or five that came down Surrey-street, and when we came down; my lord Mohun and captain Hill's swords were both drawn; my lord Mohun put up his sword just as we came down.

L. H. Stew. Speak out, man, that my lords may all hear you.

Fennell. I say, the constable and his party went down Strand-lane, and another party down Surrey-street, four or five of us, and my lord Mohun and captain Hill had both their swords drawn: when we came down, my lord put up his sword just as we came down, but the constable not being come, I went and called him.

Att. Gen. You say both their swords were drawn when you came down?

Fennell. Yes, but my lord put up his sword just as we came down.

Att. Gen. What time of night was that?

Fennell. It was between eleven and twelve.

Att. Gen. How long before the murder was committed?—Fennell. A quarter of an hour.

L. H. Stew. Do you not say they put up their swords as soon as you came down?

Fennell. My lord Mohun put up his sword, but Hill said he had never a scabbard.

Att. Gen. Did you ask them why they had their swords drawn at that time of night?

Fennell. No, I went to call the constable.

L. H. Stew. Have you any more to ask of this witness?—Att. Gen. I have not, my lord.

L. H. Stew. Nor you, my lord?

L. Mohun. No, my lord.

L. H. Stew. Pray go on then; whom do you produce next?

Att. Gen. Our next witness is James Bassit. (Who was sworn.)

Att. Gen. Were you one of the watch that night Mr. Mountford was killed?

Bassit. Yes.

Att. Gen. Did you see my lord Mohun and capt. Hill that night?—Bassit. Yes.

Att. Gen. Acquaint my lords where it was, and in what manner you found them.

Bassit. In Howard-street; I came along with the constable, and I walked before them that went down Surrey-street with my lanthorn, and there was my lord Mohun with his sword drawn, and captain Hill with his the like: we asked them what they did there? They said they were drinking of a bottle of wine; Hill said to me, You may knock me down if you please: Nay, said I, we never use to knock any gentlemen down, unless there be occasion; and then we went into Norfolk-street to the tavern to examine what they were, and what they were doing; and in the mean time the murder was done.

Att. Gen. Did you not ask them why their swords were drawn?—Bassit. Yes, I did.

Att. Gen. What did they say?

Bassit. Hill made answer, that he had lost his scabbard.

Att. Gen. What said my lord Mohun?

Bassit. My lord Mohun had put up his sword by that time we came up to him: that is all I can say to it.

L. H. Stew. If you have nothing more to ask him, call another.

L. Mohun. My lord, I desire he may be asked whether he came with the constable when I surrendered myself?

Bassit. Yes, and I took hold of your sleeve, and you shook, and quaked, and trembled, as if you would tear it to pieces.

L. Mohun. I desire he may be asked, whether my sword was in the scabbard when I surrendered myself?

Bassit. Yes, it was, he surrendered it.

L. H. Stew. That was after the murder was done.

Att. Gen. With your lordship's favour, I desire he may answer my lord Mohun's first question again, so as to be heard by your lordships: what was that you were saying when my lord surrendered himself?

Bassit. I took him by the arm when he surrendered himself up.

Att. Gen. What then?

Bassit. Then he quaked, and I had him to the Round-house.

L. H. Stew. Hear my question; you say you took him by the sleeve, when he surrendered himself; what do you mean by that? is it that he had surrendered himself before you laid hold on him, or afterwards?

Bassit. I took hold of his arm, when he surrendered himself.

L. H. Stew. But was it before he surrendered himself to the constable?

Bassit. No, it was afterwards, my lord; to have him away.

L. H. Stew. Then you did see him surrender himself to the constable?

Bassit. Yes, my lord.

Att. Gen. Then call Mr. Charles Knowles. (But he did not appear.)

L. H. Stew. Whom do you call next, Sir?

Att. Gen. My lords, we called Mr. Charles Knowles; but they say, he is not come; therefore, with your lordships favour, we will call Mrs. Brewer. (Who was sworn.)

Att. Gen. Mrs. Brewer, I think, you live at the next door to Mrs. Bracegirdle's lodging?

Mrs. Brewer. Yes, I do so.

Att. Gen. Pray give my lords an account what you saw and heard that night Mr. Mountford was killed.

Mrs. Brewer. I was at Mrs. Bracegirdle's house, and I went to the door with them; and just as I went to the door, my lord Mohun came up to me; just as he came to the door, Mr. Mountford came down the street, and my lord went to him, and embraced him, and said, Mr. Mountford, your humble servant, I am glad to see you. Who is this, said Mr. Mountford, my lord Mohun. Yes, said my lord. What makes your lordship here at this time a night, saith Mr. Mountford? Saith my lord again, I suppose, Mr. Mountford, you was sent for. Sent for, for what, saith he? You have heard of the business of Mrs. Bracegirdle, I suppose, saith my lord; no, my lord, saith he, I come by chance.

Att. Gen. Who said that?

Mrs. Brewer. Mr. Mountford, Sir.

Att. Gen. Well, go on, and speak aloud.

Mrs. Brewer. My lord, Mr. Mountford— And there she hesitated, and seemed to be in a confusion.

Att. Gen. She is not used to such public examinations: if your lordships will please to allow her to begin, because she is in some confusion, she will be the better able to give you what account she can of this matter.

L. H. Stew. Let her recollect herself, and begin again.

Mrs. Brewer. When Mr. Mountford came down the street, I stood at the door, and my lord Mohun was come to the door, and my lord Mohun went to him and said, Mr. Mountford, your humble servant, I am glad to see you, and embraced him. Saith Mr. Mountford, Who is this, my lord Mohun? Yes, saith he, it is. What maketh your lordship here at this time of night? Saith my lord Mohun, I suppose you are sent for, Mr. Mountford. No indeed, said he, I came by chance. Saith my lord, You have heard of the business of Mrs. Bracegirdle. With that, after he had said this, Mr. Hill cometh up, and saith, Pray, my lord, hold your tongue, this is not a convenient time to discourse this business, and would have drawn my lord away. Saith Mr. Mountford, I am very sorry, my lord, to see that your lordship should assist capt. Hill in so ill an action as this; pray let me desire your lordship to forbear. Upon this, as soon as he had said so, Mr. Hill came up and struck Mr. Mountford a box on the ear. Saith Mr. Mountford, Damme, what is that for? And with that, he whipped out his sword, and made a pass at him, and I turned about and cried out Murder, murder.

Att. Gen. But you say, you saw Hill draw his sword, and make a pass at him?

Mrs. Brewer. No, his sword was drawn before; but he, immediately after the box on the ear, made a pass at him, and I turned about and cried Murder.

Att. Gen. Had Mr. Mountford his sword drawn at that time?

Mrs. Brewer. No, he had not.

Att. Gen. Are you sure he had not?

Mrs. Brewer. Yes I am sure he had not, for as soon as he struck the blow, he made a pass at him.

Att. Gen. Was my lord present at that time?

Mrs. Brewer. He stood just by on the right-hand.

Att. Gen. How near to them?

Mrs. Brewer. They were all close together, as well as I could discern.

L. H. Stew. My lord, have you any mind to ask this witness any questions?

L. Mohun. No, my lord.

L. H. Stew. Have you done with her?

Att. Gen. Yes, my lord. The next witness we desire to call is Mr. Davenport, the constable. (Who was sworn.)

L. H. Stew. Well, what saith this man?

Davenport. The 9th of December last at night, as I was walking my rounds between eleven and twelve o'clock, I divided my watch into two parts, one was to go down one street, and the other another, and coming into Howard-street, my beadle happened to be there before me, and he had spied them, as he told me, with their swords drawn: as soon as I came up, my lord Mohun very civilly (his sword not being then drawn) proffered to surrender his sword to me, and said, he was a peer of the realm. I asked the other man what he did with his sword drawn? and he made answer, he had lost his scabbard in Drury-lane. With that I found them very civil, and I heard some women at the door, and they said, they were serenading them with a bottle of wine. There was a drawer there that I knew, who formerly lived over-against me, and then lived at the White-horse tavern; so I left them (finding them very civil) and went to the White-horse tavern to examine what the business was; they told me, they were there a drinking, and before I had spoken three words almost to the man of the house, the watch was called, and when we came, Mr. Hill had made his escape, and so I secured my lord Mohun.

Att. Gen. What was the occasion of calling the watch?

Davenport. They cried out Murder in the street; so I took my lord Mohun, and carried him to the Round-house, where we kept him all night.

Att. Gen. I think you say, when you first came my lord Mohun's sword was not drawn.

Davenport. It was put up then, but the beadle said they were both drawn before.

Att. Gen. You did not see them so soon as your beadle?

Davenport. No, he was there before me.

Att. Gen. Then acquaint my lord what was done, after you had secured my lord Mohun.

Davenport. After I had taken him, I carried him to the Round-house, and when we came there, he asked me, If Hill was taken? I said no; and said I, my lord, this is a bad misfortune you are happened into; and he said, 'God damn me, I am glad he is not taken, but I am sorry he has no more money about him; I wish he had some of mine; and, I do not care a farthing if I am hanged for him.'

L. Mohun. My lord, I desire he may be asked whether I offered to fly.

Davenport. No, my lord, I do not say you did, but you know, my lord, you said this to me.

L. H. Stew. But, Mr. Davenport, did not my lord surrender himself to you?

Davenport. Yes, my lord, mighty civilly.

Att. Gen. Did my lord say any thing to you about changing of coats?

Davenport. He said, they had changed coats three or four several times that day, and at the same time he had Hill's coat upon his back; and I asked him, if he knew where Hill's lodging was? and he told me; and I went to his lodging with my watch; and when we came there, we searched the house, but did not find him there; but captain Hill's boy came in whilst we were there; so with that, I secured the boy, and searched him, and found gunpowder and ball about him; and I have Hill's sword in the court, and Mr. Mountford's and my lord's.

L. Mohun. I desire he may be asked, whether Mountford's sword was not broke in the street, or whether he carried it away.

Davenport. I took up a piece myself, and a servant maid took up another in the street.

L. Mohun. I desire he may be asked, whether Mr. Mountford's sword, when it was found, was in the scabbard or not.

Davenport. No, it was not; I saw no scabbard.

L. H. Stew. My lord, you ask the questions so fast, that we do not hear the answers. Was not your first question, whether Mountford's sword was not broken?

L. Mohun. Yes, my lord.

L. H. Stew. What answer giveth he to that?

Davenport. I do not know when it was broken; but by the report of people that were there by, it was said, Mr. Mountford made a pass, and at the first pass his sword was broken; and I went with a lanthorn, and according as they said, I found a piece of a sword, and I took it up myself.

L. H. Stew. What is your next question, my lord?

L. Mohun. I would ask him in what part of the street he found the piece of the broken sword.

L. H. Stew. You heard the question, what say you?

Davenport. It was in the highway in the street.

L. H. Stew. My lord Mohun, what do you mean by that question?

L. Mohun. Whether it was in the middle of the street towards Surrey-street or Norfolk-street, or near Mrs. Bracegirdle's lodging, or upon the pavement?

Davenport. It was over against the door where you stood.

L. Mohun. How far might it be from where I stood? I desire he may be asked that.

L. H. Stew. You hear my lord's question, answer it.

Davenport. He was walking up and down when I came to take him; and I took the piece of the sword up in the highway; he was walking on the pavement, the broad stones.

L. H. Stew. Have you done with that witness?

Att. Gen. Yes, my lord. Is Mr. Charles Knowles come? He did not appear.

Att. Gen. Then we desire to call Mr. Bancroft the chyrurgeon, and Mr. Hunt.

L. H. Stew. Who do you examine first?

Att. Gen. We begin with Mr. Bancroft. [Who was sworn.]

Att. Gen. You attended upon Mr. Mountford, Mr. Bancroft, when he was wounded?

Bancroft. Yes, my lord.

Att. Gen. Pray acquaint my lords what you know of this matter.

Bancroft. My lord, upon the 9th of December last at night, between the hours of twelve and one, I was knocked up to go to Mr. Mountford, whose servant came for me, and told me, he was a dying of a wound he had received. So I came to his house, and found him very desperately wounded; it went in and out by his back bone, behind his left side. I told him what he must expect, that he was a dead man. I attended him that night till about four a clock, in the morning, and then I took my leave of him, and went home: about eight a clock in the morning I came thither again, and met Mr. Hobbs there, and he was of the same opinion. He lived till about one, and then he died.

Att. Gen. What discourse had you with Mr. Mountford?

Bancroft. About ten a clock, I was sent for by the constable to come to Hick's-hall to be examined there before the justices; and being then with Mr. Mountford, and some company being there, Mr. Powell (as I take it) was one; I said to Mr. Mountford, I suppose where I am going, I shall be asked some questions about what you may have said to me; you are now upon the brink of eternity, and pray answer me truly, who gave you this wound; was it Mr. Hill, or my lord Mohun? Said he, My lord Mohun offered me no violence, but while I was talking with my lord Mohun, Hill struck me with his left hand, and with his right hand run me through before I could put my hand to my sword.

Att. Gen. Did he tell you his sword was drawn?

Bancroft. He did not say, it was or not, but that Hill struck him with his left hand, and at the same time, run him through with his right, before he could put his hand to his sword.

Att. Gen. Did he tell you my lord Mohun's sword was drawn?

Bancroft. The words were these as near as I remember, My lord Mohun offered me no violence, but whilst I was talking with him, Hill with his left hand struck me, and with his right, run me through, before I had time to put my hand to my sword.

Att. Gen. Did he tell you he had his sword drawn at all afterwards?

Bancroft. No, not a word of that, that I heard.

L. H. Stew. My lord Mohun, have you any thing to say to him?

L. Mohun. No my lord.

Then Mr. William Hunt was sworn.

Att. Gen. Mr. Hunt, you have heard what Mr. Bancroft was examined to, do you give an account what you know in relation to this business.

Hunt. I was sent for to Mr. Mountford, when he lay very ill; and I then asked him the manner of his being hurt, he said, My lord Mohun spoke to me, but Hill run me through before my sword was drawn. I asked him, whether he had time to draw his sword? and he said Hill was in me, and was through me, before my sword was out; and this he repeated again about twelve a clock, about half an hour before he died the next day.

L. H. Stew. Will you ask him any thing else, Mr. Attorney?

Att. Gen. We shall ask him no more questions, my lord.

L. H. Stew. Will you ask him any, my lord Mohun?—L. Mohun. No, my lord.

L. H. Stew. Then have you any more witnesses?

Att. Gen. My lord, I do not hear that Mr. Knowles is come yet; and if he be not come, we have no more witnesses to examine; if he does come, we must beg leave that we may examine him.

L. H. Stew. You know that the court cannot stay; for after you have done on both sides, my lords are to withdraw, and we are not to sit here in expectation of your witnesses.

Att. Gen. My lord, we do not expect that; if my lord Mohun please to examine any witnesses on his part, and it happen that the witness should come before my lord has made an end, we hope your lordships will favour us so far, as that we may examine him.

L. H. Stew. My lord Mohun, if you have any witnesses to be examined, now is your time to call them.

L. Mohun. I desire first, Mr. Hill's foot-boy may be called.

L. H. Stew. Name him. [He came to the bar.]

L. Mohun. My lords, if you please, I desire Mr. Brereton may be called first, because I would prove to your lordships, and shew you I had no malice to Mr. Mountford.

L. H. Stew. I thought you had called that boy first.

L. Mohun. That was a mistake, my lord; this gentleman, Mr. Brereton, I desire may be first examined.

Mr. Brereton. My lord, I know nothing as to this matter of fact, for I had not seen my lord Mohun of two or three days before.

L. H. Stew. What do you examine this witness to, my lord?

L. Mohun. To shew that I had no malice against Mr. Mountford, but spoke kindly of him several times.

Brereton. I had not seen my lord Mohun for two or three days before this fact was committed, and therefore can give no account of what happened then; but the Friday before the play of Alexander the Great was acted, and my lord Mohun and I were at the Play-house, and he and I went to supper together, and we were talking of the play, and he said it was a good play, and commended several parts in it, and particularly the acting; and he commended Mr. Mountford's acting extremely: I said, I thought he never acted so well in his life before; but my lord spoke particularly very kind things of Mr. Mountford, that he thought him a very good actor. I answered, as to comedy, he did use to act very well, but I thought he would never make so good a tragedian as Mr. Betterton, or some others. But my lord before this, had used to commend Mr. Mountford and speak kindly of him: and he said, that several of the players had been very rude to him, more than their business did require of them; but Mr. Mountford had been more civil than any of the rest. Upon this, my lord Mohun was pleased to ask me, Whether I was acquainted with Mr. Mountford? I told him, I never was in his company but once with Mr. Bludworth. Saith my lord, I have a great mind to drink a bottle of wine with him. Said I, I do not think him worth your acquaintance, but you may do what you will. Several things more my lord said, and spoke more kindly of him than of any of the rest of the players; but there was no time fixed for drinking with him. Upon Tuesday after, my lord Mohun came to my lodgings, and told me, Mr. Mountford had been very civil to him the night before at the Play-house, when the rest were very rude to him; and he had a mind to drink a bottle of wine with him. Saith he, I am going about some business to Kensington, but within a day or two you shall certainly hear of me, and we will fix a time for it, and if I do not like his company, I will never trouble you, nor myself more with it.

L. H. Stew. When was this, Sir?

Brereton. This was the Tuesday before; the first discourse was upon the Friday before.

[Then the Boy was examined.]

L. Mohun. Was you along with me and Mr. Hill, that night Mr. Mountford was killed?

L. H. Stew. My lord, you must propose your questions to me, and I will ask them.

Att. Gen. I desire to know what the boy's name is, and who he is.

L. Mohun. His name is Thomas Lake, and he was Mr. Hill's foot-boy.

L. H. Stew. What do you ask him, my lord?

L. Mohun. Pray, my lord, ask him if he was with Mr. Hill and me, that night that Mr. Mountford was killed.

L. H. Stew. You hear the question, what say you to it?—Boy. Yes, my lord.

L. H. Stew. I do not hear what you say.

Boy. I was with them, my lord, and all I heard was, they had a design to take away the woman, Mrs. Bracegirdle, and they had provided night-cloaths and a coach for her, to go to Totteridge, which was the place where they designed to carry her.

L. H. Stew. I do not hear one word this boy saith.

L. Mohun. My lord, shall I repeat to your lordship what the boy saith?

Lords. No, no, no.

L. H. Stew. No, my lord, you are not to repeat what your own witness saith.

Boy. They had a design to carry away the woman, Mrs. Bracegirdle.

L. H. Stew. I do not hear one word. That boy can speak out, if he pleaseth: I warrant him, he would make noise enough if he was in another place. Speak out, that my lords may all hear you.

Boy. I cannot speak any louder than I do; I say, they had a design to carry away the woman.

L. H. Stew. I may as well be at the other end of the town, as in this place, as for hearing what he saith. Somebody should repeat what he saith.

L. Mohun. If your lordship please to allow it, that one of the officers of the court may come down to the bar, and repeat from his mouth to the court what he saith.

Lords. Aye, aye.

L. H. Stew. Mr. Walker, then do you go and stand by him and tell us what he saith.

Mr. Walker the clerk went and stood by the boy at the bar, and repeated his evidence aloud.

Mr. Walker. My lord, he saith, they had a design to take away the woman, and they had night cloaths in the coach for the woman to put on, and they enquired at the woman's lodging where she was, and there they were told, that she was at Mr. Page's at supper, and her brother came to the Horse-shoe tavern and drank with them, and he was to go to tell them when she came out, and which way she was to go home; and there was a man that was to give notice, and they went down before her, and the coach stood almost at the lower end of Drury-lane, where there were some soldiers to put her in, and the soldiers went and took hold of her.

L. H. Stew. Is this my lord Mohun's witness?

Mr. Walker. Yes, my lord; and he saith, when they went to take hold of her to put her in, Mr. Page struggled with them, and would not let them, and she cried out, and was very much troubled at it.

L. Mohun. My lord, I desire he may be asked, whether he was in Howard-street when Mr. Mountford was wounded, and what passed in Howard-street before Mr. Mountford was wounded?

Mr. Walker. He saith, he was in Howard-street, and saw Mr. Mountford come down in Norfolk-street towards them, and turn into Howard-street, but out of his way to his own house; he saith, he came down, and there met my lord Mohun and his master, Mr. Mountford did; and he came to my lord Mohun, and bowed to him, and said, He had a kindness for his lordship. And my lord Mohun replied, He had a kindness for him. My lord Mohun said to him, He hoped he was not come to vindicate any thing of Mrs. Bracegirdle. Mr. Mountford said Not, and asked if his wife had done any thing to him, and said, He was very sorry his lordship should have any thing to do to vindicate Mr. Hill in such rudeness. He saith, captain Hill was at the lower end of the street, and captain Hill heard him say so, and came up and said to him, Mr. Mountford, if you have any thing to say to me, I can vindicate myself, and pray now draw; and he went into the street, and Mr. Mountford drew, and met him, and made three or four passes, and in the passes, the sword was broke. He cannot tell which sword it was that was broke, he supposeth it hit against the hilt, and snapped in two.

L. Mohun. I desire he may be asked, where I was when they fought?

Mr. Walker. My lord stood upon the flat stones, he saith, by the house side all the while, and they were in the middle of the street.

L. Mohun. My lord, I desire he may be asked, whether Mr. Mountford had his sword by his side, and where it was, and whether I meddled with him?

Mr. Walker. He saith my lord Mohun did not meddle with him, but stood upon the flat stones, nor did offer to draw his sword, and when Mr. Mountford came down, he carried his sword in his hand.

L. Mohun. My lord, I desire he may be asked, whether Mr. Hill did not stay in the street to ask Mrs. Bracegirdle's pardon.

Mr. Walker. He saith, he desired to see Mrs. Bracegirdle, and to beg her pardon, and as soon as he had seen her, he would be gone.

L. H. Stew. How can he tell that? Where was he?

Mr. Walker. He was just by my lord Mohun, and Mr. Hill in the street, and Mr. Hill said he would but stay, and beg Mrs. Bracegirdle's pardon for what he had done, and he would go home.

L. Mohun. I desire he may be asked, whether I offered to fly when his master went away?

L. H. Stew. What is it you ask, my lord?

L. Mohun. Whether I offered to run away, or make my escape?

Mr. Walker. He saith, my lord did not offer to run away, but stood still, and he said he had done no hurt, nor drawn his sword.

L. Mohun. I desire to ask him, whether I could not have run away as well as Mr. Hill, if I had had a mind?

Mr. Walker. He saith, he might have run away as well as his master Mr. Hill, but he stood still a great while, till the watch came and took him, and he gave himself up.

Att. Gen. My lord, before the boy goeth away, I desire to know of him whether he has not been already examined upon his oath elsewhere?

Mr. Walker. Yes, my lord, he was examined at Hicks's-hall, and was kept in prison two days.

Att. Gen. Were you examined before the coroner?

Mr. Walker. He saith, he was examined before the coroner.

Att. Gen. Which was the first place he was examined at?

Mr. Walker. He saith, he was examined at Hick's-hall first.

Att. Gen. When he was examined before the coroner, did he give the same evidence as he does now?

Mr. Walker. He gave the same evidence before the coroner that he doth now, as near as he can remember.

Att. Gen. When you did make oath before the coroner, was it read to you what you swore?

Mr. Walker. He saith, his evidence was not read to him.

Att. Gen. Did you subscribe the evidence you gave before the coroner yourself?

Mr. Walker. Yes, he did.

Att. Gen. Did not you write your name yourself?

Mr. Walker. Yes, he saith.

Att. Gen. Did you not know what it was you subscribed your name to?

Mr. Walker. He saith, it was not read to him afterwards, he knoweth what it was he gave in.

Att. Gen. Are you sure it was not read to you?

Mr. Walker. He saith, he is sure it was not read to him.

L. H. Stew. Was it not read to him before he subscribed it?

Att. Gen. That I did ask him, my lord.

Mr. Walker. He doth not remember that it was read to him at all.

L. H. Stew. Can he read himself?

Att. Gen. He writes a very good hand, my lord.

Mr. Walker. He saith, they bid him put his hand to it; and as soon as he had put his hand to it, they put him out, and bid him call another woman.

Att. Gen. I would have him consider of it, before he makes answer; because there are several persons present here, who were present when it was read to him before he subscribed it.

Mr. Walker. He cannot remember that it was read to him.

Att. Gen. Do you remember you swore at that time, that when Mr. Mountford and Mr. Hill were pushing at one another, my lord Mohun said, he would stand by his friend, and Mr. Hill was his friend.

Mr. Walker. He saith, my lord said, he would not go, he would stay by his friend, for Mr. Hill was his friend.

E. of Carlisle. My lord steward.

L. H. Stew. My lord of Carlisle.

E. of Carlisle. I desire that he may be asked, whether he was the boy that said to my lord Mohun, Pray, my lord, good my lord, do not do it, alter your resolution.

L. H. Stew. Call the boy again. [Which was done.] Was you by when those words were spoken? Pray, my lord, will you repeat your own question?

E. of Carlisle. Whether he was the boy that said to my lord Mohun, Pray, my lord, good my lord, do not do it, alter your resolution, or defer it to another day?

Boy. No, my lord, I did not hear him.

L. H. Stew. Did not you say so yourself?

Boy. I said no such thing, nor heard no such thing said by any body.

L. H. Stew. Do you bring any more witnesses, my lord?

L. Mohun. Yes, my lord, Mrs. Elizabeth Walker, Mrs. Bracegirdle's maid.

Eliz. Walker. Here, my lord, I am she.

Att. Gen. My lord, before my lord Mohun proceedeth to examine any other witness, I have one thing humbly to offer to your lordships.

[Then Proclamation was made for silence.]

Att. Gen. Of what consequence it will be to my lord Mohun, I must submit to your lordships when you have heard it; that is, whether it may not be proper now, since this boy has given an evidence so very different from what he gave upon his oath before the coroner, to have his deposition that he made before the coroner, read in his presence.

L. Mohun. My lord, I think I ought to conclude and give all my own evidence before Mr. Attorney maketh his remarks.

L. H. Stew. Then reserve that till the last, Mr. Attorney.

Att. Gen. My lord is certainly in the right of it; there ought to be no observations made upon his evidence, and we shall be sure to keep exactly to the usual method in this matter; but I take it to be the course of evidence, where there is an objection to what the witness delivers now, which does arise from what the same witness has sworn before, it is proper to make the objection, as soon as he has delivered such evidence, whilst the matter is fresh in your lordships' memories.

L. H. Stew. Mr. Attorney, let the boy stay, he shall be called upon afterwards; but let my lord go on now with the rest of his witnesses.

L. Mohun. Here is Elizabeth Walker, my lord.

L. H. Stew. What is that woman's name?

L. Mohun. Elizabeth Walker, did you live with Mrs. Bracegirdle?

Eliz. Walker. Yes, I did, my lord.

Att. Gen. This person has concealed herself; we have been endeavouring to find her out all this while, but could not.

L. H. Stew. What do you ask her, my lord?

L. Mohun. I desire she may be asked, whether she lived with Mrs. Bracegirdle, and what she saw and observed that night Mr. Mountford was killed.

Eliz. Walker. If it please you, I lived then with her.

L. H. Stew. I cannot hear what she said; Mr. Walker, I think you must go thither again; speak out, woman.

El. Walker. I was her servant at that time, when Mr. Mountford was killed. And, may it please you, my lord, that night, old Mrs. Bracegirdle and her daughter were invited to supper, at one Mrs. Page's in Drury-lane, and coming home about ten or eleven o'clock out of Drury-lane, my mistress desired me to go to Mr. Mountford, to see if Mr. Mountford was come home. I went, and they said, he was not come home: she desired me then to go again, and tell Mrs. Mountford, that if he was not come home, she should send to see where he was, and desire he would not come home without a good guard, for my lord Mohun and captain Hill were walking about the street, and she did not know their design, by reason Mr. Hill had his sword drawn in his hand, out of the scabbard. I asked the reason why he had his sword drawn, and the answer was made, he had lost the scabbard in a skirmish in Drury-lane; but that I know nothing of. Mrs. Mountford said, She would send her maid to see where her husband was, and I told her, if my mistress would give me leave, I would go along with her to bear her company. And when I returned to my mistress, she did give me leave, and I went along with her to several places; but we could not find Mr. Mountford; so coming home, I went to my mistress, and I saw them two stand at the door, and they staid there above an hour, and in the mean time our landlady, Mrs. Browne, heard the watch come into the street, and she said, she would go to the door, and bid the watch seize them; and she did go out, and I was kept within doors, and heard her talk to the watch, but what she said I cannot tell; but presently the watch went away and left them. And I stood at the door, and heard Mrs. Browne say, There cometh Mr. Mountford, and she would go speak with him; and with that she went as fast as she could to meet him, and came to him a good way before he came down to them, and took him by the arm thus, to stay him, and she said captain Hill and my lord Mohun were walking in the street, and captain Hill had his sword in his hand drawn, and she did not know what their design was.

L. H. Stew. Indeed she must speak louder, or I cannot tell what she saith.

El. Walker. My lord, I say, Mrs. Browne, when I was at the door, said, Yonder cometh Mr. Mountford, and she said, she would go and meet him, and away she went as far as she could towards him; and when she came up to him, she took him by the arm thus, and desired him that he would not come down that street, but go to his own house, for there were captain Hill and my lord Mohun walking in the street, and she did not know what their design was, but captain Hill had his sword drawn in his hand. If it please you, my lord, Mr. Mountford did not answer a word; but pressed forward to meet my lord Mohun and captain Hill. If it please you, my lord, they met one another, and my lord Mohun and Mr. Mountford complimented one another very lovingly, and said, They were glad to see one another; and Mr. Mountford said to my lord, He had a great respect for his lordship, and my lord replied to him again, By my honour, I have the like for you, Mr. Mountford; and with that, they embraced one another; I am sure this is truth, for I followed Mrs. Browne out, and stood by when it was done. Mr. Mountford told my lord, it was a dishonour to him to keep company with captain Hill. I will not take my oath that captain Hill did hear him say so, but he might have heard him, and it may be he did too; and that might occasion the quarrel; but I will not take my oath of that: it came just in my head after this was said, that our door was open, and I turned my back to hear and look who was at our door, and I heard Mrs. Browne say, that captain Hill and Mr. Mountford were going to fight: I saw them fighting, making passes at one another, I saw them engaged, I never saw men naked fighting so in my life. [At which there was a great laughter.]

El. Walker. My lord, I do not understand these matters, I tell you as well as I can, they were fighting with naked swords, Mr. Mountford's sword was upon Mr. Hill hereabouts, and Mr. Hill's sword was upon Mr. Mountford hereabouts; and after they had made two or three pushes at one another, Mr. Mountford said, he was killed, and threw down his sword thus, and I took it up, and there was a good piece of the sword broken off. I turned me about thus, towards our own hatch at our door, and there stood two or three people, I cannot say who they were, but I gave them the sword, and I turned my face towards Surrey-street, and saw captain Hill making his escape, running up Surrey street; and, if it please you, my lord, Mr. Mountford was the friend I had most respect for; and I saw him, as fast as he could, going towards his own house, and my lord Mohun stood in the same place that he was in, when he and Mr. Mountford were embracing one another, and I did not see my lord Mohun stir from that place; but when they fought, they were engaged in the middle of the pitched stones, where there was a place made for the water to run along the street like a channel: and to my knowledge, I did never see my lord Mohun off of the paved stones, on the side. I cannot say he was never off, when my eye was turned another way; but to my knowledge, I never saw him off of those stones. If it please you, my lord, the next thing that I saw, was this, after captain Hill run up Surrey street, and Mr. Mountford did go home, I saw my lord Mohun walking up to the end of the street, where the watch were coming, and when the watch came, I see him deliver himself up to the watch; but I think one of the watch said, he must have his sword, and he did deliver up himself and his sword to the watch. And he bid me take notice, bear witness, said he, I have no hand in the death of Mr. Mountford. Said I, No, my lord, I think you have not. The next thing I remember, was Mrs. Page came and said Mr. Mountford was killed, upon which, said my lord Mohun to her, bear witness, I had no hand in his death. Said she, you were in his company, therefore seize him and carry him to the round house; and the watch did secure him; and my lord answered, as he was a gentleman, he desired to be used like a gentleman; and they did carry him away to the round house. This is the thing that I did say, as near as I can remember, to the justices; but I have been very much abused and distracted amongst them, and therefore to a word I cannot say; but as near as I can remember, being abused at the rate I have been, this I did then say, and it is the truth.

L. Mohun. I desire she may be asked, whether she was not examined before the justices at Hicks's hall, and whether she was not then Mrs. Bracegirdle's maid.

L. H. Stew. Truly, my lord, I have heard very little of what she has said, but I hope my lords that have been nearer have observed it.

El. Walker. If it please you, if you ask what was done at Hicks's hall, I will tell you just as it was, what happened there, and so proceed on to tell you how I have been abused.

L. H. Stew. My lord, what would you have her asked more?

L. Mahon. I desire to ask her, whether she was not Mrs. Bracegirdle's servant when she was examined at Hicks's hall, and whether she swore the same there, as she saith here, and what was done to her since, or what they would have done, and whether they did not try to make her speak what they would, and to put her out?

El. Walker. If it please you, my lord, that next morning, there came several of the players to me, to ask me what I knew of the death of Mr. Mountford, and I told them; but they did not like what I said, and they seemed discontented at me. And when they were to go to Hicks's hall, they said, they had no need of my evidence, they could do without me. So Mrs. Browne and her maid they went away, and left me at home; what they did, or where they staid, I do not know: but about two or three hours after, a messenger came and said, my mistress and I must go to Hicks's hall to be examined before the justices; and we went, and when we came there, all were examined, and I was examined in the last place; where, my lord, I gave in the same evidence that I do now, as near as I can speak. I do verily believe it to be the same, but I have had so much trouble with their abusing me, that I cannot speak to every word or particular thing. For my mistress stood before me, and said, they brought evidences that confounded themselves; and another said, hang her a jade, pull her by the coat. I turned me to the justices, and said, I hoped I might speak now I was there; but it may be for fear of my mistress, I did not then speak all that I have done now, because I have called more since to my remembrance. And there is one particular thing that I call to mind now; I remember that in our parlour, as soon as they came home out of Drury lane, there was a discourse between my old mistress, and my young, that captain Hill waited at the door to see my mistress, and that if he might but have leave to see her, and to beg her pardon, they would be gone thence to their own lodging; and I said to my mistress. If she would give me leave, I would go out to them, and demand captain Hill's sword, and then he might come in.

L. Mohun. I desire she may be asked, Whether she was not turned away and threatened?

El. Walker. I am going on to tell my lord what happened in our house that night. I told my mistress, if she would give me leave, I would undertake to get captain Hill's sword from him, and then she might let him come in and see her, and beg her pardon, and I thought it would prevent a great deal of danger that might follow else. And my mistress said, I was a prating slut, and my young mistress said if he begged her pardon upon his knees never so, she would never forgive him, nor see him more. My lord, there was another discourse in the street, that captain Hill had made a vow that he would kill himself that night, and that lord Mohun, having a respect for him, watched to prevent him from doing himself a mischief. That was discoursed in the street, but I cannot say it was so of my own knowledge.

Then another Proclamation for Silence was made.

L. Mohun. I desire she may be asked, whether she was not turned away, and whether she was never threatened.

Eliz. Walker. If it please you, my lord, that night that I gave in my evidence at Hicks's hall, by their talking, I knew before I went from home what a life I should have with my mistress, for I knew they did not like my evidence, and I was afraid of coming home, and went and staid with my sister; but notwithstanding I went home about nine a clock, and they were very inveterate against me, and I told one of them, I had witnessed the truth, and nothing but the truth, and that I would stand by. If it please you, my lord, the next morning there was this Ann Jones that lay with me that night, and she told me that in the morning they threatened, and intended to fetch me to Mrs. Mountford to rattle me for what account I had given in, and she giving me this item, I got up, and went to dressing my dinner, and Mrs. Mountford sent a man, that I know by sight, I think it was one Roberts, I believe that was his name; whereupon he came and asked me where was Mrs. Bracegirdle's maid; I said, I was she, and then he said Mrs. Mountford desired me to come to her. I said, I had given in my evidence where I ought to do it, and I had nothing to do with her; but it was upon this account, not that I had any antipathy against Mrs. Mountford, but only as Ann Jones had given me that item of a design to send me to her, to rattle me for the evidence I had given in, and I did not know what might come of it, or what their design might be.

Att. Gen. My lord, I would not interrupt any witness, but because she speaks of what was said by Jones, and Mrs. Bracegirdle, I desire they may be by to hear what she saith.

L. Mohun. My lord, I desire my witnesses may not be hared.

L. H. Stew. This is not haring of evidence, my lord.

L. Mohun. My lord, I desire I may go on with my evidence without interruption.

L. H. Stew. My lord, this is no interruption.

Att. Gen. Pray, my lord, let Mrs. Mountford be called in to hear what she saith of her; I desire she may be by.

L. Mohun. My lord, I have no more to say to her.

Att. Gen. But then, my lord, before she goeth away, I have two or three questions to ask her.

L. H. Stew. What do you ask her, Mr. Attorney?

Att. Gen. She saith she was examined at Hicks's hall, I desire to know if ever she was examined before the coroner.

Eliz. Walker. If it please you my lord, I was not, and I will give you the reason.

Att. Gen. Ay, pray let us hear it.

Eliz. Walker. Why you have not heard how badly they used me after this.

Att. Gen. But pray, mistress, answer my question.

Eliz. Walker. But, my lord, if it please you, I went to my sister, and staid with her till eight or nine, and my aunt told me there had been a porter to enquire for me, to go to the jury; I was sorry I was not at home, but I took a neighbour with me to go to Mrs. Mountford's, to see if the jury were not gone; and I knowing how they had threatened me, I desired him to leave me at a victualling-house by Temple-bar, and go and tell them, if the jury were not gone, I was ready to wait upon them; he went, and I remained at the victualling-house, and he came again, and told me Mrs. Mountford said they had done without me; but he was a little surprized.

Att. Gen. My lord, she maketh a long answer to a short question. I would ask her another question presently; but by the way, as to this examination at Hicks's hall, I would observe that it is a very unusual, and, I think, under favour, a very unwarrantable thing for justices of the peace, to take upon them, under a pretence of considering, in order to bail a person charged with murder, to enter into a particular examination of every one of the king's witnesses, as if they were either a grand inquest, charged upon oath for finding a bill of indictment, or coroners to take an inquisition of the murder, both the grand jury and the coroner are upon their oaths to keep the king's evidence secret; but this is to make it public by an indirect way by a justice of peace's examining, in order to the bailing of an offender. But I would observe this woman goeth away from her mistress, and continueth away; and concealeth herself; she was not to be found to be examined before the coroner, the proper officer, nor are we able to tell where she has been; I desire some account may begin in whose hands she has been all this time.

L. Mohun. My lord, I desire your lordship's opinion, whether this may be permitted, that he should talk thus.

L. H. Stew. What do you say, my lord?

L. Mohun. My lord, I desire to know whether he may interrupt me in my evidence thus: all this matter is foreign to the business before your lordships.

Att. Gen. If you please, I would ask her this one question.

Lord ———. Under Mr. Attorney's pardon, I think the prisoner, or his witnesses, ought not to be interrupted; but if he have any remarks upon the evidence, when they have gone through he may call them again, and ask them any questions, or make any remarks upon them.

Att. Gen. My lord, I would ask her but one question.

L. H. Stew. What is it, Mr. Attorney?

Att. Gen. If she heard Mrs. Browne say to Mr. Mountford that she would not have him come forward, because my lord Mohun and Mr. Hill were there, and she did not know what their design was?

Eliz. Walker. If it please you, my lord, I did hear them, and I was just by them; and there was none but she and I.

Att. Gen. She upon her oath saith, she did not tell him any thing more, than that she would speak with him; but he did not hear her, or hearken to her: but, my lord, I have no more questions to ask her.

L. H. Stew. Have you any more to ask this witness, my lord?

L. Mohun. No, my lord.

L. H. Stew. Who is your lordship's next? pray call your witness.

L. Mohun. I desire Ann Jones may be examined. [She came to the bar.]

L. H. Stew. What doth your lordship examine her to?

L. Mohun. I desire she may be asked what she knoweth of what passed that night Mr. Mountford was hurt, and tell the whole story.

Jones. First, I saw Mrs. Bracegirdle coming home with her mother and Mr. Page, about ten a clock at night, and there were captain Hill and my lord Mohun with them when they came home, but they did not come in with them, but walked in the street about an hour and an half; and after they came in, Mrs. Browne sent to Mrs. Mountford, for she said captain Hill had some design, and my lord Mohun, upon Mr. Mountford, but Mr. Mountford not being at home, they sent to all the taverns thereabouts but could not find him; they came home again, and told Mrs. Mountford and Mrs. Bracegirdle, they could not find him, and there my lord Mohun and captain Hill walked to-and-fro about the street for an hour and half in all; about an hour after they had been to look for Mr. Mountford, or about three quarters of an hour, Mr. Mountford came down, and I saw my lord Mohun and captain Hill at this door.

L. Mohun. At whose door, I desire she may be asked.

Jones. At this Mrs. Browne's door, and Mr. Mountford coming down my lord Mohun met him, and embraced him, and said, he had a great honour and friendship for him, and Mr. Mountford said, he had a great honour and respect for his lordship. Saith my lord Mohun, Mr. Mountford, I suppose you are sent for. No not, I upon my honour, said he. Upon that he up and said how they had like to have got Mrs. Bracegirdle into a coach, and carried her away, but were prevented. Saith Mr. Mountford, as to Mrs. Bracegirdle, I have nothing to do, she is no concern of mine, if my wife have offended your lordship, she shall beg your pardon. Said Mr. Mountford again, I hope your lordship will not vindicate Mr. Hill in any such action as this. With that captain Hill came up and hit Mr. Mountford a box on the ear, and bid him draw. And, said Mr. Mountford, damn ye, What is that for? And thereupon he drew; and I tell you what I saw, they both came off from the paved stones into the middle of the highway, and made two or three passes at one another; at the second pass Mr. Mountford's sword broke, and he flung down his sword, and run away, and said he was a dead man; Mr. Mountford went one way and Mr. Hill another.

L. Mohun. I desire she may be asked, if I did meddle with Mr. Mountford at all, or helped Mr. Hill whilst they fought, and where I stood all the while?

L. H. Stew. What say you? answer all those questions my lord asked you.

Jones. If it please your lordship, he stood upon the causey, the paved stones, in the same place where he was all the time.

L. H. Stew. Did my lord meddle at all?

Jones. No, I did not see my lord Mohun meddle.

L. H. Stew. Was my lord's sword drawn?

Jones. I did not see it drawn.

L. Mohun. I desire she may be asked, Whether I run away, or whether I did not surrender myself to the watch.

Jones. If it please your lordship, I did not see my lord run away; but I did see him surrender himself.

L. Mohun. I desire she may be asked, if she was not examined at Hicks's-hall?

Jones. Yes, my lord, I was.

L. Mohun. And whether she did not there declare the same upon oath, that she doth now?

Jones. Yes, my lord, I did.

L. H. Stew. Have you any thing to say to this witness, Mr. Attorney?

Att. Gen. My lord I would only ask her this question: she saith my lord Mohun was upon the pavement, or causey, as she calleth it, all the while; I desire to know whether the scuffle did not begin upon the pavement?

Jones. Yes, it did upon the causey.

Att. Gen. I desire to know, whether she saw any blood upon that causey the next day?

Jones. No, I saw none.

L. Mohun. I desire she may be asked, Whether they did not fight in the middle of the street?

Jones. Yes, and please your lordship I did see them make passes at one another in the street.

L. Mohun. I desire she may be asked, Whether the sword was not broken there in the middle of the street, and whether Mr. Mountford did not then cry out, I am killed?

Jones. His sword was broken in the middle of the street; but I did not hear Mr. Mountford say he was killed, but he flung down his sword, and run away, and said, I am a dead man.

L. H. Stew. Have you done with this witness, my lord?—L. Mohun. Yes, my lord.

L. H. Stew. Have you any more to say to her, Mr. Attorney?—Att. Gen. No, my lord.

L. H. Stew. Then who is your next witness, my lord Mohun?

L. Mohun. Edward Warrington, my lord. [Who came to the bar.]

L. H. Stew. What say you to him, my lord?

L. Mohun. I desire to ask him where he liveth? Whether he be not a neighbour to Mrs. Bracegirdle? and what he saw that night Mr. Mountford was killed? I desire he would give his whole evidence.

Warrington. I live, if it please your honour, over against Mrs. Bracegirdle's house, at the White-swan, on the other side of the way,

L. Mohun. I desire he would tell all that he saw that night.

Warrington. All that I can say, is, about nine or ten o'clock, as near as I can guess, I heard a disturbance at Mrs. Browne's door, where Mrs. Bracegirdle lodgeth, and looking out, I saw there were two gentlemen talking to old Mrs. Bracegirdle, and Mrs. Bracegirdle and some people went into the house, and when they were gone into the house, I saw the two gentlemen walk about the street, one's sword I saw was drawn.

L. H. Stew. Whose sword was that was drawn?

Warrington. Captain Hill's, as they say; for my part, I did not know either of them; they walked there for the space of an hour and a half, I saw them oppose nobody. But as they came along, I heard them ask a gentleman that came towards them, Whether he would not drink a glass of wine or not?

L. Mohun. My lord, I desire he may be asked, what he saw afterwards of fighting?

Warrington. For fighting, I saw Mr. Mountford come down Norfolk-street, and I saw him turn at the corner with his sword in his hand in the scabbard to the best of my knowledge, and seeing some people there, as I suppose, went towards them, and came up to them; and I saw my lord Mohun to the best of my knowledge, lay his hand upon his shoulder, and embraced him, and complimented him; but I cannot be certain what the words were that passed between them.

L. H. Stew. Did you see them fight?

Warrington. If it please your honour, I did see their swords both drawn, Mr. Mountford and he that they said was captain Hill; there were some women about them, so that I could not so well discern when they drew their swords, or who begun the quarrel. Hill, they said, had no scabbard to put his sword in; my lord Mohun stood by, and laid his hand upon Mr. Mountford's shoulder.

L. H. Stew. Was that before the fighting, or at the time of the fighting?

Warrington. It was before their fighting, at their first meeting.

L. Mohun. I desire your lordship would please to ask him, in what part of the street they fought, and whether I was near them then?

Warrington. When first I saw their swords drawn, it was upon the flat stones of the pavement; and I saw Mr. Hill come off of the stones and Mr. Mountford with him. Mr. Hill was, I think, the first, and they came both up together with their swords drawn in their hands, they were not a sword's length off from one another; and they passed at one another, and I run into our house to fetch a paring-shovel, with an intention to part them; but before I could get out of doors with the paring-shovel in my hands, the one was gone one way, and the other the other way; and I saw nobody in the street to ask any questions of, but my lord Mohun at the corner, three or four doors above this place. And I came out, and asked which way they were gone? My lord Mohun turned about, and I was a little afraid of him at first; but, said he, here am I, I did not offer to oppose or draw my sword; you all know it; and immediately, if it please your honour, the watch came in, that is all I know.

L. Mohun. I desire he may be asked, whether I did not go towards the watch, and surrender myself.

Warrington. I cannot say that, but the watch came in a minute. My lord turned about, and said, Here am I, I did not oppose or draw my sword, you all know.

L. Mohun. Pray my lord, let him be asked, whether I did offer to fly? And whether I had not as much time to fly, as Mr. Hill?

Warrington. I cannot say that, my lord. I suppose he might have gone away as well as Mr. Hill, for they were both together.

L. Mohun. My lord, I desire he may be asked another question, Whether, when Mr. Mountford came into Howard-street, he did not come out of his way to his own house, to come towards us?

Warrington. My lord, if it please your honour, it was out of his way; but whether he did it on purpose, or because he saw people there, I cannot tell.

L. Mohun. I desire he may tell you where Mr. Mountford's house is?

Warrington. Mr. Mountford's house is in Norfolk-street, two doors in the corner out of the Cross street; and this was done in Howard-street.

L. H. Stew. I would ask you a short question, whether that was the way to his house that he went?

Warrington. No, it was not the way, my lord; for he turned on the right-hand, and he should have kept straight along.

L. Mohun. I desire he may be asked, whether he was not sworn at Hicks's-hall, and whether he gave not the same evidence there, that he doth now?

Warrington. I was sworn there, and did, to the best of my knowledge, give the same evidence I do now.

L. H. Stew. If I understand you aright, you say both the swords were drawn of Mountford and Hill?

Warrington. Yes, my lord, I did.

L. H. Stew. Can you say whether Mountford's sword was drawn before he was hurt, or not?

Warrington. If it please you, my lord, I cannot tell that, I cannot be positive whether it was or no, for there were women about them, I say, at first, and I could not discern the beginning; and I did not stand to see them push, for as soon as I saw their swords drawn, and they come off the pavement to fight, I run into the house to fetch a paring-shovel.

L. Mohun. Now, my lord, I will call another witness.

L. H. Stew. Mr. Attorney, have you any questions to ask this witness?

Att. Gen. No, my lord.

L. Mohun. Then, my lord, I will call another witness to shew you the reason why Mr. Hill and I stayed in the street, and what was the business we stayed for. I desire Ann Knevit may be examined. (She came to the bar.)

L. H. Stew. What do you ask her, my lord?

L. Mohun. I would ask her where she liveth, and what she knoweth of this business?

Knevit. My lord, I live in Howard-street, exactly against Mrs. Bracegirdle's lodging, and my lord Mohun, as he gave his own name to be, to the watchmen, and another man that they called captain Hill; for so he gave his name to be; they came down with Mrs. Bracegirdle, both the Mrs. Bracegirdles, into the street, and came to their door, and old Mrs. Bracegirdle put her daughter in at the door, and then she stood still and talked with the gentlemen, and asked them their business. They said, they wanted to beg the young woman's pardon for what they had done, and then they would be gone. She said she thought they came to rob her. They said, No, they came upon a very honourable design. She said, then they might have come at a more seasonable time; but she believed they came to rob her.

L. Mohun. What time of night was it?

Knevit. It wanted a quarter of ten, I believe, or it was about ten, a quarter over or under; I cannot exactly tell. They said, If she would give them leave but to speak to her, and beg her pardon for what they had done, they would go home immediately. She said, She would not, they should not see her any more that night. Then one of the gentlemen, I know not which of them it was, said, they would walk a little while in the street. She did see them walk very quietly, but she made a great noise herself; and at last she went in, and shut the door, and the gentlemen walked quietly up and down; and by and bye they went to the door again, and desired to be admitted to speak with young Mrs. Bracegirdle, that they might beg her pardon for some affront that they had put upon her, I suppose; and she still refused them, and would not let them speak with her; and several times they called and knocked at the door, and still desired but to speak with her, and beg her pardon, and they would be gone home; but she every time refused it.

L. H. Stew. Woman, I do not hear you; you must speak louder.

L. Mohun. My lord, I desire your lordships will let one of the clerks come and take the evidence, and report it to you.

L. H. Stew. If it be material, another must report it; for I have not heard one quarter of it.

L. Mohun. It is very material, my lord, to shew the reason why we stayed there.

Knevit. My lord, I will repeat it over again, if you please.

L. H. Stew. Then pray speak so loud that I may hear.

Knevit. My lord Mohun is a perfect stranger to me, I only tell you what I saw and heard. At the first beginning of all, two gentlemen and two women came to a door over against our door, and at that house Mrs. Bracegirdle and her daughter lodged; the gentlemen gave their names to the watch afterwards to be my lord Mohun and captain Hill. So when they came there, the old woman put her daughter in at the door; and when she had pulled off her hood and scarf, she came to the door, and asked them their business; and they told her, they wanted to beg her daughter's pardon for what they had done; but she abused the gentlemen mightily, and gave them very ill words, and said, She believed they came to rob her daughter; they said, No, they came upon a very honourable design; then she said, they should have come honourably at a seasonable time; they said, it was not an unseasonable time, for she was out of doors herself at that time. So she stood there a little, and then at last she went in-a doors, and shut the door, and some of them opened the door again; and they were walking upon the causey, and came up to the door, and still desired the same thing, to speak with the young gentlewoman to beg her pardon for what they had done, and they would go home for that night. One of them, I think it was

Mr. Hill, said, He had given her an affront, and he desired to beg her pardon; but still they said, he should not be admitted to speak with her. Then one of them, I think it was Mr. Hill, desired she would be pleased to come but to the hatch, that he might see her, and beg her pardon, and he would not desire to come in; but that would not be permitted. So one of them made answer, that they would not stir till they did see her, and they would walk there all night.

L. H. Stew. Cryer, call for silence; and pray, my lord great chamberlain, take some order with those people behind there, for they cannot hear themselves what the witnesses say, and therefore they are resolved we shall not hear them neither. (Proclamation was made for silence.)

L. H. Stew. Now go on, woman.

Knevit. They said they would stay in the street all night, unless they did speak with her: but if she would give them leave to speak with her, they would depart to their own lodgings immediately; but they were denied to be admitted to speak with her. Whereupon one of them called unto his boy, to bring him his cloak; but then he said, he would not have his cloak, he would walk without it, because they had not both of them cloaks: by and bye they sent for a bottle of wine, and there they drank her health, and took several turns; and after they had drunk off the bottle, or some part of it, they went to the door again, and knocked at the door; and somebody answered from within, for they were not at the door, what they would have? They said the same thing as before, that they desired only to see her, and beg her pardon, and they would go home; for it was a very cold night, and it was not convenient to walk there; but they still refused to let them in. By and bye the watch came down, and asked, who was there, and what was their business? And one of the gentlemen made answer, and said, he was a peer, and his name was Mohun; the other said, his name was Hill. So the watch went by, and said no more; but somebody made answer, and said, there was a gentleman had a sweetheart in that street, and he wanted to speak with her. Just at that time, I went up stairs to warm a bed in our house, and whilst I was warming the bed, I heard a little bustle in the street; and running to the window, there I saw a sword in a man's body; I could not tell who the man was, nor who put the sword there; but the man that drew out the sword run away as hard as he could, and the man in whose body the sword was, went as fast as he could the other way. And my lord that gave his name to the watch to be Mohun, stood on the farther side of the street, and said, I have done no hurt to any body, and I will not stir. And there was a woman that called out to the watch to seize him; but who the woman was, I cannot tell; but he stood still between Mrs. Bracegirdle's door and the next neighbour's one that is called Nuttall, I think, and never stirred till the watch came to him, and the rest went to Mr. Mountford; he said there was no occasion to lay hands upon him, for he would not stir from them.

L. Mohun. I desire to ask her, if Mr. Mountford did not say, I am killed, after the sword was broke?

Knevit. Yes, he did say he was a dead man.

L. H. Stew. What, after his sword was broke?

Knevit. After the sword was drawn out of his body, his sword was in his own hand; I squalled out when I saw the sword in his body, and had like to have gone out of the window; and somebody said to me, when I told them why I cried out, Will you break your neck for that reason? It may be, it is one of the watchmen. No, said I, it is not a watchman.

L. Mohun. I desire she may be asked, where Mr. Mountford and Mr. Hill fought, whether it was not in the middle of the street?

Knevit. My lord, it was exactly in the middle, as near as I can guess, rather on our side of the way, with his arms spread, and his sword in the scabbard.

L. H. Stew. Have you any more to ask th witness?—L. Mohun. No, my lord.

L. H. Stew. Have you any thing to say to her, Mr. Attorney?

Att. Gen. I would ask her, where she liveth.

Knevit. I live in Howard-street.

Att. Gen. With whom there?

Knevit. At one Mrs. Brewer's.

Att. Gen. What employment is your mistress?

Knevit. My mistress keepeth a coffee-house.

Att. Gen. Do you live near Mrs. Browne's?

Knevit. I know not any of that name there; but I live over against Mrs. Bracegirdle's lodgings.

Att. Gen. Do not you know the people of that house?

Knevit. No, upon my word, I do not know their names that keep the house.

Att. Gen. Let me ask you another question: You speak of many messages sent backward and forward, and that they said Mrs. Bracegirdle should not be spoken with while my lord staid there; I desire to know, if you can tell who any of the persons were that brought those messages?

Knevit. It was the man that called himself my lord Mohun, and the other that called himself Hill, they spoke themselves.

Att. Gen. But who was it that came to them so often, to tell them they should not speak with her?

Knevit. It was old Mrs. Bracegirdle.

Att. Gen. You are sure of that?

Knevit. Yes, Sir.

Att. Gen. I would ask you one question more: When the watch came up to them, did my lord tell the watch his name was Mohun, or only that he was a peer of England?

Knevit. He said first, he was a peer of the land, and then he said, his name was Mohun ; and the other said, his name was captain Hill.

Att. Gen. You are sure both of them told their names to the watch?

Knevit. Yes, I am sure I heard them say so.

L. H. Stew. Have you any more witnesses to call, my lord?

L. Mohun. No, my lord ; I could call some as to Sandys's reputation, but I do not think it at all material.

L. H. Stew. Have you any thing, Mr. Attorney, to say to the boy that was set by? Will you have him called again?

Att. Gen. My lord, I did propose that the boy should hear the information read which he gave in to the coroner.

L. H. Stew. Will you have him called again?

Att. Gen. Yes, if your lordships please.

L. H. Stew. Well, then, call him again.

[The Boy came to the bar, and his Deposition before the coroner was shewed to him.]

Att. Gen. Look upon that paper, is that your name or your writing?—Boy. Yes.

Att. Gen. Was it true you then swore before the coroner?—Boy. Yes, it was true.

L. H. Stew. Read it. [It was taken by the Clerk, and read at the table.]

Clerk of the Crown reads:

Middlesex. The Information of Thomas Leake, Servant to Richard Hill, Gent. taken upon Oath, the twelfth day of December, 1692, before me.

He saith, "That on Friday morning last, about nine o'clock, it was agreed betwixt my lord Mohun and captain Hill, to seize Mrs. Bracegirdle with some soldiers, and carry her away in a coach about nine miles off; and about ten o'clock at night my lord Mohun and captain Hill, with about six soldiers, did seize her, and endeavour to put her into a coach; but she refused to go, and they led her down into Howard-street to her lodging, and then said, they would walk an hour under Mrs. Bracegirdle's window, and another under Mrs. Barry's; and about an hour and an half after, Mr. Mountford came down the street, and Mr. Mountford and my lord Mohun saluted each other; and my lord Mohun said, he hoped Mr. Mountford was not come to vindicate Mrs. Bracegirdle; and Mr. Mountford hoped my lord did not come to vindicate the rudeness done to Mrs. Bracegirdle by Mr. Hill; and then Mr. Hill said, he was able to vindicate himself, and bid Mr. Mountford to draw; and they both pushed at each other with their swords; and my lord said, he would stand by his friend, and Mr. Hill was his friend; and during the time that Mr. Hill and Mr. Mountford fought, my lord Mohun did not endeavour to part them. THOMAS LEAKE."

JO. COOPER, Coroner.

Att. Gen. My lords, as to this last witness, I would desire some of the watch may be asked, because she saith my lord told them his name was Mohun, and Hill told them his name was Hill, whether it was so or not.

L. H. Stew. Who would you call?

Att. Gen. Merry, my lord, if you please.

L. H. Stew. Call him.

L. Mohun. I desire the constable may be called. [Merry did not presently come in.]

Att. Gen. My lord, I think it is not so material, as to desire your lordships should stay for him. But as to that one witness that entertained your lordships so long, Mrs. Bracegirdle's servant, I desire, that she being here, may give your lordships an account what became of this servant of her's.

Mrs. Bracegirdle. My lord, she went away from me on the Sunday.

L. H. Stew. Who did?

Mrs. Bracegirdle. My maid that was then; and I sent to her aunt's the week after to seek for her, but she could not be found; where she was, I cannot tell; nor could not hear of her from that time to this.

L. Mohun. I desire she may be asked, whether she did not discharge her, or pay her her wages?—Mrs. Bracegirdle. I did not.

L. Mohun. Did not you or your mother?

Mrs. Bracegirdle. My mother, my lord, did; she was not my servant, my mother hired her, my lord.

L. H. Stew. What doth she say? Were her wages paid, and she discharged?

Mrs. Bracegirdle. They were paid because she would not stay with me, my lord; I desired her to stay, and she would not; and then she demanded her wages, and my mother paid her.

L. Mohun. My lord, I desire you would ask the maid the reason why she would not stay.

El. Walker. If it please you, my lord, the reason was this. When I came from Hicks's-hall Mrs. Mountford the next day sent for me, and I lying with this Ann Jones that was here, she told me that I should be sent for, and they would rattle me off for my evidence that I had given at Hicks's-hall for the king; my lord, I having such an item from Ann Jones, and they being all players, I was afraid, because players have a worse reputation than other people.

Att. Gen. My lord, we shall not trouble your lordships with any more witnesses.

L. Mohun. My lord, I desire she may be asked if there were not bailiffs sent to take her, and she threatened to be arrested.

L. H. Stew. What say you to that?

El. Walker. If it please you, my lord, I cannot swear it, but I will tell you as near as I can, how it was; I had not time to look over my cloaths, being in haste when I went, and for fear I should have mistaken any thing, the next day I went to look over my cloaths, whereupon I found I had mistook, and taken one of my mistress's aprons, and left one of my own for it, and knowing their great suspicion and inveteracy against me, I went the next day to my uncle's, a porter's, and desired him to carry it to them; but when I had delivered it to him, he would not let me stay to speak much, for he said there had been three bailiffs to take me, and I having no friends, was much affrighted, and run crying up and down, and did not know where to fly, for fear they might lay me in a prison; and having no friends, therefore I was forced to fly, and so I went to a justice of peace, and there I gave him an account of the business. But he said he must have nothing to do with it, I must go again to proffer my service to my mistress; but I was not willing to proffer my service again to her, so I kept away ever since.

L. H. Stew. If you have done with the evidence on both sides; what have you more to say, my lord?

L. Mohun. My lords, I hope it will be no disadvantage to me, my not summing up my evidence like a lawyer, being a young man; I think I have made it plainly appear that there never was any former quarrel or malice between Mr. Mountford and me; I have also made appear the reason why we staid so long in the street, which was for Mr. Hill to speak with Mrs. Bracegirdle, and ask her pardon, and I staid with him as my friend, so it plainly appeareth I had no hand in killing of Mr. Mountford, and upon the confidence of my own innocency, I surrendered myself, and I commit myself to this honourable house, where I know I shall have all the justice in the world.

L. H. Stew. Has your lordship no more to say?

L. Mohun. No, my lord, but I am innocent of the fact, and leave myself wholly to your lordships.

Sol. Gen. (Sir Thomas Trevor.) May it please your lordships, according to my duty, I am to repeat the evidence to your lordships on the behalf of the king.

My lord, the evidence hath been very long, both that on the part of the king, and that on the part of the prisoner, and I know your lordships have given attention to it with very great diligence. I cannot pretend that my memory will serve me so well, as to repeat the circumstances of this so long evidence; but that which has been material, I shall crave leave shortly to mention to your lordships.

My lords, I know a great many things may slip my notice and repetition, but nothing can slip your lordships observation: so that though I should not lay a due weight upon the evidence for the king, yet your lordships will let nothing pass without giving it its just consideration, and will give judgment according to the exactest justice.

My lords, the evidence for the king doth consist first of facts precedent to the killing of Mr. Mountford, and next what happened at that time.

As to what preceded this fact thus committed, there were two or three witnesses called, and the first of them is Mr. Hudson, the next is Mr. Powell, and they give you an account that Mr. Hill had made his applications in the way of courtship to Mrs. Bracegirdle, but that he had an apprehension that Mr. Mountford was an obstruction to him in that matter, and therefore he did declare several times, that he would be revenged of him. And one time (which I think was two or three days before the fact was done) my lord Mohun, the prisoner at the bar, was at dinner with Hill, when Hill had this discourse concerning Mountford, and said he would be revenged of him. My lord Mohun was by, they both say, when such discourse was used by Hill, but they cannot tell what notice he took of it.

My lords, after this, the day that this fact was committed, your lordships have heard how my lord Mohun and Hill hired a coach and six horses in order to seize Mrs. Bracegirdle and carry her away by force, and that is proved most fully, both upon my lord Mohun and Hill, that they were both concerned in that design, and actually engaged in it; there can be no dispute of that. Accordingly they dined together that day, and at dinner there arose a discourse in relation to Mrs. Bracegirdle. And at that time my lord Mohun said it would cost Hill 50*l.* to carry her off. And Hill said, if the villain resisted he would stab him. And my lord Mohun said, he would stand by his friend. This declaration was made at dinner, on the day this fact was committed; and then they appointed to meet at the play-house at six o'clock in the evening, expecting Mrs. Bracegirdle would be there; and accordingly the coach was ordered to be ready at that time in Drury lane.

My lords, in pursuance of this design, they both came to the play-house at six o'clock; this is proved by two or three witnesses. When they came there, they inquired for Mrs. Bracegirdle, but she was not there at that time. And then not finding Mrs. Bracegirdle there, your lordships have an account from the coachman, to what places he carried them from thence. First to Drury-lane, there they staid some time; and not finding her there, he drove them into Norfolk-street, near the place where she lodged, and there a man and a woman being discoursing together, gave them occasion to say, they thought they were betrayed. And Hill said, my lord, let us go and cut that fellow's throat, or words to that effect.

Then, my lords, they drove back from that place, into Drury-lane again, and ordered the coach to stop over-against my lord of Clare's house. There it happened that Mrs. Bracegirdle came from Mr. Page's house, where she had supped. At that time there were present her mother, her brother, and Mr. Page, and Mr. Page led her along. Hill came up with seven or eight soldiers, and forced her out of Mr. Page's hand, and endeavoured to thrust her into the coach. In that coach my lord Mohun was, that is agreed upon on all hands, the coach door was open, and my lord Mohun was there in it with seven or eight pistols.

It happening they could not carry her off, but the matter taking air, people came in to their assistance, and the design being prevented,

Hill would needs go home with her to her lodging in Howard street, and my lord came out of the coach and went along with him. When they were come to the lodging, the witnesses tell your lordships, that at that time, when Mr. Page was going into the house, Hill would have had some discourse with Mr. Page, and desired to speak with him, but Mr. Page said it was not a convenient time, but to-morrow would do better, and so went into the house, and the door was locked.

My lord Mohun and Hill continued walking about the streets for about two hours before Mr. Mountford was killed, and now your lordships will observe what transactions there were during the time that they continued walking in the streets.

Then there was an interruption for about a quarter of an hour, occasioned by a lady's falling into fits in one of the galleries; but she being removed, and proclamation made for silence, the Court proceeded.

L. H. Stew. Pray, go on, Sir.

Sol. Gen. My lords, I was observing to your lordships, that part of the evidence which related to what happened after the time that Mrs. Bracegirdle was in her lodging. And, my lord, your lordships hear from the witnesses, that my lord Mohun and this Hill continued in the street, where Mrs. Bracegirdle lodged, and walked up and down for near two hours before Mr. Mountford came.

During that time, the constable and the watchmen have told your lordships upon their oaths, that my lord Mohun's and Mr. Hill's swords were both drawn. And the constable swears expressly, that he asked my lord Mohun what he did with his sword drawn, and that my lord answered, he was ready to put it up, and told him withal, he was a peer of the realm; the constable then asked, why the other gentleman's sword was drawn, and my lord Mohun made answer that his scabbard was lost.

But your lordships observe, that before the watch came, Mrs. Browne (as she herself hath sworn) came out of the house where Mrs. Bracegirdle lodged, and desired to know what they did there, and then Hill said, he should light upon Mountford one time or other; saith Mrs. Browne to him, Why, what hath he done to you? To which he replied, He hath affronted me, and I will be revenged upon him; and this was said in the presence of my lord Mohun, he being just by.

My lords, after this, in a very short time, Mr. Mountford came down, and Mrs. Browne telleth your lordships, that they were so much aware of this matter, that my lord Mohun and Hill staid to do Mountford a mischief, that there were persons sent to Mrs. Mountford to give her notice of it, and she sent messengers to find out her husband, to prevent his coming in their way, but they could not find him.

Upon Mr. Mountford's coming down, Mrs. Browne seeing him, steps up towards him, to tell him that my lord Mohun and Hill were in the street with their swords drawn, and she was afraid they had some ill design against him; but she sweareth she did not, nor could not tell him this, he was in such haste; but one of the witnesses for my lord contradicts her in this, and says, that she did tell him; but whether the one witness sweareth true, or the other witness saith true, must be left to your lordships judgment.

But Mr. Mountford came down immediately, and as he came down he met my lord Mohun, and they did salute one another (for I would not injure my lord in mistaking the evidence, as near as I can) but your lordships will observe, the witnesses say, that presently my lord Mohun asked Mr. Mountford, whether he was not sent for, and said, I suppose you have heard what happened to the lady this night, and I hope you do not come to vindicate Mrs. Bracegirdle. And Mr. Mountford replied, I hope your lordship doth not come to vindicate Mr. Hill in such an action.

Thereupon Hill stepped up, and struck Mr. Mountford a box on the ear, and at the same time, with his right hand, passed at him, and run him through, before his sword was drawn. This two of the witnesses for the king say Mr. Mountford told them upon his death-bed, and it was very probably so; because your lordships observe by all the evidence, Hill's sword was ready drawn in his hand.

[There being some noise, proclamation was made for silence.]

Sol. Gen. My lords, I was observing that it was immediately, and at the same time that he struck him, and run him through, and it is very likely it was so, as Mr. Mountford said when dying; for several of the witnesses for the king do swear, that the box on the ear was before his sword was drawn, and Hill's sword was ready in his hand. So Mr. Mountford said when he was expiring, and what regard your lordships will have to the declaration of a dying man, we must submit to your lordships judgment; and Mrs. Browne, who was there and saw the fact, sweareth the same thing, that it was done before Mr. Mountford could have time to draw his sword.

If that be so, it is very plain it was murder in Mr. Hill, and your lordships will please to observe another piece of evidence that came from the mouth of a witness, examined for the noble lord the prisoner at the bar, and that is Leake the boy, he was examined before the coroner; indeed he was not called now for the king, and your lordships may see some reason why he was not; but your lordships have had his deposition before the coroner read, and by that your lordships may observe, how different his testimony then was, from what he now giveth. And whether your lordships will believe what he then said upon his oath, or what he now saith, is left to your lordships consideration. He saith, when he was examined upon his oath, soon after the fact, that my lord Mohun was by when Hill did wound Mountford, and that my lord Mohun said, that he would stand by his friend, and that Hill was his friend, and that my lord Mohun did stand by, and did not offer to part them. Though he hath something varied from this in his testimony now, yet he still affirms what he there swore to be true.

But further, my lords, your lordships will consider what the constable swore my lord Mohun said after he was taken, and when he was in custody at the round-house. Whether he did surrender himself or no, we must leave to your lordships, upon the evidence that hath been given on the one side, and on the other. But when he was in custody (as I said) my lord Mohun asked whether Hill was taken, and being answered, No, he said he was glad of that; but he was sorry he had no more money about him, and wished that he had that money which he himself had, and that he would be willing to be hanged for him. So great a kindness he expressed for Hill, and said, he had changed coats with him, and then had Hill's coat on his back.

This, my lords, is the substance of the evidence on the king's part, and upon the whole of it, it is plain, with humble submission to your lordships, that here was a premeditated malice in Hill, by his own declarations preceding, by what was done at the time of the fact committed, and by stabbing him before his sword was drawn.

The question will be, whether my lord Mohun, the prisoner at the bar, was privy to this design of Hill's, and did so far agree in it, as to keep him company to assist and encourage him. For if he was privy, and knew of Hill's design, and staid there for that purpose to give him assistance in it, with humble submission to your lordships' judgment, he will be as much guilty of the murder, as Hill that actually killed him: that therefore will be the question before your lordships, for your judgment upon the consideration of what has been proved in this case.

My lords, the prisoner, my lord Mohun, has called and produced several witnesses to your lordships, in defence of himself. The first witness was called to this purpose, to shew that my lord had no malice to Mountford, but that they were very good friends but two or three days before; that he spoke of him with a great deal of kindness, and desired to drink a bottle of wine with him.

Now for this, I would observe to your lordships, that it is not the question, whether my lord Mohun had any direct or express malice against Mountford; but if Hill, who is so great a friend of my lord Mohun's, had a malice against Mountford, and my lord Mohun had so great a kindness for Hill, as to accompany and assist him in taking his intended revenge (whether it was so or no, your lordships are to judge) it will be as much murder in law, as if my lord had himself had a hand in it.

For the other witnesses that have been called for the prisoner, I must leave the consideration of what they say to your lordships. They are not upon their oaths, but yet they are to be believed so far, as your lordships shall judge what they say credible, upon consideration of all that you have heard. But for the boy, who hath contradicted his own evidence, which he gave upon oath before the proper officer, but acknowledgeth what he swore then was true, what credit is to be given to him, will deserve your lordships particular consideration. How he has been prevailed upon to change his evidence, I cannot tell, nor what weight it will have with you.

My lords, I will not spend more of your lordships time; I know you very well remember, and will carefully recollect all the evidence, both for the king and for the prisoner, and your lordships will consider that it is a case of blood, and if your lordships think him guilty, though he be one of your own body, you will adjudge him so; if not, you will acquit him; and therefore I leave the matter to your lordships just determination.

L. H. Stew. My lords, I think now, having heard the evidence on all sides, your lordships will think fit to adjourn to the House of Lords. Is it your pleasure to adjourn?

Lords. Ay, ay.

L. H. Stew. This House is adjourned to the House of Lords.

Then the Lords returned to their own House, in the same order as they came into the court.

After some debate amongst themselves in their own House, they adjourned till the next day, and ordered the Prisoner, Counsel, and Witnesses to attend in the Court.

WEDNESDAY, February 1, 1693.

The Lords sate all day in their own House, debating amongst themselves in the absence of the Judges, who were in the Court, and about eight o'clock in the evening, the House of Lords adjourned till the Friday following, the Thursday being Candlemas-day, and no law day. And the Prisoner, Counsel, and Witnesses were ordered to attend in the Court on Friday morning.

FRIDAY, February 3.

About the hour of four in the afternoon, the Lords (who had till then been debating amongst themselves in their own House) came in the same order as the first day into the court of Westminster-hall, except only that the Judges were a great part of the day waiting for them in the court.

The Lords being seated on their proper benches, and his grace the Lord High Steward in the chair before the throne, proclamations were made for silence, and for the bringing the prisoner to the bar in the usual manner; and the prisoner coming to the bar, and having saluted his grace the lord high steward, and the peers, and being re-saluted by them, the court proceeded in this manner :

L. H. Stew. My lord Mohun, My lords have heard the evidence on both sides, for and against you ; and upon that evidence some Questions have arisen in point of law, in which some of my lords are doubtful. I am therefore by their lordships command to propose to your lordships, my Lords Chief Justices and the rest of the Judges here, to have your Opinions upon a case stated by their lordships ; and it is this :

‘ In a Case where a man shall murder another, Whether all those that are in his company at the time of the murder, are so necessarily involved in the said crime, that they may not be separated from the crime of the said person, so as in some cases to be found guilty of manslaughter ?’*

To this, my lords expect you, the Judges, should give your Resolutions severally one after another, and therefore it is to begin with you, my lord chief justice.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, the question is pretty long ; and I desire, that I may not be mistaken in the opinion I shall give, that I may have it in writing, and that I may have a little time to consider it, because it hath been a question framed upon very great consideration and deliberation : therefore I would be very well advised before I give an Answer to such a question, because it is of so great importance.

L. H. Stew. You must speak out, my lords ; for else I am at such a distance that I cannot hear a word you say.

L. C. J. Treby. My lords, I make the same humble request : the Question propounded is long, and the fruit of great deliberation among your lordships : I desire therefore my Answer may be such as becometh me to it, and to that purpose, that I may have a copy of it, and some time to consider of it.

L. H. Stew. I have it here in writing, and will give it you, if that will serve the turn.

The Paper was brought by the Black Rod from his grace to the Judges.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, we desire your lordships will give us time to withdraw, and consider of it among ourselves.

L. H. Stew. Your lordships hear the motion of my Lord Chief Justice ; the Judges desire your leave to withdraw, and consider of the question among themselves.

Lords. No, no, no.

Then the Judges sitting upon the wool-packs conferred for a little time privately with one another ; and then the earl of Rochester stood up.

E. of Rochester. My lords.

L. H. Stew. My lord of Rochester, What say you ?

E. of Rochester. My lords, the prisoner doth desire to have a copy of this Question, it being a question in point of law, that his counsel may see it.

Lords. Ay, ay, he ought to have it.

A copy was carried by one of the clerks to the bar, and delivered to the prisoner, and he gave it to sir Thomas Powis, who, with Mr. Hawles and Mr. Price, before assigned of council for my lord Mohun in matters of law, stood by him at the bar.

L. Mohun. My lords, I desire to know whether my counsel may speak to this case before the Judges give their Opinions, it being a matter of law, and the judges superior to my counsel ?

L. H. Stew. My lord, they may be heard to any matter of law that is law singly, the counsel of either side may be heard to any thing that is a point of law only.

L. Mohun. My lord, I conceive this to be so.

L. H. Stew. My lord, it is agreed to be so ; but, my lords, I must desire your lordships leave to go down to the wool-pack, or I shall not be able to hear what is said.

Lords. Ay, ay.

Then his grace came down and seated himself on the wool-pack.

Sir T. Powis. May it please your lordships, I am of counsel—

E. of Devonshire. My lords.

L. H. Stew. My lord Devonshire.

E. of Devonshire. I think your lordships have not yet resolved that the prisoner's counsel shall be heard before the judges ; therefore I desire they may not begin.

Lords. Yes, yes, it was agreed above.

L. H. Stew. My lords, it must be either then, or not at all ; and I understand the resolution of the house to be so.—Lords. Ay, ay.

L. H. Stew. Go on, Sir.

Sir T. Powis. May it please your lordships, I am of counsel assigned by your lordships for this noble peer that is now a prisoner at the bar : The question your lordships are pleased to propound is this :

‘ In a case where a man shall murder another, Whether all those who are in his company at the time of the murder, are so necessarily involved in the same crime, that they may not be separated from the crime of the said person, so as in some cases to be found guilty only of manslaughter ?’

My lords, with humble submission to your lordships, I take it there are many cases where a person that is present when a murder is committed by another man, shall be equally guilty of that murder ; and there are many cases where a person that is present when a murder is committed by another man, shall be guilty only of manslaughter ; and there are many cases where a person that is present when a murder is committed by another man, shall not (with humble submission) be guilty of any crime at all.

* See East's Pleas of the Crown, c. 5, sec. 135, and the books there cited.

For the first, there is no question but if two persons or more do meet together with malice prepensed to kill another, and one of them killeth him, and the rest do aid and assist him in doing of it, though the mortal wound is only given by one, there is no question but they are all equally guilty of the murder, with him that gave the mortal wound: And it is also as clear, if two persons meet together to commit an unlawful act, and during the execution of that unlawful act, one of them doth kill another man, the other will be involved in the guilt of it.

But, my lords, if several persons do meet together to commit an unlawful act, and the design of the act is totally over, so that the prosecution of it is quite left off—

There being some noise and disorder about the court, proclamation was commanded to be made, and was made again for silence.

Sir T. Powis. My lords, I say in the second instance that I was offering to your lordships; If two persons or more meet together to do an unlawful act, but are either disappointed in it, or have totally desisted from it; and afterwards these same persons having quitted their design, are together, and a third person coming into their company, though there were malice between one of those persons and that third person, and upon words, or some other occasion or accident, there should be quarrelling and fighting between those two persons that bore malice to one another, and one of them is killed, and he that before had joined in the design of committing an unlawful act, be only there in the company, if he doth neither aid nor abet, nor any ways agree to the doing of the thing, the authorities are, it will neither be murder nor manslaughter; and of this I would, with your lordships' favour, put some instances.

If two persons agree together (as the case is put in that which goeth by the name of my lord Dacres' case) to enter into another man's park and steal his deer, this is an unlawful design; and if one of them kill the keeper, and the other no way at all act in the doing of it, yet it will be murder in the person that did go along with that other in that unlawful act: But the lord Dacres' case was accompanied with further circumstances; for there it did appear that the lord Dacres' had agreed before hand to kill any person that should oppose them; there was that particular circumstance in that case.

But, my lords, I take it, with submission, to be very clear, that if two such persons who made such an attempt to rob or steal deer in a park, should be disappointed, and should leave the park, and afterwards go to a tavern, or an ale house, or any place to drink, having quitted that design, and some hours afterwards, a person cometh in that was not expected, or thought of, and a quarrel ariseth between one of those two persons who were before together and the man that so came in, and he shall be killed, I take it that the other person who was present will not be guilty of the murder, unless he aided, or assisted, or acted in it.

My lords, I would speak to your lordships in a case of this nature with as good authority as I could, besides my own poor reason to prove to your lordships that there may be many cases where a person may be present at the time when another is murdered, and yet he shall be guilty of only manslaughter, and in some cases shall be guilty of no crime at all.

The case that I shall cite is out of a treatise of a very great and very learned man: it is the book that goeth under the name of sir Matthew Hale's Pleas of the Crown: the case is this: You will find in that book under the title of murder, fol. 51. If A. and B. having malice prepense, meet and fight, and C. the servant of A. not acquainted therewith, take part with A. his master, and kill B. this is murder in A. but only manslaughter in C. So here is an instance where one is guilty of murder, and the other only guilty of manslaughter, when both are present at the time of the fact committed. The same law, saith he, it is, if C. came in suddenly, and took part with A. and killed B. In this case it is murder in A. if there was malice prepensed between him and B. but only manslaughter in C. who came in suddenly, and actually killed B.

My lords, he goeth further, and saith, If one come by chance where one is killed, and doth not abet, he is neither principal nor accessory to that murder or manslaughter; so that here are cases where it is murder in one, and manslaughter only in the other, and here are cases where it is murder in one, and not so much as manslaughter, or any crime at all, in the other.

These that I have cited are cases where one has malice against another, and he that joineth in the quarrel doth not know it. But I will put the case now, That a person hath malice against another, and one happeneth to be in his company that knoweth he hath malice against that other person; if those two that had malice against one another, do fight, and the one kill the other, yet he that is present will not be guilty of murder or manslaughter. For if the law should be, that men are involved in the guilt of murder whenever they are present at a time when one that beareth malice against another killeth his enemy, conversation in the world would be very dangerous: For, my lords, we know the world is too full of malice, and there are few men but have acquaintance with such as bear malice to others; but if to be that no man that is acquainted with one that bears malice to another, may be in his company but at the peril of his life; if his enemy come in his way, and he happen to kill him in his presence, then no man that is ever so innocent can be safe.

For I would put this case to your lordships: I am walking with a friend, or an acquaintance that I know hath malice against another, and that other man cometh in the way, and they fight, and my friend killeth that other man, and I am no way aiding or assisting in it; if that should involve me in the crime, surely the law of England would be the most unreasonable and dangerous law to live under in the world. No doubt but in such a case the person that is so present is unfortunate, but he is innocent, is not guilty.

For to make one guilty of murder where murder is committed, it must be either that he doth aid or abet, or some way assist in the killing of the man, or he must have before that time agreed and confederated with the person that killed him, that he would join therein at that time, and he must be there for that end and purpose: for if he never engaged or agreed to the killing of him, nor was there for that purpose, nor at the time did any way act, or join, or assist, in the doing of it; in those cases he is certainly not guilty.

My lords, I dare not apply any of these things to the present case, because I suppose your lordships only propounded this as a question of law, and not of fact; your lordships are the great judges both of the one and the other, but what in the argument or resolution of this case, your lordships will find agreeable to the present case of my lord now before you, I submit to your lordships judgment.

Mr. Hawles. My lords, I will not repeat what has been offered; the distinction is certainly true that has been made, that there are cases and instances in law where a man may be guilty of murder, when he is present where murder is committed, and he may be guilty of manslaughter only, where another is guilty of murder; and a man may be present where murder is committed, and be innocent both of the one and the other. But this I do venture to say, that there is no authority in our law, that saith a person present, when a murder is committed, must be guilty either of murder or manslaughter, it must be according to the circumstances of the thing, either that he intended to aid or assist in the killing, when he was there by agreement before hand, or must actually aid or assist by some action or encouragement.

But, with submission, the authority of law is very plain upon this question proposed by your lordships, That one person may be guilty of manslaughter, and another of murder at the same time. The case that hath been put out of my lord Hales, was upon his account, authority sufficient to quote, if we would only rely on him: but, my lords, with submission the authority goeth a little higher yet; Stamford putteth the question before the justices; A. that is, the master, fighteth with B. and C. the servant taketh part with his master, and killeth B. A. is guilty of murder, and C. only of manslaughter.

And that authority is followed afterwards in the case of Salisbury, in Plowd. Com. fol. 100. B. with the Resolution of all the judges in that case, That one man may be found guilty of murder, and another of manslaughter, as to the same fact; and Stamford doth expressly say, as my lord chief justice Hales quotes it out of him, that if a man be present, but do not abet or assist, or contribute to the thing, he is totally innocent, and neither principal nor accessory to the murder or manslaughter.

My lords, we do not find that our law hath any way prohibited a man to keep company with one that oweth another a spleen; sure there should be some warning given about it, if that was the law in such a case. The law goeth no farther than to caution a man, that he take care he doth not break the law himself, that he doth not transgress the bounds set him by the law.

And it were a very hard case upon a private person, if it should be otherwise; for no law compelleth a private person to part two that are fighting; if he doth attempt it, he doth it at his own peril, as to that case of A. the master fighting with B. and C. the servant taking part with his master to part them, if B. be killed, C. is guilty of manslaughter, though his design was only to part them, because the law putteth it not upon a private person to do it; if it did, the law would protect him for what he did in obedience to it.

The law is otherwise in the case of a magistrate, or a constable, who endeavoureth to part any persons fighting, and to keep the peace; if he happen so to kill a man, he is totally innocent; but a private person shall answer for it.

My lords, I will not trouble your lordships further; I hope it is plain, that malice is absolutely necessary to make a man guilty of murder, and there is no such thing in this case stated by your lordships; and therefore I submit the matter to your judgment.

Mr. Price. My lords, I am of counsel for this noble and young lord, the prisoner at the bar: I shall not trouble your lordships so far as to make any repetition of what has been said by those gentlemen that went before me.

But there was a case in Plowden that was cited by Mr. Hawles, by the name of Salisbury's Case; and I would crave leave to cite the case that is next precedent; it is in that book, fol. 98. There, my lords, was an indictment for murder against several, and among the rest, against two, one for giving the wound, and the stroke, and the other for being present, and aiding the other; and they tell you how he was an aider and abettor because he was present, and put the man upon whom the assault was made in terror, which terror was the occasion that he could not defend his life; and made him full as much a principal as the other that gave him his death's wound. And there, my lords, he citeth another ancient record, which is Quarto Libro Assisarum Placito 25. of an appeal of murder by a woman for the death of her husband against sixteen; four whereof were principals, and the other accessories, where the words are Presence, Force and Aid.

How that will come up to this case now before your lordships, I am not to trouble you with the consideration of, you who have heard the evidence are best able to judge of it.

My lords, by the same reason and rule that one man may be found guilty of murder, and another of manslaughter; one may be found guilty, and the other not guilty. As for example, if A. commandeth B. to kill C. and afterwards it repenteth him of this command, and he countermandeth it; yet notwithstanding B. doth kill C. now B. that killed C. is guilty of murder; but A. that countermanded it, is not guilty as accessory; for his malicious intent did not continue till the murdering stroke was given, and to make murder, there must be a continuing malice till the mortal wound given. Cases to this purpose many might be cited; but for a full authority there is my lord Coke in his Pleas of the Crown, fol. 51.

My lords, I have no more to say, but that by the same rule, that one may be found guilty of murder, and another of manslaughter for the same fact, by the same rule, (as circumstances may be,) the one may be found guilty of murder, and the other not guilty at all.

L. H. Stew. Have you any more to say that are of counsel for the prisoner?

Sir Tho. Powis. No, my lord, I have nothing further to offer to your lordships.

L. H. Stew. Have those who are of counsel for the king any thing to reply to this that is said by the counsel for the prisoner?

Att. Gen. May it please your lordships, the question that is proposed, is this:

‘ In a case where a man shall murder another, Whether those who are in his company at the time of the murder, are so necessarily involved in the said crime that they may not be separated from the crime of the said person, so as in some cases to be found guilty only of manslaughter?’

My lords, that which, with all submission, we would offer to your lordships, is this: we are intrusted by their majesties, to prosecute for the death of one of their subjects; there hath been a case stated to your lordships by the evidence which hath been given before you; that which is mentioned in this paper has nothing certain in it; we are to imagine a case, and suppose facts, and then to argue what will be the law upon those facts supposed. When your lordships are pleased to let us know what it is which your lordships take to be the fact of the case before you, we shall be ready to speak to the law upon that case, as it becomes us, and as is our duty to do; but till the fact be so stated by your lordships, and declared to be that which your lordships take to be the fact of my lord Mohun's case, we think it not consistent with our duty to enter into a debate upon supposals, or upon other cases than that which is in judgment before your lordships.

L. H. Stew. Will your lordships then please that the judges give their opinion?

Sol. Gen. My lords, not to trouble your lordships with any repetition of what hath been said, it is my opinion, as Mr. Attorney General has declared his, that, as this case is stated, we are bound not to give any answer to it, unless your lordships will please to tell us what the case is upon the evidence that hath been given before you.

Serj. Thompson. My lords, I desire to be heard one word in this case. I take it for granted, that your lordships here are judges both of fact and law in this case, and you are so entirely judges of it, that nobody can interpose in giving their opinions in relation to your judgments, what the fact is, and from the fact the law ariseth. We, that are of counsel for the king, must needs prejudice him as to the evidence of the fact that we have given, except we argue that which is the fact of this particular case, and the law arising thereupon together; which is not necessary here, where your lordships are judges of both; and since you are better judges of them than any one else can be, therefore we do not think it our duty to argue upon a case put ad dextra, and obitur; and hope your lordships will excuse us from answering what hath been said by the counsel for the prisoner; though I think it might be easily answered in every point; but I shall not enter upon the debating of it. For your lordships see what caution we ought to have in relation to our duty to the government, which your lordships will always expect we should perform as exactly as we can. When the fact that hath been proved in this case is stated, your lordships then are the proper judges what it amounteth to in point of law, or if your lordships desire that counsel should argue it, we shall be ready to do it.

L. H. Stew. Then my lords the judges, what say you to it? My lords here expect your opinion in this case.

L. C. J. Holt. If your lordships please, I will repeat the question; which is this:

‘ In a case where a man shall murder another, Whether those who are in his company are so necessarily involved in the said crime, that they may not be separated from the crime of the said person, so as in some cases to be found guilty only of manslaughter?’

My lords, I shall not inlarge upon the matter, but humbly offer my opinion to your lordships as generally to the question. I am of opinion, that the crime of those who are in the company at the time of the murder committed, may be so separated from the crime of the person that committeth the murder, as in some cases they are only to be found guilty of manslaughter. I suppose your lordships do not expect that I should argue the case, or explain my opinion upon so general a question, by particular instances, or run into a consideration of the different cases that may be put upon it, therefore I only deliver this as my opinion.

L. C. J. Treby. May it please your lordships, I am of the same opinion; I think the import of your lordships question is, Whether there may be a case in which it is possible that one person who is in the company of another at the time that he committed murder, may be guilty of manslaughter; and, my lords, I think a case may fall out, and may be so circumstanced, as that it may be possible, that he who did accompany the murderer, may be guilty only of manslaughter. Your lordships only expect our opinion, and therefore I will not go about to argue it.

Just. Nevil. My lords, I shall not spend your time to repeat the question, it hath been so often repeated; but I am of the same opinion with my lords chief justices: I must concur with them in it, that there may possibly be such a case, as that when murder is committed where others are in company, he that doth the thing will be guilty of murder, and those that were in company, guilty but of manslaughter. There may be such a case.

Earl of Carlisle. My lords, to save your lordships time, unless the rest of the judges differ from those that have spoken their opinion, I think you need not trouble them to speak to it severally.

Baron Turton. We are all of the same opinion, my lords: we cannot differ in opinion upon such a case.

Earl of Monmouth. My lords, I humbly beg your lordships leave to propose a question to my lords the judges for their opinions.

Lords. Ay, ay.

L. H. Stew. What is your question, my lord of Monmouth?

Earl of Monmouth. My lords, the question is this:

‘A, conscious of an animosity between B and C, A accompanieth B where C happeneth to come, and B killeth him; whether A, without any malice to C, or any actual hand in his death, be guilty of murder?’

L. H. Stew. Pray, my lord, be pleased to hand up your paper, that my lords the judges may see it.—

Earl of Mulgrave. My lords—

L. H. Stew. What saith your lordship, my lord of Mulgrave?

Earl of Mulgrave. I only desire, that the prisoner at the bar, if he hath a mind to it, may have his counsel speak to this question, before the judges answer it, as was done in the other case.

L. Mohun. I desire, my lords, my counsel may have the question in writing.

L. H. Stew. Make my lord a copy of it.

One copy was delivered by the clerk to the prisoner, and by him to his counsel, and another to the king's counsel; and the original was delivered to the judges.

L. Mohun. Is it your lordships pleasure that my counsel may be heard to this question?

Lords. Ay, Ay.

Sir T. Powis. My lords, the question that this noble peer hath been pleased to propose, is this:

‘A, conscious of an animosity between B and C, A accompanieth B where C happeneth to come, and B killeth him; whether A, without any malice to C, or any actual hand in his death, be guilty of murder?’

My lords, with humble submission to your lordships, I take it in this case the law is very clear, That as this case is put, he that was in company when the murder was committed, under these circumstances, is not guilty of any crime: But without question he is not guilty of murder.

My lords, malice is so absolutely necessary to murder, either express, or that which the law calleth malice implied, that there can be no case where murder can be committed without it; no indictment can ever be good, unless, ‘Ex malitia sua precogitata,’ be alledged in it; because this is absolutely essential to murder.

But, my lord, if so be a man that is present, not designing, or foreseeing that unhappy accident that doth fall out between his friend with whom he is in company and another person that came accidentally to them, though malice was between those two, God forbid he should be guilty, if he did neither foresee it, nor any way acted in it.

He that is present must be involved in the crime, either by some way aiding, abetting, or contributing to the death of the man, or there must be some precedent combination and agreement to do that act which at that time was done; and that must be plainly and clearly proved: For his acting, his standing by innocently and harmlessly, is so great an evidence of his not concurring, that it must be a mighty proof of malice that must convict that man of a preceding agreement to do the fact; and if it doth not appear plainly and manifestly, that he agreed before-hand, or acted then, and abetted and contributed to the thing; I say, unless this be clear and manifest, it is no question, but in law he is innocent of the murder.

For in such a case it is plain he never had prepensed malice express, nor is there any evidence of that which the law calleth malice implied; which is when a man killeth another without provocation, that is, when he that doth the act had no provocation, or killeth an officer in the prosecution of his office, that the law calleth malice implied. But then that is never but in the person that did the act, and not in the persons who were present at that time, unless before-hand they had agreed to do that act; and therefore they cannot be guilty of murder.

And this, my lords, is what I humbly offer to your lordships' consideration, in relation to the case put by that noble lord.

Mr. Hawles. Will your lordships please to favour me with a word on the same side with sir Thomas Powis, and I shall be very short in the matter.

The king's counsel did complain that the last case was not fully stated, and therefore they could not speak to it; my lords, with submission, this case is fully stated: there was nothing in the other case said of malice between him that was murdered, and him that killed him; but here it is said, that the person present was not conscious of any malice, nor had any manner of hand in the doing of it: And then, with submission, my lords, upon the question, whether he was not guilty of murder? If this was a special verdict found by twelve men, and referred to the judges, I do not at all doubt but their judgment would be, that he was not guilty. For though in a special verdict, where malice is not found, the prisoner would be acquitted; yet if it be expressly found in the verdict that he did not know of any malice between them, then, with submission, there would be no colour to find him guilty of any thing.

A Lord interrupted him, and said, The case was put of one conscious of the malice.

Mr. Hawles. My lords, I beg your pardon, I confess it is so, I did mistake it; but, with submission, that will not much alter the matter. If he was conscious, that will not make him guilty; for that consciousness of his is no matter of crime: if he did not act any thing, or agree to do any thing before-hand, but only was in company with the person that had malice against another, that will not make him guilty of any crime whatsoever.

Mr. Price. My lords, I shall speak but one word to it; I observe the great stress of the case lieth upon the word being 'conscious' of the malice between B and C. Now as to that, with submission, I conceive, and am of opinion, that as this case is, A is not guilty of murder, and for authority, I shall rely upon the cases in Stamford's Pleas of the Crown, fol. 40, and my lord Coke's Pleas of the Crown, fol. 51. The case is this, If a man happen to be in company where murder is committed, or felony, and he cometh not there on purpose, or by confederacy to do it, in that case, though murder be committed, and he doth not endeavour to part them, this is no murder in him, for he is punishable by fine and imprisonment, if not an infant; but if he was an infant, he is not punishable at all, for he is not conscious of the law in such a case. But in this case, except malice prepensed, express, or implied, be proved, without doing any thing or abetting, he is not guilty of murder.

L. H. Stew. Gentlemen, you that are of the king's counsel, have you any thing to say to this question?

Att. Gen. My lords, here is a case put which I hear from the counsel on the other side, is certainly enough stated. My lords, if this be stated to us, as that which is agreed to be the fact of the present case, we are ready to speak to it; but if this be not taken by your lordships to be my lord Mobun's case, and as such stated to us, then we must humbly beg to be excused. I know your lordships will be tender in this matter, and as well pleased that we hold to that which we conceive to be our duty in reference to that station in which we serve the king, as with any forwardness in us to answer questions: and therefore we beg your lordships' excuse for saying nothing more to it.

Earl of Monmouth. My lords, I did not propose it as a case stated and agreed by your lordships, it is only a case particularly stated for my own satisfaction.

Earl of Mulgrave. My lords—

L. H. Stew. My lord of Mulgrave.

Earl of Mulgrave. If your grace please, let the king's counsel know, that they are not to ask you the question, Whether the Lords are agreed what the case is? They are to answer such questions as are proposed, and not to ask any such question.

Att. Gen. My lords, with that noble lord's pardon, I did not ask any question; all that I said was, That when a case is agreed to, and stated by your lordships to be the present case, we would be ready to speak to it, and till we receive that intimation from your grace, we shall think ourselves excused from giving any answer to other questions.

L. H. Stew. My lords, I think we must go on, and if any lord has any more questions to propose, he may propose them.

E. of Nottingham. My lords—

L. H. Stew. My lord of Nottingham.

E. of Nottingham. Your lordships will not certainly require of the king's counsel to answer any questions that they think improper for them to speak to; but when a question hath been proposed by any noble lord, to which the counsel for the prisoner hath been heard, and the king's counsel think not fit to speak to it, there is nothing more requisite, but that in the presence of the prisoner (as the law requireth it should be) you do demand the opinion of the Judges.

L. H. Stew. What say you to it, my Lord Chief Justice?

L. C. J. Holt. If your lordships please, I will repeat the question:

'A, conscious of an animosity between B and C, A accompanieth B where C happeneth to come, and B killeth him; Whether A, without any malice to C, or any actual hand in his death, be guilty of murder?'

And, my lords, as this case is stated, I do conceive, that A is not guilty of the murder, for it appeareth the meeting was casual, and there was no design in A against C, and therefore though A did know of the malice between B and C, yet it was not unlawful for A to keep company with B, but he might go with him any where, if it was not upon a design against C.

Therefore I take it as this case is put, that C came accidentally into the company where A and B were, and then, without any design in A, B killeth C. This is not murder, indeed no offence in A.

3 U

L. C. J. Treby. If it please your lordships, as this case is put, I think it is not an offence of murder or manslaughter in A; it dependeth upon the words, as the last question did. For the former question was put generally, Whether there might not be a case found or framed, wherein one might be guilty of murder, and the other of manslaughter? So here it dependeth upon the word 'happeneth,' which I take to signify (as my lord doth) a casual coming into, or being in the company.

Now, my lords, when B had communicated to A this malicious purpose to kill C, it stood uncertain, whether he to whom B had communicated it did consent; if he had any way declared his consent, that he would go to such a place, and stay there with B for such a purpose, then it had been murder in both; but if he merely was silent, and only kept B company, perhaps with an intent to dissuade him from it, or possibly without any consideration at all, and then the person intended to be killed accidentally came by, and is killed by B, A doing nothing towards it: in that case it is neither murder nor manslaughter in A.

Just. Nevil. My lords, as this case is, it seemeth to be mere accidental the coming of C into their company, for it is said, 'happeneth to come;' and so though A did know that there was an animosity between B and C, yet declaring no intent of going with B to that purpose, but coming with B into a place where C accidentally came or happened to be, between whom and B there is a quarrel, and C is killed; I do not take it at all that A is concerned, but merely as any other person that accidentally was there, and in that case he cannot be guilty of murder or manslaughter, or any other crime.

E. of Devonshire. My lords—

L. H. Stew. My lord Devonshire.

E. of Devon. If the rest are of the same opinion you need not give them any farther trouble, I think.

Judges. We are of the same opinion.

E. of Scarborough. My lords—

L. H. Stew. My lord of Scarborough.

E. of Scarborough. I humbly beg your lordships leave, that I may offer a question to your lordships, to be proposed to the judges, and the question is this:

'Whether if A heard B threaten to kill C,
'and some days after A shall be with B
'upon some other design, where C shall
'pass by, or come in the place where A
'and B are, and C shall be killed by B;
'A standing by without contributing to 'the fact, his sword not then being drawn,
'or any malice ever appearing on A's part 'against C; whether A will be guilty of
'the murder of C?'

L. H. Stew. Pray, my lord, give your paper to the clerk. [Which was done.]

L. H. Stew. My lord Mohun, doth your lordship desire that your counsel may have a copy of this question, and be heard to it?

L. Mohun. Yes, my lord, if you please.

Then a copy was given to them for his counsel, and another to the king's counsel, and a third the judges had.

Sir Tho. Powys. Will your lordships please to favour me with a few words, and I shall trouble your lordships very little, because I have said that already to your lordships which will be an answer to a good part of this case: the case is this:

'Whether if A heard B threaten to kill C,
'and some days after A shall be with B
'upon some other design, where C shall
'pass by, or come in the place where A and
'B are, and C shall be killed by B; A 'standing by without contributing to the 'fact, his sword not then being drawn, or 'any malice ever appearing on A's part 'against C; whether A will be guilty
'of the murder of C?'

My lord, with humble submission, we do take it, that the law in this case is likewise very clear, that A is not guilty of murder: for as this case is put, there doth not appear (nay, the contrary doth appear) that he had any manner of malice to this man that was killed, nor any hand in killing of him: and, as I said before to your lordships, (and I hope the judges will verify us in that, and your lordships will be of the same opinion) there can be no case wherein a man shall be guilty of murder, but where there is malice against the person so murdered, or some way abetting and assisting in the killing of him, or what the law calleth 'implied malice.'

But in this case that is now put, there is neither express malice, but the contrary appearing, nor any implied malice, which is by construction of law; the person that was by, and heard B threaten C before, yet doth no way aid or assist to the killing of him; and therefore I think, with submission, the law, and all our law-books, and reason itself, are clear for the acquitting of A in this case.

Mr. Hawles. My lords, I think the resolutions that have been given in the cases before, will warrant us in our opinions in this, that A is not guilty of murder in this case: for I think it was said by the judges, that notwithstanding a man knew another had a design upon a third person, yet it was lawful to keep company with him, if he did not join with him in the design. Now here it doth appear, that A keepeth B company, but not upon that design, for he had no malice to C, nor had any hand in his death, and C cometh in by accident into their company or place where they are: with submission, my lords, A is totally not guilty, for there was no malice in him; and though he was there, he was there upon his lawful occasions; and if they two fight, the best course he can take is to stand still and do nothing; and therefore he cannot be guilty of murder or manslaughter.

Mr. Price. My lords, I have but this word to say, his being there was lawful; C cometh there but by accident, and when they two do fight, his not parting of them doth not make him guilty of the other's death, here is no malice, therefore he is not guilty of murder, and he hath done nothing towards the fact, therefore he is not guilty of man-slaughter.

L. H. Stew. Will you say any thing to this question, you that are of the king's counsel?

Att. Gen. My lords, we are ready to speak to the present case, when we receive intimation from your lordships, that what is put is the present case.

Serj. Thompson. My lords, if they put a case of fact to be argued as a case of law, and from time to time alledge facts which are not in the case before us, we cannot speak to them.

Att. Gen. My lords, we are ready to argue the case of the prisoner at the bar when it is stated; but till then, we humbly beg your pardon: we think we are not bound to speak to other cases.

L. H. Stew. My Lord Chief Justice, what say you to it?

L. C. J. Holt. If your lordships please, I will put the question:

'Whether if A heard B threaten to kill C, and some days after A shall be with B upon some other design, where C shall pass by, or come in the place where A and B are, and C shall be killed by B; A standing by without contributing to the fact, his sword not then being drawn, or any malice ever appearing on A's part against C; whether A will be guilty of the murder of C?'

My lords, I am of opinion that A in this case will not be guilty of murder or manslaughter: for it doth not appear by the stating of the case, that A did consent to the design, or in any wise contribute to the fact.

L. H. Stew. My Lord Chief Justice Treby.

L. C. J. Treby. My lords, I take this question to be the same in substance as to the point in law with the last; and am of opinion that A is not guilty of murder or manslaughter.

Just. Nevil. I am of the same opinion.

L. H. Stew. If all the rest of you are of the same opinion, you may spare yourselves the trouble of delivering it particularly.

Judges. We are all of the same opinion.

[Then there was a little pause; and afterwards the earl of Kingston stood up.]

E. of King. My lords, I desire for my own private satisfaction to know,

'Whether a person knowing of the design of another to lie in wait to assault a third man, who happeneth to be killed, (when the person who knew of that design is present) be guilty in law of the same crime with the party who had the design, and killed him, though he had no actual hand in his death?'

L. H. Steward. My lord, I must crave your excuse, there is another question to precede this.

E. of Devon. My lords, I had a question to ask; but it being much to the same purpose with the two last, I think it better to wave it, for there hath been given an answer to it already.

L. H. Steward. Then, my lord of Kingston, will you be pleased to deliver up your paper to the table? (Which was done.)

L. H. Steward. My lord Mohan, do you desire your counsel may have a copy of this question?

E. of Mulgrave. My lords—

L. H. Steward. My lord of Mulgrave.

E. of Mulgrave. I desire your grace will hear the question. Pray let it be read, that we may know what it is.

L. H. Steward. Read it.

Cl. of Crown. Readeth.

'Whether a person knowing of the design of another to lie in wait to assault a third man who happeneth to be killed, (when the person who knew of the design is present) be guilty in law of the same crime with the party who had the design, and killed him, though he had no actual hand in his death?'

E. of Mulgrave. My lords—

L. H. Steward. My lord of Mulgrave.

E. of Mulgrave. I think, my lords, in a case of this nature we cannot be too exact: I humbly conceive that is not a proper question to be put, therefore I move that we may adjourn to consider of it, whether it shall be put or not, if that lord do insist upon it.

L. H. Steward. My lord of Kingston, doth your lordship insist on this question being put?

E. of King. Yes, my lords, I do, and I must insist upon it; for I think I cannot give my private opinion in this case without satisfaction in it.

Lords. Then adjourn, adjourn.

L. H. Steward. This court is adjourned into the House of Lords.

Then the Lords went back to their own house in the same order, and debated this matter amongst themselves for about an hour.

Between six and seven in the evening the Lords returned into the court in the same order, and being seated on their benches, and his grace in the chair before the throne, they proceeded thus:

First, Proclamation was made for silence.

L. H. Steward. My Lord Chief Justice and you the judges—

L. Cornwallis. My lords—

L. H. Steward. My lord Cornwallis.

L. Cornwallis. My lord, before your grace giveth any directions, I think you should call the prisoner.

L. H. Steward. Is not the prisoner at the bar?

L. Cornwallis. No, my lord.

L. H. Stew. Call for the prisoner.

[Then Proclamation was made for the governor of the Tower to bring forth the prisoner, and he was brought as before.]

L. H. Stew. I am to let you that are of counsel for the king and the prisoner know, That if any question be put by any of my lords which any of you shall not think fit to give an answer to, my lords will take it for granted, either on the one part or on the other, that the reason is, because it is not necessary to give any answer; and then they will proceed to have the answer of you, my lords the judges. And now for myself, I must desire your lordships will give me leave to come down again to the wool-pack.—Lords. Aye, aye.

[Then his grace came down, and seated himself on the wool-pack.]

L. H. Stew. My lord of Kingston, Will you please to propose your question?

Earl of Kingston. My lord, my question is this, which I desire the judges opinion in for my own satisfaction:

‘Whether a person knowing of the design
‘of another to lie in wait to assault a
‘third man, who happeneth to be killed,
‘(when the person who knew of the design ‘is present) be guilty in law of the same
‘crime with the party who had the design,
‘and killed him, though he had no ac‘tual hand in his death?’

L. H. Stew. My lord Mohun, do you desire your counsel may have a copy of that question?

L. Mohun. Yes, if your lordships please.

L. H. Stew. Read it aloud, and deliver a copy to my lord.

[The question was read by the clerk of the crown, and one copy of it delivered to the prisoner's counsel, and another to the king's counsel, and a third to the judges.]

L. Mohun. Is it your lordships pleasure, that my counsel be heard to this case?

Lords. Ay, ay.

Sir T. Powis. The case that is put, my lords, is this:

‘Whether a person knowing of the design
‘of another to lie in wait to assault a third ‘man, who happeneth to be killed (when
‘the person who knew of the design is ‘present) be guilty in law of the same
‘crime with the party who had the design,
‘and killed him, though he had no ac-
‘tual hand in his death?’

My lords, I shall not insist upon the same privilege that the king's counsel did even now do, to decline speaking to any case that your lordships shall put. But I hope your lordships will permit me to say, that I do not admit this to be the case of my lord Mohun, and I hope that my speaking to it shall not be taken as any admission that this is his case. But as this case is put with that allowance, that I speak to it not as his case, I do take it, that this person thus present at the killing of the third man, is not guilty of murder.

My lords, there are but two circumstances in the case that can draw him into any danger.

The first is, That he knew another person had a design to make an assault upon a third man. And

The second is, That he who had the knowledge of this design, was also present when upon that assault that third person happened to be killed.

But, my lords, I do take it, that in this case neither of these ingredients will make this man guilty of murder.

As to the first, The knowing that a man has a design to make an assault upon a third person, that taken by itself is no crime. It frequently happeneth, that a man heareth what others threaten, that they will assault and beat such an one; I may know that another doth so design, and that he will watch his opportunity for the doing of it; and yet my mere knowledge, my mere knowing of it, doth not make me guilty of any crime, though I do not endeavour to prevent it.

I confess, it doth become a good man upon such knowledge to do all that he can to prevent such beginning of mischief; but if he doth not prevent it, that is no crime.

The second matter is, That though he did know of this design, he was also so unfortunate as not to prevent it; nay more, he was present when the assault was made, and that assault is attended with the death of the party assaulted; but he never acted in it, never abetted it. Take all this together, and yet he is not guilty of murder, nay, perhaps not of any crime, at most only of a misdemeanor.

For it is no more than this: I knew another person did intend to assault a third man; I was present when he did assault him, but did not prevent it either before he made it, though I knew he designed it, nor whilst he was making the assault upon which the man is killed. That is all that this thing doth amount to; and no man can say, with humble submission, that this can involve me in the crime of murder.

It is true, if I command A to beat C, and he according to my command doth fall upon him, and so beat him that he dieth; this maketh me guilty of his death, because what is done by that command of mine is my doing; therefore though I only commanded him to beat him, yet he dying upon that beating, which was made pursuant to my command, I that gave the command must answer for it, and am guilty of all that followeth thereupon.

But if I only know that another person designeth to do such a thing, and am neither commanding, aiding nor assisting in the doing of it, but only present at the time, but did not interpose to prevent it; that doth not make me such an agent in this matter, as that I should be any ways guilty of his death, if it doth ensue. I take it, this case cometh to no more than this; there is no malice precedent, no sort of abetting, aiding or assisting, but a bare declining to prevent the assault, and that will not amount to any thing that is capital: if it be any offence, it can only be construed as a misdemeanor, but neither murder nor manslaughter.

Mr. Hawles. If your lordships please to spare me one word on the same side: it is no manner of crime for a man to know, that another doth design to lie in wait to murder a third person, much less to assault him.

There is but one case that I know of in law, where the knowledge of an ill design, without discovery and endeavour to prevent it, is an offence, and that is in the case of high-treason; and yet even there the bare knowledge doth not make a man guilty of treason: and it was a hard case if it should; for it is not in the power of any innocent man to say, that he shall not know of an ill design, either of murder or high-treason.

It is true, in the case of treason, if I conceal it, it is a crime; but it is not treason, but only misprision of treason; which is forfeiture of lands, and perpetual confinement in prison during my life: but it doth not extend to any other matter; for though I know, and do conceal it, that is no manner of crime at all, though that is farther than this case putteth it, for it only goeth to the knowing, and not to the concealing.

And, my lords, with submission, this would be likewise a hard case, if the law was otherwise: for sometimes a man may apprehend he knoweth of a design, when there is no such thing designed. Your lordships know, where a certain gentleman said he would kill any man that did oppose him, when he neither designed it, nor executed any such purpose: and in such a case, though it had been well done of the person that heard of the design, to have gone and informed the third person, (and if he had, I believe your lordships would have had no occasion of a trial at this time, for it might have been determined another way); yet his not doing it is not a crime.

Then further, my lords, a person's being present at such a time is his misfortune, but not at all his fault; he can no more help the action, than he could the ill design, or his own knowledge of that design. It is a complicated misfortune, both to know it, and be present at the execution of it; but without having any hand in it, it can be no offence: for indeed, it is as to him no more than a man's being present that did not know of such a design. And if this was a special verdict, upon an indictment for murder, I doubt not but my lords the judges would give their judgment, that the defendant was Not Guilty.

Mr. Price. I have only this word to add, my lords: I do take it, that the bare privy of this design, with the bare personal presence of him that was so privy when this act is committed by another man, will not amount to make him principal; and so he will not be guilty of murder: for we find, that to make a man principal in murder, there must be aiding and abetting, and only being present will not do it. Now the aiding and abetting must be, either by commanding or assisting, or putting the person assaulted in terror or fear; or he must be there ready, and designing to assist in case of opposition. These are facts that the law requireth to the making a man principal in murder: and bare privy, with a mind to assault, and bare presence when upon the assault the man is killed, will not amount to make a man principal, and consequently guilty of murder.

L. H. Stew. Mr. Attorney, Do you think fit to say any thing to what the counsel for the prisoner have alledged?

Att. Gen. No, my lord.

L. H. Stew. Nor any other of the king's counsel?—Sol. Gen. No, my lord.

L. H. Stew. Are ye all of that mind?

Serj. Tremain. I am of that mind, my lord.

Serj. Thompson. And so am I.

L. H. Stew. Then, my Lord Chief-Justice, what say you to it?

L. C. J. Holt. If your lordships please, I will repeat the question:

‘Whether a person knowing of the design
‘of another to lie in wait to assault a
‘third man, who happeneth to be killed
‘(when the person who knew of the de‘sign is present) be guilty in law of the ‘same crime with the party who had the ‘design, and killed him, though he had ‘no actual hand in his death?’

My lords, I am of opinion, this is no murder nor manslaughter; he that knew of the design of assaulting, only happened to be present when the assault was made, and the party killed; but if he did not contribute to his death, he is not guilty of murder. This question is much to the same effect with the question that was put before: but if the person that knew of this design did advise it, or agree to it, or lay in wait for it, or resolved to meet the third person that was killed, with him that killed him, it would be murder: but as this case is put, it is neither murder nor manslaughter.

L. C. J. Treby. My lords, I am humbly of the same opinion, as this case is put. The person to whom this matter of the design to lie in wait to assault another is communicated, is only passive; he only receiveth the notice of it, and doth nothing towards the fact. But if by going to the place, directing, persuading, promising assistance, or encouraging, he had discovered his consent, or had lain in wait himself, then he had been guilty: but if he did nothing, but only receive this notice, and then the person assaulted happened to come by, and is killed in his presence, this is but an accident, and doth not involve him in the murder. And I think, in effect, it is the same with the second question that was proposed. There it was put, of one that had an animosity against another; here it is put, of one that lay in wait to assault him: there it was put, of accompanying him to the place where the party was killed; here it is, of his being killed in his presence: so that the resolution must be the same in this case that was given in that.

Just. Nevill. My lords, I shall not spend any of your lordships time: I am of the same opinion with my lords that spoke before, and for the reasons that they have given.

L. H. Stew. If they are all of the same opinion, I suppose your lordships will not require their particular delivering it.

Lords. No, no.

Judges. We are all of the same opinion.

L. H. Stew. I am now to know of your lordships, whether there be any of you that have any more questions to ask?

E. of Nottingham. My lord.

L. H. Stew. My lord of Nottingham.

E. of Nottingham. The question that I have to propose to your lordship is the same that hath been already offered to you, but with some little variation; for I do find, my lords the Judges do interpret this person's being killed in the presence of another, to be upon an accidental meeting. I would propose to your lordships, that the judges may answer what the law would be, when a person, knowing of the design of another to lie in wait to assault a third man, accompanied him at that time that the design is to be executed, whether it be the same crime in the one as the other?

L. H. Stew. If your lordship have your question in writing, pray deliver it in.

E. of Nottingham. I will immediately, my lord. [Then he did put it in writing.]

L. H. Stew. Will your lordship please that it may be handed to the table? [Which was done.]—L. H. Stew. Read it.

Cl. of Cr. Readeth.

‘ Whether a person knowing of the design
‘ of another to lie in wait to assault a third
‘ man, and accompanying him in that de-
‘ sign, if it shall happen that the third ‘ person be killed at that time in the pre-
‘ sence of him who knew of that design,
‘ and accompanied the other in it, be guilty
‘ in law of the same crime with the party
‘ who had the design, and killed him,
‘ though he had no actual hand in his ‘ death?’

L. H. Stew. My lord Mohun, do you desire a copy of this?

L. Mohun. Yes, if your lordships please.

L. H. Stew. Carry my lord one.

[Then copies were delivered as before.]

L. H. Stew. Well, Sir, what say you to that question?

Sir Tho. Powys. The case that is now propounded is this:

‘ Whether a person knowing of the design
‘ of another to lie in wait to assault a third
‘ man, and accompanying him in that de-
‘ sign, if it shall happen that the third ‘ person be killed at that time in the pre-
‘ sence of him who knew of that design,

‘ and accompanied the other in it, be guilty
‘ in law of the same crime with the party
‘ who had the design, and killed him,
‘ though he had no actual hand in his ‘ death?’

My lords, I shall not, though I am of counsel for this noble lord, decline or refuse speaking to this question; still, my lords, with that saving which I know your lordships will allow me, that I am very far from admitting that this, which goeth much farther than the last case, is the case of my lord Mohun. Whether your lordships will permit the king's counsel, who have declined speaking to any of the cases hitherto, as not being, as they pretend, my lord's case, now to speak to this which we do much less admit to be so, than they did the others, will be in your lordships pleasure to determine, but I shall not decline to speak to it, with that saving.

And truly, my lords, with humble submission, I do take it, that as this case is put, the party who accompanied the other in such manner as in this case it is stated, is not guilty of murder. I know it was intended by that noble lord who proposed the question, that it should be admitted, that beyond all doubt the fact was so as here it is stated; and then the question is, what the law will be where the fact is thus admitted and agreed to on all sides: and if there was such a case, (for, my lords, I speak to this as a case at large) if there was such a case where the fact is beyond all question made out to be so as it is here stated: yet I take it that in a case of life, which is the case now before your lordships, the party will not be guilty of murder.

My lords, here is a further circumstance added in this case than what hath as yet been inserted into any of the other cases; that is, That the party knoweth of the design of him that he accompanieth to assault a third man, and doth accompany him in his design, and then is present when the design is executed; yet all these together, will not, as I humbly conceive, with submission to your lordships judgment, make this to be murder, because it doth not appear in this case that he did accompany him with an intention to execute this matter, or to aid and assist him in the doing of it: there is no such circumstance in the case, and 'tis that which must be the thing that will draw him in to be guilty of murder.

For if two men (to put a case, which I hope I may do, with your lordships pardon, to explain myself) should be travelling upon the way, and one of the persons should acquaint the other, that at such an inn, there is a servant that he is resolved to beat, and this person that has this matter imparted to him, doth accompany the other in the journey (which I take it answereth the knowing the design, and accompanying him in the design), and when they come to the inn, the thing is executed in the presence of the party that knew of such a design, and it doth fall out that death doth ensue upon it, unless he that did accompany him did some way or other act, contribute, or assist in the doing of it, it doth still remain a thing whereof he had only privity and knowledge, which he had done well, (especially in regard of the consequence of it) to have prevented; and he is highly blameable, that he would accompany a man who had such a design to do an unlawful act, and did not prevent him from executing of it.

All this is blameable in him, but it will not, as I conceive, be murder in him; for I must insist upon that in point of law, that to make any thing murder, there must be prepensed malice in the person that is to be found guilty of it, or some precedent agreement to do it, or some act of aiding or assisting of the person who doth it; but as this case is, here is nothing of malice doth appear, or that the person who accompanied the other in his design had any sort of malice against the person assaulted. And it doth not appear that he did any way assist in the doing of it. He was present at the time when the other executed the design he had imparted to him, but he never joined in it, nor had any malice precedent, nor did assist or do any act at that time; and therefore I take it in this case, which (as I said) I am very far from admitting to be my lord Mohun's case, that the party who accompanied the other is not guilty.

Mr. Hawles. My lords, though we who are of counsel for this noble lord, the prisoner, do not think this case, that is put, to be his case, for, with submission, if the indictment be looked upon, your lordship will find—

L. H. Stew. Sir, I must stop you there, you are not to tell my lords what your opinion is as to the fact, for of that my lords are the judges; you are to take the case fairly, as a case put, and you are to inform my lords what the law, in your opinion, would be upon such a case. It is not before you, but my lords only, to consider whether this be applicable to my lord Mohun's case or not.

Mr. Hawles. If your lordship please, I shall observe your directions in that matter, and with humble submission, this is not murder in him who accompanieth the other, as this case is put; for in every case of murder the indictment must be either, that he actually killed him, or aided and assisted him that did kill him. But, with submission, there is neither of these in this case.

He did know of the design, there is no crime; he did accompany him in it, that is, he bore him company at that time; he went with him to the place where he executed his design, but he did nothing when he came there to further, promote, or encourage the execution of it; and therefore it can never make him principal, nor accessory to the murder.

Mr. Price. I shall only say this, my lords, that I take it, that the bare going with him in this design, without doing any act, doth not involve him in the confederacy, as aiding and abetting. Something must be done or said; either he must assist or advise, or otherwise he cannot be principal, and consequently cannot be guilty of this murder.

L. H. Stew. Mr. Attorney, have you any thing to say to this?

Att. Gen. My lords, we that are of the king's counsel do not desire to be heard to this case neither.

L. H. Stew. I do not hear you, Sir, what you say.

Att. Gen. My lord, we do not desire to speak to it.

L. H. Stew. Then, my lord chief justice.

L. C. J. Holt. This is the question:

‘Whether a person knowing of the design of another to lie in wait to assault a third man, and accompanying him in that design, if it shall happen, that the third person be killed at that time in the presence of him who knew that design, and accompanied the other in it, be guilty in law of the same crime with the party who had that design, and killed him, though he had no actual hand in his death?’

My lords, as for this last, I desire to make some observations upon the words, ‘Had no actual hand.’ By these words, I suppose, is meant, he did not draw his sword, or lay any hand upon the person slain, or give any actual assistance to the other person at that time when the third person is slain, but was only in company, and a looker-on.

E. of Nottingham. My meaning in those words is, that with his hand he gave no stroke.

L. C. J. Holt. That my lords, I take to be the meaning, he did not give an actual stroke, nor held the person whilst the other killed him, nor used any violence.

Now, I am of opinion, my lords, that this is murder in the person that did accompany the other in the design. For he being acquainted with the design, and knowing of the intention of the party to commit murder, or do an unlawful act, upon which death might ensue, accompanying him in that design, he shews an approbation of it, and gives him greater courage to put it in execution; which is aiding, abetting, assisting, and comforting, which are words used in such indictments, and so my humble opinion is, it is murder in that person that accompanied the other, as well as in him that did the fact.

L. C. J. Treby. My lords, as this case is, I think the accompanying of him in that design (which are the effectual words upon which the question turneth) is murder.

Here is, first of all, the party that designeth the assault, and he doth, pursuant to that design, make this assault, and thereupon doth kill the third man; this undoubtedly is murder in him, for here was malice prepensed, an intent of bodily hurt to the party, and in pursuance of this intent, death ensueth; this is unquestionably murder in him.

Then the question is, what crime it is in him to whom this is made known, and who accompanied the other in that design, knowing of it? I take this to be a consent to the design, and to the execution of it. It is more than knowing and not revealing of it, though that was his duty to have done (and so the counsel for the noble lord did admit, that it was a misdemeanor in him not to hinder such a breach of the peace.)

But here, I say, is more than that: he goeth with him to the place, and accompanieth him in order to the executing the design, and this is an aiding and abetting of it. If a man say to another, I intend to assault and beat such a one; come along with me, stand by me, and see it done; and the other consenteth, and accordingly goeth along with him, and accompanieth him while he beats and kills the man; this is an approving, encouraging, and emboldening of him in his mischievous purpose, and shews such concurring malice in that other person, as renders him guilty of the same crime with him that with his hand and weapon beat and killed the man.

Justice Nevil. My lords, as this case is, and as I take the law to be, this is murder. It is a case of one's lying in wait, and another person doth accompany him in the design, he that did design the lying in wait having told it to him, and then he is present at the execution. I take it as a law, if the party is killed, he that is present, and cometh with the other upon that design, shall be taken to come to assist or abet the other, or defend him if any thing of opposition should happen, and that I take to be murder.

L. H. Stew. Are you all of the same opinion?

Judges. We are all of that opinion, it is murder in both in that case.

E. of Devon. My lords—

L. H. Stew. My lord of Devon.

E. of Devon. My lords, I desire they may all give their reasons, as well as their opinions, as this case is.

Mr. Justice Gregory. My lords, I am humbly of the same opinion with my lords chief justices that spoke before me, that this is murder, and my reason is this: First, he knew of the design, which was an unlawful design; then he accompanied him, as this case is put, not only to the place, but in the design, which differs the case from his being present by accident; for by his going along with him he doth encourage him to do that, which perhaps singly the other would not venture upon; and going and being present when the design is executed, upon which the man is slain, I take it he is as much guilty as the person that struck the stroke in point of law.

Just. Eyres. My lords, I am humbly of the same opinion; I take it to be murder in him that knew the design, and did accompany the other in it, though he did nothing at all towards the killing of the man.

For, my lords, it is the intention of the party that diversifieth the act. If he came there with an ill intention, and to assist him if need did require, as it is plain he did if he did accompany him in the design, which is a strong evidence of the intention: and, my lords, nature hath allowed no man a casement into another's heart, and therefore we can judge of no man's intention, but by circumstances of the fact appearing without; and then, I say, if the fact be so apparently from the circumstances of it, that he knew of the design, and accompanied him in it, it is a strong evidence that he came to assist him; and though he doth nothing actually in the matter, yet being present to assist him if occasion did require, it is plain he did aid and abet him in the action, and so it is as much murder in him, as in the other that gave the stroke.

Baron Turton. My lords, I am humbly of the same opinion; the thing that differeth this from the former case is, that this person was in the design with the other; for that, my lords, I take to be accompanying him in the design in order to the execution of it, for bare privity and knowledge of the design would not do it; but if he be with him at the time, and accompany in order to the execution, that maketh him as much criminal, as he that did actually occasion the death of the person, for he was present in the company, and ready to assist him in the evil design, which I conceive is as much murder as the other.

Baron Powell. My lords, I am of opinion, as this case is now put, that this is murder in both, and my reason is this: where one person is privy to a design of felony, or committing some personal violence, as this case is, and is not only privy to it, but goeth along with him, and accompanieth him in putting this design in execution, though he may not think it will extend so far as death, but doth only intend beating, and hath no personal hand, or doth otherwise contribute; but by his being with the other person when he executeth his design of assaulting, and the party beaten dieth, they are both guilty of murder.

L. Mohun. My lords, will your lordships give leave, that my counsel may answer some things that the judges have said?

L. H. Stew. No, my lord, you must not reply after the judges have given their opinions. Have any of your lordships any more questions to propose?

L. Cornwallis. My lords, I have one.

L. H. Stew. My lord Cornwallis.

L. Cornwallis. My lords, I am very sorry to have occasion to ask any questions in this case; but I humbly desire a question may be answered by the judges, which is this:

'If a person be by, named William, when
'Thomas said he would stab John, upon
'which William said, He would stand by
'his friend, and afterwards Thomas doth
'actually murder John, and William is
'present at the same murder: whether the 'law will make William equally guilty
'with Thomas, or what crime William is
'guilty of?'

L. H. Stew. Pray deliver in your paper, my lord.

It was delivered in, and read by the Clerk of the Crown, and copies given of it as before.

L. H. Stew. What say you to this question, gentlemen?

Sir T. Powis. May it please your lordships, this question runneth thus:

‘ If a person be by, named William, when
‘ Thomas said he would stab John; upon
‘ which William said, he would stand by
‘ his friend; and afterwards Thomas doth
‘ actually murder John, and William is ‘ present at the same murder: whether
‘ the law will make William equally guilty
‘ with Thomas; or what crime William is ‘ guilty of?’

My lords, I do not question but many cases may be put which will be plainly murder, and if this case should be attended with facts equal to the state of this case, I believe it will amount to murder. But upon this difference the resolution of it will depend, and every case must stand upon its own circumstances.

If a person do generally say, I am fully resolved I will stab such a man, and say so without condition or limitation, that he will do it; and another doth declare his intention to assist and aid him, by saying, I will stand by you in it, and afterwards the thing is executed in his presence who so concurred; I do take it, that that is an evidence that he is equally guilty with the other.

But, on the other hand, if a man say, I will stab such a one if he oppose me in such a design, and so maketh his resolution conditional, and the person that is present doth say, I will stand by you in it, that is in your doing it, if you are opposed in such a particular matter; my lords, with submission, if he is not opposed in that particular thing or design upon which he did say he would stab him, but if he doth afterwards, upon some other occasion different from the former, and not relating to what he was talking of before, or upon some other provocation, stab him, and the other person happeneth only to be present, I take it, that the words which he spoke with a limitation to a particular matter, will not make him liable to the guilt of the murder that is committed upon quite another account.

The words, ‘ Standing by him,’ are capable of two senses; but I would not, in so serious a matter as this, offer to put a jocular sense upon them, as if it was meant he would stand by and not meddle; but I take it, that such a case as this will turn upon the manner of the man’s engaging himself: if he engaged to stand by him in a particular matter, and the other doth stab the threatened person afterwards, not upon that particular occasion, but upon another account, and he happeneth only to be by, these words will not draw him in, though they should be well proved to be spoken, so as to involve him in the guilt of that murder.

VOL. XII.

For the law is favourable to a man in he case of life, and will judge according to the intention of the party; and he having not abetted or contributed to the fact, his words shall not be carried to his prejudice, farther than his intention, or farther than the concomitant circumstances of the matter will make them plainly import.

This case is put generally, and without restraint; and there is no question but many cases may be put that will undoubtedly be murder; but every case must, as I said, stand and fall by its own circumstances.

Mr. Hawles. My lords, I think the case, as it is put single, and upon these circumstances, would be murder; and my reason is this, the person that saith he will stand by a man, who saith he will kill or stab another, is as much guilty as that man himself, and will be thought as malicious; but if it should happen that between the words pronounced, and the murder committed, that the person that saith he will stand by his friend, cometh to have a friendship and kindness for the party that is threatened to be killed, and upon meeting him caresses him extremely, and there being no malice continuing (as there must be to the time of the stroke given, to make murder), but he happened to be killed by that other, suddenly in his presence, those words will not make him guilty of murder; but as the case is put, I think it is murder.

Mr. Price. My lords, I shall not take upon me to trouble your lordships with making a case, but as this is put without any condition, or other circumstance annexed to it, I think it will be murder.

L. H. Stew. There will be no need to ask the king’s counsel upon this question whether they will speak to it, because the counsel for the prisoner agree it to be murder; therefore if your lordships please, we may now proceed to ask the judges opinions: and first, What say you, my Lord Chief Justice?

L. C. J. Holt. My lords, the question is this:

‘ If a person be by, named William, when
‘ Thomas said he would stab John, upon
‘ which William said he would stand by
‘ his friend, and afterwards Thomas doth
‘ actually murder John, and William is ‘ present at the same murder; whether the ‘ law will make William guilty with Tho‘ mas; or what crime William is guilty of?’

My lords, I am of opinion that this is a great evidence of murder in William, that was thus actually by. I cannot say it is murder, as the case is put; but upon such an evidence, fact is to be left to the conscience of a jury in the case of a commoner, or the conscience of the peers in the case of a peer.

For when William said he would stand by his friend, who said he would stab John, that is plainly a consent, or at least such an expression, from which a consent to the stabbing of him may be inferred.

Then afterwards it seemeth Thomas actually murdered John, and William was present. Now if William was designedly present with the other that committed the murder, then it is plain it will be murder in William; but if there be no evidence to prove upon what account he was present, it may be presumed he was present in pursuance of his former agreement, so that it may be murder, or not murder, as circumstances may happen upon the evidence; if he was present in the pursuance of his promise, then no doubt it is murder; but if he did not meet in pursuance of that agreement, it may not be murder. But this is all matter of evidence, and that rests upon the consciences of those that are to try the prisoner.

L. C. J. Treby. My lords, I am of opinion that this is evidence, and great evidence of murder; the fact consisteth of two parts.

First, here was a deliberate expression of his intention, that he would stand by his friend Thomas, when his friend Thomas had said before he would stab John, and this I take properly to be interpreted, and understood as a promise of abetting him in the murder he would commit; for, I presume, standing by him in this case to be meant in a grave sense, signifying that he would befriend, and, if there should be occasion, defend and support Thomas in what he resolved to do.

Secondly, He was present at the stabbing, which was before designed and spoken of. Now I think his being present when that resolution of his friend was executed, coupled with his preceding declaration of his intention, is a strong evidence of murder.

Just. Nevil. My lords, the question I take to be, whether the law of England saith William is guilty of this murder? truly, my lords, I must say as my lords have said before, that as this case is, this is a very strong evidence of murder: for when he doth say, that he will murder such a man, and the other saith, he will stand by him, in the common acceptation of those words, it is taken, that he doth then agree with him in that design, which he declareth to be to stab John.

But then it seemeth to me truly, that this case is not put full, how long it was afterwards that the fact was done, and what circumstances attended it; for if any circumstance happened afterwards that did amount to a countermand of his promise, or any thing interposed to interrupt it, that this agreement was not performed, perhaps the case might not be murder, but still it is evidence so far as your lordships may judge upon the circumstances that attend it whether it be murder or no. But to declare a further opinion, as this case is put, truly I cannot.

Just. Gregory. My lords, I do upon this case humbly conceive, there is a little difference from the former, only there it is put positively, but here as evidence. Now, my lords, I do humbly conceive that in common discourse, I will stand by my friend, is, I will assist my friend. If my friend should say, I will kill such a man, or I will do any other act, and I say I will stand by him, I think the import of the words is, I will assist him in it.

My lords, as to the latter part, as this case is put, for I can go no further, it doth not appear, whether when the man was killed, he came by accident, or in pursuance of his agreement, knowing of the design. Now that is but matter of evidence; if he came by accident it will not be murder, but if he came with design, no doubt it is murder in one as well as in the other.

E. of Mulgrave. My lords—

L. H. Stew. My lord of Mulgrave.

E. of Mulgrave. If any of my lords desire that the rest of the judges should give their opinion, it is fit they should be heard; but if no lord doth desire it, and they are of the same opinion; without any more to do, because it may save a great deal of time, I desire your grace may only ask them, whether they agree in their opinions with those that went before?

L. Cornwallis. My lords, I humbly desire the judges may all speak.

Lords. Go on then.

Just. Eyres. My lords, I humbly conceive this is a question of fact, and not of law, and it is a very strong evidence, if a man hear another say he will stab such a man, and he saith he will stand by his friend, and accompanieth him at the time when the fact is done, it is a strong evidence, that he came with a murderous intent with his friend; and doth as much manifest his intention to commit murder, as if he had actually given the wound; and a great evidence to involve him in the crime, as much as the person that gave the stroke.

Baron Turton. My lords, I am of the same opinion with my Lords and my brothers that have spoken before me; my Lords, I confess I do not think it cometh up so close to the matter as the question that was put last before; for this, as my brother Eyres saith, is rather a question of fact and evidence, than law. But certainly a very strong evidence it is of the intention of that party that was present when the other said he would stab the third person, and his going away presently, and accompanying him when the stab was given, and murder done, I say his presence after this determination is a very great evidence, that it was done in pursuance of that agreement: It is a matter of fact which your lordships will determine, according as the circumstances appear before you, which may vary the resolution one way or other.

Baron Powell. My lords, I am of opinion as this case is put, that it may be murder or not murder, according to the concomitant circumstances. If a man say, I will stab such a one, and another say he will stand by him, and afterwards when he is with his friend, the man is stabbed, if that is at some distance of time from the words speaking, and the meeting be accidental, or other facts happen that may alter the case, it may receive another determination. But if after this is said, there be any immediate going to look after this man, or they be near the way where this man is to come, and then he is killed; this is a mighty strong evidence that something was done in pursuance of this resolution, and that the one went along with the other to countenance him in the action.

L. H. Stew. Have any of my lords any other questions to propose?—Lords. No.

Earl of Mulgrave. My lords, if there had been any other questions proposed by any other lords, I would have staid till they had all been over; but I see their lordships are at an end with their questions: I have one which I think is nearer the case than any has been yet, and of more importance to the matter in hand, and more fit for the counsel to inform you in, and for your lordships to ask, and the judges to answer. The question is this:

‘ If A accompanieth B in an unlawful action,
‘ in which C is not concerned, and C hap‘ peneth to come in the way of B, after
‘ the first action is fully over, and happen‘ ed to be killed by B, without the assist‘ ance of A; whether A is guilty of that ‘ man’s murder?’

This question was handed to the table, read by the clerk, and copies given as before.

L. H. Stew. What say you to it, gentlemen, who are of counsel for the prisoner?

Sir T. Powis. May it please your lordships, I will not trouble your lordships with the repeating of the case again, because my copy is agreeable with what was read at the table: nor shall I trouble your lordships with many words upon this case, because I take it, the law is very plain.

If two persons accompany each other to do an unlawful act, and in the execution of that unlawful act, one of them doth go beyond what was first designed, and a third man is killed whilst they are in execution of that act, though the one did the fact, and the other did not immediately contribute thereto, yet he being joined with him in the unlawful action, upon which this doth ensue, he is answerable for all the ill consequences of it; the law herein is clear according to the case that was put at first of two persons going together to rob a park and steal deer.

But if that unlawful action be executed, or the two persons who joined in the design have totally desisted from it, or are disappointed in it, if afterwards when they are together upon some other occasion, it happeneth that one of them killeth another man, but his friend no way aided him or assisted him in the doing of it, your lordships and the law will separate these persons who were at first joined together for another purpose; and will distinguish between them in this new matter that is subsequent to the former agreement, though they were in company together.

Because in the first case, he that is joined in an ill action must look to himself, and be answerable for all that followeth thereon: In the second case, he is in no fault at all, it is only his misfortune to be in ill company if he had no hand in the fact. This the law is very plain in, and therefore I shall not trouble your lordships further with speaking to it.

Mr. Hawles. My lords, I would only add one short word: There is but this one difference between an accessory and a principal; the principal is always present, the accessory is always absent; and I would only put you one case of an accessory of felony out of my lord Coke; he saith, It must be the same numerical thing in which they are joined, and therefore, if A bid B rob the vintner’s boy of plate as he cometh to a gentleman’s chamber to bring wine, but B doth not pursue the instructions, but breaketh into the vintner’s house, and stealeth the plate there; this is a different matter, it is not the same thing wherein A and B agreed at first, and A is no way concerned in it.

The same law is, if A and B agree to kill C, and B killeth D; though A be present, it will not be murder in A; for the agreement was for the killing of C, and not of D.

My lords, as this case is put, they did agree in the unlawful act, but that matter was over, and there is no agreement as to the other matter, nor is that pursuant to the matter agreed upon; and therefore the presence of the party that agreed to the unlawful act doth not make him guilty of murder, unless he agree to that too.

Mr. Price. My lords, I have but one word on the same side. I take it, that when a man is doing an unlawful act, there is an inseparable incident that doth attend it, which is malice implied. And this is so inseparable, that when his ill design is at an end, his malice is at an end too, and hath no being, and therefore if he entereth upon an ill design afterwards, though another be present that was joined with him in the former ill design, yet his malice who was so joined, being coupled with the ill design that is over, must be gone too; and there is no malice in his being barely present. And therefore for that reason, he that was aiding and assisting before, cannot be principal in such a sudden act as this new one is, and consequently cannot be guilty of murder, or of manslaughter.

L. H. Stew. Mr. Attorney, do you or any of the king’s counsel think fit to say any thing to this question?

Att. Gen. My lords, we that are of the king’s counsel do not think we have any occasion to be heard to this question.

L. H. Stew. Then, my lords the Judges, what say you to it?

L. C. J. Holt. If your lordships please, I will again repeat the question; it is this:

‘ If A accompanieth B in an unlawful ac‘ tion, in which C is not concerned, and C ‘ happeneth to come in the way of B, after ‘ the first action (that is, the unlawful ac‘ tion, I suppose) is fully over, and hap‘ peneth to be killed by B, without the as‘ sistance of A; whether A is guilty of that ‘ man’s murder?’

And I do humbly conceive with great clearness, That A is not guilty at all. For here is no relation to the first unlawful act that he was engaged in, but that is all over and determined; and then C cometh in the presence of B, who killeth him, and of A who had no knowledge of any malice between them, or any design of his death. This is merely accidental, and doth not depend upon the first unlawful action; and therefore A is not guilty.

L. C. J. Treby. My lords, I think there can be no difference of opinions in this case: For it is plain there was an unlawful action in which they did agree, (as a riot or assault to beat or wound a man or the like) and if death had ensued, they both had been guilty of murder, as well he that looked on, as he that gave the mortal wound. But then the question added further, that the action to which they agreed was fully over, and there only happeneth to be a continuance of their presence together; and there being an old grudge between one of the parties and a third man, and the party who had that old grudge, meeting with his enemy, executeth it then upon him, and murdereth him; this doth in no sort affect the other that was present, and had joined in the former unlawful action that was over. In the former, he did join and concur, and therefore if death had ensued, they had been both guilty: In the latter, he did not join and concur; and therefore though murder did happen in his presence and company, he is not guilty, but only the party that actually killed is.

Just. Nevill. My lords, I am of the same opinion.

L. H. Stew. If you are all of the same opinion, I think you need say no more.

Judges. We are all of the same opinion, my lords.

L. H. Stew. My lords, all the Judges are of the same opinion; and now I think it is your lordships resolution to adjourn to the House.

Lords. Aye, aye.

L. H. Stew. This court is adjourned to the House of Lords.

And then the Lords returned to their House in the same order, and there presently adjourned till the next morning.

SATURDAY, February 4.

About four of the clock in the afternoon, the lords came from their house in the former order into the court in Westminster-Hall: and being seated on their benches, and his grace the lord high-steward in the chair before the throne, proclamation was made for silence; and the judgment of the peers was demanded, and delivered in this manner.

L. H. Stew. My lords, your lordships have now heard all the evidence both against the prisoner and for him: the next thing is your lordships judgment, and for that the method is this, your lordships opinions are to be delivered in the absence of the prisoner. The Question that your lordships are to deliver your opinion about will be this:

‘Whether my lord Mohun be Guilty of the murder of William Mountford whereof he stands indicted, or Not guilty?’

The order of delivering your Opinions must be, to begin with the youngest baron, and so upwards; and therefore I must desire your lordships to allow me to take your judgments distinctly, and that I may write them down.

Lords. Ay, ay.

L. H. Stew. My lord Lemster, Is my lord Mohun guilty of the murder whereof he standeth indicted, or not guilty?

The lord Lemster stood up in his place uncovered, and laying his right-hand on his breast, pronounced his judgment thus:

Not guilty upon my honour.

The same question was severally asked of all the lords, who in the same form delivered their opinions as followeth:

L. Capel. Guilty upon my honour.

L. Ashburnham—L. Cholmondley—L. Godolphin—L. Osborne—L. Arundel of Trerice—L. Crew—L. Cornwallis—L. Granville—L. Berkley of Stratton—L. Lexington—L. Lucas (severally,) Not guilty upon my honour.

L. Clifford of Lansborough—L. Colpeper (severally) Guilty upon my honour.

L. Vaughan—L. Jermyn—L. Leigh—L. Lovelace—L. Brooke—L. Hunsdon—L. Chandos—L. Willoughby of Parham—L. Evers—L. Fitzwalter—L. Morley—L. Berkley of Berkley—L. De-la-Ware—L. Willoughby of Eresby—Visc. Villiers—Visc. Longueville (severally) Not guilty upon my honour.

Visc. Weymouth. Guilty upon my honour.

Visc. Newport. Not guilty upon my honour.

Earl of Warrington. Guilty upon my honour.

E. of Scarborough—E. of Marlborough—E. of Montague, (severally) Not guilty upon my honour.

E. of Monmouth. Guilty upon my honour.

E. of Falconberg. Not guilty upon my honour.

E. of Portland. Guilty upon my honour.

E. of Abingdon. Not guilty upon my honour.

E. of Rochester—E. of Nottingham, (severally) Guilty upon my honour.

E. of Radnor—E. of Macclesfield—E. of Feversham—E. of Craven—E. of Carlisle—E. of Bath—E. of Essex, (severally) Not guilty upon my honour.

E. of Sandwich. Guilty upon my honour.

E. of Scarsdale—E. of Sunderland—E. of Thanet—E. of Chesterfield—E. of Carnarvon, (severally) Not guilty upon my honour.

E. of Kingston. Guilty upon my honour.

E. of Stamford—E. of Rivers—E. of Mulgrave—E. of Manchester, (severally) Not guilty upon my honour.

E. of Westmoreland. Guilty upon my honour.

E. of Bullingbrook—E. of Clare—E. of Denbigh—E. of Northampton. (severally) Not guilty upon my honour.

E. of Bridgwater. Guilty upon my honour.

E. of Bedford—E. of Huntingdon—E. of Kent—E. of Shrewsbury, (severally) Not guilty upon my honour.

E. of Oxford. Guilty upon my honour.

E. of Dorset (Lord Chamberlain)—Earl of Devon (Lord Steward)—Earl of Lindsey—(Lord Great Chamberlain)—Marq. of Hallifax—Duke of St. Albans—D. of Northumberland—D. of Ormond.—D. of Somerset—D. of Norfolk, (severally) Not guilty upon my honour.

E. of Pembroke. (Lord Privy Seal) Not guilty upon my honour.

Then his grace the Lord High Steward stood up uncovered, and laying his right hand on his breast, pronounced his grace's own Judgment thus :

L. H. Stew. My opinion is, that my lord Mohun is not guilty upon my honour.

Then his Grace seated himself again in the chair, and numbered up the opinions of the Peers.

L. H. Stew. My lords, I have carefully taken your lordships opinions, and find the numbers to be thus : my lords that have found my lord Mohun to be Guilty are fourteen ; my lords that have found him Not Guilty are sixty-nine. Call for the Prisoner.

Proclamation was made for the chief governor of the Tower to bring forth the body of the Prisoner, and he was brought to the bar as before : and proclamation for silence was made.

L. H. Stew. My lord Mohun, you have been indicted for the murder of William Mountford ; upon your arraignment you have pleaded Not Guilty, and have put yourself upon the judgment of your peers ; and your peers have considered what hath been said both for and against you, and the judgment of my lords is this, that your lordship is Not Guilty : your lordship is therefore discharged. Make proclamation for dissolving the commission.

Cl. of Crown. Serjeant at arms, make proclamation.—Serjeant. O Yes.

Cl. of Crown. Again.—Serjeant. O Yes.

Cl. of Crown. Again.—Serjeant. O Yes.

Cl. of Crown. My lord high steward of England his grace doth straightly charge and command all manner of persons who have given their attendance here, to depart hence in the peace of God, and of our sovereign lord and lady the king and queen ; for his grace the lord high steward of England intendeth to dissolve his commission.

Which the Serjeant at Arms repeated, and at the end of it, his Grace standing up, and holding the White-Staff in both his hands, broke it in two, by which his commission was dissolved.

Marq. of Carmarthen. Is it your lordships pleasure to adjourn to your own house ?

Lords. Ay, Ay.

Marq. of Carmarthen. This house is adjourned into the House of Lords.

And then the peers returned to their own house in the same order.

572. The Proceedings against Dr. THOMAS SPRAT, Bishop of ROCHESTER,* before the Lords of the Privy Council, concerning a Plot to restore King James the Second: being, a RELATION of the late wicked Contrivance of STEPHEN BLACKHEAD and ROBERT YOUNG, against the Lives of several Persons, by forging an Association under their Hands. In two Parts. The first Part being a Relation of what passed at the three Examinations of the said Bishop by a Committee of Lords of the Privy-Council. The second being an Account of the two above-mentioned Authors of the Forgery: 4 WILLIAM & MARY, A. D. 1692. [Written by the BISHOP Himself.]

PART THE FIRST.

A RELATION OF WHAT PASSED AT THE THREE EXAMINATIONS OF THE BISHOP OF ROCHESTER BY A COMMITTEE OF LORDS OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

I THINK it becomes me, as a duty which I owe to my country, and to the character I have the undeserved honour to bear in the church, to give the world some account, how my innocence was cleared from the late wicked contrivance against me; in hopes that this example of a false plot, so manifestly detected, may be, in some sort, beneficial to the whole nation on the like occasions for the future: however, that the enemies of the church may have no reason to cast any blemish upon it, from the least suspicion of my guilt; and that this faithful memorial may remain as a poor monument of my own gratitude to Almighty

* Of this very sorry prelate, see some particulars in vol. 9, p. 362, et seq.; and the present volume, p. 492. It may be not unreasonably conjectured that Pope had in his thoughts the character of this man, when, in the second book of the Dunciad, he wrote of “A low-born, cell-bred, selfish, servile band, “Prompt or to guard or stab, or saint or damn,

“Heaven’s Swiss, who fight for any God, or man.”

Although, as we have seen, Sprat readily enough acted under king James’s illegal ecclesiastical commission, yet, when king William, in the hope of promoting union between Protestants of different denominations, issued a commission to several bishops and other divines of the Church of England, to consult about and prepare such alterations as might be thought necessary, Sprat questioned the legality of such a commission, and would not act under it. The words of the Commission were as follows:
“We, out of our pious and princely care for God, to whose immediate protection I cannot but attribute this extraordinary preservation.

Perhaps my Reader, at first view, will look on this relation as too much loaded with small particulars; such as he may judge scarce worth my remembering, or his knowing: but he will pardon me, if I presume that nothing in this whole affair ought to appear little, or inconsiderable, to me at least, who was so nearly concerned in the event of it.

I have therefore made no scruple to discharge my weak memory of all it could retain of this matter; nor have I willingly omitted any thing, though never so minute, which I thought might serve to fix this wonderful mercy of God the more on my own mind; or did any way conduce to the saving of divers other innocent persons lives, as well as mine.

I cannot indeed promise, that I shall accurately repeat every word or expression that fell from all the parties here mentioned: or the good order, and edification, and unity of the Church of England, committed to our charge and care; and for the reconciling, as much as is possible, of all differences among our good subjects, and to take away all occasions of the like for the future, have thought fit to authorize and empower you, &c. and any nine of you, whereof three to be bishops, to meet from time to time, as often as shall be needful, and to prepare such alterations of the Liturgy and Canons, and such proposals for the reformation of ecclesiastical courts, and to consider of such other matters, as in your judgments may most conduce to the ends above mentioned.”

Sprat, and Watson of St. Davids (‘par nobile fratrum’) were the only bishops who refused to sign the Association which was entered into by the House of Lords upon occasion of the Assassination Plot in 1696.

Sprat was one of the three Bishops who sentenced Johnson. See vol. 11, p. 1339, of this Collection.

that I shall put all down in the very same order as it was spoken, having not had the opportunity to take notes of every thing as it passed. But this I will say; if I shall not be able to relate all the truth, yet I will omit nothing that is material: I will, as carefully as if I were upon my oath, give in all the truth I can remember, and nothing but the truth.

What I write I intend shall consist of two parts: the first, to be a narrative of the plain matter of fact from my first being taken into custody, May 7, to the time of my last dismissal, June 13. The second, to contain some account of the two perjured wretches, that were pleased, for what reasons they know best, to bring me into this danger.

For the truth of the substance of what I shall recollect on the first head, I am bold to appeal to the memories of those honourable lords of the council, by whom I was thrice examined. And, touching the second, I have by me so many original papers, or copies of unquestionable authority (which I am ready to shew any worthy persons who shall desire the satisfaction) as are abundantly sufficient to justify all that I shall think fit for me to say against Blackhead and Young; especially against Young.

It was on Saturday, the 7th of May, of this present year 1692, in the evening, as I was walking in the orchard at Bromley, meditating on something I designed to preach the next day, I saw a coach and four horses stop at the gate, out of which two persons alighted. Immediately I went towards them, believing they were some of my friends coming to give me a visit. By that time I was got to the gate, they were entered into the hall, and met me about the middle of the court. The chief of them perceiving me to look wistly on them, as being altogether strangers to me, said, My lord, perhaps you do not know me: my name is Dyve; I am clerk of the council, and here is one of the king's messengers. I am sorry I am sent on this errand; but I am come to arrest you upon suspicion of high treason.

Sir, said I, I suppose you have a warrant for so doing; I pray let me see it. He shewed it me: I read it; and the first name I lighted on being the earl of Nottingham's, I said, Sir, I believe this is my lord Nottingham's own hand, and I submit. What are your orders how to dispose of me? My lord, said he, I must first search your person, and demand the keys you have about you. My keys I presently gave him. He searched my pockets and found no papers, but some poor notes of a sermon, and a letter from Mr. B. Fairfax about ordinary business.

Now, says he, My lord, I must require to see the rooms to which these keys belong, and all the places in the house where you have any papers or books. I straight conducted him upstairs into my study. This, Sir, said I, is the only chamber where I keep all the books and papers I have in the house. They began to search, and with great readiness turned over every thing in the room, and closets and presses, shaking every book by the cover, opening every part of a chest of drawers, where were many papers, particularly some bundles of sermons; which I told them were my proper tools, and that all that knew me, could vouch for me: it was not my custom to have any treason in them. They read several of the texts, and left them where they found them. But in one corner of a press, which was half open, they met with a great number of letters filed up. I assured them they were only matters of usual friendly correspondence, and most of them were of last year's date. Mr. Dyve looking on some of them, found them to be so; and said, If he had time to view them all, he might, perhaps, see reason to leave them behind; but being expressly commanded to bring all letters, he must carry them with him. I left him to do as he pleased; so they sealed them up.

Then they went into my bed-chamber, and the closets adjoining, doing as they had done in my study, feeling about the bed and hangings, and knocking the wainscoat in several places, to see if there were any private hole, or secret conveyance.

After that, they came down stairs, and searched the parlour and drawing room on that side of the house with the like exactness. In all these rooms I observed they very carefully pryed into every part of the chimnies; the messenger putting his hand into every flower-pot, which I then somewhat smiled at: but since I found he had but too much reason so to do.

When they had done searching in all those rooms, and in the hall as they were going out, and had taken with them what papers they thought fit, they carried me away in the coach that brought them. By the way, we met my servant, Mr. Moor, coming from London: I called out to him, Have you any letters for me? He gave me three or four, which I delivered to Mr. Dyve to open, who found nothing in them but matters of private concernment, or ordinary news. And so between ten and eleven at night, we arrived at Whitehall, and I was brought to my lord Nottingham, whom I found alone in his office.

My lord, said I, I am come upon your warrant; but certainly there must be some great mistake, or black villainy in this business: for I declare, as in the presence of God, I am absolutely free from any just accusation relating to the government. His lordship told me, He himself was much surprized when he heard my name mentioned. I intreated him I might be examined that night, if any witnesses could be produced against me. He said, that could not possibly be, because, the lords, who had the management of such affairs, were separated, and gone home: But that I was to appear before them the next day; and in the mean time, all the civility should be shewn me, that could be expected by a man in my condition.

My lord, said I, I hope, it being so very late, you will suffer me to lie at my own house at Westminster. He replied, You shall do so ; but you must have a guard of soldiers and a messenger with you. A guard of soldiers, said I, my lord, methinks is not so necessary to secure one of my profession ; I should rather offer, that I may have two or more messengers to keep me, though that may put me to greater charges. My lord, said he, I, for my own part, would be glad if I might take your parole ; but I must do what I may answer to others, and therefore I pray be content.

At this I acquiesced : only adding, My lord, here are divers papers brought up with me, which, upon my credit, are but of common importance ; yet, because they are most of them private talk among friends, there may be some expressions, which no man, if it were his own case, would be willing to have divulged ; and therefore I desire your lordship will take care they may not be shewn to the prejudice of any. He answered, you have to do with men of honour ; and you shall have no occasion to complain upon that account.

And so I was conveyed home to Westminster, by Mr. Dyve and Mr. Knight, messenger, in the coach with me, and a guard attending on each side. After we came to the deanery, Mr. Dyve having diligently surveyed my lodgings, and the avenues to them, left me about midnight, with a strict charge to the messenger and soldiers, not to give me any unnecessary disturbance ; but to watch carefully at my bed-chamber door, until further orders, which they did.

The next day being Sunday, May the 8th, Mr. Dyve came again to me about noon, to acquaint me, That I was to attend the committee of the council that evening by six of the clock. And, says he, My lord, I suppose you have here also at Westminster, a room where you keep the rest of your books and papers. I told him, I had. Then, said he, I have a commission to search there likewise ; particularly in your cabinet. I shewed him my library, and gave him the keys. He opened all the presses of books, and viewed particularly every shelf, and examined every drawer in the cabinet : but finding nothing there of a late date, or that might afford any the least shadow of a traitorous correspondence, he went away without removing any one paper thence.

At the time appointed I was brought by the messenger and guard to Whitehall, where a select number of the lords of the council were assembled at my lord Nottingham's lodgings. There were present, (as I remember) the earl of Devonshire, lord steward ; the earl of Dorset, lord chamberlain ; the earl of Nottingham, secretary of state ; the earl of Rochester, the earl of Portland, the lord Sydney, lord lieutenant of Ireland, and sir Edward Seymour.

When I was entered the room, and come to the end of the table, my lord Nottingham began.

Earl of Nottingham. My lord, you cannot but think it must be some extraordinary occasion which has forced us to send for you hither in this manner.

Bishop of Rochester. My lord, I submit to the necessities of state, in such a time of jealousy and danger as this is.

Earl of N. My lord, I am to ask you some questions, to which we desire your plain and true answers.

Bishop of R. My lords, I assure you mine shall be such ; as, I hope, I have been always taken for a man of simplicity and sincerity.

Earl of N. Have you composed a Declaration for the present intended descent of the late king James into England ?

Bishop of R. I call to God to witness, I have not.

Earl of N. Did you ever draw up any heads, or materials for such a Declaration ?

Bishop of R. Upon the same solemn asseveration, I never did.

Earl of N. Were you ever solicited, or applied to by any person, for the undertaking such a work ?—Bishop of R. I never was.

Earl of N. Do you hold any correspondencies abroad in France ?

Bishop of R. I do not hold any.

Earl of N. Have you ever signed any Association for restoring the late king James ?

Bishop of R. I never signed any.

Earl of N. Do you know of any such Association ? Or any persons that have subscribed one ?

Bishop of R. Upon the word of a Christian, and a bishop, I know of no such thing ; nor of any person who has subscribed any paper of that nature.

Sir Edward Seymour. My lord bishop of Rochester, We have examined the papers that were seized in your closet at Bromley : we find nothing in them but matters of ordinary and innocent conversation among friends ; only we have one scruple, that there are few or no letters among them written since Lady-day last.

Bishop of R. Sir, I suppose there may be some of a date since that time in the bundles : if I had preserved more, they would have been of the same nature with the rest that you have, that is, concerning common intelligence, and the talk of the town ; not any secrets of state, or against the government. My lords, I hold no correspondencies of that kind. When I am in the country, I desire some friend or other here, to let me know how the world goes, that I may inform myself, and the neighbouring gentlemen, of the truth of things, and prevent the spreading of false news : and afterwards I file up such letters, according to their dates (as you may perceive I did these), that at any time I may have a present recourse to them to refresh my memory in any past transaction. My lords, Those are all I thought worth keeping of this kind these two last years : and I hope the clerk of the council has done me the justice to acquaint your lordships, how I was apprehended, out of my house ; and how narrowly I myself, and my study, and lodging-chamber, and other rooms, were searched: so that it was impossible for me to have suppressed or smothered any one writing from you; and really I believe there was not a note, or least scrip of paper of any consequence in my possession, but they had a view of it.

Earl of Devon. But, my lord, it is probable, a man of your interest and acquaintance, must have received more letters since than are here to be found. We see here are many concerning affairs that passed just before that time.

Bishop of R. My lords; a little before the conclusion of the last session of parliament, I obtained leave of the House of Lords to retire into the country for the recovery of my health. During my abode there, as long as the parliament continued, I was somewhat curious to learn what passed in both Houses; and therefore, as your lordship has observed, letters came thicker to me about that time: but when the parliament was up, very little happening that was remarkable in that interval, I was not so mindful to preserve the letters that came to me, whilst all things, both abroad and at home, were rather in preparation than action. Besides that, since the time your lordship speaks of, I was twice or thrice in town for several days together; once especially, upon a public occasion, the annual election of Westminster school, which detained me here about a week: and these are the true reasons why you find so few letters to me since the date of time your lordships have mentioned.

Earl of N. Will it please your lordships to ask the bishop of Rochester any more questions?

They being all silent, I said,

My lords; I cannot imagine how it comes to pass, that I should be thus suspected to be guilty of any contrivance against the government: I think I may appeal to all that know me, I am sure I may to all my neighbours in the country, where I live, that there has no man submitted to it more peaceably and quietly than I have done, ever since the Revolution; and I must own, I did it both upon a principle of conscience and gratitude. Of conscience; because I cannot see how the Church of England, and the whole Protestant religion, can be preserved, but upon this foundation; since an invasion from France cannot but be destructive to both. And of gratitude; because, as you all know, I happened to be, in the late reign, engaged in an affair, which since I have been taught was illegal. [The Ecclesiastical Commission.] And though I may say, I stopped betimes, and did no great hurt, but hindered, as much as I could, whilst I acted; yet I acted so long, that I might have expected to be severely punished for what I did. But the king and queen's part, in the general pardon, was so gracious and benign, in making it their own act, and not excluding me out of it, that their majesties have thereby laid on me an obligation never to be forgotten.

Upon this I was bid to withdraw; and about an hour after, the same clerk of the council was sent to tell me, The lords had ordered I should return to my own house, and be under the same confinement as before, of a messenger, and a guard of soldiers: and there I should shortly hear what their lordships would determine concerning me. He likewise told the messenger and the guards, That he had a strict command to them, to use me with all respect; only to take care that I should be safely kept, and forth-coming. Nor indeed had I any thing to object against their behaviour: for, as Mr. Dyve demeaned himself always to me like a gentleman, and the messenger was very civil, so the soldiers themselves were as easy and quiet to the rest of my family, as if they had been a part of it.

The same evening Mr. Dyve came home to me, and brought me all my papers, telling me, That the lords had heard him read them over: and, having no exception against them, had sent him to return them all safe to me again.

Thus guarded, I continued from that day, till the 18th of May, under the custody of a messenger, and of four centinels, who watched day and night, and were relieved every eight-and-forty hours.

But then, having heard nothing in the mean time from the lords, I wrote this letter to the earl of Nottingham:

"My Lord;

"As I have all this while, according to my duty to their majesties government, with patience and humility submitted to my confinement under a guard of soldiers and a messenger; so now, fearing that my longer silence may be interpreted as a mistrust of my innocence, I think it becomes me to make this application to your lordship, earnestly entreating you to represent my condition and request to the most honourable board, where I was examined. I entirely rely on their justice and honour, that, if they find nothing real against me, (as God knows, I am conscious to myself they cannot) they would be pleased to order my enlargement. I am forced to be the more importunate with your lordship in this business, because it is very well known, in what a dangerous condition of health I went out of town towards the latter end of the session of parliament: and I find my distemper very much increased by this close restraint, in a time when I was just entering upon a course of physic in the country. My lord, I am, &c.

"May 18, Westm. "THO. ROFFEN."

"To the Right Hon. the Earl of Nottingham, Principal Secretary of State."

This letter was read in the cabinet council that day, and it had the desired effect; for thereupon I was ordered to be discharged that evening; which accordingly was done at ten at night, by Mr. Shorter, a messenger of the chamber, coming to my house, and dismissing the messenger, and taking off the guard.

The next morning, being May the 19th, to prevent any concourse, or congratulations, usual upon such occasions, I retired early to Bromley, where I remained quiet till June the 9th, little dreaming of a worse mischief still hanging over my head.

But that day, being Thursday, as I was upon the road, coming to Westminster, to the meeting of Dr. Busby's preachers, who assemble once a term at my house there, I was stopt by a gentleman, that brought me this letter from my lord Nottingham.

"My Lord; Whitehall, June 8, 1692.

"I must desire your lordship to be at my office on Friday morning by ten of the clock.—I am, &c. NOTTINGHAM."

"For the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Rochester, at Bromley."

I asked the bearer, whether he had any farther orders concerning me? He answered, No: But was forthwith to return. I desired him to acquaint his lord, that I was now going to town upon other business, but that I would presently wait on him at Whitehall: accordingly from Lambeth I went to his office. When my lord came to me, I told him, that having met with his lordship's letter accidentally in my way to Westminster, I thought it best to come presently to know his pleasure.

Earl of N. My lord, there is a mistake; I gave you notice to be here to morrow morning; and that is the time you are appointed to appear before the committee of the council.

Bishop of R. However, my lord, being in town occasionally, I thought it became me to present myself to you as soon as I could: And I now make it my request, if your lordships have any thing farther to say to me, I may be convened before you this day.

Earl of N. I fear you cannot be so, for there is much business to be this afternoon, both at the great council, and the committee; but I will send you word to the deanery, if you can be called this evening: In the mean time you have your full liberty to go where you please.

Thus I went home; but having no notice from my lord that night, the next day, being June the 10th, about ten of the clock, I came to his lordship's office, where were met the same lords as before; only, I think, the earl of Portland was not there, and the earl of Pembroke, lord privy seal, was.

When I was called in, besides the privy counsellors that sat about the table, there was standing against the wall a very ill-favoured man, who afterwards proved to be Blackhead; with whom I straight perceived I was sent for to be confronted. For, as soon as I was in the room, my lord Nottingham said, My lord, do you know that person?

Bishop of R. My lords, I have seen this man's face, but I cannot immediately recollect where.

Earl of N. I pray view him well. Has he never brought you any letters from one Mr. Young?

Bishop of R. I do call to mind, he has brought me a letter. I cannot in a moment remember from whom it was.

Earl of N. He says it was from one Young.

Bishop of R. I think it was at my house at Bromley that he delivered it me; but I verily believe, it was not from any of the name of Young.

Blackhead. I was with the bishop of Rochester at Bromley: I brought him a letter from Mr. Young, and I received an answer to Mr. Young, back again from the bishop.

Thus far, during the beginning of this examination, I stood with my face against the window, and my eyes being so very tender and feeble as they are, I had not a perfect view of Blackhead; but he so confidently affirming, that he had of late carried letters between me and one Young, I changed my station, and got the light on my back; and then immediately, having a true sight of his very remarkable countenance and habit, and whole person, and being also much assisted by his voice, which is very loud and rude, I did (by God's blessing) perfectly call him to mind.

Bishop of R. Now, my lords, by the advantage of this light, I do exactly remember this fellow, and part of his business with me at Bromley. What he says of Young cannot be true. I know not for what purpose he affirms this; but upon my reputation, it is utterly false, that he ever brought me a letter from one Young.

Earl of N. My lord, he says particularly, it was upon a fast day.

Bishop of R. My lords, I do remember this fellow was with me at Bromley on a fast day: by the same token, I told him, he should stay till after evening prayers, and must expect only a fasting kind of meal. But then I would return an answer to his business.

Blackhead. It was upon a fast day. I did eat with the bishop's servants; and I received an answer from his own hand, to the letter I brought him from Mr. Young.

Bishop of R. My lords, this that he says of Young is a wicked lye; All my correspondencies are so innocent (as I hope your lordships can testify) that, if I had received a letter from any Mr. Young, I should have no reason so positively to deny it. I beseech you, examine this fellow thoroughly, and I doubt not but you will discover some impudent knavery. I stand to it; I am sure there is no person whose name is Young, with whom I have of late years maintained any intercourse by letters.

Earl of Devonshire. My lord, is there no person of the name of Young, a clergyman, with whom you are acquainted?

Bishop of R. Oh! My lord, there are two excellent persons of the name of Young, both clergymen, to whom I have the good fortune to be very well known: The one was your brother Ossory's chaplain, and, is now prebendary of Winchester; the other was canon of Windsor when I was a member of that church, and is there still. But I suppose, neither of these are the Youngs, whose correspondence this man objects to me; I should take it for an honour to correspond with them. But, in truth, it has so happened, that I have neither written to, nor received one letter from either of them these many years, to the best of my knowledge.

Blackhead. The bishop, if he please, may remember it was Robert Young, from whom I brought him a letter.

Earl of N. How long ago say you it was?

Blackhead. It was about two months ago.

Bishop of R. I have, indeed, my lords, some obscure remembrance, that some years ago, there was one writ to me out of Newgate, under the name of Robert Young, pretending to be a clergyman; and I recal something of the contents of his letter. It was to tell me, That he and his wife lay in prison there upon a false accusation, of which he hoped they should be speedily cleared. In the meantime, he desired me to recollect, that he had officiated some weeks for the chaplain at Bromley-college, and had preached once or twice in the parish-church there. He intreated me to give him a certificate of this, because it would stand him in much stead, in order to his justification: And withal, that I would send him something out of my charity, for his and his wife's relief in their great distress. This, my lords, I dare say, was the whole substance of that letter; and this was two or three years ago at least.

To that letter I am sure I made no reply in writing. Only, having not the least remembrance of him myself, I enquired in the neighbourhood, and among the widows in the college: intending to have sent him some alms suitable to his condition and mine, had I found him worthy. But upon enquiry, I received from all hands so very ill a character both of this Young and his wife, that I resolved to give him no answer at all; and I have never heard any thing more of him to this day.

But now, I beseech your lordships, to give me leave to speak to this person myself: and they intimating I should do as I thought best, I said to him; I conjure you, in the presence of these noble lords, and especially of the great Lord of heaven and earth, that you will declare the truth of what I am going to ask you.

When you came to my house at Bromley, upon a fast-day it was, I think the first fast of this year; did not you desire to speak with me, as having a letter for me? When I came to you into my hall, did not you first kneel down, and ask me blessing? Did you not then deliver me a letter, affirming it was from a country minister, a doctor of divinity? Did not you tell me, you were his servant, or bailiff? And that your master had sent you on purpose, many miles, to receive an answer yourself to that letter from my own hand?

Blackhead. I never brought a letter to the bishop of Rochester from a country minister; I know no such doctor of divinity: nor ever was servant to any: I only brought a letter to the bishop from Mr. Young.

Bishop of R. My lords, what I say is most certainly true. This man had never any other business with me, but in relation to that letter, pretended by him (for now I find it was but a pretence) to be written to me by an eminent country divine in Buckinghamshire, a person of a considerable estate, as he told me. My lords, I cannot yet call to mind the doctor's name; but the business of the letter I am in great part master of, and it was to this purpose: that there was a person, (naming him,) who had applied to him to be his curate; but that he had reason to suspect he had counterfeited my hand and seal for holy orders: therefore he desired me to send him word under my own hand by the bearer, his man, whether I had ordained such a one, in such or such years: that if I had, he would encourage and entertain him; if not, he would take care he should be punished for his forgery.

Now, my lords, upon the receipt of so friendly a letter by this very messenger, I bid him stay a little, and I would give his master satisfaction out of my books, whether I had ordained any man of that name; which I thought I had not. Accordingly, my secretary, and I, did severally turn over all my papers relating to such affairs, as carefully as we could; and finding no such man's name in them; in which we could not be easily deceived, because I keep methodically (as, no doubt, every bishop does) all recommendations, subscriptions, testimonials, and titles of those I admit into orders; I wrote the supposed author of the letter as civil an answer as he seemed to deserve.

That I was extremely pleased, and thankful, that a mere stranger to me should be so careful of my reputation: that my secretary, and I, had diligently examined all the books where such things are recorded: and I could assure him, I never had ordained any such person either priest or deacon, within the space limited in his letter, or at any other time: that I should look upon it as a signal service done to the church in general, and a special favour to me in particular, if he would, as he promised, cause the counterfeit to be apprehended, so that the course of law might pass upon him.

This letter, my lords, all written with my own hand, I delivered to the person here present: and he went away with it, asking me blessing again upon his knees, and promising I should speedily be made acquainted with the success.

Earl of Devonshire. I pray, my lord, how was the letter superscribed you sent back by this man?

Bishop of R. My lord, it was to the same person, with the same superscription as he subscribed himself, and directed to the same place, where he said he was minister; though the name of place or minister I cannot yet recover. But let that letter of mine be produced, and it will put an end to this whole controversy.

Blackhead. The letter I received from the bishop, was superscribed to Mr. Young, and to no other.

Bishop of R. My lords, this is a horrid falsehood. I well remember now, this fellow was at my house a second time, some weeks after the first. When he came, I was in the garden with some gentlemen, my neighbours; where, first asking me blessing, he told me, his master, the doctor, had taken up the person who had forged my orders: that the man stood upon his vindication; but that his master was bringing him up to London; and then I should hear farther from him: adding, that his master was a man of such a spirit, and such a plentiful estate, that whenever he suspected a man to be a rogue, or a cheat, he would spare no pains to discover him, nor think any cost too much to get him punished. These, my lords, I well remember, were the knave's very words: and I hope your lordships will likewise deal with him in the same manner. I took this second message still more kindly, and ordered my servants to entertain the messenger very civilly.

Blackhead. I brought no such message. All my business with the bishop was from Mr. Young, which I suppose was of another nature.

Bishop of R. What I say is so true, that I am confident several of my servants do remember the particulars. For this man stuck not to declare his business before them all; very much magnifying his master, and his house-keeping, and vapouring what an example he would make of the counterfeit priest, without putting me to any trouble or expence.

Earl of Devonshire. Has your lordship none of those servants near at hand?

Bishop of R. My lord, some of them are in town; and one, my secretary, Mr. Moore, by an accidental good fortune, came hither with me: He was without when I was called in. I doubt not but he will satisfy your lordships what was this man's errand to me: He is a young man of great honesty, and, I believe, would not tell a lie to save my life: I am sure I would not have him.

Whilst they were calling in Mr. Moore, I added; My lords, I appeal to the great God of heaven to judge between me and this wretch, touching the truth or falshood of what we say, and to deal with us both accordingly at the last Day of Judgment: and I dare also appeal to your lordships to judge between us by what appears to you: For did you ever see greater villainy, and consciousness of guilt in any man's countenance than in his?

By this time, Mr. Moore being come in, I said, Moore, apply yourself to my lord Nottingham. I charge you, do not, for any consideration of me, speak any thing which you cannot justify for truth.

Earl of N. Mr. Moore, do you know that person there? (Pointing to Blackhead.)

Mr. Moore. My lord, I do know him so far, that I have seen him once or twice at my lord's house at Bromley.

Earl of N. What business had he at Bromley?

Mr. M. The first time he brought a letter to my lord.

Earl of N. From whom?

Mr. M. My lord, it was from a country minister in Buckinghamshire, a doctor of divinity, as he wrote himself; his name was Hooke.

Bishop of R. My lords, I now very well remember that was the name, Hooke, or something very near it. There may be the difference of a letter: I will not stand upon that, or can it be expected I, or my servant, should be positive as to every letter of a name, in so sudden a question.

Earl of N. Mr. Moore, what was the business of that letter?

Mr. M. My lord, it was concerning one that offered himself to be the doctor's curate, whom he suspected to have counterfeited my lord's letters of orders. The doctor desired my lord to look into his books, whether he had ordained any such person. My lord and I did thereupon search all the places where the memorials of such affairs are kept, and we found no such name; and so my lord himself wrote back to the doctor, by this very man that stands here.

Earl of N. Mr. Moore, will you take your oath of all this?

Mr. M. I am ready to take my oath of it, if you please to give it me.

Earl of N. What say you, Blackhead? You see here is a young man, the bishop's secretary, comes in by chance, and confirms punctually what the bishop had said before, concerning your message to his lord; and he offers to take his oath of it. If you did bring a letter from one Dr. Hooke, why do you not confess it? It can do you no hurt.

Blackhead. I know of no such divine as Dr. Hooke; nor any thing concerning one that counterfeited the bishop's orders. The letter I brought was from Mr. Young.

Mr. M. My lord, this fellow cannot but know, that what he says is shamefully false; I assure you, I have the original letter at home to produce; and doubt not but divers of my lord's servants remember him, and his business, as well as I do: For he was a second time at Bromley, some weeks after.

Earl of N. What was his business then?

Mr. M. He said, he came to acquaint my lord, that his master, Dr. Hooke, had seized on the person who had forged his orders. My lord asked him, Whether he had also seized the false instrument? And if he had, desired it might be transmitted to him. This man answered, He believed his master had got it: That he was coming up to London, and bringing the cheat with him; and had been there sooner, had he not sprained, or hurt his leg: But when he was come, the doctor would give my lord notice, or himself wait upon him. My lord was much pleased with this second message, and gave orders to have the bringer of it well used. He was so; and freely discoursed with the butler, and the other servants, touching his business there. So that I am verily persuaded several of them remember all these circumstances of it, and perhaps more than I do.

Upon this, Blackhead being again urged by the lords with so plain a testimony, perfectly agreeing with what I had said, and he still persevering obstinately to deny every part of it; I, and Mr. Moore were ordered to withdraw, Blackhead staying behind.

As I was going out, I said, My lords, I cannot comprehend to what purpose this fellow persists in this lie; I am sure he can never prove that I have injured the government in word, or deed, or writing. Then I could not but again observe to the lords, what visible marks of falshood and treachery there were in Blackhead's face: for, indeed, all the while he looked as if he would have sunk into the ground; though, as I was told afterwards, before I came into the room, he had appeared very brisk, and bold, and full of talk. But, upon my first coming in, his complexion, which was naturally very sallow, turned much paler and darker; and he was almost speechless, saying nothing to any purpose, more than what he thought was necessary to keep him from the main lie, That he had brought me a letter from one Young, and no other.

But after my being withdrawn about half an hour, I was called in again, and Blackhead sent forth.

Earl of N. Now, my lord, the business is out, the fellow has confessed he brought the letter to you, written not in the name of Young, but as from one Dr. Hookes; Hookes was the name, not Hooke: Your lordship was in the right, in saying, you would not stand upon a letter.

Bishop of R. My lords, I could not trust my memory so far as to a letter: but one thing I was sure of, that was the only letter this rascal ever brought me; and it was not from any whose name was Young.

Earl of N. Well, that business is over, he has confessed it; and now, my lord, pray take a chair, and sit down.

Earl of Devon. Pray, my lord, sit down.

Bishop of R. No, my lords, I desire you to excuse me.

Earl of N. My lord, we have some few questions to ask you, and therefore pray repose yourself.

Bishop of R. If you please to permit me, I had rather answer what your lordships have farther to say, standing thus as I am at the table.

Earl of N. Then, my lord, we shall ask you, have you ever written to the earl of Marlborough within these three months?

Bishop of R. I think I may safely affirm, I never writ to my lord Marlborough in my life: but I am certain, and upon the faith of a bishop, I declare, I have not written one word to him these three months.

Earl of N. Have you received any letter from my lord Marlborough within these three months?

Bishop of R. I protest solemnly, I have not received any.

Earl of N. Have you received any written or printed papers from my lord of Marlborough within that space of time?

Bishop of R. As in the presence of God, I declare, I have not. My lords, I have had some acquaintance with my lord Marlborough, both in king James's court, and in the parliaments since; but I cannot call to mind that ever I wrote to him, or he to me.

Earl of N. Then I think, my lords, we have nothing more to do, but to wish my lord bishop a good journey to Bromley.

With that they all rose up, and saluted me, testifying their great satisfaction that I had so well cleared myself, and confounded my adversary. More especially two noble lords of the company, to whom, I said, I would now particularly appeal, gave me an ample testimony of their belief of my innocency in this accusation, and of my dutiful disposition to the government.

My lord Nottingham then told me, in the name of all the rest, They had no further trouble to give me. I intreated them to suffer me to add a few words: They permitting me, I said,

My lords, I heartily thank you for confronting me with this fellow; else I could not so well have made out my innocency; but I might still have lain under a suspicion, whereof I had not known the least ground. Had this been a trial for my life, I should have been glad to have such honourable persons for my judges. But now I have much more reason to bless God, that you have been my compurgators: That you are witnesses, as well as judges, of the detection of this villainy against me; whereof, I must acknowledge, as yet, I do not fathom the bottom. Wherefore I must entreat, that I may put myself under your protection for the future. For although this fountain of wickedness has been now stopped in this particular, as to myself, yet it seems to run under ground still: and unless special care be taken, it may break forth again in some other place, on some other occasion, to the ruin, if not of me, yet of some other innocent person.

Earl of Devon. No, my lord: you need never fear this fountain can break forth any more, to do you, or any other good man, any prejudice; he having been so palpably convicted of knavery and lying.

Bishop of R. My lords, I hope so: as for myself, I take my own innocency to be abundantly vindicated by this your general declaration in my favour. I make no question but your lordships will next vindicate yourselves, and the justice of the government, by bringing this wicked man to condign punishment, and by examining the main drift of his design, and who have been his accomplices.

They all assuring me I might rely upon them for it, I withdrew.

All this while I had not the least conjecture, or imagination, who this Young should be, with whom Blackhead pretended I held so close a correspondence. But my next appearance before the Committee of the Council, will clear up what remains of the whole wicked mystery.

In the mean time, returning home that evening to Bromley, I presently met with a plentiful concurrence of evidence from most of my servants, of their discourse with Blackhead, and their knowledge of his business, in reference to Dr. Hookes's letter.

First, The butler, Thomas Warren, told me, That according to my order to use him kindly, he had done so both times he was with us: particularly the second time, he had enterained him with one of the Petty Canons of Windsor, who came thither by chance, in the parlour next the garden: that thence he brought him down into the cellar, where Blackhead drank my health with knees almost bended to the ground: that then he earnestly desired him to shew him my study: saying, I have heard your lord has a very good study of books: my master Hookes has a very good one; he often lets me go into it, and I doubt not but you have the same liberty. I pray let me see his books. The butler answered, My lord has but few books here, only such as he brings from time to time from Westminster for present use, and they are locked up in presses, so that I cannot shew them if I would. I pray then, said Blackhead, let me see the room, I hear it is a very fine one. The butler said, He could not presume to do it, without my leave. Then, said Blackhead, let me see the rest of the house. The butler excused his not being able to do it then, because there were some ladies with his mistress. The same request, he assured me, Blackhead repeated almost twenty times; but still he denied him.

Then Thomas Philips, my coachman, and John Jewel, my gardener, confirmed most of what the butler had said; all of them agreeing, that both the times he was at Bromley, especially the second, he talked publicly with them of the business he came about from his master Dr. Hookes; enlarging much in commendation of the said doctor, what a worthy man he was; what hospitality he kept; and how he would never rest, till he had brought to punishment the knave that had forged my hand and seal for orders. They added, That after I had dismissed him, he lingered about in the garden, the hall, and the great parlour, a long time; and was full of such discourses.

Moreover, the gardener, and William Hardy, the groom, and Thomas French, and one or two of the other servants, who remained at Bromley whilst I was in custody at Westminster, did all assure me, that this man who brought first the letter, and then the message, from Dr. Hookes, had been a third time at my house, whilst I was under confinement. That it was upon a Sunday, which by computation proved to be Whitsunday, May the 15th: that they found him in the midst of the house before they knew he was entered. He told them, That passing that way, he came to condole for my mishap, and to inquire what the matter was; hoping it was not so bad as was reported at London. They answered, They knew nothing of particulars; yet doubted not but I was innocent. That he then again desired to see the house: but all the doors were locked, except the great parlour, which has no lock upon it. That he would have enticed them to town to drink with him, which they refused, but made him drink there; and he coming after dinner, they persuaded a maid-servant to provide him some meat; which she did, but unwillingly, telling them, She did not like the fellow's looks; that perhaps he might come to rob, or set the house, now so few servants were at home: that he rather looked (as indeed he did) like some knavish, broken tradesman, than an honest, rich clergyman's bailiff, or steward (as he also called himself); and it has proved since, that her conjecture was true.

All this, and more, my servants repeated to me, touching Blackhead's behaviour in my house, and his discourse concerning his master, doctor Hookes; and they offered to depose it all upon oath. And, above all, the next day, being Saturday, June the 11th, Mr. Moore coming from London, immediately found the original letter that Blackhead had brought me from the pretended doctor.

Wherefore, being furnished with all these fresh materials, especially with the letter itself, and being not a little surprised to hear that the rogue had, the second time of his coming, been so earnest to get into my study, or any of the other rooms; and that he had the diabolical malice against me, to come to my house a third time, on pretence of condoling my misfortune, which I then thought, it was probable, had chiefly proceeded from his malicious perjury against me: all this considered, I resolved to go to London on Monday morning with these servants, and to carry the letter that he brought me as from Dr. Hookes, to lay the whole business before the lords of the committee, and to desire their farther examination of Blackhead upon these particulars.

Accordingly, on Monday, June the 13th, I went, and attended the meeting of the lords that morning in the usual place. When there was a full committee, I sent to them by a clerk of the council, intreating that I might have a short audience. After some time, I was introduced: there were present (besides most of the lords before-mentioned) three others, whom I had not seen there since my first appearance before them, the marquis of Carmarthen, lord president; the lord Godolphin, and sir John Lowther.

When I came into the room, and was just going to propose the business that brought me thither, my lord Nottingham prevented me, and said,

My lord, Do you know that person there? pointing to a man, who stood behind the privy counsellors, near the door which leads into the public room.

Bishop of R. My lord, I do not know him.

Earl of N. My lord, I pray observe him well.

Bishop of R. Upon my credit, I never saw this man before in my life, to the utmost of my knowledge.

Then the person standing there, looked boldly upon me, and said, Do you not know me, my lord? Do not you remember, that I officiated some weeks at Bromley-College, for Mr. Dobson, in king James's time? And that I preached in the parish church there once or twice?

Bishop of R. My lords, I solemnly affirm, I do not know this man: I never saw him before: I never knew that he officiated in Bromley-College: I never heard him preach in the church there: he is a mere stranger to me: he may have served for the chaplain of that college in king James's time; but I was not then concerned who officiated there. He may have preached in the church, and I not have heard him; for about that time I was clerk of the closet, and was seldom or never at Bromley on Sundays, by reason of my attendance on the princess Anne of Denmark, either at Whitehall, or Windsor, or Hampton-Court, or Richmond.

The same person presently took me up, with insolent confidence, You will know me better when captain Lawe appears: I warrant you do not know capt. Lawe neither.

Bishop of R. My lords, if any of your lordships please to ask me any thing, I shall answer with all respect. But I do not understand that I am bound to satisfy this saucy fellow's questions: yet, because he has asked me so familiarly, touching my acquaintance with one captain Lawe, I assure you, I know not any such man in the world as captain Lawe. But, my lords, by this person's discourse, I am induced to believe, he may be the Young, with whom the other knave Blackhead pretended the last time that I held a strict correspondence by his means.

E. of N. This man's name is Young, Robert Young.

Bishop of R. Then, my lords, because my lord president, and some of the other lords, were not here then, I must beg leave of those that were, that I may repeat what I then remembered, concerning one Robert Young. Whereupon I recollected the substance of what I had said, of a letter I had received some years since, dated at Newgate, from one of the same name, who pretended himself to be a clergyman.

I added, It seems, my lords, by his own confession, this is the very same Young. But, as I never saw him before he was in Newgate, so I declare, upon the faith of a Christian, I never saw or heard from him since that letter: however, I am very glad you have him now: I make no doubt but he will be found, in the end, such another villain as Blackhead was proved to be on Friday last.

But, my lords, said I, the business that brought me to wait on you now, is to intreat you to take that same Blackhead into farther examination, and to enquire a little more into his part in this wicked contrivance, whatever it is.

My lords, since I went to Bromley, my servant, Mr. Moore, has had the good fortune to retrieve the very original letter that Blackhead brought me from his counterfeit master, doctor Hookes. Then I delivered the letter at the table, and my lord Nottingham read it aloud. And to shew with what a treacherous insinuation, and plausibility of style it was written, to draw from me an answer under my own hand, I here set down the very letter itself, word for word:

"My Lord;

"Being destitute of a curate, one Mr. James Curtis came to me, who produced letters dimissory (bearing date, March 13th, 1691), and likewise letters of orders under your hand, and episcopal seal. Now, my lord, willing I am to employ any that your lordship shall recommend, and give him all the encouragement imaginable; but being since, by his own words, suspicious that his instruments are forged, I have therefore on purpose sent my man to know the truth thereof; and in order thereunto, I humbly beg your lordship to give an account in yours by this bearer, promising, for the Church of England's credit, and likewise your lordship's honour, that, if he be an impostor, I will see him brought to condign punishment for such his forgery; but if he be not, I beg your lordship's pardon for this trouble, occasioned by my candid affection for your lordship, and all clergymen, being not willing to have them imposed upon. I am your lordship's most obedient servant, ROBERT HOOKES, D. D."

"Windgrave, April 6, —92."

Now, my lords, I thought it would be for your service to acquaint you, that I have received, from divers of my servants, a farther account of all Blackhead's demeanor, the first, second, and third time he was at my house at Bromley; for he was there a third time also, which I knew not of before I went home on Friday.

Then I summed up what has been said before, my servants were ready to depose to that purpose: concluding thus, My lords, my servants are attending without; I pray that Blackhead may be brought before them face to face, and that they may be admitted to give in upon oath what they have to say concerning him.

Upon this, several of the lords said, Send for Blackhead; and he was sent for.

But before he came, they called in Mrs. Young, the wife, it seems, of the aforesaid Robert Young; but what a kind of wife, and which of the two wives he had at one and the same time, will appear in what follows.

When she was come in, my lord Nottingham said to her, Mary Young, whence received you this paper? Taking up a paper that lay upon the table.

Mary Young. I had it from captain Lawe.

E. of N. What did he say, when he gave it you?

Mrs. Young. He bid me deliver it to my husband.

E. of N. What did he say it was?

Mrs. Young. He said it was a Sociate, or some such word.

E. of N. What! Did he deliver you a paper of this treasonable nature, in the manner as it is, to be given to your husband, without sealing it up, or inclosing it in another paper?

Mrs. Young. Yes, my lord, he did.

E. of N. Did he tell you any of the names to it?

Mrs. Young. Yes; he said, there were the late archbishop of Canterbury's, the bishop of Rochester's, and some other lords names to it.

E. of N. What passed afterwards between you about it?

Mrs. Young. I gave it my husband; and when captain Lawe came for it again, my husband said, No, these lords, whose names are subscribed, have not been so liberal in their relief of my wants as formerly; and therefore I will make another use of this paper: and so locked it up.

By this time Blackhead was brought in, and the woman ordered to withdraw, and to be kept by herself.

E. of N. Blackhead, the last time you confessed you brought the bishop of Rochester a Letter from Robert Young, under the false name of doctor Hookes.

Blackhead. Yes, I did.

E. of N. Can you know that letter when you see it?

Blackhead. I cannot tell; I doubt I cannot know it.

E. of N. Here it is; (and it was given into his hand); is that the same letter you delivered the bishop?

Blackhead. I am not sure it is.

E. of N. Consider it well; look on the superscription, you cannot but remember that. You began to be somewhat ingenious last Friday; if you relapse, it will fare the worse with you.

Blackhead. Yes, this may be the letter; this is the very same letter.

E. of N. And you received an answer to this from the bishop for Dr. Hookes, which you carried to Robert Young?

Blackhead. Yes, I did; I own it.

E. of N. But, what made you, when you were at Bromley the second time, so earnestly to desire of the bishop's butler, and his other servants, that you might see the rooms in the house, especially his study?

Blackhead. No, I do not remember that I desired to see the study: the house I might, out of curiosity.

E. of N. But here are some of the bishop's servants without, who are ready to swear, that you pressed very often to get a sight of his study; saying, you had the freedom at your master Hookes to shew any stranger his books, and you doubted not but the butler could do the same there.

Blackhead. I cannot deny that I did desire to see the bishop's study: the other rooms I am sure I did.

E. of N. What reason had you to be so importunate to see that, or any of the other rooms? Had you any paper about you, that you designed to drop, or leave in any part of the bishop's house?

Here Blackhead stopped, as very loath to out with it; until divers of the lords urged him to tell the truth. At last he went on, though with much hesitancy.

Blackhead. Yes, I must confess I had a paper in my pocket, which I designed to put somewhere in the house.

E. of N. What did you with it?

Blackhead. I did leave it in the parlour next the kitchen.

E. of N. In what part of the parlour?

Blackhead. In the flower-pot in the chimney.

Good Lord bless me, cried I, I seriously protest, I never heard that any paper was found there by my servants. To be sure they would have brought it me.

E. of N. But, my lord, it will be worth your while to send presently to Bromley, to see whether there be any paper still, and what it is.

Bishop of R. My lord, I will send one away immediately. Only my servants are without, expecting to be sworn. Be pleased first to call them in, and dispatch them.

E. of N. Nay, my lord, there is no need of their testimony now, for this fellow has said already more than they know. He has confessed, not only that he desired to see your house, and particularly your study, but that he did it with intention to leave a paper somewhere in it; and that he did leave one in your parlour, and in the flower-pot of the chimney.

Bp. of R. Then, my lord, I will send away forthwith.

E. of N. Stay, my lord, let us first examine him a little farther. Blackhead, What paper was it you left in the bishop's chimney in the flower-pot?

Blackhead. It was the Association.

E. of N. Was it this paper here? Shewing the Association that lay upon the table.

Blackhead. Yes, it was.

E. of N. How came you by it? And who advised you to lodge it there?

Blackhead. I had it from Mr. Young, and he advised me to leave it in the bishop's house, as I did.

E. of N. Did Young direct you to put it into the flower-pot in the parlour?

Blackhead. Yes, he did; and I put it there accordingly in the flower-pot.

E. of N. But were not you a third time at the bishop's house? It was upon a Sunday, which it seems was Whitsunday.

Blackhead. I was.

E. of N. You pretended to condole for the bishop's imprisonment: it is manifest that could not be your business. What was it?

Blackhead. I was desired by Mr. Young, seeing the Association was not found by those who apprehended the bishop, to go to Bromley, and try to recover it, that being the original. I did so; I came into the house before any of the servants were aware, I went into the parlour unseen, and took the paper out of the same place where I had put it, and delivered it again to Mr. Young.

Bp. of R. My lords, I am very much surprised at all this. I cannot but admire the wonderful goodness of God in this my extraordinary deliverance. It appears by what this fellow confesses, that this forged Association was in my house, in a flower-pot, for many days together: and that it was there at the very time I was seized on by your lordships order. For he says he put it there the second time he was at Bromley, which was a pretty while before I was in hold; and took it not out 'till the third time, which was upon Whitsunday, the ninth day after I was under confinement. And by a strange and marvellous Providence, that parlour, where he says it lay so long in the chimney, was never searched or enquired after by the clerk of the council, or the messenger.

The other part of the house, on the left hand of the hall, where my study is, and bed-chamber above stairs, and a parlour and drawing-room below; all these they searched very accurately. Particularly, I well remember the messenger thrust his hand into the flower-pots in every chimney: which seemed very odd to me then: but I now understand the meaning of it.

At this, my lord Sidney, my lord Nottingham, my lord Devonshire, and some others of the council, affirmed, that they perfectly remembered, both Blackhead and Young did especially direct them to give order to those who should be sent to take me, to search all the flower-pots.

By this time, it was thought seasonable by the lords, to confront Blackhead with Young.

But in the mean while, the counterfeit Association being handed about the table, was, at length, delivered to me. It was to this purpose, as much of it as, by a transient view, I could carry away in my memory.

"That we whose names were subscribed, should solemnly promise in the presence of God, to contribute our utmost assistance towards king James's recovery of his kingdoms. That to this end, we should have ready to meet him at his landing, 30,000 men well armed. That we should seize upon the person of the princess of Orange, dead or alive; and take care that some strong garrison should be forthwith delivered into his hands: and furnish him with a considerable sum of money for the support of his army;" or to this sense.

March 20, —92.

VOL. XII.

And the forged subscriptions were, as I remember, after this manner:

Marlborough.*	Salisbury.	W. Cant.
		Tho. Roffen.
Basil Firebrace.		Cornbury.
		John Wilcoxe.

Now upon the first sight of this Paper, I presently said, I protest, my lords, I am very much amazed to see my hand so well counterfeited. All the difference is, they have done me the favour to write it finer than I can. Otherwise, I acknowledge it is so like, that I verily believe, I myself, had I seen it in another place, should have been apt to doubt whether it were of my writing or no. I am confident it might, upon the first blush, deceive the best friends I have.

But, my lords, here is another innocent person's name, whose hand I know very well. And I dare venture to say, it is even better forged than mine. I mean archbishop Sancroft's.

Lord Godolphin. My lords, I am very well acquainted with archbishop Sancroft's hand. And really it is here most exactly counterfeited.

Moreover, my lord Godolphin, my lord Sydney, and others, said, that the earl of Marlborough's hand had been so well feigned in a letter pretended to be written to Young himself, that it was very difficult for his most intimate friends to observe any distinction. And in that letter the bishop of Rochester was said to have the paper in his keeping, which appears now to have been meant of the false Association's being in my custody.

Nay, my lord Sydney assured me, these very impostors had brought him a letter, supposed also to be written by me to Young, which being but of ordinary matters, he thought not worth the keeping, but he well remembered the subscription of my name was very like this in the Association, as well indeed it might.

By this time, Young being come into the room, my lord Nottingham spoke to him; Young, look upon that letter, (shewing him his own to me, under the name of doctor Hookes) Do you know that hand?

Young. No, I don't know it.

Earl of N. Did not you send that letter to the bishop of Rochester by Blackhead?

Young. No, I know no Hookes. I never writ to the bishop of Rochester but in my own name, with my own hand.

Earl of N. What say you, Blackhead?

Blackhead. I did receive that very letter from Mr. Young's own hand, and delivered it to the bishop of Rochester with mine.

Earl of N. (Taking up the Association, and shewing it to Young,) Did not you give this Paper to Blackhead, and order him to put it into a chimney in the bishop of Rochester's house, and into a flower-pot, if there were any?

* As to the earl (afterwards the great duke) of Marlborough's correspondence with the abdicated family, see the Note to lord Oxford's Case, A. D. 1717, infra.

Young. No, I never desired him to carry it thither, or to put it into a flower-pot.

Earl of N. What say you, Blackhead?

Blackhead. Mr. Young did give me that Paper, and directed me to leave it in the bishop's house; and, if I could, to put it in a flower-pot in some room; which I did, in the parlour.

Young. There is no such matter, I absolutely deny it.

Upon this, the earl of Nottingham, the lord Sydney, and some others of the counsellors, asked Young, Why then did you give us such express directions, to send and search the flower-pots, among other places in the bishop's house?

Young. I said nothing of flower-pots. I bid you take care that the bishop's person should be exactly searched; because, when he went abroad, he carried the Association about him; when he was at home, he put it in some private place, for fear of surprize: perhaps I might say in the chimney.

The lords replied, Nay, we all well remember you particularly mentioned the flower-pots.

Earl of N. Young, When you perceived that the persons sent to seize on the bishop had missed the association, did not you then desire Blackhead to go a third time to the bishop's house, and to take it out of the pot, where he had laid it?

Young. No, I know nothing of it.

Earl of N. What say you, Blackhead?

Blackhead. At Mr. Young's request, I went to the bishop's house a third time; it was upon a Sunday; I privately got into the parlour, and took the Association out of the same flower-pot where I had laid it, and returned it back to Mr. Young.

Young. This is a combination between the bishop of Rochester and Blackhead, to baffle the whole discovery of the plot.

Which saying of Young's could not but raise a general smile among all the company, they lifting up their hands with great indignation at his unparalleled impudence.

Bishop of R. I thought, my lords, the last time I was here, Blackhead was the most brazen-faced fellow that ever I saw; but now I find this same Young to be a much viler miscreant than he. This is so base a suggestion against me, and so impossible for me to be guilty of, and I know your lordships so little suspect it of me, that I need not make any answer to it in my defence.

Lord President. Young, Thou art the strangest creature that ever I heard of: dost thou think we could imagine, that the bishop of Rochester would combine with this thy confederate, to have an Association written, with his own hand to it, and then laid in his own house, in a flower-pot there; which, if it had been found, must have endangered his life? And we see it was the most remarkable good fortune to him that almost ever happened to any man, that it was not found there.

But Young still persisting, that he believed I had taken Blackhead off, they were both ordered to withdraw. And, I assure my reader, that during this whole examination, though Young's forgery was so evidently convicted by the confession of his own companion and instrument, yet he behaved himself with a daring unconcerned confidence, with a bold and erect countenance, though it had naturally very much of a villain in it. His whole carriage indeed was such, as became the discipline he has undergone for these divers years; having so long been almost a constant inhabitant, together with his wife, of many of the common-gaols in England and Ireland*.

Then the Lord President called for the letter

* "I crave liberty to remind you what Young the parson, in conjunction with Blackhead, had contrived, in order to the murdering several of the first quality in the kingdom, besides divers gentlemen of lower degree; for these fellows, judging it too little and mean for persons of their transcendency in villainy, merely to swear that such and such had conspired to combine and restore, and re-establish king James, they had the audacious and the unprecedented impudence to forge an Association, and to counterfeit and affix the hands and names of honourable peers, and worthy persons unto it; importing, their having mutually and jointly undertook to dispossess king William, and to bring back and re-advance king James. And though it was morally impossible, as well as altogether incredible, that had there been such a design, and so concerted and stipulated, wretches of the meanness of Young and Blackhead should have been admitted upon a secret of such importance in itself, and whereof the discovery would have rendered those concerned liable to the loss of life, honour and estates: yet not only with easiness, but lechery, was the belief of it entertained, by divers of our supreme and reputed wise ministers; and notwithstanding its being in the whole matter of it, more ludicrous than farce, or Bartholomew-fair-shew, than to be entertained by statesmen, yet with what seriousness and gravity was it brought to the council-board, and received there as a subject worthy of weighty and solemn debate." See a Letter to the Right Hon. sir John Holt, knt. Lord Chief Justice of the King's-bench, occasioned by the noise of a Plot. The 2nd edit. 1694, p. 10.

And in the same Letter, pp. 11 and 12, the author says, "Nor could the ministers be so great strangers to the infamous characters of the witnesses, (whose many and notorious crimes had sufficiently published them before through the whole nation as rascals, who had forfeited all right to be believed and credited) as to hope to have their integrity and righteousness justified in seizing and prosecuting which Young had sent to me under the name of Hookes. When his lordship had viewed it deliberately, he asked also for the Association, and having compared them for some considerable time, he broke forth in these words; Really, my lords, it is a very great providence that this letter, sent by Young under the name of Hookes, to the bishop of Rochester, was preserved by his servant; for this very letter, and the Association, were both apparently written by the same hand; you may perceive there is no manner of difference in the writing, but any upon their testimony: and yet had it not been for the missing of the forged paper, when it was at first so narrowly searched for at the bishop of Rochester's, where one of the rogues traitorously and feloniously lodged it, it is scarce to be conceived, how some of our statesmen were prepared to have pushed on that affair to the imprisonment of several. But that misadventure, together with the defences which the aforesaid eloquent bishop, after his apprehension, made at his being examined before the council, rendered them more slow and wary in their proceeding: and thereupon, through the gaining the respite of a little time, there was an opportunity obtained, not only of discovering and laying open the many infamous and horrid crimes, whereof the rogues had at other times been guilty, but of fully detecting the 'Forgery of the Association,' and where they had secretly laid it in the bishop's house, in order to have destroyed him and others, in case it had been found by the clerk of the council and the messengers, when it was so industriously sought for. And, truly, my lord, had not Young laboured under a strange defect of morals, he was incomparably qualified in all other respects to have been a select, singular and standing witness for the state: for as he has a sufficiency of wit, and presence of mind, to be able to give things the best gloss and readiest turn of thought, so he is furnished with a larger stock of impudence and assurance than most men in the world are: of which your lordship was an astonished witness when you had him before you at the bar, to be tried for the forgery which I have mentioned, and to be condemned to the too gentle and feeble punishment which the law hath ordained for it. For with what confidence did he stand, not only under the load of a thousand infamous actions, of which all the court knew him to have been guilty, but under the fullest and clearest proof of the malicious forgery for which he was then arraigned? Yea, with what effrontery and air of impudence, to the amazement of all there, did he continue to assert his own innocence, and persevere in his crimination of others? But that which filleth men most with sorrow, in reference to that transaction, and which keeps them under disquieting fears ever since, is, that though Young and Blackhead were instruments in it, yet people of another figure must have been the first contrivers and authors of it: and the handing money to Blackhead, while only that the letter is written in a less hand, as letters are wont to be, and the Association in a greater, as a public instrument.

At this the whole board, one after another, had a perfect sight of both, and all applauded the happiness of the discovery: for it was as clear as light to all that were present, that the letters and words of both were of the very same form and figure.

Particularly, my lord Godolphin farther observed, and made it plain to them all, that the W. in W. Cant. in the subscription was the very kept in custody by Allen the messenger, and conniving at his escape from thence, gives us more than a suspicion of it, and little less than a moral certainty: for that rogue having been the tool, employed too with Young, by the superior managers, and having threatened to squeak in case given up and abandoned to a public punishment, it was so ordered, that he might not only be permitted to get away, but be sheltered and maintained in Ireland, whither he withdrew, and from whence the government might have easily brought him back, were there not a mystery in that affair, which it is not for some people's honour to have unravelled. Nor was the messenger, out of whose house and custody he made his escape, ever punished for his carelessness and neglect; but after a little menacing and reprimand, which was mere grimace, he hath been treated all along since with more distinguishing favour than fell to the share of his fellow-officers. Neither durst so mean and creeping wretches as Young and Blackhead, (how impudent and malicious soever they are) have attacked persons of the earl of Marlborough, and the bishop of Rochester's rank and quality, and who had merited so well of the government, and were believed at that time to stand in all terms of fairness with, had they not been prompted, guided, and encouraged to it, by persons of authority, grandeur and eminency. And had the villains acted merely under their own conduct, and by the influence of personal malice and avarice, they would have singled out such to be accused, as are held indiscreet, talkative and rash, and with whom it might have been likely for them to have had some conversation; and not persons of the greatest prudence, circumspection and reservedness of any in the kingdom, and into whose society it was morally impossible that any should judge them to have been admitted, nor so much as into their presence, unless as beggars and indigent supplicants. So that this conspiracy, by suborning two infamous rascals, and of obtaining thereby credit to a Plot, upon the belief of which, several noble, reverend, and worthy persons, were to have been involved under guilt of ruin, may serve to instruct your lordship not to be hasty and forward in giving credit to the present importunate and noisy clamours, and to make you extremely wary how you proceed to the conviction and condemnation of those that are accused and threatened to be arraigned."

same letter with the W. in Whereas, which was the first word of the counterfeit Association.

For my part, I could not forbear exclaiming, Great is truth, and it will prevail!

After all this, I asking the lords, whether they had any farther service to command me? And they saying, No: I spoke these few words.

My lords, I must always acknowledge, that, next the signal providence of God, in so visibly protecting an innocent man, your lordships fair and honourable way of proceeding with me, in not shutting me up close in the Tower immediately upon my first accusation, but in openly confronting me with these varlets, whilst the matter was fresh in my memory; and in so strictly and impartially examining them now, has been the principal occasion, that my innocency has met with a vindication as public and unquestionable, as I myself could have wished and prayed for. But still, my good lords, I do again most humbly recommend to your lordships, the prosecution of this black contrivance to the bottom, for the sake of truth and justice, and for the safety of every other honest man, whose lot this might have been as well as mine. I am sure your lordships all believe, that there can be no greater service to the government, especially at this time, than to have such perjured informers, so plainly discovered, to be severely punished according to their demerits.

And so I took my leave of their lordships.

This is the substance of what I can remember, as far as my part goes in this surprizing adventure. As to the Account I promised of my wicked accusers, my reader shall have it as fast as my weak eyes will give me leave to write it.

Aug. 1, 1692. Bromley. THO. ROFFEN.

PART THE SECOND.

THE SECOND PART OF THE RELATION OF THE LATE WICKED CONTRIVANCE AGAINST THE LIVES OF SEVERAL PERSONS, BY FORGING AN ASSOCIATION UNDER THEIR HANDS: BEING A FARTHER ACCOUNT OF THE SAID FORGERY, AND OF THE TWO AUTHORS OF IT, STEPHEN BLACKHEAD AND ROBERT YOUNG, ALIAS YOUNGS, ALIAS BROWN, ALIAS HOPKINS, ALIAS HUTT, ALIAS GREEN, ALIAS JONES, ALIAS SMITH, ALIAS, &c. WRITTEN BY THE BISHOP OF ROCHESTER.

Quo teneam Vultus mutantem Protea Nodo?

TO THE READER.

It is well known to divers persons of worth and honour, that this second Part was finished, and has lain by me some considerable time; excepting the additions of some very few original papers lately come to my hands, which serve only to explain and confirm some passages I had written before. The cause of my not printing it sooner, was an expectation of Robert Young's speedy trial. But that being now deferred till the next term, upon occasion of Mr. Aaron Smith's sickness, I have been prevailed with no longer to delay the publication of it.

If any shall still surmise that I might have done better to let him alone yet a little while, till the justice of the nation had passed upon him: I answer, that well-nigh all, that I say of him, relates to such of his crimes, which the justice of this, or a neighbouring nation, has already passed upon. And though I can prove, this villainous contrivance of his plot has been at least of a year and a half standing; and do know many steps of it more than are hitherto commonly known; and have seen many letters to this effect, all written by Robert Young's hand, some in his own, some forged for me, and divers other persons far more considerable; yet my reader will find, I pass all, or the greatest part of that by, and leave still enough to be produced against him at his trial.

I do indeed briefly touch upon his late endeavours to suborn one Holland, to support his perjuries by perjuring himself, but his discourse with Holland to that purpose, and the instructions he sent him to swear by, having been both averred already upon oath, in an open court of justice, before a great assembly at Hicks's-hall: I know no pretence, why I should be bound to conceal what was then, in so solemn a manner, made public.

The truth is, the chief reason that urges me, at this time, to make known to the world the certain discoveries I have made of Robert Young's most detestable villainies of all kinds, is, that I am assured, this infamous man does still persist in his causeless and wild malice against me, and other innocent persons; and attempts, at this time of day, to justify his forged Association, by the false testimonies of others like himself. Wherefore, since he will not give me over, it is high time I should begin with him: and whilst he goes on in such a barbarous manner, to strike at my life, surely none can blame me if I debase myself so much as to write his.

But if any one shall still suggest, that I have troubled myself too much, and spent too many words on so inconsiderable a rascal: I have this yet to say, that since he could think himself so considerable, as to hope to be an evidence against mine; and several others lives; I should be wanting to myself, to them, and indeed to the public, should I not prove him to be a dangerous rascal, now it is come so unexpectedly into my power to do it.

It seems also the more seasonable for me at this very time to shew him to the world; since Blackhead has made a second escape out of the messenger's hands; and since there goes about a letter (forged, one would think, by Young himself among his infinite other forgeries) wherein it is declared in Blackhead's name, but in Young's English, that Blackhead has done no wrong to no man upon earth but Young. Whether this can possibly be true, I leave to any man upon earth, that has read my First Part to judge. And whoever shall peruse this my Second Part, I doubt not but he will be convinced, that whatever Blackhead has done, I have done Young no wrong.

In the former part, I promised to give some account and character of those wicked wretches, that brought me into the troubles there described.

I come now to make good my promise. Only I fear, let me do what I can, the account of them, which I at first designed should be very short, will be much longer, and rise to a far greater bulk than I intended: especially, in what I have to say of Robert Young. But for that, I hope, my reader will reckon it to be his fault, and only my penance: since his life has been so highly criminal, and this is so clearly attested, that I must be somewhat large, or else I cannot do him all the right he deserves, and fully satisfy the world concerning him.

I must confess, I could never have been brought to foul my fingers with so base a subject, had I not been provoked, and almost challenged to it, by this same Young's intolerable insolence, even after he found himself detected of manifest forgery. For the last time I was discharged by the lords at Whitehall, on June the 13th, whereof I have already given a full relation; whilst I was passing through the outer-room, in my way home, there being a crowd of people, I stopped, and said, I pray, gentlemen, is Mr. Young here? I would fain have another sight of the man, who has put himself upon me as my old acquaintance, and intimate friend: though I never saw him in my life, till this very day.

Divers of the company presently shewing me, where he was, sitting by himself; I said to him, Robert Young, your conscience cannot but condemn you, for having thus mortally injured me, and other innocent persons. I cannot call to mind, that ever I gave you the least provocation: I am sorry now for your own sake, that you are still so obstinate in defending your forgeries, after they have been so undeniably detected. For you know, there is one of your own confederates within, who has plainly confessed them. And this he briskly, and most audaciously, replied to me, without the least concernment, that I could observe, "Confessed: no; you shall find to your sorrow, all is not confessed yet: a parliament will come, and then you shall hear from me." I left him, praying to God to give him grace to repent; and only adding, that else he was more in danger of his own damnation, than I of his accusation in parliament.

Now therefore, because of this impudent defiance, I have taken some pains to enquire into the man, and his former course of life. And notwithstanding the time of my inquiry has been so short (for he was never personally known to me, till I saw him at Whitehall, on the 13th of June last) nay, though the scene of his impious actions has been so large, that I have been forced to collect my intelligence, from far and near; yet I have been so fortunate in my discoveries of him, and his meet-help, that now I look upon the loathsome heap of scandalous materials, I have got together against him, I am almost ashamed to make it public.

But, perhaps, it may be no unacceptable, I am sure it will be no unseasonable service to my country, to present it with a faithful picture of one of the most graceless wretches, that ever yet entered upon the stage of evidencing; which I think is as bad as can be said of him, in so few words.

As to a discovery of the whole plot and contrivance against myself and others; I have been able to penetrate no farther yet, than to find that it was hatched and ripened in Newgate, where-ever it was first laid, or designed. Of the managers or abettors of it, there are but very few, hitherto, come to my knowledge: though no doubt, there are still more behind the curtain. And many other honest men, in all likelihood, had been accused after the same manner, had this first attempt taken effect.

For how can it be imagined, they would only have introduced the good archbishop Sancroft, and the poor bishop of Rochester, and joining us with three or four persons of honour, and a citizen or two, have then supposed us to be so mad, as to engage under our hands, to seize on the queen's person; to surprise the Tower; to raise a mighty army; and to bring the city of London into subjection.

No; without all question, if this false association had once passed for authentic, many other papers of the same nature would soon have been produced out of the same forge; to the involving of many other innocent persons, both of clergy and laity, in the like counterfeit guilt.

But, till time shall bring to light more of this detestable work of darkness, the whole ignominy of it must be shared at present among the pretended witnesses, whom I have already heard named.

Of these there was one captain Lawe, mentioned both by Young, and his wife. And they boasted much of his concurring testimony, when he should appear. Yet of him I have nothing more to say, than that I find, there really was such a man as Lawe, a prisoner too in Newgate; and freed from thence the 5th day of August, 1691: a captain, Young said he was; and he might as easily make him one, as he made himself a priest; which (I thank God for the church's sake) he was no otherwise than in fiction. How this captain got his liberty, I have yet no reason, that I know of, to examine strictly; seeing he has hitherto had either the modesty or the cunning to withdraw himself, and not to venture being an evidence in so bad a cause. For the present, therefore, I leave captain Lawe, as I found him, with no other mark of disgrace, but what his friend Young has fixed upon him, by naming him as a man likely to deserve the title of the third discoverer of his plot.

Of Blackhead too, besides what relates to myself, which the reader has had before, I have but one story more to insert here; though that indeed is home, and to the purpose. For this very Stephen Blackhead was prisoner also in Newgate, and condemned on January 15, 1689, to stand in the pillory, and to lose his ears together with one Lewis and one Patrick, being all three convicted of one and the same forgery.

Lewis, and Patrick, it seems, were so ill befriended, as to have the rigour of the law pass upon them. By what favour Blackhead came to be reprieved and pardoned, it is not now my business over-curious to inquire: else I could perhaps tell a story, how the knave, being himself a broken taylor, and employed in the soliciting of other debts; and having, as is usual, some bills and letters of attorney intrusted with him for that purpose, had the good luck, and the honesty, by delivering up, and cancelling one of them, to save his ears, and purchase his pardon.

But, perhaps, I do not well to anticipate any part of Blackhead's other knaveries, not doubting, but he will, in time, supply abundant matter, to deserve a like history of himself: it is more than probable, that some other good and peaceably-minded man, having been as vilely trepanned by him, as I have been, though perhaps, by some other way than a flowerpot, will have the same reason to search into all his tricks, and to set them out with as much variety, in as ample a manner, as I shall now endeavour to do Robert Young's.

It is this Robert Young, that I conceive, has most merited to be my proper subject. By what appears yet, Blackhead was only the tool, and the instrument; Young was the chief, if not the first contriver of this treacherous design. Blackhead was touched with some remorse, so far as to reveal some part of the truth: Young persisted to the last, without any relenting. And, when one would have thought he should have been quite overwhelmed with what his colleague confessed, he had the face, in so honourable a presence, with a prodigious and inimitable turn of impudence, to impute Blackhead's confession to my having suborned him.

As to Robert Young, therefore, I will first give a true draught in little of his whole life: that my reader, keeping the principal passages of that in his memory, may know where to require satisfaction in any particular, from my original papers.

But now, in the very beginning of Robert Young's story, I might be at some loss, what is really his name; for, in several places, he has gone under divers names; and behaved himself so, as quickly to wear them all out, and to make it necessary for him to change them often.

Thus, on sundry occasions, he has passed under the names of Brown, Smith, Hutt, Jones, Green, &c. In Dublin, he sometimes called himself Marsh: in Raphoe, Hopkins, to render himself more acceptable, in his ill projects; taking the true names of the worthy archbishop and bishop of those sees, at that time.

Yet, after all, I find the name of Young is most likely to pay all his scores; for, notwithstanding his many divings, under other disguises, it has so happened, that he has still risen up again at last, in his own true name of Robert Young.

There may be also as great a controversy raised, what countryman he is. In some of the original papers in my keeping, he passes for an Irishman; in some, for a Scotchman; in his own letters (which I have the least reason of all to believe, and, being myself an Englishman, I am most unwilling to believe) he gives himself out for an Englishman, born at Chester. Wherefore, till I am more familiarly acquainted with him, than he himself says I am, I must be forced to leave his country uncertain: though I am confident, there will be no great contention or emulation between the three kingdoms, to which of them he owes his birth.

In the same letters, wherein he says he was born at Chester, he affirms, that his grandfather was sir Peter Young's son, and his grandmother the duke of Lenox's daughter. Had he really been descended from sir Peter Young, I might still urge, that he is the more to blame in rendering an honest stock, as he calls it there, infamous, by making it degenerate into the most enormous crimes.

But how can I credit him in this matter of his extraction from sir Peter Young, and the illustrious house of Lenox; when, in the very same paper, there follows, immediately, that which, to my knowledge, is a horrid lie: that he was ordained priest by the bishop of Clogher. For I shall give infallible proof, that his priest's orders he only imposed on himself, by his own false hand.

But, to clear up this whole business, I have also by me a true copy of an account he gave of himself; wherein, quite forgetting this romance of his being a Cheshire man, and his kindred to the duke of Lenox, he gives this narrative of his own life.

It is dated May 26, 1683; and declares, that he was born at Warrington in Lancashire, that he went over into Ireland, and to school at Iniskillin: that he thence removed to Dublin college, being eighteen years old; where he continued seven years, and was made master of arts, eleven years since: that thence he went to be curate in Leighlin; and for three years last past, was chaplain to the bishop of Ferns and Leighlin: that he preached all the courses, for the dean and prebends, at ten shillings a sermon: that he had all the book-money; that is, the fees for marriages, burials, and christenings, there being no other parish church, but the cathedral: that he lived in the bishop's house, till his death, since Christmas: that two years before, he married the bishop's house-keeper: that he had testimonials from the college of Dublin, and was ordained by his own bishop.

Now would not any plain honest man take this to be a simple and true narrative of the man's birth, his education, and conversation? But nothing is more certain than that every line almost of all this is full of gross falshoods. And, as ill-luck would have it, after he and his reputed wife had rambled over England for divers years, and cheated multitudes of well-disposed persons, by the help of false and lying certificates, they being at last apprehended and imprisoned at Bury, as you will hear, confessed before the magistrates, that all their testimonials and recommendations were false and forged.

Wherefore it is time for me to leave still in the dark, as I find it, that age of Mr. Young's life, which he has made either to be merely fabulous, or so mixed with truth and fable, that there is no distinguishing between them. I now apply myself to that part of it, which, from undoubted testimony, I can affirm to be historical. And I shall date the beginning of this period about the year 1680.

In that year, or near thereupon, his first famous exploit, that occurs to me worthy of himself, was his marrying a second wife, Mary Hutt, whilst his first lawful wife, Anne Yeabsly, was living; with whom he had cohabited five years, and had three children by her.

Then, to qualify himself for employment in the church of Ireland, and to maintain his family (which he had taken such a way to increase) he did really insinuate himself into deacon's orders by the hands of the bishop of Killybegs; whom he circumvented by forging the archbishop of Cashell's, the bishop of Waterford's, and other clergymen's hands, to false, but very ample testimonials of his morals and learning.

But, as for his priests orders, he was beholden to no bishop for them: he had only recourse to his own incomparable faculty of counterfeiting hands and seals; so that, if that same Dr. Hookes, you wot of, had been but an honest man, he might easily have found out the false priest, without ever troubling himself to write to me about him.

However, being after this manner ordained deacon, and having ordained himself priest, he got to be entertained as a curate, first at Tallogh in the diocese of Waterford; whence, for divers crimes, he ran away with another man's horse, which he never restored: then at Castle-Reah in the county of Roscommon, whence he was forced to flee for getting a bastard: and, lastly, at Kildallin in the diocese of Kilmore.

Nor had he been long in this last cure, but he was accused, for many heinous offences, before the bishop of that see, who, at the time of my writing this, is the most reverend archbishop of Dublin: whose just description of the man, I shall give in its due place; wherein his grace has represented him, as the most impudent, lying, profligate wretch on the face of the earth.

Wherefore, to escape the justice of his diocesan, who knew him so thoroughly, he fled into the diocese of Raphoe. But, being pursued thither, and traced out by the notoriety of some of his new pranks, he was apprehended by my old friend bishop Hopkins, and first imprisoned at Lifford; then removed to the gaol of Cavan: where he was presently loaded with many of his former crimes; especially for having two wives then living; Simon Hutt, the father of the second, being then an inhabitant and innkeeper in Cavan.

Whereupon the good bishop of Kilmore, now archbishop of Dublin, fearing Robert Young might come to be hanged in his gown, degraded him from his orders; if I may call them his, since the one of them he had surreptitiously gotten, the other was really none at all.

Shortly after he was indicted, and should have been tried for his having two wives: but he had so ordered the matter, by an admirable artifice (which I shall tell by-and-bye) that the two women could never be brought together at his trial, to own him for their husband.

By this means he was discharged of a crime, whereof I shall presently give manifest proofs, besides his own confession, under his own hand; which, I hope, the reader will not think he did counterfeit too.

But, still being in Cavan gaol for fees and debts contracted there, to free himself thence he made application to the duke of Ormond, at that time lord lieutenant of that kingdom; pretending, that if he were once out of prison, and had leave to appear before his grace, he could make notable discoveries of dangerous plots against the government; in which some of the nobility, and several bishops, were concerned.

Whereupon, the popish plot having been just before in full vogue there, as well as here, the duke thought it expedient to grant him his liberty, in order to his coming up to Dublin, to make good what he had so confidently promised.

But the knave had his end, and having got out of gaol, by a pretence so plausible, he never thought of calling at Dublin, but retired secretly to Inniskillin, and let the discovery of that plot shift for itself: which, they that knew him best may think, was the honestest action of his life; to break only a promise, that he might avoid being an Irish evidence: and perhaps some of my friends may be apt to say, Sic omnia.

Whilst he was lurking at Inniskillin, he enticed thither his second wife Mary Hutt, who has ever since run the same fortune with him, and been the inseparable companion of all his frauds, and was the very woman that appeared against me before the lords, to justify the association. So that from that time we hear nothing more of his true wife, Anne Yeabsly. It seems he then entirely cast her off, after he had allured her by the most solemn vows of living with her alone, and for ever renouncing the other, to be the chief instrument of his not being convicted at Cavan; and that by no less than a downright perjuring herself for his sake.

But, whatever became of her, it is certain, that it was with Mary Hutt he fled into England, in or about the year 1683. And, from that time to this, they have run a constant uninterrupted race of all kinds of wickedness in this kingdom, scarce ever passing a month, or a week, of these eleven years, without either being actually in some prison, or committing such crimes as deserved the deepest dungeons.

The first news I hear of him, after his arrival in England, was upon his making application to the venerable archbishop Sancroft, for some employment in our church. This he did in the garb, and under the character of a distressed Irish clergyman; and, to prove himself such, he exhibited his counterfeit orders from the bishop of Clogher. And I must not omit, that, as a testimony of his modesty, this his first visit at Lambeth, and the producing his orders there, was within a month after he had been degraded in Ireland.

But the wise and wary archbishop immediately suspected him and his letters of orders, they being not in form, or the usual stile, nor the seal fixed in its due place. Against all which exceptions the falsary fenced as well as he could with a shameless lie. Yet he received no other answer, but that his grace had no cure void in his gift.

But Young would not be put off so; shortly after he came again, desiring and pressing the archbishop to recommend him to be a chaplain to some ship, or to some cure in one of our western plantations. Which his grace again refused, and upon surer grounds than before: for, in the mean time, he had sent to Dr. Foley, chaplain to the archbishop of Dublin, then in England, for a better information concerning this bold and importunate man, which produced the letters hereafter set down from the lord archbishop of Dublin, and the lord bishop of Ferns and Leighlin, touching his forging of orders, his degradation, his double marriage, and other his good qualities.

Thus failing at the archbishop's, he forthwith sent his woman to Windsor, where the court then resided, with a petition to the king; therein she sets forth, that her name was Mary Green, the wife of one Robert Green, an Irish minister; who, going into the West Indies, upon urgent affairs, was taken captive by the pirates of Sallee. Therefore she prays that the king would be graciously pleased to recommend her sad condition to the clergy of England; and that his majesty would request them (so her secretary words it) to contribute their charity toward her husband's ransom.

This petition was read in council, June 18, 1684, and referred to the lord archbishop of Canterbury, and the lord bishop of London. But we may be sure the petitioner, or her husband, came no more to Lambeth for an answer to the reference. They took a shorter way, and much easier to themselves; they forged a favourable report upon the petition, under the archbishop and bishop of London's hands and seals; by virtue of which (together with the archbishop's true hand and seal, which they had gotten by chance, and affixed a false recommendation to it) they wandered a long time over England, sometimes together, sometimes asunder, he passing for her brother, sometimes under the name of Robert Hutt, sometimes of Robert Green; and so cheated the king's subjects of very considerable sums.

But at length this plot was unluckily spoiled by their coming in their progress to play their pranks in Suffolk, the archbishop's native country, especially in Bury; where exhibiting their false recommendations to Mr. Cleggat, the minister of that town, the vagabond and his quean were seized upon suspicion; and, being severally examined, they themselves confessed before divers justices of the peace the whole train of their forgeries in this particular. Whereupon they were tried, and found guilty, and sentenced to stand in the pillory in the market of Bury, October 6, 1684; he going under the name of Robert Young, alias Hutt; she of Mary Green, alias Hutt, alias Peirson, alias Young.

Some time after this, having made a property of the name of Green, and of the captive Irish minister long enough, and squeezed out of it as much money as it would afford; and not being to be terrified from so gainful a traffic by one pillorying at Bury, they still carried it on, only changing the scene, and altering their stile: she, that before was Mary Green, is again sent out, and furnished by her friend, with a new set of forged instruments and names.

In some of her false recommendatory papers, she passed for Mrs. Mary Jones, wife of Mr. Robert Jones, rector of Ashford: in others, for Mrs. Mary Smith, wife of Mr. John Smith, supposed rector too, at the same time, of the same Ashford, in the diocese of Canterbury; whereas neither Jones, nor Smith, was ever rector there, no more than doctor Hookes is rector of Wingrave in Buckinghamshire.

However, each of these her new husbands was pretended to be a prisoner for a vast debt, upon the account of suretyship: and she carried about with her divers counterfeit letters of the hand still of archbishop Sancroft, desiring (and in one of her papers making his grace humbly to beseech) the contributions of the bishops and clergy for the poor man's enlargement.

This cheat was indeed more gainful to them than the former. The archbishop's hand was so admirably well imitated, especially in the subscriptions of his name, that she generally met with a very kind reception; and particularly applying herself to three bishops, who, of all the bench, were the archbishop's most intimate friends, even they were deceived by a legerdemain so well devised, and nothing doubting, but it was his grace's true hand (though they knew it almost as well as their own) they and their clergy were very bountiful to her.

Nor was Robert Young himself all this while idle, but sometimes he accompanied this Mrs. Jones and Mrs. Smith, as her brother; sometimes he came after her as her receiver; sometimes he went a different road from her, as her agent deputed to solicit good people's charity to so pious a work: shewing another false letter under the hand of Dr. Faulconberge, secretary to the archbishop; wherein were set down divers sums, as given by several of the clergy, to draw in others; and, among the rest, I thank her, she owns the receipt of 4*l.* from the bishop of Rochester.

I admire how it was possible this their wicked trade was not sooner discovered; which it had been in a nation less charitable than ours. But here they successfully drove it on the better part of the year 1687, till at length the archbishop was alarmed from divers quarters, by notice that his hand and seal went a begging about the kingdom; which occasioned the advertisements, that were given to the whole nation, in the Gazettes of September and October, 1687, to beware of Mrs. Jones and Robert Smith; and to apprehend them, that they might be dealt with according to law: whereupon Mrs. Jones was very closely traced to Chester, and searched for there by the lord bishop of St. Asaph's order. But she prevented the diligence of his messenger, and escaped to London.

Not long after this, they both came to Bromley. The occasion of it was (as I have understood since) that Mr. Goodwyn, who officiated some time for Mr. Dobson, falling suddenly ill, and going to London for cure; and being at a loss for the supply of a chaplain at the college of widows, had by chance this Young offered to him, as a grave Irish clergyman, of good preferment in that church, but at present out of business, having fled that kingdom with his family, upon the beginning of the duke of Tyrconnel's rage against the Protestants.

By help of this imposture he and his wife were entertained at Bromley, though, by good hap, they made a very little stay here. Yet, as short as it was, he has left signal marks behind him of his wickedness, and particularly of his owning that he had the knack to counterfeit any man's hand in England.

However, during his small time in the college, the good widows had respected him, and his fellow traveller so kindly, that he remembered it two or three years after, when he was in Newgate. I will presently produce the very letter written thence, in which he is not ashamed to beg of an hospital, and in a canting strain, to intreat they would make a collection among them, towards his being removed to the King's-bench.

The whole letter is full of prevarications: but there is one I cannot forbear mentioning now. For though the true cause of his and his reputed wife's being clapped up in Newgate, was their forging several bills of exchange, and receiving the money upon them, for which they both then stood convicted, and had been pilloried; yet he solemnly protests, and thanks God, that he was not a prisoner for any ill thing, but only because an Irishman ('whom I pray God forgive,' these are his very words) 'swore against me, that, by virtue of bills, I raised money for the use of king James: whereas (says he) you all remember I stood up for the Church of England, and stood in the gap against the Roman Catholics in the worst of times.'

But after a short time of sojourning here, of about six weeks, or two months, in the year 1687, Robert Young soon perceived, that the poor town of Bromley was not a proper seat for him to set up his rest in; where he could only expect a bare subsistence by reading prayers, as a substitute to one who was himself a substitute to the chaplain of the college: whereas he knew, and had practised, a far more ready way of getting a plentiful livelihood; whether honest or dishonest he mattered not.

Wherefore, removing hence to Wapping, and thence to Whitechapel, he began to look out for some fitter place for a new scene of action; where he might more profitably exercise his best-beloved faculty of counterfeiting hands and seals.

At length he cast his eye on St. Alban's, a town, which, by reason of its great trade, and convenient distance from London, and, being so great a thoroughfare, he pitched on to practise in it some of the cleanliest feats, I must say, of his knavish dexterity in that kind.

Between St. Alban's and London, he began to ply in the beginning of the year 1688, and it was not long before he crept into a great familiarity in the post-house there. By what arts of courtship he became so intimate on a sudden in the family, I leave it to the ensuing papers to inform my reader.

However, by this means, he procured the absolute command of all the mails of that road; and so had the opportunity of opening and perusing, and taking out, and putting in, what letters he pleased, between the chief traders of those parts, and their correspondents in London.

Having thus furnished himself with proper tools, and chosen as fit a shop to work in, as any in England, he presently fell to his usual way of commerce; whereof I shall only mention three or four instances; they being the very same for which he and his supposed wife were afterwards condemned of forgery at the Old Bailey.

His first cheat was thus: in July 1688, he went to Northampton, and, under the name of Robert Smith, paid to Mr. John Clarke, an inhabitant there, the sum of 20*l.* and took his bill of exchange for it, to one Mr. Jonathan Kendall of London: Mr. Clarke also sending a letter of advice, that he had drawn such a bill upon him for the use of Mr. Robert Smith.

Robert Young, whom we must now call

Robert Smith, forged another bill verbatim by the true one, for the same sum of 20*l.* payable to himself under the same false name; and, straight coming up to London, delivered the forged bill to Mr. Kendall; which being so very exactly done, Mr. Kendall made no delay of paying it, and had Robert Smith's receipt, dated July 16.

As soon as this was over, honest Robert immediately took horse, and hasted down to Northampton; where, arriving on July 17th, he forthwith went to Mr. Clarke, and told him, that he had offered his bill at London, but Mr. Kendall refused to pay it, and therefore desired his money again, producing the true bill; which Mr. Clarke receiving, and seeing no imaginable cause of distrust, paid the 20*l.* without demur.

Thus far Mr. Clarke and Mr. Kendall only sustained the loss of 20*l.* and, perhaps, somewhat smiled at the clever contrivance. But that which next follows, was more extraordinary, and struck deeper into their purses.

And how can my reader now think it probable, that both Mr. Clarke and Kendall should be again cheated by the same hand, of a much greater sum, within less than three months after? Yet so it really happened; and, in such a manner, that it was almost impossible for the wit of man to prevent it.

His second St. Alban's cheat, therefore, was this: being now become perfect in the exact character of Mr. Clarke's writing, he forged a bill, dated Oct. 5, 1688, as drawn by Mr. Clarke on Mr. Kendall, for 150*l.* payable at sight to his own Mary Young, under the name of Mrs. Mary Clarke.

And, because there was a necessity that a letter of advice should go before the bill, he counterfeited one also in this manner: in the Northampton bag, which he opened at St. Alban's, he found a long letter written to Mr. Kendall by Mr. Clarke, touching divers particular affairs then transacting between them. This letter he intercepted, transcribed it throughout, and, about the middle of his false copy, inserted these words, That he had drawn on Mr. Kendall a bill of 150*l.* to be paid upon sight to Mrs. Mary Clarke; and so went on with the other business, as in the true letter. This forged letter he put into the Northampton mail; so it went safe to Mr. Kendall at London.

The next morning after, Mrs. Mary Clarke came to him with her bill. Whereupon Mr. Kendall, not in the least suspecting that the bill or letter of advice were forged, because he was confident, they were both of Mr. Clarke's own hand-writing, and the letter giving him an account of several other businesses, which he thought could not possibly be known to any, but to Mr. Clarke, and himself, he presently paid to Mary Clarke the 150*l.* and so lost the whole sum beyond recovery.

His third cheat on the same road was in this manner: about the latter end of February, in the same year, 1688, he sent his second false-self now again under the name of Mary Young, to Mr. Jonathan Mathew of Daventry in Northamptonshire. She paid him 9*l.*; for which he gave her a bill of exchange upon Mr. Richard Shipton of London, payable to the said Mary Young, which she received March the 14th.

By this true original of Mr. Mathew's own hand, on the 18th of March following, he forged another bill in the name of the said Mr. Mathew, for 200*l.* charged also on the said Mr. Shipton. And, having still the liberty to search the Daventry mail at St. Alban's, and finding there a letter from Mr. Mathew to Mr. Shipton, he made the same use of it as he had done that of Mr. Clarke's to Mr. Kendall; transcribed it intirely, and, in the same surreptitious manner as before, put in an advice of his having drawn a bill of 200*l.* and for whom. Which letter was immediately sent by the post to Mr. Shipton.

The false bill and letter of advice, I am assured, was so accurately counterfeited, that Mr. Mathew himself could not discover the difference nor disown it upon view; but only in that he was certain he had never drawn any bill of that importance.

Mr. Shipton therefore was easily deceived by the similitude of hands; and Robert Young having sent Mary to London, to receive the money, he paid it without the least scruple; since this letter of advice also mentioned other things which Mr. Shipton knew to be true.

Mr. Mathew, as soon as Mr. Shipton sent him word, that he had paid in his name a sum so considerable, dispatched immediately a servant up to London, to let him know, he had never drawn any such bill upon him, and had given him this timely notice, that, if possible, he might retrieve the money.

Thenceforth, they both used all imaginable endeavours to discover the authors of the fraud. Which Mary Young perceiving, by their frequent letters to each other, Robert having still the advantage of opening at St. Alban's; she wrote Mr. Mathew a most insulting letter; telling him, that she had made bold to borrow of Mr. Shipton 200*l.* upon his credit, but would repay it, when she was able. And, to amuse him the more in his search, she addeth a flam story, that she had got his hand-by corrupting one of the letter-carriers in London; and that, therefore, he need not trouble himself to enquire any farther about the matter: subscribing herself, Mary Young, alias Brown, alias Stewart, alias Forbus, alias Boner, &c. of which pretty piece of impudent raillery, my reader shall have the true copy, when it comes in its course.

His last forgeries practised at St. Alban's, that have come within my observation, were upon Mr. Olds of Coventry, and Mr. Billers of London.

But, before I proceed to these, I must acquaint my reader, that Robert Young had owed Mr. Olds and Mr. Billers an ancient grudge, of as long standing as the year 1683; because then he could only defraud them of 10*l.* and a ring, and not of 100*l.* as he designed. The case was thus :

Robert Young, in June 1683, forged a bill in the name of Mr. Joseph Olds of Coventry, for 100*l.* upon Mr. John Billers of London, payable at sight.

He likewise forged a letter of advice of the said bill, which he procured to be put into some post upon the road. And accordingly it was delivered in London to Mr. Billers on June the 12th.

The next day, being June the 13th, Robert Young, in a canonical habit with a scarf on, presented to Mr. Billers the forged bill for 100*l.* ; the counterfeit was exact, and Mr. Billers had received a letter of advice before ; whereupon he straight ordered his cash-keeper to pay the reverend Mr. Young his bill.

Robert, seeing the money come so freely, would have taken it upon content ; the servant would not pay it, except he would tell it over ; which at length he did.

But, before he could carry it away, the servant whispering this to his master, and Mr. Billers himself observing something in the bill, that gave him reason to suspect it, came to them, and said to Robert, that he desired to be better satisfied in the said bill, and that he was the person, whose right it was to receive it, since he knew him not.

Robert replied, he was a country minister, altogether a stranger in town, and known to none but the archbishop of Canterbury, ' Well, said Mr. Billers, ' when you bring me any of ' the archbishop's gentlemen to give me an account of his grace's knowledge of you, you ' shall presently have the money.'

But Robert pretended very urgent occasions for it, and that he was to pay away some of it that night : and therefore earnestly intreated he might have the whole, or at least ten pounds of it for the present. Mr. Billers consented to this last request : Mr. Young gave a receipt for the 10*l.* : and, to prevent a farther trouble of telling the money again, Mr. Billers desired him to seal the rest up in the bag where it was put. Mr. Young had no seal. Mr. Billers pulled off his finger a gold ring set with a cornelian stone ; bid Mr. Young seal the bag with it ; gave the ring into his keeping, and appointed him to bring it again the next day, when he came for the residue of the money. Mr. Young very fairly went away with the 10*l.* and the ring, but never came again for the remainder of his bill, or to bring witness, that he was acquainted with the arch-bishop.

Having now set forth this matter of fact of Mr. Billers keeping back 90*l.* from Mr. Robert Young, even just when he was in the very act of receiving it, I leave it to my reader to judge, whether Robert did not owe him a good turn. My next business is to show how he paid it him : some years, indeed, had passed, before he took his revenge ; which I somewhat wonder at ; but he took it at last to some purpose.

The manner how it was done I shall express as briefly as I can, because the circumstances of this were very near the same with his other aforementioned St. Alban's forgeries. About the middle of February, 1688, he sent his faithful instrument Mary, under the name now of Mrs. Sarah Harris, to pay the same Mr. Olds 10*l.* at Coventry, for which he gave her a bill of exchange upon the same Mr. Billers, payable at sight : so, for very good cause, Robert took care all, or most of his bills should be worded. By this means Robert renewed his acquaintance with Mr. Olds's hand, and soon perfected himself in it, by watching over all his letters of correspondence with Mr. Billers, which must come from Coventry through St. Alban's, where he governed those that governed the post house.

Being thus prepared, he began at first to play at small game, that he might keep his hand in use : for, finding in one of Mr. Old's letters two bills, the one of fourteen pounds ten shillings, the other of 20*l.* both payable to Mr. Billers, he took possession of the letter, forged indorsements on the bills, in the name of Mr. Billers, that they should be paid to his servant, James Moreton (whose true name was James Young, and he was really Robert's servant) and accordingly both these bills were paid, Aug. 5, 1689, to James Moreton, alias Young ; as, it seems, nothing can belong to Robert Young, without being intitled to an alias.

This James Moreton, alias Young, I say, did actually receive both the bills ; and, thinking it was but reasonable he should have a share in the profit, as he had in the knavery, paid the sum of the one bill to his master, and kept the other to himself : the first cheat (and the last, I believe) that was ever put upon Mr. Robert Young.

But, after these less gainful experiments, it seems, Robert Young thought it now a fit season, that his main plot upon Mr. Olds and Mr. Billers should begin to work ; for, by his long familiarity with the northern mails, he had learned, that, at this time, there was a considerable cash of Mr. Olds's remaining in the hands of Mr. Billers.

Wherefore, by the same method which he had used in his other cheats of this kind, he forged a bill of two hundred pounds to be paid at sight to the same Mrs. Sarah Harris, proceeding in the same steps as before ; that is, he intercepted one of Mr. Olds's letters, transcribed it, adding an advice of having drawn the said bill of 200*l.* for Mrs. Sarah Harris ; then suppressed the true letter, and put the false one into the post ; which was delivered to Mr. Billers, at London, upon August the 11th, 1689.

The next morning came Mrs. Sarah Harris to Mr. Billers, and produced her forged bill : he could discover no deceit in the hand, owned he had received the letter of advice, and was just giving order for the payment ; when, by good fortune, he recollected, that he had heard

Mr. Shipton of Friday street had, not long before, been defrauded after the same manner, by a woman coming, as this did, in the morning, and of the same sum of 200*l*.

The fresh remembrance of this gave him just grounds of being jealous of the like trick; so that while the money was telling out, he thought it would not be amiss to send and desire Mr. Shipton to come and take a view of this Mrs. Harris, intimating the reason why he sent for him. Mr. Shipton came accordingly, and, upon the first sight, declared her to be the same Mary Young, that had lately cheated him of his 200*l*. She, being thus unexpectedly charged with this crime, confessed it upon the place; whereupon she was apprehended, and committed to the King's-bench, after she had received above 500*l*. in a short space, by the like ways, whilst she was such a kind of agent at London for Robert Young, as my reader will find she owned upon oath afterwards at Litchfield.

But in the King's-bench I must leave her for a short time, that I may look out after her dear friend, and inquire how he behaved himself, in this sad catastrophe of their affairs, after they had so long proceeded smoothly and prosperously.

It was high time for him now to intermit his correspondencies at St. Alban's, and to remove to a greater distance from London; so that the next footsteps, I have traced of his rogueries, were at Litchfield; whither, I find also, he had made some excursions in the year 1688, but now, in the year 1689, it seems he went thither, resolving to settle there for some time.

There he appeared in a genteel habit, with his man, James Young, alias Moreton, to wait upon him: there he personated again an Irish clergyman, of considerable preferments in that church, and a plentiful temporal estate. He kept two horses, rode often abroad in an equipage, rather fitting a highwayman, than a divine. He had plenty of gold and silver, and some plate; the product, no doubt, of his late cheats upon Mr. Clarke, Mr. Matthew, and Mr. Olds, besides some remains, probably, of what was collected for Mr. Green, Mr. Jones, and Mr. Smith, whilst they, good men, perhaps, lay in prison for it, all the while.

During his abode at Litchfield, he professed himself to be a single man, and, upon that pretence, made love to divers women, in the way of marriage; believing, that his former Mary was lodged so safely in the King's-bench, that she could never get out to disturb his designs. But there he was deceived; for, when the fire broke out in Southwark, she made her escape, and so had leisure to look out after him, and came time enough to prevent his intended marriage.

For just then he was in close pursuit of a young woman at Tamworth, who had at least 1,000*l*. to her portion, and he was in a great probability of obtaining her. But Mary, having got loose by the above-mentioned accident, wrote him divers letters, that all her money was spent; and that she would be with him shortly, though she begged by the way. Which, at last, she made good, and arrived there, some few days before his new designed wedding, and challenged him for her husband. Or else, undoubtedly, he had served Mary Hutt the same trick, for the sake of 1,000*l*. as my reader will find he really served Anne Yeabsley, for 150*l*.

But this had like to have cost Mary her life: for Robert, being enraged at the disappointment, practised with his man, to meet her in her coming down; and either to cut her throat, or drown her. And, when he refused (which was a wonderful honesty in any one, that could submit to be his man) Robert's next attempt was to dispatch and kill his man, as he went abroad, one day, with him a shooting.

My reader, no doubt, will be amazed at this horrible story, yet I say no more than what his man himself declared upon oath, at Litchfield, and what all the country thereabout believes to be true.

But, the gun not going off, his man fled from him, first to Litchfield, and thence to Coventry; where he acquainted Mr. Olds, a mercer there, whom I have already so often mentioned, with the several cheats, that his master Robert Young had formerly acted upon him by forging bills of exchange.

Mr. Olds, having never before, by all his search, been able to discover the contrivers of those forgeries, without delay, repaired to Litchfield, and lighted upon Robert Young, whilst he was yet flush of money and plate; which he pretended to have brought out of Ireland, where he affirmed he was a dean.

Mr. Robert, being thus unawares charged with all these cheats, freely confessed them all to Mr. Olds: and, that he might not lose his new gotten reputation in the church there, and all his hopes at once, privately made up the business, and repaid to Mr. Olds all he could demand: that is to say, the 14*l*. 10*s*.; the 20*l*. and the 10*l*. and the value of the gold ring, which unlucky blow to his fortune made him, for the future, be content to be served without plate.

But this was also the occasion of a worse mischief, that shortly after befel Robert Young and Mary; I say Mary also. For, before this, she arrived safe at Litchfield; and though, at first, he positively denied her to be his wife, and forswore her too, according to his custom; yet, in a short time, I know not how, they were pieced together again, as seeming indeed to be born for one another's society.

I have already told my reader, that Mr. Matthew of Daventry had used all possible industry, and written a vast number of letters, and made many fruitless journies, in quest of the author of his 200*l*. forgery. But all in vain, till now the noise of it, spreading all over the country, came, at length, to Mr. Olds, at Coventry. He presently gave intimation by letter to Mr. Matthew, how he himself had likewise been cheated of divers less sums, and recovered them again, by composition: and that his knave was still in a flourishing condition at Litchfield; and he might probably be the same man.

Mr. Matthew, upon this intelligence, quickly posted down to Litchfield: beset the house, over night, where Robert and Mary lodged: the next morning Mary was soon taken, and Robert also, after above an hour's search, was pulled out from under a heap of furze, in a corner of the cellar. They both immediately confessed the fact; and Robert would fain have stopped Mr. Matthew's mouth, as he had done Mr. Old's, with the small reliicks of his ill-gotten wealth. But, that not sufficing for a sum so considerable, Robert stoutly denied all again, and defied him to do his worst: whereupon they were both clapped up in Litchfield gaol.

During this time, news was come to the secretaries office at Whitehall, of the aforesaid violations on the post-office, at St. Alban's; and that the persons offending were in custody at Litchfield. Whereupon, the right honourable the earl of Shrewsbury, then principal secretary of state, granted a warrant to Mr. Legatt, the king's messenger, to bring them up to town, as being accused for dangerous practices against the government; the persons, abused by the former forgeries, giving their consent, that they should be so removed.

Mr. Legatt brought them up, and laid them first in the Gate-house in Westminster; whence, by a warrant of the lord chief justice, they were removed into London, and lodged safely (one would have thought) in Newgate.

To Newgate they had directly steered their courses the greatest part of their lives; and thus, at last, wrought their way thither, 'per varios casus, per tot discrimina.' There they were tried and condemned for these forgeries, and underwent again the punishment of the pillory; he being fined, for one fault, 100 marks; for the other, 100 marks; and she 20 marks.

If my reader shall ask, why Robert was found guilty of no more than two of these cheats? It was, because there was no other proof against him for the rest, but the confession of Mary, who plainly confessed him to be the author of all. But that, it seems, in law, is not evidence sufficient, because they supposed her to be his wife; it was a pity the judges and jury had not known how little she was his lawful wife.

However, in Newgate they continued above two years, for want of payment of these fines, till the 25th of May last, when his fines were paid: I suppose his wife's fine was discharged too. For they both came forth in triumph, and new cloaths on, that day, with the association in their hands; after they had prevailed with Blackhead to steal it in, and steal it out of my chimney.

Thus, according to the fashion, I have given a true portrait of these precious evidences of a new plot. My next business will be to exemplify all this more largely, by authentic proofs: which, if I mistake not, I shall do so unquestionably, that none shall be able to disbelieve what I say against Young, but such as can believe what Young has said against me.

But first I will dispatch Blackhead: touching whom, I will only give a copy of the record of the sessions at the Old Bailey, where he was condemned for forgery.

'London ss. Deliberat' gaol' dominor' regis
'et regin' de Newgate tent' pro civitat'

By this it appears, Blackhead and his two companions were convicted of cheating one Mr. Faulkener of 60*l.* by a false bill or bond; and were condemned to stand in the pillory in Cornhill near the Exchange, for two hours; to lose each of them an ear; and to continue prisoners, for twelve months, without bail or mainprize, in Newgate: where, no doubt, that intimacy between Blackhead and Young was contracted, which had been so fatal to me, had not God marvellously defeated their conspiracy against me.

Having thus, for the present, rid my hands of Blackhead, I proceed next to Young. And, the first scene of his villainies, that have come to my knowledge, having been in Ireland, I will now give certain demonstration of the particulars, out of the original papers themselves: which seem to me to describe the caitiff so plainly, that I need only set them down in their order, without any comment of mine upon them.

The principal crimes I have already objected against him in Ireland, were his marrying a second wife, whilst his first was alive: his counterfeiting certificates for deacons orders; his entirely forging of his priests orders; and his feigning the knowledge of a dangerous plot, in that kingdom; wherein he would make out, that divers great persons were engaged.

There are, also, several others of his rogue-ries, such as his having a bastard by a kitchen wench, at Castlereagh, whilst he was, a short time, curate there: his lewd life, and cheating divers people of money by counterfeit bills, at Tallogh, where he was also sometimes curate, his running away with another man's horse:

when he was forced to flee from thence, for his other pranks, and the like. All these, and more such, will come in, as by the bye; and it will be enough for me only to give my reader this notice, to mark them in the papers I am going to produce: the method of which shall be this:

1. He shall have Robert Young's general character, in a letter from the present lord archbishop of Dublin; and another from the lord bishop of Ferns and Leighlin; both written so long ago as the year 1683: whilst he was only under suspicion at Lambeth; and before he had entered upon so many vile practices in England. In these letters, he is, even then, described to be as wicked a liar, as the little carmelite friar Moor, and to be as very a rogue as the Spanish wits have fancied their Gusman. Who the carmelite friar was, I know not; Gusman is sufficiently known. But, in the sequel, it will appear, that our rogue has far outdone the very Spanish romance of theirs.

2. He shall have the lord bishop of Raphoe Hopkins's letter to the lord bishop of Kilmore, when R. Young was apprehended in that diocese under the name of Robert Hopkins; for which name also he shewed his forged letters of priests orders, upon his examination by the said bishop, which shall also follow.

3. Here are the copies of the original certificates confirming the truth of both his marriages.

4. Here are divers letters of Robert Young's own hand, when he was imprisoned at Cavan, and in danger of his life for having two wives.

(1.) A letter to one justice Waldrum, to offer him a bribe, if he would take bail for him.

(2.) Another letter to the lord bishop of Kilmore, confessing some of his knaveries, but solemnly denying his having married two wives.

Next, here is a letter to Roger Yeabsly, brother to his first wife Ann Yeabsly, alias Apsly.

Then another to George Yeabsly, her father; then two letters to herself.

In all these he confesses his two marriages: however, proposes, to her and her brother, a way to save his life by forswearing themselves: that they should get a certificate at Cork, signed by a public notary, that Ann Yeabsly was really married to one Robert Young, and that Roger her brother was present at the marriage, and that then they should both come to Cavan, and, upon his trial, deny that he was the man; and, if they did him this service, he promised, with horrible imprecations upon himself, that he would only stay to receive Mary Hutt his second wife's portion, and then run away with Ann Yeabsly, his first wife, into England.

Lastly, To complete all, I will produce two of his letters to his second wife Mary Hutt; the one after he had fled out of the diocese of Kilmore; the other after he had got to Iniskillin out of Cavan gaol.

The first is full of the like blasphemous curses and execrations upon himself, if ever he was married to any other woman but her; therefore inviting her to come and relieve him, with dreadful promises and vows of never forsaking her.

In the second, to say nothing of his impudent reviling of the lord bishop of Kilmore, he desires her to steal away from her friends to him, and to bring the bond with her (a true one, without doubt) to bring also all the money she could get, and to be sure to pay nobody: which was accordingly done, and so with her he fled, and took sanctuary in England.

A LETTER from Dr. Foley, containing part of a Letter from the present Lord Archbishop of Dublin, concerning Robert Young; written in the year 1683, to the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury.

Tunbridge, June 17, 1683.

May it please your Grace;

Last night I received a letter from my lord archbishop of Dublin, concerning Mr. Young; part of it runs thus: 'If he be Robert Young whom I degraded, he is the veriest villain alive: he has now, or had when I knew him, several wives living. A notorious cheat, has counterfeited several hands and seals, by which he has deceived men of money, and stolen into credit and holy orders. He has been in several gaols, as namely Lifford, where he was laid up by the bishop of Raphoe, now Derry, who is going now for London; and if you can procure him to see him, I am confident he remembers him well enough. He was long in Cavan gaol, and to be tried for his life; where I got, and have by me, very many of his papers, which would enable any man to write the Scotchman's life, which I think would transcend the Spanish rogue. For fear he should hang in his gown, by the advice of the lord primate, I degraded him for the least of his villainies; because the canon was express, and he guilty, as was proved, of marrying without license. In brief, he is a notorious wicked man, and so well furnished with the necessary instruments of it, that I think friar Moor, the late convert, cannot exceed him in lying. He is a black swarthy man, of a suspicious countenance. He has several names. He assumed mine at some places; Hopkins's at Raphoe; and was here lately by the name of Brown; but, hearing that I was here, I suppose, made off again. The last wife he married was one Simon Hutt's daughter of Cavan. I send you the inclosed, which I pray reserve for me. It is a letter he wrote to his second wife, after he fled from me. Keep the letter for me; I send it, because I am mightily of opinion he is the man. Here is another letter to his former wife Ann Yeabsly, at the same time; by which you will be satisfied that Robert Young ' is a very ingenious person, and a man of deep contrivance. Had he been in time and place, he would have made an excellent evidence; and, had that trade gone on, I had doubtless been in a plot; for he declared he had a plot to discover, in which some noblemen and several bishops were concerned. I am confident I had been one; and the bishop of Waterford (whose hand and seal he counterfeited to me, and the bishop of Elphin) another; from whom he pretended orders, and the bishop disowned upon my letter to him.—Dublin. June 2, 1683.—Thus far the Archbishop.

I send inclosed to your grace the two letters, which my lord sent me, and beg your grace will please to keep them by you, till I can wait on you for them; because he desires to have them again. I am bold to say, that your grace will hereafter be a little suspicious of clergymen who come out of Ireland, without better testimonials; and that it will be for the honour of our clergy and university, that wicked and ignorant men, who pretend to be of them, and are not, be animadverted on by your grace, with some severity. I beg your grace's blessing, and am your grace's, &c. S. FOLEY.

A LETTER from the Lord Bishop of Ferns and Leighlin, now Archbishop of Cashel, to Dr. Foley, concerning the same Robert Young; written in the year 1683.

Sir; Dublin, June 2.

According to your desire, I waited on my lord archbishop of Dublin, to enquire of his grace concerning one Young, whom he degraded for several notorious crimes; as having two wives, counterfeiting the archbishop of Cashel's hand to the bishop of Killaloe, for his being made deacon; which the bishop (not discovering the cheat) did; and then his counterfeiting the bishop of Clogher's hand for the order of priesthood, which he never had: he went likewise under several names, and was in several gaols, particularly in that at Cavan for a great while. The man, my lord says, is about his grace's own stature, that is, somewhat tall; neither lean nor corpulent; of a pretty long, black, ill visage; his hair, if his own, is black, thin, pretty long, and hangs flag without any curls. He is a Scotchman, about twenty-seven or twenty-eight years of age; and will lie as fast as the little carmelite friar Moor (to use his grace's own expression). And this is all I can say of him. I am yours, &c.

NARCISSUS FERNS and LEIGHLIN.

A LETTER to the Lord Bishop of Kilmore, from Bishop Hopkins, then Lord Bishop of Raphoe; written in the year 1680, concerning Robert Young's Apprehension in his Diocese, under the name of R. Hopkins.

Raphoe, Nov. 11, 80.

My Lord; Your lordship's to me came very seasonably, that is, one day before Mr. Young:

and he came very confidently, expecting much kindness for name's sake; for he thought it fit to assume mine; and, at his first accost, thrust into my hands letters dimissory, lewdly forged, as from the bishop of Killaloe; with the seal to them vilely cut, and the date of 'octo die Octobris.' This alone would have given me suspicion of an imposture; but, being forewarned by your lordship, I was certain I had the man, though he lurked under another name. The contents of the letters were the amplest form of commendation, which I keep by me, but shall remit when your lordship requires it. I put many cross interrogatories to him, till, at last, one lie so contradicted another, that the man was perfectly confounded, and began to speak truth. There were two other justices then with me: we took his examination, a copy of which I have sent here inclosed. When I pressed him upon the point of polygamy, he utterly denied it, as indeed it concerned him; as also that he ever was at Londonderry, much more that ever he was school-master there; and this some who were present believed to be truth. Besides, some affirm, that to their knowledge, Sarah Mallon, who was afterwards married to one Young, was, upon his decease, married to one Mr. Laughtin, a minister in the diocese of Londonderry, with whom she now lives. I know not whether he can be so well vindicated from others, for your lordship speaks of two or three more. However, his misdemeanours and forgeries were so many, that we committed him to the county gaol, where, I hope, he will not long continue. For, as at your lordship's desire I have secured him, so I must desire that your lordship would speedily take order to have him sent where the fullest evidence may be given against him. I am your lordship's, &c. EZECHIEL RAPHOE.

The EXAMINATION and CONFESSION of R. Young, before the Lord Bishop of Raphoe, and others, in the year 1680.

County Donegal.

The voluntary examination of R. Young, late of the parish of Kildallin, in the diocese of Kilmore, and county of Cavan, clerk, taken at Raphoe, November 10, 1680, before the right reverend father in God, Ezechiel lord bishop of Raphoe, Richard Inett, clerk, and Matthew Cocken, esq.; justices of the peace of the said county of Donegal.

Who being voluntarily examined, upon suspicion of being guilty of several forgeries and misdemeanors, saith, that he was curate at the said parish of Kildallin for three quarters of a year; that he came thence in October last; that he had not any certificate or dismiss from the bishop of that diocese; that he confessed the counterfeiting of letters dimissory from the lord bishop of Killaloe, and the seal and subscription thereof are false; as also the name of R. Hopkins in those letters dimissory mentioned, he intended to have taken on him; but that his own name is Robert Young; that he was about three years since ordained deacon by the bishop of Killaloe. That he is a married man; and that his wife's name is Hutt, daughter to Simon Hutt, and is now with her father in the town of Cavan; that he was never married before: and saith, that he is not guilty of counterfeiting any letters of orders; but confessed, that he did counterfeit and forge a letter from one Dr. Smith of Limerick, to the bishop of Killaloe, upon which letter, he ordained the said exanimate deacon, as aforesaid, and further saith not. ROBERT YOUNG.

COPIES of the original CERTIFICATES and PAPERS, confirming the truth of both Robert Young's Marriages, and both his Wives being alive at the same time.

The CERTIFICATE upon Oath of George Yeabsly, or Apsly, his first Wife's Father, concerning R. Young's first Marriage, with three other Certificates of his Cheats.

Jan. 17, 1680.

Memorandum; The day and year above written, George Apsly, of the Breedas, in the parish of Arda, in the county of Cork, yeoman, came before me, Richard Pine, one of his majesty's justices of the peace for the said county, and made oath, that on, or about the 18th of May last was five years past, he, this deponent, was present, and gave his daughter, Ann Apsly, in marriage with one Mr. Robert Young, clerk, at Ralph-cormack in the county aforesaid; and that he saw them lawfully joined in matrimony (Dr. Smith, minister), and lived together several years afterwards. He afterwards, that is to say, about two years last past, was curate under Mr. Francis Beecher, in the parish of Tallogh, in the county of Waterford; and that his daughter Ann had three children born and begot by him, and that she, his daughter, is now living. GEORGE APSLY.

Jurat coram me R. Pine, 17 die Jan. 1680. —Thom. Neesham, Not. Pub. præsente.

Jan. 17, 1680.

I, Richard Burt of Tallogh, in the county of Waterford, esq.; do certify, that (upon perusal of the within contents) the within named Robert Young was entertained and licensed as a curate in the parish abovesaid, and afterwards deposed for reasons unknown to me; but did soon after, viz. about Christmas 1679, feign and counterfeit my name and hand-writing to an acquaintance and kinsman of mine at Fealher, for seven pounds (Mr. Cook by name) and did, by virtue of his other counterfeit letter in my name, receive (as I am assuredly told) the sum of three pounds of one Henry Russel of Clonmell. The truth of all which I certify under my hand and seal, the day and year above written. RICHARD BURT, V. C.

Jan. 17, 1680.

I, Thomas Elms of Tallogh, in the county of Waterford, feltmonger, do certify, that the aforenamed R. Young, on, or about the 1st of December, 1679, did hire an horse, with bridle and saddle, to ride to Cashel, of me, at the rate of twelve pence per day; all which he hath deceived me of to my great damage. And I certify under my hand the day and year abovesaid. THOMAS (his + mark) ELMS.

Being present, Richard Burt, V. C. Francis Foulke, Thom. Neesham, Not. Pub., Garret Roche, Roger Power.

The COUNTERFEIT BILL of Mr. Burt.

Tallogh, 17 Dec. 1679.

Sir; The bearer hereof, Mr. Robert Young, minister of our town, is bound for Cashel to the archbishop, to pay some money. Therefore I intreat you to do me that great kindness, as to let him have three pounds, and I will pay you, when you call for it. If you do me this courtesy, I will requite you for it: so hoping you will not fail, I rest your loving friend,

To Mr. Henry Russel, Goldsmith, at Clonmell. R. BURT.

December 18, 79.

Received of Henry Russel the sum of three pound: I say, received by me,

R. YOUNG, Clerk.

The CERTIFICATE of divers other Persons, touching Robert Young's first Marriage.

We, whose names are subscribed, do hereby certify all whom it may concern, that Robert Young, who lately supplied the cure at Tallogh, was, as we are credibly informed, married at Rath-cormack, by Dr. William Smith, to Ann, the daughter of George Yeabsly, about five years since; during which time, the said Robert Young and Ann did cohabit, or dwell together as man and wife, at the house of the said George Yeabsly; where they had three children; which said George Yeabsly and Ann his daughter, do now dwell at Monoth, within four miles of this town of Tallogh. All which we do certify this 21st day of January, 1680.—Thomas Beecher, Prebend. de Clashmore; Richard Gist; John Yeabsly; William Gist; William Page; Thomas Clark; Richard Burt, V. C.; Richard Giles; George Oburn; Robert Benger; Francis Cooper; Thomas Bateman.

The CERTIFICATE of the Dean of Kilmore, concerning Robert Young's second Marriage with Mary Hutt.

I, Edward Dixy, Dean of Kilmore, do hereby own and acknowledge, that I married Robert Young, formerly clerk and curate of Kildallin, in the diocese of Kilmore, and Mary Hutt, daughter of Simeon Hutt, of the town of Cavan, vintner, on the 1st day of July last, in the presence of the under-named persons, and others, who, with myself, do hereby certify the same, and subscribe hereunto this 5th of March, A. D. 1680.—Edw. Dixy, Decan. Kilmore; Hen. Gillorist, Not. Pub.; Simeon Hutt; Lettis Hart, sen.; Lettis Hart, jun.;

Ann Hollend ; Alexander Makeland ; Thomas Lavender.

At the request of Mary Young, alias Hutt, we do hereby certify, that Robert Young, in the abovesaid certificate mentioned, lieth in the gaol of Cavan, and standeth charged with being the husband of two wives, viz. Mary Hutt, now resident in the corporation of Cavan, and one Ann Absly, in the county of Cork, unknown to us. And we do hereby desire some of his majesty's justices of the peace for the said county of Cork, that they will be pleased to bind over the said Ann Absly, her father, and some other persons, who were present at the inter-marriage of the said Ann to the said Robert Young ; that they may appear the 30th instant, to give their evidence against the said Robert Young.—Dated at Cavan, the 5th of March, 1680.—Humphry Perriot, vice com., Richard Lewis, Samuel Townly, John Maxwell, Henry Waldram, sov. of Cavan, Mer. Hart.

An ORDER of the Justices to summon George Yeabsly, his son Roger, and Ann Young his daughter, to appear at the Assizes at Cavan, at the Trial of Robert Young.

By his Majesty's Lords Justices of the Assize for the province of Munster.

Whereas George Absly of Breedas, in the parish of Arda, in the county of Cork, yeoman ; Roger Absly of the same, in the said county, yeoman, son to the said George Absly, and Ann Young, are material evidences in his majesty's behalf, against Robert Young, now prisoner in his majesty's gaol of the county of Cavan, and charged with being married to two wives, both being alive ; these are therefore, in his majesty's name, to will and require you, George Absly, Roger Absly, and Ann Young, to appear before his majesty's lords justices of assize for the north-west circuit of Ulster at Cavan, on the thirtieth day of this instant, then and there to give your evidence, in his majesty's behalf, against the said Robert Young. Whereof you may not fail, at your peril.—Dated at Cork, this 17th day of March, 1680.

HEN. HEN.

WILLIAM DAVIS.

Robert Young's LETTER to the lord bishop of Kilmore, confessing his guilt of some crimes, but denying his double Marriage.

May it please your lordship ; Having deliberately considered the evils I have really done, and the greater evils that have been misreported of me to your lordship, I cannot but acknowledge the justice of your lordship's displeasure ; and I am now so far from making any defence for the disingenuous shifts, my necessities and fears have put me upon, that I have already been my own accuser, and do as much condemn myself as the severest judge can do. And I hope no temptation of secular advantage shall ever hereafter make me so far swerve from the severe rules of virtue, becoming a christian and a clergyman. But though

VOL. XII.

I am willing, in all humility, to submit myself for your lordship's censure for what I have done amiss : yet I hope your lordship's goodness will be my sanctuary, where I am manifestly wronged. There are so many persons of credit here, that knew the gentlewoman, that was affirmed, and, as I hear, sworn to be my wife in these parts ; that I doubt not but it will be made clear to your lordship, that that report was the issue of ignorance and malice ; and I hope a little time will acquit me of what other reports I suffer under in that matter. But, while I am here in confinement, I am in a manner debarred of all expedients to clear my innocence, at least to do it speedily. And, in the mean while, I suffer all the hardship of a gaol amongst people, from whom I can expect no relief, and at so great a distance from such as might relieve me, that I can hope for little comfort from them. May it therefore please your lordship, so far to favour my innocence in this matter, as that I may be brought to hearing before your lordship ; where, if it appear that I have any other wife but her, with whom I have lived in your lordship's diocese, I shall quietly submit myself to the severity of the laws ; if not, I hope my penitence and reformation may in time mitigate your lordship's just displeasure for the confessed faults of your lordship's most humble suppliant, Lifford, Novem.

A LETTER from Robert Young to Justice Waldram, offering him a Bribe to let him be bailed.

May it please your Worship ; My mind I thought your worship understood, therefore if your worship does not understand what I mean (as I suppose you do) I will discover it to your worship. I have not any to make my complaint to, but to your worship. Therefore I most humbly beg your worship to take bail, and I will give you forty shillings. Moreover, my brother will bring a letter from captain Sanderson, that my brother is sufficient bail, and that captain Sanderson is satisfied to take him, provided I get any other : and I, not being acquainted with any, in these parts, fears I cannot procure another easily ; but, if your worship will take any other bondsman with my brother, I will give you the aforesaid sum of money, before you take bail : and I will take my oath to your worship, that I will not tell it to any body. Dear Mr. Waldram, do me that charity, for I ly in a sad condition ; indeed, you will do me a singular kindness, and shew a great deal of charity, in so doing ; for I know, if your worship please, it lys in your hands. I desire your worship not to discover any thing, to the bearer, or any other. I intreat your worship, to write your worship's mind to me by the bearer, that I may send him for captain Sanderson's letter to your worship. So I wrest your worship's most humble suppliant to command,

ROBERT YOUNG.

A LETTER from Robert Young to Roger Yeabsly his brother-in-law, to come and save his life, by forswearing himself.

Dear Brother; Cavan, Feb. 5, 1680.

Come along to me, with your sister, for I have fallen under a sad business, and I will lose my life, if you and your sister does not come to deny, that I am not the man. For Christ's sake, dear brother, come along with her, and I hope you shall not be the worse for it; for my life lies in my wife's, and your hands; so that I am certain, you will do what lies in you; if you do not come, I will be put to death; but, if you and my wife comes, you may have many a merry day with me hereafter. So I rest your loving brother, ROBERT YOUNG.

A LETTER from Robert Young out of Cavan Gaol, to his first Wife, Ann Yeabsly, to the same purpose.

When I left you last, I came to Belturbet in the county of Cavan, where I served as curate for the space of half a year, and had 35*l.* a year. Upon which, I spoke to my brother-in-law to bring you down to me, but he seemed unwilling to go so far. At which time, I used too oft, which is my sorrow this day, at one Simon Hutt's in Cavan, cursed be the time, that ever I went there. Whereupon Simon Hutt proffered me 150*l.* with his daughter; and he getting me drunk one night, I was married to her, and was ready to cut my own throat, the next day; but I seeing what a priminary I had by my ludness brought myself in, I saw that it could not be avoided: whereupon I resolved only to stay till I had got the money promised, and then to come to you, my dear honey, and so for you and I to go for England, where we should never be known. But my journey was stopt, for Simon Hutt heard something of my marriage to you, before the portion was paid, and so sent up to know, whether it was so, or no. And so the messenger brought word, that one Robert Young, a minister, was married to one Ann Yeabsly, daughter to George Yeabsly, near Tallogh: but, for all that the messenger brought they knew not whether I was the man or no. So that it may be denied with safety, to preserve my life. For they have clapt me in gaol upon suspicion, where I lie in a deplorable condition, and nobody to help me. Therefore, dear honey, for Christ's sake come to me, and bring my brother Roger along with you; for the assizes is the 6th of March; where I will be tried for my life, and there is not any in the world can preserve it, only you, my dear honey, if you come and say, that I am not the man, you were married to, and bring my brother Roger along with you to justify the same; I will be set at liberty, and then I shall get what money is promised, and go over to England with you. And I wish, that I may never thrive in this world, if ever I leave you hereafter; for I care no more for this husy, than for the durt under my shoe. O curse of God light on me if ever I leave you hereafter, if you prove so real to me, as to come and deny that I am none of your husband! for there is no way to save my life but that. I wish that I may never see the kingdome of God, if I do not prove as real, constant, and loving husband to you, as ever man did to woman. Dear heart, I know that I have committed a grievous and abominable fault; but I may blam bad company, and my drink for it. Therefore, for Christ's sake, dear honey, forgive me, and come along with the bearer, and clear me. And the curse of God light on me, if I prove false to you, after saving my life, for now my life lies in your hands. I will earnestly repent for what I have done, and I hope God Almighty will forgive me. If I had a hundred wives, it is you alone that is my lawful wife, and shall be to my dying day; for Christ's sake, come and say, that I was not the man you were married to. I say, dear heart, come along with the bearer; and bring my brother Roger along with you. If you do not clear me, I will be put to death; and is it not better for you to come, and tell a lie to preserve your husband's life, and to enjoy him, as long as you live, and I lives; than for to have him put to death, and never to see him again? And this I will assure you, that there will be an order from my lord chief justice to bring you down against the assizes: so that I sent the messenger to prevent that, by giving you timely notice: for you may come and stay in my brother-in-law's house, until such time as we do get our business done. And I will go with you unknown to any body; so hoping you will come and save the life of your loving husband; I rest, dear heart, your loving husband, and till death, ROBERT YOUNG.

Cavan, Feb. 5, 1680.

Here I have sent you the inclosed to my father, and my brother Roger. Pray present my duty to my mother, and my love to my brother John, and William Haskins, and my sister Else; and my blessing to my poor child, if she be alive.

A LETTER to her Father George Yeabsley from Robert Young, proposing the means how he might get off, by his Son and Daughter's perjuring themselves.

Dear Father; Cavan, Feb. 5, 1680.

I have declared the reasons and causes of my marriage in my wife's letter, which you may peruse; therefore, dear father and mother, forgive me, for it was a folly of youthhood, and if you come to prosecute to put me to death, I cannot help it. But if you give your consent to my wife, to preserve my life, this shall be a warning to me so long as I live. O! dear father, you know that David, a man after God's own heart, was guilty of both murder and adultery. And therefore, dear father, preserve my life, if you please; and I protest to God Almighty, I will never forsake my poor wife, your daughter, so long as life continues; for it is she that is my lawful wife. And therefore, for Christ's sake, dear father, send my dear wife and my brother Roger, to clear me by the same means that I have prescribed in my wife's letter. If I were cleared, I could get money enough to do you and I good, as the bearer can tell you. After I am cleared, I will carry my wife and my brother Roger down to see my grany, whom I dare not as yet write to. If you have a mind to save my life, do not come yourself; but send my wife and my brother Roger down to me; and go to Tallow, and get a certificate drawn, and have it signed by Mr. Burt, and Mr. Neesham, that Ann Yeabsly is your daughter, and that she was married to one Robert Young, that they may believe she is the same woman; and that Roger Yeabsly is your son, and that he was standing by when Robert Young was married to your daughter; and if you have a mind to save my life, they must deny that I am the man: for there is no way to preserve my life but that. Write also to Simon Hutt, in Cavan, that you would a comt to see if it were the same person to prosecute him, but only you fell sick; and therefore you sent your son and daughter to prosecute, if it be the same man. So having no more at present to write, I rest your loving son,

ROBERT YOUNG.

My duty to my mother, and love to my brother John, and sister Else, and my brother Haskins, and all the rest of our friends in general.

A LETTER to his second Wife, Mary Hutt, denying his first Marriage, with terrible Curses.

O, my dear Heart;

You know it was for love of you that I brought this misery upon myself, God Almighty help me; I was fully resolved to tell you the contents of all my letters, whenever I could have the opportunity of speaking to you: for my landlady can tell you, that I was fully resolved to shew you the letters, but could not, by reason I could not get speaking to you. O, my dear, have I thrown myself, for the love of you, into all this misery, and you to serve me thus: surely, if you have the heart of a stone, you will not do it. O, if I had but only you here, I would a reckoned all this nothing; but if I be requited thus I cannot help it. O, I wish to Christ I were ten foot under ground, and then you would have your hearts desire as I perceive. Those letters that I write, was only for that woman to come and clear me; for I was afraid that if I had writ any otherwise, she would not come. But upon those letters, I was certain would a com't and cleared me: and then I was in good hopes to have enjoyed you again. If I had my liberty and your consent, I would quickly have brought you out of all your misery. I write purposely to that woman against you, for to have her come and clear me, which, if she did me justice, I am certain she cannot do to the contrary. I wish I may never leave this place alive, if ever I was married to any other woman upon the face of the earth but you. But if you will be pleased to give me a meeting, I will satisfy you why I write so to that woman; and you will find it so at long running; though I dare not say that my soul is my own here. For Christ's sake take pity on me, and let me not starve in this deplorable condition. For God's sake pay my landlady but only for one month's diet unknown to any; and if I do not prove what I said formerly to be truth, then never pay another week for me again. My dear heart, for Christ's sake do not heed these letters, for I write them only in design to get my liberty, and to enjoy your sweet company again. God let me never see the face of God Almighty, if there was any other design in it. You may believe me a poor miserable soul. I hope you will take all this to consideration, for if I had but only your favour, I did not care for any thing; but if not, pray put an end to my days. I wish that I may never see the kingdom of God and Christ, if ever I was married to any woman but yourself. Indeed I should not take such an oath as this, if I found myself guilty, and knowing not how long I have to live. O my dear soul, you will believe any body before me; I have seen the day, you would not believe any before me; but now it seems the case is altered. I will take the Sacrament to-morrow, and take it on my death if I were going to die, that those letters were write upon no other design; O I wish that I may never see the face of my Saviour, if ever I was married to any other woman but yourself. Surely you may believe me in this sad condition, and know not how long I have to live. If you will but only to do me the charity as to come and speak to me, I will give you full satisfaction why I write to Absly: if you remember, I told you somewhat of that woman before I left Belturbit. O my dear heart; will you not do me the charity as to give me a meeting that I may satisfy you? O! will you, my dear, leave me comfortless in this sad condition? God knows, I lie weeping and writing. I thought I was well enough so long as I had you on my sid; but now it seems all comfort is fled from me; O will not death make an end of this misery! if not, I will if I can conveniently. If you give me any comfort, I will endeavour to clear myself, and take a good heart still: but if not, I wish they would put me out of this misery: for I am sure I shall die with a clear conscience. If you forsake me, I have none to take my part; but if not, I hope you and I shall have joyful days for all this. So hoping you will pity my condition, I rest, dear soul, your loving husband till death,

ROBERT YOUNG.

I hope you will send me an answer by the bearer, what you are resolved to do. If you will pay for my diet unknown to any, my landlady will say that she took my word.

Another LETTER to her from Iniskillin, after he was got out of Cavan Gaol.

My dear Heart ;

I am safely arrived at Iniskillin, and am well at present, and cares not for all your barking dogs at Belturbit and Cavan both. Let them do what they can, I care no more for them than I care for the silliest dog in the street. But as to that, I will leave it off at present. I hope you are mindful of your promise to me in Harris's garden, made to me there. Here I have sent the bearer purposely for you, and I gave him 6s. for going for you. Dear heart, do not fail but come along with him to me, for my life lies where you do : if I had your company, I did not care for all the world. Dear heart, I say again, come to me, for I will assure you have as many tears from my eyes, as there are letters in this letter, from your poor husband. Therefore, dear heart, if ever you intend to see me alive, come to me now ; if you do not, I will make this town my burial-place. I hope you will take nobody's counsel in this case but your own. If your friends will not let you come to me, pray (if you have any love for me) steal away to come to me. Send all your linnen and cloaths of woollen, and my cloaths also out before you, and seal all that you cannot bring along with you ; and be sure not to pay a farthing to any body, but keep it yourself ; take my counsel, I desire you. Dear heart, you and the bearer may contrive the business I suppose, and be sure bring the bond or money along with you, for you know I have but little money when I pay the bearer. I could a had a place, but only it is too nigh your bishop, that dog. Do not fear, for I will soon get a place if I would look for it. So, hoping you will come to your poor husband, I rest, dear heart, your loving husband, till death do us part,

ROBERT YOUNG.

Pray do not trust any thing with the bearer, but come yourself. Dear heart, be sure to bring the bond along with you, if you love me ; and all the papers that you find in my box. I hope you will not fail to perform all that I have spoken.

All these letters of Robert Young's I have set down, just as I found them under his own hand, in his own way of spelling, as I shall do the rest of his which are to follow ; and perhaps some reader or other, who is more acute in such matters than I am, will shrewdly guess thereby, and by divers unusual words and expressions, and his manner of syntax, what countryman he is.

That which next follows, is another of his disingenuous shifts (as he modestly calls them) performed also in Ireland, I mean, his profane invasions of holy orders ; that of deacon, by deluding the lord bishop of Killaloo with forged certificates ; that of presbyter, by his own sacrilegious self-ordination.

To prove this, I shall produce also the undoubted evidence of original writings ; wherein, as in those foregoing, and indeed in most of the other papers I have by me concerning him, it may easily be observed, that, besides the main crime they chiefly intend to prove, there is also, here and there, a casual mention made of divers other steps towards his present pitch of perfection.

And particularly, in this whole cheat relating to his orders, it may be observed, that he had always ready divers sets of testimonials, letters dimissory, and letters of orders fitted to his several names, and pretended to be from several bishops ; but let the papers speak for themselves.

A LETTER from one Dr. Nicholson, of Castle-Reah, to the Lord Bishop of Kilmore, concerning Robert Young's forging Certificates.

Castle-Reah, in the County of Ros-
My Lord ; common, Dec. 22, 1680.

I received a letter from your lordship concerning Mr. Young ; I am glad he is secured. Upon better recollection of his doings, I remember exactly, that he produced letters of priests orders here, not from your lordship, as I at first supposed, but from the bishop of Killaloo, and that by the pretended recommendation of the archbishop of Cashell ; under whose hand he shewed a letter here, directed as to the bishop of Killaloo and another from the bishop of Killaloo in answer to that, and to acquaint the archbishop, that he had ordained Mr. Young ; several others here saw his letters. I hope his forgery and sacrilegious invasion of the priesthood will receive due punishment, for the necessary discouragement of others of the like impudence. I am your lordship's, &c. EDWARD NICHOLSON.

A LETTER from the same Dr. Nicholson, to the Lord Bishop of Elphin, concerning Robert Young's heinous Miscarriages.

My lord ; Castle Reah, Oct. 11, 1680.

I do verily believe, that Mr. Young was never ordained by your lordship, nor any else : he produced parchments in this diocese from the bishop of Kilmore, as ordained presbyter by him, and that by mediation of a letter from the archbishop of Cashel, which he shewed me here, and I suspected it counterfeit ; as also I did his letter of orders ; for which suspicious, if I had had as great evidences then as I have had since, I should have seized his papers ; but being then glad to be rid of him, I dispatched him, without giving him the interruption to meddle with his papers. As to the character of him, I am sure he was a most unconscionable ignorant villain ; he got a bastard here by a kitchen-maid, at the inn he first lodged at ; which he owned himself to me ; and, being needy, I bestowed on him 40s. more than I owed him, to carry him away : yet, when he went to Dublin, he counterfeited letters, under my hand, to my brother, a merchant there, to get 50s. worth of goods ; and did also the same for Mr. Dalton, to his son-in-law in Dublin. Both the letters were returned to us by the post, and we never heard from him since; but we hear he had a wife living, and another before her, and was seeking for a third very busily. We have heard so much of him since, that we all think it a great pity he was not rather hanged, than employed to serve at the altar: I am certain, if any conscientious person that could apprehend him, would make it his design to rid the church of such a scandal, he would sufficiently appear to have deserved that, if not to be quite packed out of the world. And I assure your lordship, it is no grudge at his person, but perfect charity and zeal for the church, which forces me to give this testimony of him, in obedience to your lordship's commands, which require my character of him; and if your lordship could be a means of preventing him from further proceeding in the profanation of holy things and offices, it would, no doubt, be acceptable service to God and his church; which is only submitted to your lordship's wisdom, by your lordship's, &c.

EDW. NICHOLSON.

A LETTER from one Mr. Fletcher, to the Lord Bishop of Kilmore, to the same purpose.

My Lord; James Town, Oct. 19, 1680.

I suppose, my lord of Elphin will be particular with your lordship in the matter of Mr. Young; Mr. Cooke, who was surrogate of Elphin diocese, tells me, he had never letters of orders from that bishop. It is certain, he fled from his cure at Castle Reah, having got a wench with child; and fame says, he has two wives besides the last. I am your lordship's, &c.

BEN. FLETCHER.

A LETTER from the Lord Bishop of Waterford, to the Lord Bishop of Kilmore, concerning Robert Young.

My Lord; Waterford, Feb. 5, 1680.

I should have sent your lordship an earlier account of your last to me concerning Young, but I did desire to inform myself the best I could, for your better satisfaction, of his having a wife in these parts, and being chaplain to the earl of Barrimore, and tutor to his son. As to the former, you will receive here inclosed a certificate from the high sheriff of the county, and several of the best of the inhabitants of Tallogh to which I refer you; and, as to the latter, I have spoken with some persons of quality from those parts, who tell me plainly, that Young was never chaplain to the earl of Barrimore, nor went tutor to his son to Oxford; for his son was never there; but, for farther satisfaction, I have employed a friend to the earl of Barrimore himself for his certificate, which every day I now expect. This Young's rogueries and forgeries must needs redound to the great discredit of the church; and I think your lordship has done very well, in taking up his pretended letters of ordination. I humbly entreat you farther, that you would be pleased to take up that forged testimonial, he shewed you in my name, and to send it to me, who am your lordship's, &c.

H. WATERFORD and LISMORE.

Robert Young's COUNTERFEIT LETTER, from the Lord Bishop of Waterford, to himself; together with his Forged Testimonials from the same Bishop.

Sir; Waterford, March 30, 1680.

According to your expectation I have sent you the inclosed, and truly am sorry you left my diocese; but, however, I will be kind to you, if any thing offers itself worthy your acceptance. So, concluding with my blessing to you, I rest, your, &c.

H. WATERFORD and LISMORE.

(L. S.) 'These are to certify, that Mr. Robert Young, cler', and master of arts (whose testimonials from the University of Oxford, in Magdalen college, I have often perused) is a man whom I have known from a child; and knows him to be of a sober and religious, yea, a singular life and conversation; who behaved himself in my diocese, as becometh a labourer in God's vineyard. And, as concerning whose parts, I myself has often sounded them, and knows him to be a singular scholar; yea, I may say, as well qualified for the function as any within my episcopal see, which is not all I have to speak in his commendation. All this I do certify, as witness my hand and seal, this 30th day of March, Ann. Dom. 1680.

'H. WATERFORD and LISMORE.'

A LETTER from the Lord Bishop of Waterford, to the Lord Bishop of Kilmore, and another from the Earl of Barrimore, touching Robert Young's never having been the Earl's Chaplain, or Tutor to his Son, as he pretended.

My Lord; Waterford, Feb. 18, 1680.

I acquainted your lordship in my last, that I daily expected an account from the earl of Barrimore, concerning Young's pretended chaplainship to his lordship; I do now send your lordship here inclosed an account thereof from the earl; and do earnestly intreat that your lordship will be pleased to take up that forged certificate Young shewed you in my name, and to send it to me. Our post will not give me leave to write any more, but that I am your lordship's, &c. H. WATERFORD and LISMORE.

My Lord; Castletyons, Feb. 11, 1680.

I received a letter from Mr. Dalton, wherein he gives me an account of one Young, who has impudently and falsly called himself my chaplain, and my son Butterant's tutor. I never saw him but once that he brought me a letter from the now high-sheriff of your county, to recommend him to colonel Wittenham (late deceased) at Castletown: if he had been never so much my chaplain, if he failed in the least part of that duty he owes your lordship, he should not have been owned by, my very good lord, your lordship's, &c. BARRIMORE.

To the Lord Bishop of Waterford.

A LETTER from the Bishop of Waterford to the Bishop of Kilmore, touching Robert Young.

My Lord; Waterford, Oct. 11, 1680.

I heartily thank your lordship for communicating to me the inclosed silly forged certificate, concerning Mr. Robert Young therein mentioned. This Young I never knew till about three years since, when he came to the archbishop of Cashell, with a letter of high recommendation from Dr. Smith to be ordained deacon. The archbishop being somewhat indisposed, and not suspecting the letter, writes to me that I would do that office, and inclosed Dr. Smith's letter to him therein. I knew the archbishop's hand, and his secretary's hand that transcribed the letter: but Young, it seems, not contented therewith, breaks open the letter by the way, and adds a silly postscript (as near as I can remember) in these words: 'More-over, dear brother, fail not to do this office for Mr. Young, for he is a good scholar, and moreover a very good preacher.' This postscript gave me some suspicion: I charged him with it, but he stood stiffly to it a great while, that the postscript was the archbishop's as well as the letter; but, at length, confessed he had broke open the letter by the way, and added the postscript himself. Then I began to examine Dr. Smith's letter, and went into my study to compare it with some I had of Dr. Smith's, which I found to be nothing like, and charged him with that too; and, after a little while, he confessed he had bribed a kinsman of Dr. Smith's to forge the letter to the archbishop; whereupon I gave him a reproof, and dismissed him from me, re infecta. The next news that I heard of him, was, that he had forged a letter from the archbishop of Cashell to the bishop of Killaloe, to be ordained deacon, and thereupon he was ordained. But how he came to be ordained priest by the bishop of Elphin, I cannot give your lordship any good account; yet this I have heard, that, whilst he was labouring his ordination there, in few days, he was to have married some poor woman in those parts, had not some person of the neighbourhood where he lived here in Munster, being casually there, discovered that he had a wife and children then living here in these parts: an account whereof, if occasion be, may easily be had. And now, my lord, I have an humble and earnest request, that your lordship would not return this forged testimonial to Young, but either destroy it yourself, or send it by the next, to your lordship's, &c.

H. WATERFORD and LISMORE.

If Young be not free to part with his testimonials and letters of orders too, (if your lordship think good) I pray let him be secured, and in short time there will be enough to be said against him.

A POSTSCRIPT of a LETTER, together with a LETTER to the Lord Bishop of Kilmore, both from the Lord Bishop of Elphin, concerning Robert Young: having counterfeited Priest's Orders from his Lordship.

Elphin, Oct. 4, 1680.

The inclosed gives your lordship an account of Mr. Robert Young, who was in an ill name before he left us; and since it appeareth that he is ἀνὴρ ἄνομος, fills his own hand, the church cannot do herself greater right, than to cast such unsavoury salt to the dunghill.

My Lord;

Mr. Young, alias Hopkins, coming into these parts, and producing letters of orders from Dr. Roan, bishop of Killaloe, was by me admitted in writing under my own hand and seal, to serve a cure in this diocese; that wretched and unworthy man was not by me ordained deacon or presbyter: I had much rather have laid my hands on briars than on such heads. The inclosed has been viewed by such as know his hand, and compared; all conclude it a forgery, the instrument formed by himself, the register's hand counterfeited. How he should get my seal, I am not able to say, unless it was taken off the licence I granted him; and of that there are strong presumptions. I shall acquaint those that knew him there, that he is now in safe custody; and if he should escape without some brand, his scandalous crimes being divulged and spread abroad, it would tend to the great dishonour of God, and to the great discredit of our whole profession. I shall not give your lordship farther trouble, but shall beseech God to direct you herein; and likewise shall watch all opportunities to serve you, and approve myself, your lordship's, &c.

I think my Reader will say, I have given a sufficient heap of evidence concerning Robert Young's life and conversation in Ireland. And to prove that all these allegations against him are undeniable, (for I would not willingly bely Robert Young himself) I will briefly shew by what certain means I came by my intelligence.

Having, among other papers sent me by archbishop Sancroft, found the aforementioned letter of Dr. Foley's, inclosing one from the lord archbishop of Dublin, I sent a copy of it to that excellent person, my dear and honoured friend, sir Charles Porter, lord chancellor of that kingdom; withal, intreating his lordship to enquire a little farther into Young's character there. Whereupon my lord chancellor took such care, that in a short time I had the originals of all these papers transmitted to me by the favour of the lord archbishop of Dublin; together with a letter from his grace to myself, justifying them all to be authentic, as may be seen in their lordships' own letters, which I here subjoin, as a testimony of the great obligations they have hereby laid on me, and right they have done the world, in respect to Robert Young.

Three LETTERS from my Lord Chancellor
Porter, to me.

My good Lord; Dublin, July 28, 1692.

So soon as I received your lordship's of the 14th, with the inclosed from Dr. Foley to archbishop Sancroft, and found my lord archbishop of Dublin was most likely to give me an account of the person you desired from Dr. Foley: I went to him, and told him what reason I had to enquire after one Robert Young; and desired he would give me some directions, how I might certainly know his character. I did not shew him Dr. Foley's letter; but he remembered him and his rogueries so perfectly, that he gave me the same with what is in the letter; and withal said, he did believe he could recover some papers which would give me a full account of all that passed: and, within a day or two after, he came to dine with me, and brought them with him; which I now have in my custody, and have perused. They are such as shew by his own confession, as well as proof, that he had two wives at the same time in this kingdom, for which he was in gaol; and I find by some of his letters, that he writes to his first wife (wherein he owns his second marriage) he desires her to save his life, by swearing he was never married to her; and promises, if she will do it, that he may gain his liberty, he will immediately go into England with her, and never more see his second wife, who was the daughter of one Simon Hutt in Cavan. It appears by these papers, that he counterfeited the hands and seals of the bishops of Elphin and Waterford to letters of his admission into priests' orders, and the hands of Dr. Wilson, (now bishop of Limerick) and Dr. Nicholson, and the archbishop of Cashell, all certifying in his behalf, as to his morals and learning. In a word, I never met with so infamous a villain. He was degraded by the archbishop of Dublin, when bishop of Kilmore. I know not how he got out of gaol, where he was committed for having two wives, the truth whereof appears by several letters under his own hand. But I will inform myself, and then give your lordship an account. I know not whether you would have the originals of all the papers or copies relating to this rogue; when I know your mind, I will take the best care I can to observe it. I am your lordship's, &c.

CHARLES PORTER.

He has counterfeited other men's hands in bills, and got the money thereupon; one of which I find among the papers.

To the Lord Bishop of Rochester.

My Lord; Dublin, Aug. 17, 1692.

I have yours of the 9th instant, and, having shewed it to my lord archbishop of Dublin, he has freely consented I shall transmit you the original papers, which, as soon as I can light of a safe hand to bring them to your lordship, shall be done, they being now with public notary for authentic copies to be kept here. My lord archbishop has also writ your lordship a letter relating to the man, and the matters of those papers, which he sent me just now. I will not be wanting in giving it all possible dispatch, that your lordship may have opportunity to publish what you intend. I am, my lord, your lordship's, &c.

CHARLES PORTER.

To the Lord Bishop of Rochester.

My Lord; Dublin, Aug. 26, 1692.

I have now sent you the original papers about Young: Mr. Roberts has promised me to deliver them to your own hands; he goes from this place to-morrow. I have sent also my lord archbishop's letter to your lordship (of which I formerly sent you a copy) in the same box; and have caused a public notary to make copies of all those relating to Young, which I keep by me, as I must also desire your lordship to do the originals; for I have undertaken you will do so: and you will find by what his grace writes, that he desires the same. I am, your lordship's, &c.

CHARLES PORTER.

A LETTER from my Lord Archbishop of Dublin to me.

My Lord; Dublin, Aug. 17, 1692.

By permission of my lord chancellor, I had the view of your lordship's letter to him concerning Mr. R. Young, whom I found employed as a curate in the diocese of Kilmore, when I served there. He was delated to me for many extravagancies, the least of which was marrying without banns or license. Though after his avoidance, by running out of my diocese, upon his apprehension in the diocese of Raphoe, whither he had betaken himself, and was sent back to Cavan gaol by warrant of the justices, procured by Simeon Hutt, whose daughter he had married, and her father had discovered to be married to another woman then living; I took the advantage of using all the force of the canon in that case, and degraded him, being then apprehensive of the danger of his hanging in his gown. For this crime he was indicted, but both the women could not be brought together; and if they had, the then riding judge (which as I remember was Mr. Herbert) declared the fact within benefit of the clergy: he was not sentenced, but left still in Cavan gaol for fees and debts contracted there; where Simeon Hutt, an inn-keeper and inhabitant there, by his interest and proper concern, found means of intercepting and getting into his own hands some of the letters of his own hand-writing, and brought them to me. The other, which are written to me, are all realities, and his pretended orders I received of himself before he run away. But, my lord, as I was saying, he was left in gaol, and not knowing how to get out, he used means of applying to my lord duke of Ormond, then lord lieutenant, pretending he could make notable discoveries of dangerous plots against the government. The Popish Plot was then on foot, and his grace, as imported, very tender and cautious of discountenancing his offered service, gave him his liberty, and ordered him to come up to Dublin, and make out what he could. The Scotchman had his end, never appeared, but run away into England with his second wife, and I never heard of him till this overture with your lordship. I indeed did write to Dr. Foley, then in England, to make some enquiry after him, and to give notice of him, that there was such a privateer abroad, and to obviate, as much as I could, the evil practices of so vile a man, and the dishonour of the church he pretended to. It is certain he stole into deacons orders unobserved; he forged his priests orders, and was self-ordained. He was extremely vicious, and had ignorance and impudence enough to offer at any thing. Much of his story (it is so long since 1680), is out of my head, and I wonder how these papers, now sent to your lordship, escaped the general plunder I underwent, when all my books and papers were utterly lost for ever. I cannot otherwise account for their preservation, than that they were all tied together, and thrown into a box of loose and useless letters, which they who took the rest of my goods neglected, because they had store of better things: and consequently were preserved by a servant of mine; and by a very casual view, since my return out of England, after the late general dispersion, came into my hands as I left them, utterly beyond any purpose or design of mine. However, it fell out happily enough, if your lordship can make any use of them, for the vindication of any honest and innocent person, or the detection of a notorious villain. I beg your lordship would let me know, by some means or other, that you received them, and that you will preserve them; for if they be any way available to your lordship, they may be so (though that be, as this was, more than I can possibly fore-think) to somebody else. I am, my lord, your lordship's, &c.

FRANCIS DUBLIN.

To the Lord Bishop of Rochester.

I have now brought the true Robert Young and his false wife safe into England, though I confess, I had rather any man in England had done it than myself. But now they are here, I will proceed with them in the very same plain and just method as I did before in relating their actions in Ireland; I will trace out their crooked paths as near as I can, step by step, and follow them close at their backs, with an honest hue and cry of original papers, describing them and their crimes.

I have already declared, that after their arrival in England, about the year 1683, upon Robert Young's unlucky repulse at Lambeth, one of the most memorable enterprizes in which he and his woman displayed their art, was the taking upon them the names, first of Green, then of Jones, then of Smith, (all counterfeits of clergymen in distress) and then authorizing the whole cheat by forged recommendations of archbishop Sancroft's: beginning thus to practise on other men's purses by forging his grace's hand, that, when they were more perfect in it, they might attempt with it to strike at his life.

I begin, first, with their cheating dealings under the name of Green, which was the first considerable figure I know of, that they made of themselves in England.

By this having deluded vast numbers of good people in several dioceses, especially that of Norwich, (whereof I have by me a large list of the parochial collections) they came at last, as I have said, to be detected and punished for it at Bury.

Now to clear up this part of their history which concluded there, it will be very material that I should recount distinctly the occasion and manner of their being apprehended, and some of Robert's most notorious enormities even whilst he was imprisoned in that gaol, which was for the space of a year.

When Robert and Mary brought the recommendation falsified under the hands of the lord archbishop of Canterbury, and the lord bishop of London, to Mr. Cleggat, minister of that town; and boldly required him to ask the charity of the inhabitants thereupon; both Mr. Cleggat, and Mr. Samuel Batteley, a very worthy person dwelling there, (whose brother was then the archbishop's chaplain) soon discerned the knavery, and immediately repaired to the magistrates for a warrant to seize them.

In the mean time Robert Young, alias Youngs, alias Hutt, alias Green, suspecting he was discovered, went directly to his inn, and, with his sister and wife, Mrs. Mary Green, alias Young, &c. presently took horse, and rode as fast as they could out of town, in hopes to have escaped.

Mr. Batteley, believing they would do so, left the constable to bring the warrant, and ran straight towards the inn to look after them; when he soon perceived them on horseback, making all possible speed away. But, by good luck, their horse being weak and poor, he overtook them, laid hold on the bridle and led them back. Whereupon they were committed, tried, and, upon their own confession, condemned and pilloried; as by the record paper will appear, when it shall be produced.

After this Robert ———, what shall I call him? remained in Bury gaol divers months, for not paying his fees, till the summer of 1685. That being the first year of king James's reign, and about the time of the duke of Monmouth's invasion, he thought it a proper season for him to declare (as he had done before in Ireland, upon the like exigency of his affairs) that he could make out a certain discovery of seditious and treasonable practices, wherein divers considerable persons thereabouts were engaged.

To this purpose he not only actually swore treason against one John Pannell (to whom he owed a spite, who was then a fellow-prisoner with him for debt, and is now an officer in the said borough) but also sent up a petition, which he called, a Full Discovery of Treason by Robert Youngs, clerk, to be delivered to the king and parliament then sitting; wherein he offered to prove (if he might have his freedom, and be brought up to London) that divers wicked traitors in that country, particularly ten Presbyterian ministers, one lord, two esquires, a colonel, a captain and a cornet, and a gentleman, had been long plotting and contriving the death of the king, and the subversion of the government.

But, of his whole behaviour at Bury, the following papers, being of undoubted authority, are an abundant proof. It will be enough for me to name them as they pass along by me.

Only here I intreat my reader once for all to observe what is most for my purpose, that such has been the constant method of his life, both before and since, as far as I have been able to obtain any knowledge of it: whenever he was out of prison, he has forged hands to bills, and recommendations to get money: and, when he happened to be imprisoned for those forgeries, then he has fallen to counterfeit mighty discoveries of plots against the state, to gain his liberty.

First, then, here are the several Confessions of Robert Young and Mary Hutt themselves, before the justices of peace at Bury, in 1684.

N^o I.

Borough of Bury St. Edmonds,

The INFORMATION of Mary Green, alias Hutt, alias Pierson, alias Young; taken by Martin Spensley, esq. Mayor of the said Borough; Thomas Holland, esq. John Sotheby, esq. and Robert Sharp, gent. Justices of the Peace for the said Borough the 15th day of Sept. 1684.

The said informant saith, that the paper and seal thereunto annexed, pretended to be a certificate from the bishop of Elphin in Ireland, was counterfeited in Ireland, and brought over from thence by her in April or May last; and that she neither hath, or ever had, any husband called by the name of Robert Green; but that all in the same certificate mentioned concerning him is counterfeit; and that the person, who is now in her company, came with her out of Ireland, and that he is her brother, and his name is Robert Hutt; and that they came together to London, where, in the square at Essex-stairs, she met with one whose name she doth not now remember, that writ the petition, which she carried to Windsor, and with her own hands presented it to the king, who delivered it back to one Mr. Bolstred, without any further answer to it. Whereupon she repaired to the archbishop of Canterbury and shewed him her counterfeit certificate from the bishop of Elphin; and he, having viewed it, recommended it to sir John Nicholas, to whom she repaired accordingly, and shewed him the petition which she had delivered to his majesty, and left it with him; and afterwards (as he told this informant) he carried the same to his majesty at Hampton-court; and that, it being read, because it concerned Ireland, the king recommended it to the duke of Ormond, and afterwards this informant had the answer to it from him, mentioned in the paper to which sir John Nicholas's name is subscribed. And further saith, that the paper, to which the archbishop of Canterbury and bishop of London's hands and seals are set, is also counterfeit, and was written by another person, whose name she remembereth not; and that the same person did set the archbishop and bishop of London's hands and seals to it: and saith, that by virtue of the said paper and seals she and her brother have gathered a great deal of money, and thereby abused many of the king's subjects.

MARY HUTT.

The INFORMATION of the said Robert Hutt, taken before us the day and year aforesaid.

Who saith, that the said Mary Hutt (who goes by the names aforesaid) is his sister; and that he never knew any person by the name of Green or Young, that was her husband; but says, that he living in or about Cork in Ireland, and she in Connaught, above an hundred miles distant, in March last she came to this informant's house, and told him, that she had been married to one Green, a clergyman, and that he, going to sea, was taken by the Turks, and she was going to London to petition his majesty for money for his release; and that she had a certificate from the bishop of the diocese of the truth thereof, and thereupon desired this informant to go along with her, and pressed him so hard therein, that at last he left his own occasions with a friend, and went with her to London, by the name of Green, and knew no other name she had; and at London carried her to one William Young's a drummer, living in Petty-France, beyond Westminster, near the sign of Whitehall, where they stayed all the time they were about London; and during that time she went to Windsor, to petition his majesty; and finding no satisfaction there she applied herself to the archbishop of Canterbury, and bishop of London, sir John Nicholas and others, as in her said information is set down. But saith, that he knew nothing how she came by the said certificates and papers, or who drew her petitions, he knows not. But saith, that upon and with them he hath gone about the country with her, and hath collected several sums of money in several countries in the papers thereof mentioned, he not knowing but all her papers and certificates were true.

Martin Spensley, Mayor. ROBERT HUTT.

The further INFORMATION and EXAMINATION of the said Robert Hutt, taken the day and year aforesaid.

The said examinant saith, that his name is Robert Young, not Hutt, and that the said Mary is his wife; and that they came out of Ireland at the same time afore-mentioned; and that he is in priests orders according to the church of England, and received the same from Dr. Roan, bishop of Killaloo in Ireland, and had a cure of eighteen pounds per annum at Calthorn there, and that he hath preached in St. Margaret's church in Westminster; and confesseth, that all the papers and certificates aforesaid are counterfeited, and were made by one Wright,* a scrivener, in Oxford; and he set the hands and seals to them, except that from the bishop of Elphin in Ireland, which is signed by Thomas Bannester, and was made by him; and he obtained the bishop's seal to it, for which he had ten shillings. And further, that about two years since, he was in England, and applied himself to the archbishop of Canterbury for some preferment, and dined with him; but finding none, he returned into Ireland; and being destitute of friends, he applied himself to this ill course, presuming thereby to obtain charity from the people. And further saith, That the said Wright set sir John Nicholas's hand, in answer to the petition to the king; and for that, and for setting the hands of the archbishop of Canterbury, and bishop of London, he had a guinea.

* I am certainly informed, that there never was one Wright, scrivener, in Oxford; so that he has abused the name of Wright, as he has done that of Green, Jones, Smith, and divers others.

Secondly, here are copies of Mary Hutt's petition to king Charles the Second, under the feigned name of Mary Green; and of the forged reference and recommendations upon it.

N^o. II.

To the King's most excellent Majesty, and the Right Hon. Lords of his Majesty's most honourable Privy-Council: The humble PETITION of Mary Green, Wife of Robert Green, of the kingdom of Ireland;

Most humbly sheweth; That your petitioner's said husband being minded to take a voyage into the West-Indies upon some extraordinary occasions, it was his hard fortune to be taken by a Sallee man of war, about six months since, as may appear by a certificate under the hand and seal of the right reverend father in God, the lord bishop of Elphin in the kingdom of Ireland; and that he still remains under the extreme burthen of slavery in Sallee, his ransom being set at a thousand dollars; which your petitioner, in regard of her great poverty, is no ways able to raise; she having two small children, being with child of a third, hath not wherewith to provide for herself and them, but is like to perish for want of relief.

Your petitioner therefore most humbly prays, That your majesty will be graciously pleased to recommend your petitioner's and her husband's distressed condition to the consideration of the clergy of England; and, in his behalf, to request them to contribute their charity towards her husband's ransom, and your petitioner's present relief. And your petitioner shall ever pray, &c.

Read in Council, June 18, 1684.

The petitioner is referred to his grace the archbishop of Canterbury, and bishop of London, to do therein as to them shall seem meet and convenient, for the redemption of this said Robert Green, clerk. JOHN NICHOLAS.

We recommend the petitioner to the clergy of (provided this our order continue no longer than three months) England, intreating them freely to contribute their charity toward the ransom of the said Robert Green. Moreover (on his majesty's command to us) we require, and earnestly desire the respective ministers of all cities, towns, &c. to go from house to house, to receive the charitable benevolence of well-disposed christians, whom we hope will likewise contribute to the enlargement of a poor distressed clergyman. Given under our hand and seal, at Lambeth-house, June 16, 1684.

Robert Young's PETITION to the Magistrates at Bury, acknowledging his Crime.

To the worshipful Mayor, and the rest of the Justices for the Borough of St. Edmunds. The humble PETITION of Robert Youngs, Clerk.

Sheweth; That the petitioner being not only sensible, as it is apparent, of his bidding adieu to all truth and honesty, and measuring the same by his own humoursofne fancy, making every thing ridiculous, that was not suitable to his own ignorant conceptions; but penitent likewise, thinking himself bound for the future to take a notice, that honesty is the best policy.

Forasmuch therefore, as your poor suppliant being a stranger, and such to most in this kingdom, and having lessee or no friends or acquaintance, humbly beseecheth,

That your worshipes will be graciously pleased to accept of such baile, as your poor suppliant can conveniently produce, whereby he may not in a gaol be compelled to end his days, but have his liberty to compose those differences now depending. The Lord create in your worship's bowells of compassion towards him, who prays for Your, &c.

Next, here is Robert Young's first letter to the archbishop of Canterbury, 1684, confessing his crime of forgery; but, in all else, giving a very lying account of himself. A letter very singular for the elegance of its stile; and recommended to the reading of all who call themselves Presbyterians.

N^o IV.

Bury, Sept. 30, 1684.

May it please your Grace; This rude and imperfect supplication, being now to pass into your grace's hands, shal I be so bold as to begg your grace to peruse it: in prosecution whereof, I do conceive my birth and education, wil in your grace create a better understanding of me, my life and conversation, than that which the envious man really represents it to be: for envy is ever working upon some or other: for which cause, it is the proper attribute of the devill, who is called the envious man, that soweth tares amongst the wheat by night. But to return, your poor suppliant is (by birth) an Englishman, born of an honest stock at Chester, a town of marchandize on the sea-coast of England, whose grandfather was sir Peter Young's son, and grandmother the duke of Lenox's daughter; the truth whereof, if questioned, may sufficiently, by a gentleman in London, be proved: knowing some persons to delight in giddiness, and accounts it a bondage to fix a belief, affecting freewill in thinking, as well as in doing. Your poor suppliant likewise (after some knowledge in schoole learning) was removed to Trinity colledge near Dublin; where, in good litterature, he for the space of seven years remained: and from thence, by the instigation of Dr. Smith, dean of Limerick, was employed as a reader; which duty by me was faithfully performed for the space of two years, being then only a deacon. From thence, by the death of the said Dr. Smith, removed I was to serve Dr. John Wilson's cure, sometime fellow of St. Magdalene college in Oxford, who, as chaplain to his grace my lord duke of Ormond, came for Ireland, on which provision (though inconsiderable) admitted I was into full orders, by the late bishop of Clogher, who was a man of that divine nature, that all that knew him had a loss of him: the very memory of whom may justly draw a fountain of water from mine eyes; his favour to me ward cannot easily be forgotten. Thus, in short, your grace has a description of my birth, education, life, and conversation; which leads me to expostulate my present sufferings: I am, and ever was, a faithfull son of the church of England. All discentors were ever odious in mine eyes, specially that damnable faction of Presbytery. If I could, as well as others, have winked at their irregular undertakings, poverty and bondage would not now have dominion over me. But my method was to reduce such factious persons to a regular understanding, and observe wherein, and how far, they have degenerated; although others gleanings, I confess, are better than my vintage, as I am the least of the tribe: yet, I cannot sit still, but, if occasion offered itself, would once more adventure to cast in my mite against such hæresy, as those gifted persons pretended to. But, knowing to whom I speak, I must not hold your grace too long to peruse this ignorant discourse, least I give offence. Lastly, to make an ingenious confession, your poor suppliant in the aforesaid cure, though insufficient if narrowly considered to maintain a family, continued without scandal and corruption, for the space of four years; but by the insufficiency thereof, being but 18*l*. per annum, was forced to borrow money, which sum, at the day prefixed, I could not disburss; whereupon they issued out writs against me: but I considering fortune to be like the market, where, if a man stay a little, the price will fall. Thus I thought it better to meet some danger half way, than to keep too long a watch upon my enemies approach: for, if a man watch too long, as my case stood, though he commit the beginnings thereof to Argos, with his hundred eyes; and the ends to Briareus, with his hundred hands, it is odds he will fall asleep; so that I thought it my best way, for a time, to remove myself and family, to prevent future inconveniences. Whereupon I, with a discontented heart, came for England, and if your grace call to mind, made to you my application; willing was I to take up with the least provision: but no vacancy in your grace's diocess, was the answer; and withal told me, that my lord of London possibly might answer my request. Whereupon I strait way attended my lord of London, but no satisfactory answer could I find there. On which, what to do I knew not; but the second time waited on your grace, and gave up my lord of London's answer and withal told your grace, that willing I was to go for the West-Indias. Your grace's answer was, that provisions there lay in my lord of London, but being destitute of money and friends, disinabled I was to get thither, unless I had sold myself for a bond-slave, which I was not willing to do. So that for Ireland I again repaired; but no sooner was I well there settled, in a cure far remote from the other, but news my creditors had; for which, without my salary, glad was I to flee again in a distracted condition; and came, accompanied with my wife, to Oxford; where friendship I did endeavour to create, but all in vain. From thence went I towards Bristol, thinking to have made my address to the bishop of that diocese, but supplanted I was by his death. So that myself I applied to the body of the clergy, but meet not with a satisfactory answer. My second application was to desire them to disburse money for our freight; but meeting not with my desired success, I came away, not knowing which way to turn myself: to go and steal, I would be hanged; to take by violence a purse, I would be in the same condition: to work, I knew not which way; to beg of the clergy (so many cheats going about) I knew, being a stranger, they would, though undeserved then, pass on me the same sentence. Thus friendless and moneyless, we came to Oxford, in a sad condition, and accidentally meet with one Wright by surname; who after some days acquaintance, put me upon this hellish stratagem upon your grace, which forgery he committed, although I am not thereby excused. Truly a terrour to my conscience was it every hower, knowing such clandestine actions to be both against the laws of God and man. O fie! that ever it should be said that a clergyman have committed such dirty actions. O! that my eyes were a fountain of water, to weep for remission, for pardon, for satisfaction, both to God and man. For sure I am the unjust shall be punished in the next world, if not in this. I acknowledge my crime to be great, the Lord give a right understanding of my error; wherein I have offended both God and man: and what shall I do, or what shall I say to mitigate this crime? 'Tis true, I am heartily sorry, which perhaps, in your grace, may create mercy; but not pardon from my God, without a loathing and hearty detestation of such unlawful ways of gain, and an absolution from a bishop. Truly my intention, after the receipt of 20*l.* was for the West-Indies; no more did I desire than what would carry my family thither: but disappointed I was by the just judgement of the Almighty; all we received was spent to recover my wife's health; seven weeks did she lye sick, which the justices here are not ignorant of; and what little stock we had was exhausted, so that we have neither friends nor money. Your poor suppliant therefore, in most humble manner, beseecheth, That your grace will be graciously pleased, to regulate the hearts and minds of these justices who have committed my poor sickly wife, as well as myself; and, by your grace's letter, to animate their hearts to charity, the sessions being Monday next. 'Tis true, I have in a most gross manner incurred your grace's displeasure, and does not deserve the least favour, especially at your grace's hands; for which, from the bottom of my heart, I humbly beg your grace's pardon, beseeching your grace in justice to remember mercy; and though your grace may cast a severe eye upon the example, yet I humbly beseech your grace, to cast a merciful eye upon the person, to whom this shall for ever be a warning-piece, and subscribes himself, your grace's most penitent and obedient servant,

ROBERT YOUNG.

My Reader finds, that this first letter of Robert Young's to archbishop Sancroft, which seems full of remorse and solemn detestation of his former wickedness, in forging his grace's name, was dated in prison at Bury, Sept. 30, 1684; but, to shew what kind of penitent he was, I will here subjoin the informations of divers persons at Bury in 1685, touching Robert Young's threatenings against the archbishop of Canterbury's life, not long after he had written this first letter.

N^o V.

Bury St. Edmund's, Mar. 27, 1685.

Memorandum, that we whose names are underwritten, being in company with Robert Young, (who was laid in Bury gaol for counterfeiting his grace the archbishop of Canterbury's hand and seal, &c.) he spoke these words immediately upon hearing of his late majesties death, which was Saturday, Feb. 7, 84. "Is the king dead? Then have at the archbishop of Canterbury's head." These words were spoken in his chamber in my hearing. Witness my hand,

THOMAS BOUME.

The same day in the cellar, the said Robert Young declared, That, now the king was dead, he would have the archbishop of Canterbury's head off. Witness our hands,

JOHN PANNELL.

MATTHEW † BAXTER,
his mark.

And at other times, in my hearing, and others that are now out of town, the said Robert Young declared, That, if ever he got out of prison, he would revenge himself on his grace the archbishop of Canterbury.

JOHN PANNELL.

At another time, some two or three days before, the said Robert Young, upon hearing of his majesty's death, did in the hearing of me John Rewse, in the said Young's chamber, in Bury prison, say these words: Some of my enemies may repent what they have done to me: it will not be long ere the archbishop of Canterbury's head be off.

JOHN REWSE.

William Rose, of Elmswell in the county of Suffolk, yeoman, saith, that Robert Young, a prisoner in Bury gaol, upon hearing of his late majesty's death, did publicly say these words following, viz. Now, by God, have at the archbishop of Canterbury's head. And that, at several times, he hath discovered himself to bear hatred against his grace, and hath often spoken reproachfully against his grace.

WILLIAM ROSE.

Sixthly, here is Robert Young's second letter to the lord archbishop of Canterbury; confessing still his own guilt, but intended chiefly to weaken the evidence of John Pannell, one of those Bury witnesses, by accusing him of treason.

N° VI.

Bury, July 23. 85.

May it please your Grace,

In the first place, all that I design in this letter, is an apology for myself, to ask pardon for my transgression against your grace (although deluded thereto) hoping that this my mean and weak supplication will be sheltered under the canopy of your profound charity. And seeing I have, by wicked advice, consented to things misbecoming an honest man, most reverend father, let not my honesty be tainted therewith, but evil counsell justly blamed; which, for ever hereafter, shall be a warning piece to me never to commit the like again: but by honest and christian endeavours, to provide for himself and family, whose conditions are now reduced so low, that perish they must unless by your graces clemency eased. Furthermore, I do promise to do your grace that justice, as to bring in the first actors and contrivers of that wicked action, who did not only encourage me, but several imposthims they likewise have sent abroad, which I can prove. Having thus far declared myself, and endeavouring to take off such aspersions as might possibly have been thrown on me; give me leave to acquaint your grace, that I am given to understand, that one John Pannell have lately sent your grace a petition, intreating you to incense the judge, that comes this circuit, against me; which petition I humbly desire, and beseech you, for your honour, to disregard. For that person is a rebellious traytor, and have declared himself so to be; his words and intended actions are, in breve, as followeth: He called the king a popish dog, a rogue, and said, that he has taken that which was none of his own, but the duke of Monmouth; he has said likewise, that he would do his endeavour to chop off that popish rogue's head. "Si indixeris mihi ut singula dilatem, non recusabo; modo tempus mihi concesseris: nam statim hoc facere, non est harum, quoad corpus, virium: paratus semper dicere, qui sunt subditi probati et qui non." My lord, I thought fit thus to acquaint your grace, that you may not so much as mention his name with any due respect; his factious ancestors will make him notorious enough, if no treason were objected and laid to his charge. But seeing what I have in part acquainted your grace with, will next assizes be sworn against him by three evidences, and the king likewise acquainted therewith; and the said John Pannell a great finatick. I humbly have sent your grace (out of that love and affection I bear to my king and to the clergy) this caution of the said John Pannell. So I take leave, desiring to remain

Your graces most humble servant,

ROBERT YOUNGS.

Seventhly, Here is the true hand and seal of archbishop Sancroft, which Robert Young having torn off from a real instrument of his grace's that he had casually lighted on, prefixed a false licence to it to beg in three other dioceses; and that dated even after the former letters to the archbishop, and after he had been pilloried at Bury for the first forgery.

N° VII.

We recommend the petitioner to the diocesse of Oxford, Lincoln and Sarum, humbly beseeching the clergy of all cities and corporations (within the aforesaid diocesses) to go from house to house to receive the benevolence of all charitable christians, towards the relief of a poor distressed clergyman.

Given under our hand and seal, at Lambeth house, Jan. 2, A. D. 1685.

(L. S.) W. CANT.

Two papers relating to a false plot in king James's time, which Robert Young offered to discover at Bury, when he was prisoner there, in the year 1685: both which papers are written with his own hand, and were taken out of his pocket when he was searched for instruments, wherewith he designed to break prison there.

The first paper, which seems to be a letter to some lord at court, concerning Robert Young's plot in 1685, but is not superscribed.

N° VIII.

Bury Gaol, June 13, 85.

May it please your Lordship:

Although I have been, and also am unwilling to trouble you with my letters, yet, notwithstanding, the treacherous speeches and intended actions of wicked rebels forceth me thereunto at present. I leatly a petition to the king and parliament sent, which petition (declaring in part the purport of what I have to say) I humbly beseech your lordship, for the love of a gracious king, to take care of, and so far, that king and parliament may therewith be acquainted. Nothing is therein delivered, but what I, by sufficient evidence can make appear to be truth: justice will in no wise for the king here be done, the reasons when removed, I'll produce, but here I dare not; I humbly desire, before his royal majesty, and his high honourable court of parliament, to be, as soon as may be, called up, where with justice, and not with partiality, I may be heard to speak.

[And here follows some of his former sort of Latin, which I set down as I find it in his own hand.]

De his rebus omnibus obsecro et suppliciter imploro te mihi rescribere literam, in qua si indixeris mihi ut singula delatam non recusabo, paratus semper ostendere, qui sunt probati, subditi et qui non. Nihil jam superest aliud scribendum, nisi quod supplex orem ut omnes actiones secundat Deus optimus maximusque. Et ex toto corde vale.

Tuæ salutis & amplitudinis.

Ex Carcere 13^o die mensis, Julij A.D. 85.

Cupidissimus, &c. R. Y.

The second paper, which is the original petition that Robert Young sent up to be presented to the king and parliament in May 1685, when he promises to make out the discovery of his plot, if he might have his liberty, and be brought up to London to be the king's evidence. This is also recommended to the reading of the Presbyterians.

A full Discovery of TREASON by ROBERT YOUNGS, Clerk.

To the most high and mighty Prince, James the Second, by the grace of God, King of Great-Britain, France, and Ireland, defender of the Faith, &c. and to his most Honourable and High Court of Parliament: the humble PETITION of Robert Youngs, Clerk, now a prisoner in Bury St. Edmunds, in the County of Suffolk. In most humble and lamentable wise complaineth unto your Majesty and your High Court of Parliament.

That whereas your most obedient subjecte, living under the laws of God and your majesty's realms, in the days of the late gracious king Charles the second, of ever blessed memory, did in all things shew himself a true, faithful, and obedient subject, according to his function, as well as in the sincere administration (according to the Church of England) of God's holy word, as in due obedience to the higher powers. Your said suppliant, notwithstanding, contrary to all laws of justice and equity, was notwithstanding, in very extream manner, not only cast into prison (where he, being altogether a stranger, have these eight months by past continued) but likewise (last assizes nothing being objected against him) bound over to his good behaviour, where he will (through malice, and for fear of discovering their rebellious and clandestine actions) perish inevitably; for such is the malignity of your majesty's enemies against your poor subject, that they keep him close locked up, not suffering his wife to come to him, giving order likewise, that all pen, ink, and paper, should not be permitted to be carried to him, least he make complaint. And the more severity they show, because your obedient subject did discover one John Pannel, who, like a rebel and traitor, did call your sacred majesty a popish dog and rogue; and said, that he, against your sacred majesty, would fight for the duke of Monmouth so long as he had blood in his body. Moreover, Feb. 7, 1684, about three o'clock in the afternoon, he swore, that now he would accomplish his long designed and intended purpose. Now, said he (news being brought a little before that the late king was really dead) I will have that popish rogue's head, &c. Now by the discovery hereof, your poor subject have to himself enemies innumerable created, and yet will (so long as life continues) stand firm and unshaken, notwithstanding all the vain attempts and impetuous assaults made against him by such men as are given to change, and have always discovered a greater regard to their own treacherous and rebellious spirits, than to that duty and legality which they owe unto your most sacred majesty. All these things, and much more shal against John Pannel, and others (whom to discover here were to no purpose) be confirmed by three witnesses. Many are the conspiracies and conspirators, who have plotted and contrived how to bring their wicked enterprizes to an head. In order hereunto (as in conscience obliged, and as a faithful subject to your majesty) can and will make a full discovery of ten Presbyterian ministers, one lord, two esquires, a colonel, a captain, a cornet, a gentleman, who having long since plotted and contrived the death of your most sacred majesty, and the subversion of the government now established amongst us, and still continues their hellish devices, who (if in time not prevented) will (with a sad memento) make known what your faithful subject doth now in part relate, they having promised, vowed, and protested, that if ever your majesty came to the crown, enjoy it you should not one year to an end. Such evidence against them singularly shall be produced, as to the consciences of all loving subjects shall seem reasonable and sufficient; and if your poor subject does not prove by sufficient evidence what he now affirms, your said subject offers himself then to the most heavy punishment that it shall please your majesty to appoint.

In consideration whereof, may it please your most sacred majesty, and this your high court of parliament, graciously to take the premises so far into your tender consideration, as to call up to London before your princely majesty your poor subject, who will in full discover all those clandestine actions and hellish stratagems of rebellious and treacherous rebles, who intends no goodness towards your royal person, whom God preserve, &c. which thing being granted, your said subject doubts not but that it shall plainly appear de unde by sufficient evidence, who are faithful subjects and who not. Wherefore for the tender mercy of God, your said subjecte in bonds and irons, most humbly beseecheth your majesty, and this high court of parliament, benignly and graciously to grant this petition, tending so graciously to the preservation of your majesty and the government now established amongst us, &c. And your petitioner, as in duty bound, &c.

In this last, and in several of the foregoing papers, my reader finds mention of one John Pannel. Upon this there depends a story which must not be omitted, because it is sent me from Bury, attested under hand and seal by persons of known credit and repute: and with this I shall end all Robert Young's transactions at Bury.

It appears, that this John Pannel had not only fallen into Robert Young's displeasure, by his having been one of the witnesses of his menaces against the archbishop's life, but also for having prevented Robert's designed escape out of the common gaol there.

Robert Young, in revenge of all this, not only wrote to the archbishop against him in the venomous manner, as appears in his second letter to his grace, that there should be high treason sworn against the said John the next assizes, and not only also named him as guilty in the foregoing petition to the king and parliament, mentioning in both the particular treasons, but effectually made good his word; and the very next assizes at Ipswich, for the county of Suffolk, in the same year 1685, prosecuted John Pannell for his life before the lord chief justice Jones.

Nay, when it was objected by the judge, that this was but a single witness, Robert immediately took care to supply that defect, and out of hand produced Mary to swear the very same words, and the very same time and place, as her foreman had sworn before her.

So that had not the lord chief justice been seasonably informed of the profligate reputation of Robert and Mary; and had not the deputy-gaoler of Bury proffered voluntarily to take his oath, that Mary was really absent from Robert, and had been so for a good space, both before and after the time, when the treasonable words were pretended by Robert to have been spoken by John Pannell, the poor innocent man had been in danger of being hanged for a traitor to king James, by the perjury of these two wretched gaol-birds.

But thus much for Robert and Mary Green, &c.

Next we shall behold the same farce acted over again by the same persons, under the disguised names of Robert and Mary Jones; John and Mary Smith; she the wives of him the rectors of the same Ashford in Kent, and both at the same time.

Nay (to shew how necessary it is that great lyars should have great memories) we shall see, that two of these pretended recommendations, from archbishop Sancroft, do very un-happily bear date the very same day, September the third, of the very same year, 1687, for the same woman, under different names.

First, Here are the forged recommendations, pretended to be from archbishop Sancroft, of Mary Hutt, both as Mary Jones and Mary Smith, to the lords bishops of Chichester, Norwich, and St. Asaph: the body of these letters being an imitation of his grace's own hand, but all the subscriptions counterfeited to admiration.

N^o I.

My Lord; This is to acquaint your lordship, that one Mr. Robert Jones, rector of Ashford in my diocese, is a prisoner for debt, occasioned by suretyship; he is a person well known to me, and deserves our assistance. I hope you will therefore give his wife (who will suddenly attend your lordship) licence to ask and receive the charity of your dean and chapter, towards her husband's freedome, as we in our diocese have done. I am, your loving friend and brother,

My Lord;

This is to acquaint your lordship, that one Mr. John Smith, rector of Ashford in my diocese, is a prisoner for debt, occasioned by suretyship; he is a person well known to me, and deserves our assistance. I hope you will therefore (as other of our brethren have done) extend your charity toward his freedome; and likewise recommend his distressed condition to your dean and chapter, or in his absence to the subdean. I am, my lord, your loving friend and brother, Secondly, Here is a forged letter from Dr. Fauconberge, secretary to my lord archbishop, accompanying that letter to the lord bishop of Norwich; wherein is a false list of what sums other churches and churchmen had given, to excite his lordship and his church and diocese by those examples.

May it please your Lordship; I am commanded by my lords' grace of Canterbury to send this as a cover to the enclosed; and to let your lordship know, that Mr. Robert Smith, (brother to the prisoner) is appointed as the receiver. Therefore your lordship is humbly desired to transmit, by bill of exchange, your lordship's charity, together with the dean's and chapters, to the aforesaid Robert Smith, living in Maiden-lane, in Westminster, and so soon as your lordship possibly can. Thirdly, Here are letters of those three bishops written at that time, acknowledging that they were every one deceived by an imposture so well managed; though they were some of the archbishop's most familiar friends, and perfectly acquainted with his grace's hand.

N^o III.

May it please your Grace;

I have returned the letter which came to me in your grace's name on the behalf of Mr. Jones, pretended to be of your diocese; and now find enough in it to have made me suspect the cheat: but your grace's name (too well counterfeited) and the great deference I make to it, superseded all further consideration. And, although I communicated it to the dean and chapter (who are not unacquainted with your grace's hand) yet none of them saw through it. It is much to be feared, that the cheat is still carried on, and too successfully: for he must be more sagacious than I am, whom such a letter coming by the post, then followed within two or three days by the woman herself, would not impose upon. After all, I am much more concerned for the abuse that is put upon your grace, than for that little which I suffered by it; and heartily wish the cheat detected and discovered, that your grace's name may be no longer prostituted to so vile a purpose, whilst so great a veneration is paid to it by all good men. I am, my lord, your grace's, &c.

May it please your Grace;

In pursuance of the inclosed recommendation, I applied myself to Mr. Dean, and the prebends of this church, for their charity, towards the relief of Mr. John Smith, rector of Ashford in your grace's diocese, as the letters set forth. Mr. Dean, and the prebends, allotted 5*l.* to Mr. Smith, which sum, with my own mite, would have made up 10*l.* and this sum was to be paid by Mr. Dean at his arrival in London; and of this I gave a hint to Dr. Paman in my letter to him: but since we learn from the Gazette, that the whole contrivance was a cheat and a forgery; and for the further discovery of it, I have sent the inclosed to your grace. I am your grace's, &c.

Canterbury his Grace.

May it please your Grace; Sept. 6, 87.

I have received your grace's letter of the 3d instant by this post; the effect of it is, to bespeak the charity of this church for one Mr. Robert Jones, rector of Ashford, who is a prisoner on the account of suretyship; the cause for which he suffers, does not at all commend his suit; but that which follows does very much: that he is known to your grace; and that you judge him to be one that deserves our assistance: on that account he shall have it from me in such proportion, as your grace shall think fit; and of that your grace shall judge at my coming up to London, which will be about six weeks hence, if God permit; or, if you will not judge, I will tax myself as I would do any other man in my condition, and so much beyond, as I ought to be stricter with myself than any other. I am, my good lord, your grace's, &c.

Canterbury his Grace.

My most honoured Lord; Sept. 13, 87.

I send your grace, here inclosed, that piece of forgery which came this day se'nnight, as a letter from your grace. I saw your name to it so well counterfeited, that I did not examine the hand in the rest of the letter; nor took notice of the false spelling in the word acquaint, and twice diocesse; which I should have boggled at otherwise. But your name, which I doubted not to be of your grace's own hand, was enough to assure me the whole letter was yours. And whether you writ it in haste, or had an amanuensis to write it, I was not curious to examine; or whether it was forged, which I now understand was the case. The woman rogue, by whom, or for whom it was forged, having thus made ready the bait, and hanged me upon it, came and drew up her line the next day; there she had 5*l.* upon her hook; and with it she got a subscription into her paper, which she carried into Bangor; and there, I doubt not, having baited the water with a letter from your grace, and having a subscription to second it, she hooked as much more between the bishop and the dean.

To my Lord Archbishop of Wm. Asaph.
Canterbury his Grace.

Having now followed Robert Young, and his pretended wife, to the end of the first great turn of their affairs in England, it is but reasonable, that I should use the same exactness as I have done in that part of their story which was acted in Ireland, that I should declare by what means I have had the certain information, which enabled me to trace them so narrowly also in this part of their adventures.

It was soon after my deliverance from them, on June the 13th, that I desired Mr. Needham, chaplain to archbishop Sancroft, to let him know what danger he had escaped, together with myself and others. Immediately thereupon, his grace gave him notice of his own former rencounters with the same Robert Young; and withal ordered him to let me have a sight of most of the foregoing papers.

Having perused them, and perceiving they would effectually contribute to the farther confusion of the wretch, I intreated his grace to resign them to my disposal, and to recollect what he could farther remember on this subject.

To which request, I received these following answers from that excellent prelate: whose name alone would be sufficient authority in matters of far greater concernment than this; there being no good man that I know of, who has him not in the highest esteem for his integrity and piety.

A LETTER from Archbishop Sancroft to me, dated July 13, 1692.

Fresingfield, July 13.

My good lord and brother;

I have just received your's of July the 5th, and, having read it over, immediately take up my pen to tell you, that, in compliance with your earnest desires, I give up and consign into your lordship's hands, all the papers concerning Young the falsary, which I sent to Mr. Needham, to be made use of, and disposed as your lordship, in your discretion, shall think fit; with this caution, notwithstanding, that, whereas there are amongst them some letters of my old dear friends, bishop Lloyd of Norwich, and bishop Lloyd of St. Asaph, (who are both at present in or about London) no use be made of them without their privity, nor any further than they shall allow.

As for the narrative you desire, you shall certainly have it, as well as my old leaking memory will enable me to form it: but, though I must take the longer time for that, yet, because you tell me you long (with some impatience) for my answer to the rest; I have hastened to give it (and my kindest respects) with that readiness and heartiness, which becomes, my lord, your lordship's, &c.

For the Lord Bishop of Rochester.

A second LETTER from Archbishop Sancroft to me, dated August 24, 1692.

My lord; I remember well what I wrote to you in a former letter, concerning the narrative you desired, of what passed heretofore between me and Robert Young. But, when I sat down to make it, I found two things lying directly in my way. First, I was credibly informed, that you had wholly laid by your design; and, secondly, many years having passed since those things happened, and I having lately cursorily read over the papers I sent you; my memory did not serve me, without them, to judge where they were defective, or how any incoherence in them might be supplied.

But now that I am assured, that you are in good earnest going on with what you intended, and understand what are the particulars that remain still obscure to you in those papers; I will not only endeavour to clear those, but the rest of the story, as far as I can remember it.

He was twice with me at Lambeth; the first time, within a month after he was degraded at Dublin, to desire some employment in the church; in order to which, he produced letters of orders, which I very much suspected. For besides, that they were not, as I remember, in form, and in the usual style; there was fixed to them, with a label, a great episcopal seal, such as we put to our leases; which, upon my objecting it, he affirmed to be the custom of the bishops in Ireland. And, when I told him I had no employment void in my gift, he was very earnest with me to recommend him to the bishop of London; with a design, I suppose, that he might have a copy to write by in his intended forgeries; but I refused.

Some time after, he came again, since when I never saw him, to desire me to recommend him to be a chaplain to a ship, or in some of the plantations; which I again refused (for, in truth, I never liked him from the beginning) telling him, that it was a part of the bishop of London's province.

In the mean time, having acquaintance with Dr. Foley, the archbishop of Dublin's chaplain, who was then in England; I sent to him for some better information concerning this importunate bold man; which produced those letters which are in your hands.

About this time he sent his woman to Windsor, with a petition to the king, pretending, that her husband, going to be minister at one of the foreign plantations, was taken by the Turkish pirates; and begging a share in the money collected for the redemption of captives. His majesty referred the petition to me and my lord of London; which yet I never saw, nor heard of, till a good while after. In the mean while, they had forged a report upon the reference, under both our hands and seals, to bring them into a share of the redemption-money.

By this time, or before, he had gotten, I know not how, one of those instruments by which we grant places in our hospitals of Croydon and Canterbury; they are written in an expanded sheet of paper, with a margin broad enough to receive the seal which we use on those occasions, and which was usually placed about the middle of the instrument. This margin he tore off, with my subscription under it, finding room enough above it to crowd in a licence to beg in three dioceses, which I wonder any man should take to be mine; both because I had upon all occasions refused to give, even worthy persons, licence to beg; and because I could not (mean as I am) be reasonably thought so silly as to bespeak three dioceses in so wretched a stile, and in such a wretched scroll of paper.

However, this gross sham, improbable as it was, prevailed with many of my friends, and he drained a great deal of money from them, till some one (I have forgot who) seized that miserable, pitiful slip of torn paper (the most contemptible that ever had the impudence to set up for a metropolitain rescript, since the order came first into the world) and sent it to me, which was the first notice I ever had of his practices.

After this, for several years I heard not one word of Robert Young, nor knew what was become of him, till at length enter Mrs. Jones (in truth, as it proved Young's wife, or worse) pretending to be the wife of a clergyman in my diocese, then a prisoner for a vast debt, carrying in her hand a letter of mine, wholly forged, to desire the contributions of the bishops and clergy for his enlargement. I knew I had no such clerk in Kent, and though she changed the name to Smith, I think of Ashford in Kent, yet still about she went with forged letters, applying herself to my particular friends, who, with their clergy, were very bountiful to her. When I had notice of it, I disavowed the letters, as I had reason, there being manifest characters of forgery upon them; and sent to the bishop of St. Asaph to lay hold of her, and send her up to London, but she escaped us.

Whilst she was at work so far off, Young himself was playing the like pranks in my native country, where he got a great deal of money; but, coming to Bury St. Edmunds, Dr. Battely's brother, a magistrate there, observing his impudence, sent for a constable, and brought him and his quean, who by this time was come to him, before the recorder, &c. by whom, upon examination, they were imprisoned there. You have the copies of the examinations, and his original letters and confessions to me; and also copies of the informations against him, that he swore in prison he would have my blood; but how he got out of prison (unless it were because nobody prosecuted him)

Dr. Battely can better inform you than I, to whom therefore I refer you.

My lord, thus far I have gone, out of my desire to serve you, and shall be ready in any particular to give satisfaction, as my old weak memory will enable me; for I confess I most earnestly long to see this foul imposture detected, and right done to so many innocent persons, whose ruin he hath sought in the basest manner. I am, my lord, your lordship's, &c.

Fresingfield, Aug. 24, 1692.

To the Lord Bishop of Rochester.

As far as my intelligence goes, the only punishment which the authors of all these last gross cheats sustained, after they had found them so long a time successful, was that they were pursued through England by these two advertisements in the printed Gazettes of the year 1687.

Advertisement in the Gazette, Sept. 22, 1687.

Whereas a woman pretending to be the wife of R. Jones, rector of Ashford in Kent, hath gone about England and Wales, begging the charity of several persons, for the relief of her said husband, whom she pretended to be in prison for debt; and hath both forged several letters, as from his grace the lord archbishop of Canterbury to several bishops, and received several sums of money. These are to give notice, that there is no such person as R. Jones, rector of Ashford, and that his grace never wrote any such letters. It is therefore desired, that, if the said woman can be met with, she be apprehended, and dealt with according to law.

Advertisement in the Gazette, Oct. 6, 1687.

Whereas a woman, pretending to be the wife of R. Jones, vicar of Ashford in Kent, and now in prison for debt, and one who calls himself Smith, and pretends also to be vicar of Ashford, have forged several letters as from the archbishop of Canterbury, and, begging up and down in several parts of England and Wales, have received several sums of money. These are to give notice, that neither of these men is vicar of Ashford, and that the archbishop never wrote any such letters. It is therefore desired, that, if the said persons can be met with, they be apprehended, and be dealt with according to law.

But how they got clear of this ill affair, whether they suffered any corporal punishment for their going under the names of Jones and Smith, as they had done for those of Green, I am not yet certainly informed. For the present I am rather inclined to believe that they escaped unpunished, because the meek archbishop Sancroft would not permit them to be prosecuted in his name; for which they have since well rewarded him.

But this I only speak upon conjecture; and the truth is, it is impossible that the world should ever have an exact account of Mr. Robert Young's whole life, unless he himself would be pleased to write the counterpart of his story.

But it was not long after this, that Robert Young and Mary took the short turn they had at Bromley; which was indeed so short, that they were vanished thence before I knew of their being there. Only as to the man's ill character, during that time, and his frequent boasting of his abilities in forgery, I am furnished by a worthy gentleman, my neighbour, with the ensuing certificate:

These are to certify, that, during the short time of Mr. Robert Young's office at Bromley-college, which as I remember, was about six weeks, he went under an ill character of his wicked living; particularly I have heard him brag, before Mr. Roman and others, that he could counterfeit any man's hand in England. Witness my hand the 1st of Sept. 1692.

WALSINGHAM KING.

Now, because this is the proper place, I have here ready for my reader, as I promised him, the entire letter which Robert Young wrote out of Newgate, to the widows of the college at Bromley; whereof I cited before some honest truths, and quaint expressions:

Madam;

Begging your pardon for this my rude attempt, I humbly crave leave thus to set forth my present miserable condition unto you, and all the rest of the worthy gentlewomen belonging to that college, to whom, I hope, you will communicate this. I have been almost twelve months a prisoner, confined, destitute of friends, money, &c. so that it hath been the providence of God that hath hitherto supported me. I thank God my confinement was not occasioned either by murder or felony, or any ill thing; but an Irishman, (whom I pray God forgive) swore against me, that, by virtue of bills, I raised money for the use of king James. Now, to make you sensible that I never acted any such thing, and that those things which were laid to my charge, were as false as hell; you may remember, that, during my abode among you, and amidst the worst of times, I was one who stood up for the vindication of the church of England, and altogether against the Roman Catholics; whereas, if I had not a member of the church of England been, then was the time (when authority was on my side) to lift up my head; yet, at the same time, as you can all bear me witness, I stood in the gap against their doctrine and clandestine actions: all which, methinks, is sufficiently demonstrable, that they have laid to my charge things that I know not of; yet for the same a fine was laid upon me, under which I now labour, to the great disquiet of my soul, and the starving of my natural body, which, if not supported, will suddenly (being not able to subsist any longer) be transformed into its first matter. May it therefore please you, and all the virtuous gentlewomen of that college, so far to cast a compassionate eye on my most miserable and despicable condition, as to extend your charitable benevolence toward my enlargement here hence, and send it me this week by a trusty hand. The reason why I begg it this week, is because I have employed one to remove me to the King's-bench, where I expect my freedom, and, in the mean time, some employ, whereby to keep soul and body together; but, if continued here, I shal perish out of pure want: therefore I hope you will putt on bowels which are human, and lend your helping hand to a fallen brother. I pray God incline your hearts to do things for God's glory and the good of the church; and I begg leave to remain, your most humble servant, and affectionate brother in the Lord,

ROBERT YOUNG.

My most humble service to you all in general, whom I pray God keep and support now and for ever.

I have lately given me 30s. toward my removal to the King's-bench, but it will cost 4l.

Direct for me at the masters side debtors, in Newgate, London.

For Mrs. Young, or Mrs. Craige, Widows, or any other Widows of the College in Bromley, in Kent.

I am now attending Robert Young in his next stages to St. Albans and Litchfield, where he managed his business for a time without Mary Hutt, and sometime in concert with her, and both times like himself.

The season, indeed, of his coming to, and acting in these places was, of all others, most proper to conceal the impudent knaveries he practised there, and in the parts thereabout, it being towards the latter end of the year 1688, and the beginning of 1689 (the very time when all men's minds were amused with greater matters, and intent upon the revolution of the government, which happened during that interval) for, as it is usually found, that the little mean thieves and pick-purses are wont to have the great harvest in places where there is the greatest bustle and crowd, and where they find most quarrels and frays; so this great rogue could not wish for a fitter occasion to escape unperceived in his cheats, than when there was such an universal combustion in all parts of the nation, and when men were generally more solicitous to save their lives, than their pockets.

And, accordingly, he made use of this opportunity, both at St. Albans and Litchfield, to the best advantage for his designs; so that I find a world of new matter rising up before me, both that city, and that town, and all those countries resounding, to this day, with the noise of his and his pretended wife's forgeries, and other their lewd pranks.

But, out of mere compassion to my reader, and, indeed, weariness in myself, I will reduce, into as narrow a compass as I can, that part of their history, which else, perhaps, would have proved more copious than any of the rest.

It may therefore suffice, that I only give some few undoubted proofs, to justify what I have already affirmed of his behaviour at St. Albans, and at Litchfield. First, here are two letters to give an account of his general conversation at Litchfield; and then several other letters and informations concerning the notorious forgeries, which he practised on Mr. Clark of Northampton, Mr. Mathew of Daventry, and Mr. Olds of Coventry; and also the depositions of Robert Young's own servant, and Mary Young herself at Litchfield; and, lastly, the forged bills and letters of advice by which they accomplished all these cheats.

First, a LETTER to me, concerning Robert Young's life, during his stay at Litchfield, from a Reverend Clergyman of that Cathedral.

My Lord; Litchfield, July 23, 1692.

I received this morning your lordship's of the 20th instant, and have here inclosed as much, as the shortness of time would permit, of Young's carriage in this place. I shall be glad, if this may help to clear the innocent, and detect the fraud of villains.

Robert Young, who pretended to be an Irish clergyman, and to have good church preferment in Ireland, and a considerable temporal estate, lived for some time in Litchfield, and lodged with one Moreton, who kept a public house.

During his being here, he was observed to have store of gold and silver, and some plate.

He kept his man and two horses, and rode often abroad, but as many observed, more like a highwayman than a divine. Before he left this place, he went to lodge at a private house, where the gentlewoman's maid was debauched, and, some say, by him.

He made love to a gentleman's daughter in Tamworth, and in all likelihood had married her, if a woman had not come hither, whom he owned to be his wife.

It is said, he would have given his man money to have killed this woman, whom he owned to be his wife; which when the man refused to do, he attempted to kill him.

He was arrested here first for debt, and afterwards for taking bills of exchange out of the mail, and from this prison was removed to Newgate. There is one Mr. Mathew at Daventry, who, as I hear, can give more account of Young's rogueries.

I am your lordship's, &c. L. A.

Secondly, The Substance of a LETTER to sir R. R. from a person of worth and credit at Litchfield, to the same purpose as the former:

Sir; I have made the utmost inquiry I can into Young's behaviour while he was at Litchfield, which was not above a quarter of a year, or thereabouts. When he came first hither, he was very full of money and plate; pretended to be a dean in Ireland, and to have a plentiful estate there, and to have brought the money and plate thence. So soon as he became a little acquainted, he began to inquire out for a fit person to make him a wife, and presently fell in league with a woman of Tamworth (who was to have 1,000*l.* to her portion) and had prevailed with her to marry him, as he himself boasted; but while it was in fieri, there came a woman hither, who said she was his wife, and who doubtless was so; and the villain, as his man reported, would have hired him to have killed her, and upon his refusal endeavoured to kill him. Before he came to Litchfield, it seems he had been for some time at St. Alban's, where, by courting the postmaster's daughter, he obtained the privilege of looking into the packets, and by that means got divers letters into his custody, which had bills for return of money inclosed in them; with which he posted his wife to London, who there received a good part of the money. This we know by the relation of Mr. Olds, a mercer in Coventry, and of another mercer in Daventry, the former of which coming hither and surprising him, while he had money and plate left, got as much in value as satisfied his bill; and the latter being sent hither by him in two or three days after, seized his person, and got him committed to the town gaol, and thence removed him to London, where he was tried, and convicted of these and some other such roguish practices, and pilloried for them.

Sir, I am, &c.

Thirdly, A LETTER to me from Mr. ALLESTREE, minister of Daventry, touching Robert Young's demeanor at Litchfield, and particularly his forging bills of exchange, under the names of Mr. Olds and Mr. Mathew.

My lord; Daventry, Sept. 20, 1692.

I have, in obedience to your lordship's desires, inquired concerning the villainies that Robert Young has perpetrated here, and made this place the stage thereof, and I am furnished with such unquestionable intelligence, and such abundance of matter of this kind, that does sufficiently discover the disposition of the man, and the pravity of his mind, that he is prepared by nature, custom, or indigence, for any sort of wickedness: so that knowing certainly the many cheats he has acted here, and in our neighbourhood, without compunction or remorse, it is no wonder to me, that, by degrees, he is risen at last to attempt the life of others, by the trade of forgery, and swearing men into treasonable acts and associations.

About the latter end of the year 1688, we were alarmed with the news of a notorious cheat that had been practised upon Mr. Ship-ton in Friday-street, by a villain who had forged the hand of Mr. justice Mathew, of this town, and copied his letters so exactly, that he himself could not discover the difference by the strokes of the pen, or disown the writing upon view, but only by being conscious to himself that he had never written, or set his hand to any paper of that moment and importance ; so that Mr. Shipton, who was his correspondent in London, was easily imposed upon by the similitude of hands, and paid two hundred pounds upon a pretended bill drawn upon him from Mr. Mathew. When the following post gave notice of the payment of the money, and also of the order that was followed therein, all endeavours were speedily used to apprehend and discover the impostor, and many journies were undertaken into several countries in pursuit of him ; but all inquiry and search for the detection of the theft, and of the author, were fruitless and unsuccessful, till it happened, after some considerable distance of time, that, the news of this cheat spreading far and wide, one Mr. Olds of Coventry sent word to Mr. Mathew, that he had been formerly cheated of 14*l.* that he had discovered the rogue that had forged his hand, and that he had given him satisfaction for his money. He did not know but this might be the man that had put the like trick upon him in a greater sum, and referred it to his consideration, whether it would be worth his while to go so far as Litchfield for enquiry and satisfaction. It will not be improper in this place, my lord, to trace things from the beginning, and examine how Mr. Olds came by this intelligence, that helped him to the recovery of his money ; the cheat that was put upon him was of an ancient standing, and he had been a long time under the sense of the loss of his money, without any expectation ever to retrieve it. Now this Young, who had practised these rogueries upon him, and divers others, and by these frauds had lined his pockets, with a competent sum, both of gold and silver, repairs to Litchfield in a decent habit ; pretends himself an Irish protestant and refugee, one that was persecuted for righteousness, and had lost all for the sake of the gospel. The dean and prebendaries believe him, and receive him with a great deal of civility, charity, and humanity, permitting him to preach in their several courses, that so their benevolence to him might be greater, and seem like an act of justice, and the discharging of a debt.

In this pomp, with all manner of accommodation, he resides a long time among them at Litchfield, and follows the sports that were suitable to the season, whilst his wife, by his instructions, is carrying on her usual cheats at London. Now having represented himself a batchelor, he made his court to a young woman, and had advanced far in her esteem ; but the detection of his rogueries broke off the intrigue. For, his wife sending him word that she was coming down to him, he went forth one morning with his servant (who carried his gun after him) a shooting, and there proposed to him the killing of her, offering him a great reward for his pains : but the motion being rejected with abhorrence, he threatened to be revenged of him, and cut his throat.

The man, believing his master was very serious in his threatenings, and that he would accomplish his malice, when privacy and night favoured him, run away from his service ; and knowing the cheat that had been acted upon Mr. Olds, repaired as fast as he was able to Coventry, to give him notice of it ; and he accordingly went down to Litchfield, charged Mr. Young with the forgery, who rather than he would hazard the losing of his credit and his station with the prebends, gave him satisfaction immediately.

And now, my lord, I am arrived at the point of time, which made way for the discovery of Mr. Mathew's cheat ; the account of which I will choose to give you in his own words, and insert in the body of this letter :

' About the latter end of February, 1688, one Mary Young had a bill of nine pounds on Mr. Shipton, which said sum she received the 4th of March following of him, at the Seven Stars in Friday-street. On the 19th, and on the 21st of the said March, both my letters of cash concerns were opened, transcribed, and counterfeited ; and advice given of a two hundred pounds bill, which was also counterfeited ; upon which Mr. Shipton paid to the said Mary Young two hundred pounds the 22nd of March following. Robert Young lay at St. Alban's, as was supposed, and, by corrupting the post-master there, had opportunity of counterfeiting my letters. Some time after, the said Mary Young was taken at the Maidenhead and Three-kings in Cheapside, with a counterfeit bill on Mr. Billers, pretended to be drawn by Mr. Joseph Olds of Coventry. She was then charged with the cheat upon Mr. Shipton, and was committed to Wood-street compter, from whence she removed herself to the King's-bench in Southwark, and when the fire broke out there, made her escape.

' About the 10th of December following I heard of their being at Litchfield, and immediately went down post ; came thither about twelve at night, and in the morning beset the house where Robert Young lodged ; and, after above an hour's search found him in the cellar hidden under a stack of furze. At his first apprehension he owned the cheat, and offered his globes and books for satisfaction ; but they being refused, he denied all. His wife also said, before the magistrate, that was the first time ever he had seen her, though his servant swore that they had lived years together, and that she had born him several children. From Litchfield they were brought to London, and tried the 15th of January, 1689, where, upon full evidence, they were found guilty of cheating and forgery ; and were sentenced to stand in the pillory in Cheapside, and at the Royal Exchange, and fined one hundred marks ; the first day of the term following to stand in the pillory in Westminster, and fined one hundred marks more : his wife the same punishment, but her fine was but twenty marks.'

My lord, I should be very glad, &c. as being your lordship's, &c.

CHARLES ALLESTREE.

Fourthly, A LETTER from Mr. MATHEW, a justice of the peace, confirming the former relation as to his part in it.

Mr. Allestree;

I have given my lord bishop of Rochester as full an account of that rascal Young, as time will permit; but, if required, can get more particulars against him from Northampton and Coventry. I shall be very glad if I can be instrumental to clear my lord from the imputation this villain has laid him under; knowing how ready a great part of the world is to speak evil (especially of their sort) of dignities. Pray when you write to his lordship, assure him that I am his lordship's, &c.

Daventry, Sept. 12, 1692. BENJ. MATHEW.

Fifthly, The INFORMATION of JOSEPH OLDS, of Coventry, Mercer.

The said informant maketh oath, That Mr. Robert Young, the person now present, having cheated and defrauded him of a considerable sum of money (viz. in May or June, 1683, by receipt of 10*l.*, part of a forged bill of exchange of 100*l.*, pretended to be drawn by this deponent upon Mr. John Billers of London; and in August last, by the receipt of 34*l.* 10*s.* surreptitiously received by the said Mr. Young, or order, by intercepting two bills of exchange; one drawn upon Mr. Wootton in the Strand, for 20*l.* and the other upon Joseph Toovey, cheesemonger, for 14*l.* 10*s.*) the said Mr. Olds did take out a Capias out of the court of record in the city of Litchfield, and the said Mr. Young being privy to it, owned the fraud, and made him satisfaction thereof; and drew out a letter or note, importing an order, directed, as this deponent remembers, to his wife, and thereby required her to pay a certain number of pieces of gold, to the value of about 7*l.*; and that the woman now present, Mary Young, did, pursuant thereto, bring the number of pieces of gold, and delivered them to the said Mr. Young, and that the said Mr. Young delivered them to this deponent. This deponent further saith, That Mr. Billers (this deponent's correspondent at London) in his letter to him, informed this deponent, that he had received his letter, or rather a copy of it, with the advice of drawing a bill upon him for payment of 200*l.* at sight, to Sarah Harris, which money he had not paid, but that the person that brought it was secured, and proved to be the same that cheated Mr. Shipton of 200*l.* under the name of Mary Young, or words to that effect.

Sixthly, The EXAMINATION and CONFESSION of Mary the Wife of Robert Young, Clerk, late of Wapping, near the Hermitagestairs, at the sign of the Tobacco Press. Taken the 9th day of December, 1689.

City of Litchfield, ss.

The said examinee upon oath saith, That she was married by dean Dixy in Ireland, at county Cavan, to the said Robert Young, about nine years in July last; and that the said Mr. Young then kept a grammar-school there; and saith, that he was beneficed under the bishop of Kilmore's chaplain, Mr. Crew, in Ireland, and had thereby 30*l.* per ann. That she hath had five children by him, and that they are all dead. That she did go, by order from her husband, the said Robert Young, with a bill upon Mr. Richard Shipton, a linen-draper, at the Seven Stars, in Friday-street, London, and drawn in the name of Mr. Mathew of Daventry, for 200*l.*; and did thereupon demand, and receive the said 200*l.* from the said Mr. Shipton, about February, March, or April last; which bill was delivered her by her said husband, and the money to him delivered by her. That her husband told her, he gave the post-master of St. Alban's ten or fifteen guineas to open the packet, and to take out some letters; but the truth of this she knows not, otherwise than by the information of the said Robert Young, her husband. That her husband and she came out of Ireland in May was twelve months; but whether he was, or is in holy orders, she knows not, but believes he is; and says, that her maiden name was Mary Hutt, of county Cavan aforesaid.

Town-clerk of Litchfield.

Seventhly, The INFORMATION of Js. YOUNG, of the City of Litchfield, Vintner.

The said informant maketh oath, That he knows Mr. Robert Young, clerk, now present, and Mary Young now present; and that he believes her to be the said Mr. Robert Young's wife, and hath known them to live at Wapping a quarter of a year together, and dine together, and lie together; and that they formerly lived together in Dublin; and that she had two children by him there, and he owned her for his wife, and the children to be his; and that since he came over into England, this deponent lived with them in Wapping a quarter of a year; and that the said Mr. Robert Young frequented the post-house in St. Alban's, and that he courted the post-master's daughter; and that he hath heard him say, the ostler at the post-house (called John) brought him up the bags out of the packet, and he opened and took what letters he pleased, and hath sent this deponent, being then his servant, to receive monies upon bills of exchange that he had fetched from St. Alban's; namely, 14*l.* 5*s.* from a cheesemonger, near the Cock, in Aldersgate-street, London, and allowed 5*s.* for the speedy payment of it; and 20*l.* from a man at the Sword and Helmet in the Strand, by another bill, intercepted by Mr. Young as aforesaid; which bill this deponent received by the said Mr. Young's order, and delivered the sum of 20*l.* thereof to him. But this deponent having not delivered the 14*l.* 5*s.* to the said Mr. Young, he searched this deponent, and the said deponent hid nine guineas, but never could find it since; and for that this deponent would not go to London upon a message to the said Mrs. Young, to bring her down into the country, and hang or drown her coming down (for which he offered this deponent 6*l.*) the said Mr. Young, near Cannost-wood, or Weeford-park, charged a gun, and attempted to shoot this deponent; but the gun not going off upon twice cocking, and his own horse starting at the snapping of the gun, this deponent wrested it from his hand, and rode away with it, till he came to Litchfield, and then discharged it, and carried it home to the Talbot in Litchfield.

JAMES YOUNG.

Capt. et jurat. apud Civit. Litchfield,

Dec. 9, 1689, coram THO. MARSHALL.

WM. MARSHALL.

Eighthly, The further EXAMINATION and INFORMATION of JAMES YOUNG; taken at Litchfield aforesaid, the 14th day of December, 1689.

The said James Young confesseth, That he hath heard the afore-mentioned Mr. Robert Young (during the time that he lived with the said Robert Young) confess, that the afore-mentioned Mary Young had received above 500*l.* for him in London within a twelvemonth, by bills of exchange, forged, and surreptitiously obtained by him, namely, 200*l.* from Mr. Ship-ton, and 150*l.* from some other persons, whose names this examine hath now forgot; and that he received 50*l.* himself from a shop-keeper, and several other sums of money, which this informant hath now forgot; and that he blamed this examine for not receiving two other bills, which the said Robert Young would have had this informant to have gone with, and demanded, and to have received; and then boasted, that he had himself received the 30*l.* above-mentioned, and that he had given the post-mistress's son of St. Alban's 50*l.* by several times, to let him be privy to the post bags and packet, and that he had made use of them on these like occasions all this last summer: and that he went by the name of Robert Kendall, in St. Alban's, and used to be there sometimes a week, sometimes a fortnight together, though his habitation was at Wapping. And says, That when this informant refused to go with the bills, as above-mentioned, the said Robert Young called him fool, and told him, if he were apprehended, it was but standing in the pillory an hour or two; and that it was nothing, he had stood in the pillory himself, and had been imprisoned and laid in bolts at Suffolk for a considerable time.

Thirdly, The forged Letter of Advice, in which notice of the two hundred pounds is inserted :

Sir ; I have drawne a bill on you to pay Mr. Sam. Bird, or order, 30*l.* [and a bill likewise on you to pay Mrs. Mary Young 200*l.* which pray pay her on demand.] Mr. Woodward will pay you 200*l.* at least this week or the next following. Mr. Campion for Dev. Wall 100 and od pounds for your humble sarvant, Daintry, March 9, 1688. BENJ. MATHEW.

To Mr. Richard Shipton at the 7 Stares in Friday-street, London.

Fourthly, A true Letter of Mr. Mathew, in the postscript whereof forged notice is given of the two hundred pounds bill :

Sir ; Be pleased to pay to William Peytue, esq. or order, 66*l.* and place 7*l.* 10*s.* to accompt of Thomas Lucas, that I have received of him for your use ; who am your humble servant,
BENJ. MATHEW.

I hope you have paid Mrs. Mary Young 200*l.* and Mr. Sam. Bird 30*l.*

Daintry, March 21, 1688.

Fifthly, Mr. Mathew's letter to Mr. Shipton, upon notice of the cheat:

Mr. Shipton;

I have just now received a letter from you, wherein you say you have paid 200*l.* to Mary Young. I never received any such summ, nor drew any such bill, therefore have sent Tom away post to let you know it, that if possible you might retrieve it. Your servant,

BENJ. MATHEW.

My father saith he never drew any such bill, and Tom will satisfy you he hath not.

Daintrey, 8 of the clock Friday night.

Sixthly, Mary Young's Letter to Mr. Mathew, after she cheated him of two hundred pounds:

Sir; This is to give you notice, that I have borrowed on your credit from Mr. Shipton 200 ponds, and when I am able I will pay you again. The way I got your letter out of the Post-office in London, was by seeing one of the men that carried the letters about: and by that letter of advice I procured another to be write, so that you need not trouble yourself any more. I rest, M. YOUNG alias BROWN, alias STEWART, alias FORBUS, alias BONER, &c.

For Mr. Jonathan Mathew at Daintrey, near Coventary.

These at the Wheat-sheafe.

Lastly, Here are the cheats upon Mr. Olds and Mr. Billers, all but the bill of 20*l.* which I have not seen.

First, The forged Bill of 100*l.* from Mr. Olds to Mr. Billers, June 12, 1683, whereof Robert Young only got 10*l.*

Coventry, June 12, 1683.

Brother Billers; At sight of my bill bearing date June 12, be pleased to pay unto Mr. Robert Young the sume of a hundred pounds, which I have received from him. I have nothing els at present, but this letter of advice from him, who is your loving brother and servant,

JOSEPH OLDS.

To Mr. Billers, at the Three Kings in Cheapside, London.

June 13th, 1683.

Received from Mr. John Billers the sume of ten pounds. Sir, I say received by me.

ROBERT YOUNG.

Secondly, A true Bill of Samuel Croxal, upon Joseph Young to John Billers, for use of Mr. Olds for 14*l.* 10*s.* Aug. 5, 1689. But received by Robert Young's man, upon account of a forged indorsement:

The 5th of Aug. 1689.

Friend Joseph Young;

At site of this my bill, or ten days after, I pray pay to John Billers, or order, the sume of fourteen pounds ten shillings, for the use of Joseph Olds: make good payment, and plase it to the accompt of thy friend,

At sight pray pay unto Mrs. Sarah Harris, the summe of ten pounds, value received of her as per advice from your loving brother and servant,

JOSEPH OLDS.

To Mr. John and Benj. Billers, at the 3 Kings in Cheapside, London.

The Indorsement.

Received February 28th, 1688-9, ten pounds in full of this bill.

Per S. H. HARRIS (her mark.)

Fourthly, A false Bill for 200*l.* from Mr. Olds, Aug. 10, 1689, by which Sarah Harris, alias Mary Young, was discovered:

For £. 200 Coventry, Aug. 10, 1689.

At sight, pray pay unto Mrs. Sarah Harris the summe of two hundred pounds value, received of her as per advice from your loving brother and servant,

JOSEPH OLDS.

5thly, A false Letter from Mr. Olds, wherein advice of the 200*l.* bill is inserted. Aug. 11, —89.

Loving brother;

Your's of the 6th instant received—and mind the contents.—My dear wife is but poorly, and much as was when at Coventry; she does continue using the means went for; the Lord sanctify them for her good. Pray accept and pay my 200*l.* bill at sight to Mrs. Sarah Harris, or order, No. 78, value of herself. Mr. Watson does not as yet accept the 15*l.* bill; says must first write to London, where has money lays, and if can get it paid there, shall know next week, with kind respects and service to you and my sister. Rest, in some hast, yours,

For Mr. Benj. Billers, at the 3 Kings in Cheapside. Coventry, Aug. 11, 1689.

JOSEPH OLDS.

Perhaps, my Reader may wonder why I have been so accurate in setting down at large all these true and forged bills of exchange, and letters of advice. But the reason is, I have had for some time, and have now at this present all the originals of them in my keeping: I have shewn them to very many persons of great sagacity, both of the nobility and clergy, both of scholars and merchants: and after an exact view and comparison of them distinctly, line by line, word by word, letter by letter, I must say, all that have seen them were strangely astonished at the surprising similitude between the false writings and the true: and they have done Robert Young this justice, as to pronounce them all to be great master-pieces of forgery.

For my part I will only add, that since he could perform all this only with two hands, how many names soever he had, most certainly we would have been to all the citizens and traders of England by false bills of exchange; woe to all the noblemen, bishops, and gentlemen, by false plots and associations, if once Robert Young could have had his wish, and been another Briareus with an hundred hands, which I assure my reader is no flight of mine, but his own in his letter from Bury to archbishop Sancroft.

My Reader having, by this time, found that Robert Young had so often deserved Newgate, will now, I suppose, be glad to see him brought thither to his own home.

But first (according to the course of my method) I must shew that he was sent for up from Litchfield, for treasonable practices against the government, which was done by this following warrant from the earl of Shrewsbury.

Charles Earl of Shrewsbury, Waterford, and Wexford, &c. one of the Lords of his Majesty's most Hon. Privy Council, and principal Secretary of State.

'These are, in his majesty's name, to authorise and require you (taking a constable to your assistance) to search for, seize, and apprehend the persons of Robert Young, Mary Young, and James Young, for dangerous and treasonable practices against the government, and them to bring before me, to answer to such matters as shall on his majesty's behalf be objected against them: and for so doing this shall be your warrant. And herein all mayors, justices of the peace, constables, and other his majesty's officers civil and military, are to be assisting to you. Given at the court at Whitehall the 16th day of December, 1689.'

SHREWSBURY.

'To Henry Legat, one of the Messengers of his Majesty's Chamber in Ordinary.'

Robert Young and James Young, } Left in custody the 30th of December, 89, by Mr. Legat.

By virtue of this warrant we find Mr. Legat, the messenger, brought Robert from the gaol at Litchfield to the gate-house in Westminster; whither, as soon as he came to town, he procured his prisoner to be removed: for, being more cautious than some other messengers since, he would not charge himself with the safe keeping of so dangerous a guest, as he soon perceived him to be.

By the way, Mr. Legat himself has told me of one passage, in their journey up, which I believe my Reader will thank him for. It is, that Robert Young desired him to stop and call at a little alehouse upon the road, where they found a very old mean fellow, who (as Robert declared) was his father; and, which is yet more strange, the old fellow owned him to be his son.

And, since that time, Mr. Legat, being in Ireland, met by chance the same old man in the streets of Limerick, after it was delivered up to the English. Whereupon, taking acquaintance again with him, by enquiry, he found that he went about in that country, getting a poor livelihood by professing himself to be a fortune-teller and a conjuror. So that thus far we have a pretty account of Robert Young's genealogy, down from the duke of Lenox to the Irish conjuror.

From the Gate-house (as I have already said) he was removed by the lord chief justice's order to Newgate: where, if my reader and I myself were not quite tired with him, I have plenty of instances to prove that he was always the same. One I will give:

During his being prisoner there, whilst none questioned but he was in holy orders, he clandestinely married a fellow gaol-bird of his to a young heiress. For which vile fact, so esteemed even in Newgate, being more severely treated than before, he wrote captain Richardson a letter under his own hand, which I have seen; wherein he tries to excuse himself for so great a crime by an argument that is somewhat singular, and may be reckoned as one of his most ingenious shifts.

It is to this sense, 'Do not you (says he) noble captain, allow any artificer and handicraftsman, that you have here in prison, to work at his own trade, to keep himself from starving? And why then should I be denied to get bread for me, and my wife, by making use of my function?'

But, to return to that which is more pertinent to my purpose, in Newgate Robert and Mary were kept, till they were tried, and condemned, for the forgeries above-mentioned; as the records here ensuing will shew, though I produce but one a-piece for each of them, for brevity's sake.

London. ss. 'Deliber. Gaol. Domin. regis et regin. de Newgate tent. pro civitat. Lond. apud Justice-hall in le Old Bayly, London. die Mercur. (scilt.) 5 decimo die Januarii An. regni Dom. nost. Will. et Mar. nunc regis et regin. Angliæ, &c. primo.'

'Robert Young*, alias Smith, fin. cent. et committitur, &c. et ponatur stare, in et sup. pillor. uno die Cornhill prope Excambium London. et al. in die Cheapside, London. ab hora undecima ante merid. usq; hor. prim. post merid. in utroq; eorund. separat. dier. cum papir. script. supra caput su. ostens. of-

Thus Robert Young and his wife again passed their well-known road of the pillory. But being brought back to Newgate for want of paying their fines; to enable them thereunto, he fell at last upon this damnable contrivance of an association, as the consummation of all his villainies.

I have already told by what means he came to be so skilful in archbishop Sancroft’s hand, and mine; how he got a pattern whereby to forge my lord Cornbury’s, his lordship cannot remember. But my lord Salisbury’s, and my lord Marlborough’s, he obtained partly by the same craft as he did mine: that is, by writing to my lord Marlborough under his true name of Robert Young, to my lord Salisbury, under the name of Robert Yates, to inquire of the character of some servants they never had: to which false letters they also unawares returned true answers, under their own hands; which he thereupon falsified.

In the same manner he procured sir Basil Firebrace’s hand, by sending him a civil letter, under the feigned name of Robert Yarnier, a justice of peace at Marlow in Buckingham-shire, and earnestly recommending to him a wild son of his for an apprentice; professing he would not stick at any money, if sir Basil would take him under his care; withal ‘de‘siring an answer from him under his hand by ‘the bearer, his man;’ which he had; and thereupon sir Basil was entered into the Association.

But, lest my reader should think that the single framing of one Association was employment enough in matters of state, for so fertile a brain, and so artificial a hand as Robert Young’s, during the whole two years and four months that he lay prisoner in Newgate, I have one story more to tell of him, and then I shall have done: as indeed I well may; for after this Association, and this other story of the like nature I am going to relate, I think it may justly be concluded, that scarce ever any mortal man has reached to a deeper pitch of infernal wickedness.

The story is this: shortly after my being cleared at Whitehall, I went to Lambeth, to visit my ancient most honoured friend, my lord archbishop of Canterbury, and to thank him for the very kind offices he had done me at court during my affliction. That being over,

I told him I was going to my lord Nottingham to request, that my two false witnesses might be brought to trial, and undergo the justice of the government. His grace encouraged me to do so, and withal bid me tell my lord Nottingham, as from himself, this story, which I will set down, as near as I can remember, in his own words: “Near six months ago, about Christmas last, says my lord archbishop I received a letter from this Robert Young out of Newgate, to let me know there was a pernicious plot going on against their majesties, which was laid as deep as hell; and he had had the good luck to discover it; desiring me speedily to acquaint the king with it. At first, the information coming from such a place, I took little notice of it. But he shortly wrote me other letters to the same purpose; and at last sent me letters full of treason, pretended to be written by some of the greatest men in England. The hands I did not know; but then I thought it concerned me, as a privy counsellor, to acquaint his majesty with the whole matter. I did so. The king read over Young’s letters to me, and those treasonable ones that he had sent me; and then his majesty very generously said, Really, my lord, these papers may resemble some of these persons hands, but I do not in the least distrust them; I am confident they are innocent, and this is a villainy; and therefore I will not have them disturbed upon this account. And so, said my lord archbishop, I carried home my bundle of intelligence again, and, sealing the papers, laid them up in my closet, where they still remain; and I pray tell my lord Nottingham, that, when their majesties shall command, I am ready to produce them, with the very inscription I put upon them at that same time: Letters and papers from Robert Young, who is a very rogue.”

And here indeed I had resolved to give the rogue over: but, when I was just concluding, there happened a new discovery, relating still to my share in this business; so very remarkable that I cannot, without manifest injury to myself and my reader, deprive him of the knowledge of it: I mean Robert Young’s fresh attempt to suborn one Holland, in order to revive the fallen credit of his forged Association.

I should be very loth, by what I am going to say, to forestall or misreport the king’s evidence against him; but the reality of this gross subornation having been sworn to at Hicks’s hall, where I myself was an ear witness, as well as many worthy gentlemen, and great numbers of other persons, I know not how it were possible for me to make a secret of it if I would:
and the story so much conducing to shew the extreme madness and implacable rage of the villain, when he was brought to his last shifts, I think I have great obligation upon me to make it public.

Now the evidence in this matter, consisting partly in the discourse Young himself had

* For cheating Mr. Shipton of 200*l*. by a counterfeit bill of exchange, in the name of Mr. Mathew.

with Holland, to draw him in to be a perjured witness in this profligate cause ; and partly in the instructions Young sent him in writing to swear by. I will set down, as near as I can, a very brief but faithful abstract of the substance of both ; it being to both that Holland publicly took his oath. And to the truth of the instructions, being written in Young's own hand, Mr. Aaron Smith also swore at the same time, and unquestionably proved it, by comparing that paper with a whole handful of letters he had received from Young himself out of Newgate.

It seems then, that during the long time of Young's being in Newgate, he became acquainted with one Holland, a prisoner likewise there: Young for forgery, Holland for debt.

Some time after Blackhead had confessed before the lords of the council, Young sent for this Holland to the messenger's house, where he lay confined ; and knowing him to be very poor, and thence judging, by himself, that he was the more likely to embrace any wicked design, broke the business to him in this manner.

Mr. Holland, says he, it is most certain there is a hellish plot against the government: the story you may have heard of the Association, is true to a tittle: I should have clearly made it out, had not the cowardly rogue Blackhead forsaken me, being bribed by the bishop of Rochester, and frightened by some great men at court, who are also themselves as deeply engaged in the design. Now, if you will come in to assist me in the proof of it, we shall be made for ever ; I shall have 1,000*l.* (so the lying knave boasted) and you shall have half of it. And I think, Mr. Holland, 500*l.* will do no hurt to a man in your circumstances.

By my faith you say true, Mr. Young, replied Holland, such a sum would come very seasonably to me at this time. But what work am I to do for it ?

It shall be only your part, answered Young, to swear, that you saw the earl of Salisbury, the earl of Marlborough, and the bishop of Rochester, sign the Association.

But, said Holland, how can I make a probable story of it ? seeing I never saw the Association, I know none of the three lords you speak of, nor can I imagine where to fix the place or time of signing it, or any of the other necessary circumstances.

As for all that, said Young, I will send you instructions by my wife, of the particulars you are to swear to. For, Mr. Holland, I would not have you come hither yourself often to me. I have here divers spies upon me : and besides, this damned Blackhead, who has deserted me, lies just over head, in this same messenger's house.

But, as for the Association itself, I will now describe you the exact shape of it. Then, calling for a sheet of paper, he folded it into the same fashion : only, says he, you must remember that the Association is written in great thick paper.

Next, he repeated to him the heads and principal matter of it ; then shewed him in what order the names were subscribed. Here, says he, is the late archbishop of Caunterbury's hand uppermost, towards the right side ; next under that, the bishop of Rochester's. Under his the lord Cornbury's : over against the bishop of Rochester's to the left, is first the earl Salisbury's, then still to the left the earl of Marlborough's, and so of the rest ; pointing to the place of every particular name very expertly.

I also well remember, that, in the instructions, there was a list of several other names, that were not in the original forged Association ; which no doubt, were put in towards the forming of more new false Associations ; as, before I intimated, most certainly was his intention, if this had gained credit.

But for the persons, added Young, you must get a view of them as soon as you can. And (as far as I can recollect, all that follows was in his paper of written instructions) the earl of Salisbury, when in town, is at his house in the Strand ; when in the country, at Hatfield in Hertfordshire, beyond Barnet. The earl of Marlborough is so well known about Whitehall and St. James's, that you will easily find where he dwells. The bishop of Rochester is to be seen either at his house at Bromley in Kent, or at Westminster, where he is dean.

And as for the place, and time, and company ; you must swear, that you saw these three lords on such a day (mentioning a particular day which I have forgot) come to the Lobster alehouse in Southwark : that they came in white camblet clokes, with cravats about their necks : that the sign was, their inquiring for the number Three : that then they were conducted up stairs into a back room ; and there, in the presence of you and me, and captain Lawe (I think also he named one or two more) they signed the association : then, delivering it to captain Lawe, they said, Captain, we pray, make haste about to get this paper speedily subscribed by the rest, who you know are concerned ; and that then these three lords threw down their twelve-pence a-piece, and so went their ways.

I know my reader, upon sight of all this strange stuff, cannot forbear smiling : which, perhaps, it is not decent for me to make him do, so near the end of this tragedy.

But it is none of my fault : I only, as near as I am able, relate the simple truth. Most certainly it was sworn, that Holland communicated all this to the secretary of state : and, being examined by some lords of the council, affirmed it all upon oath : and I am sure, that, upon oath also, he repeated it all before the justices of the sessions, and the grand jury of Middlesex, on the day that the bill of forgery, and subornation of perjury, was found against Blackhead and Young.

And besides, that which to me confirms the truth of Holland's testimony beyond contradiction, is, that every word of the instructions was undeniably written by Young's own hand ; which, by this time, I hope my reader will take me to be a competent judge of.

For, since I began my knowledge of him, on the 13th of June last, I have seen so very many papers of his own hand-writing, (I mean his true hand, not his false) that now I may presume to say, I think myself as well-skilled in knowing his hand, as he is in counterfeiting mine.

I cannot therefore see how he can possibly be excused from ridiculous folly, as well as shameless subornation, in this last so very subtle an intrigue.

I must therefore, upon this occasion, crave his leave to apply one certain general observation to Robert Young in particular, that there was never yet a very great knave, but he proved, some time or other, as great a fool.

I have now, in good earnest, done with Robert Young. But, when I reflect on what I have been doing all this while, I am almost out of countenance at it. It vexes me, that whilst my happy deliverance might have suggested to me so many better and more useful thoughts, both in regard to the public, and my own private part in it, I should be so long diverted another way, to follow this impious wretch through one kingdom to another, from gaol to gaol, from pillory to pillory.

Nor could I have submitted to so mean a task, had not some good and great men thought it necessary not so much for my own vindication, much less for my own revenge, the thoughts of which are far below me as a Christian, and a bishop; as for the security of other innocent persons: and that this might be some warning to my country, in time to come, against the like wicked forgeries, subornations, and false plots.

It is indeed somewhat strange, that when the laws of England are so watchful and jealous (perhaps more than the laws of any other kingdom) in defending the liberties and properties of the subject from all injustice, fraud, and oppression; yet they may seem not to have been equally careful, not so much as the laws of most of our neighbouring nations, in providing severely enough against that worst sort of perjury, which reaches to the taking away of mens' lives.

For my part, I can assign no other reason of this defect, but the same for which the Romans had for some ages no laws against parricides; that is, that the ancient simplicity and generosity of the English nation did never imagine any Englishmen could possibly be guilty of such diabolical wickedness, as to turn accusers for the sake of accusing, and in cold blood, by perjury to destroy innocent men, to whom they were utter strangers, and who had never in the least provoked them.

I am inclined to believe, that this was the cause why our country has been hitherto deficient in laws of this kind, at least since the conquest.

But if we consider the different degrees of the offences themselves, how can it possibly be thought a crime of the same magnitude, to swear a man falsely out of a part (a small part perhaps) of his goods and estate, as to swear him falsely out of his life, his honour, his very name, as well as his whole estate; as in the case of high treason? Yet, by all our laws now in being, if I am not misinformed, the penalties of these greatest of perjuries are not much heavier than those which are inflicted for the least.

And what temptation must this be to forswearers, in matters of state especially, when the reward is like to be considerable, if they carry their point so far as to have their false plots believed to be real; and on the other hand, the penalties cannot by law be very grievous, should they be detected of swearing to plots most impudently false? Especially considering, that such infamous persons, knowing they are safe from extraordinary punishment, particularly from punishment by death, have usually no great dread of the shame, or pain of the ordinary ones, such as pillorying and the like; as having, perhaps, been often inured to them before.

To prove what I say, I need alledge no other example but this of Robert Young. My reader finds he has stood in the pillory more than once for several petty forgeries: petty I call them, only in comparison to this. And what a mighty business were it now, if for contriving the final ruin of so many guiltless persons, and their posterity, by the basest means, Robert Young should be adjudged once more to stand in the pillory?

Or what would it have availed me, or my family, in this world at least, should I have died, as guilty of treason, by this villain's false testimony, if afterwards, upon the detection of his perjury (as I am persuaded God would not have suffered so horrid a villainy to prosper, or remain long undiscovered) I say, what great comfort or compensation had it been to my family, and my friends, if, after my unjust execution, they had heard that the wicked author of it had stood once more in the pillory, and perhaps lost the tip of his ear?

Wherefore may it not well become the prudence of our lawgivers, upon occasion of so notorious an instance, together with some others within our memories, to review, once for all, the laws now in force against forgery and perjury? And then to adjust the distinct punishments a little more proportionably to the different guilt, and the several degrees of these crimes; for the future, I mean: God forbid I should propose, that any such law should have a retrospect, even upon Blackhead or Young.

But I presume to urge this the rather, at this time, because of the common saying, 'That ill manners make good laws;' that is, as I understand the proverb, they render the making of them to be necessary. And if this be true, perhaps there was never yet any one age, since the English were a nation, when the ill manners of false witnesses, their frequent subornations, perjuries, and forgeries, have more deserved to be restrained by some good new laws, than this very age wherein we live.

I could heartily wish so great a benefit might accrue to the public, by the happy discovery of this inhuman design, so as to deter ill men from attempting any more such; then I should think my own troubles more than enough recompensed, I should even rejoice in the extreme peril, to which I myself was thereby exposed.

But however that shall happen, I am sure there is another use of this signal providence, which, by God's grace, it is in my own power to make, and if I do not, I ought to be esteemed as the most ungrateful of men to the heavenly goodness; that is, if I do not render it the chief business of my whole life to return some suitable thanks to Heaven for it.

I hope I may say, without vanity, that perhaps it is hard to meet, in some whole ages, with many examples, wherein the divine favour has snatched any private person out of such imminent danger, with a more visible hand than it has done me out of this.

Why may I not be allowed, in all humility, to say thus much? since it is so manifest, that the destruction or preservation of me and mine, did depend upon the clerk of the council's turning to the right hand, or to the left, when he entered to search my house at Bromley.

By God's mercy and direction he turned to the left; there examined all places so curiously, as to pass by no corner unobserved, yet he found nothing on that side worthy the observation of one that came on such an errand.

Whereas, had he chanced to turn, chanced did I say? I cannot believe that any thing fell out by chance in this whole business; but had God permitted him to turn on the right hand, the first room he had entered was that very parlour, wherein was deposited the fatal instrument of my death; nor could he have missed it, but must have immediately lighted upon it, considering the punctual instructions he had received, to search all the chimnies, and the flower-pots in them.

And, had he once found it, the writing itself, so nearly resembling my own hand, and taken in my dwelling-house, had soon overwhelmed me with supposed guilt, without any further need of Blackhead's, or Young's assistance.

For, in so great a surprize, and consciousness of my own innocency, whom had I to accuse, or suspect, but only Mr. Dyve and Mr. Knight themselves, for having put the Association into the same flower-pot, whence I had seen them take it out? And this, indeed, had been another aggravation of my misfortune, that I should have been forced to impute so vile a treachery to persons as innocent in this, as I myself was in the Association.

Moreover, let my reader but recollect the particular time when all this happened, and I need mention no other proof, or circumstance, of the marvellous greatness of my danger and escape.

It was in the beginning of May last, a time when perhaps there was as great a consternation, both in town and country, as was ever known in England; the English fleet was scarce yet out of the river; the Dutch, for the most part, at home; the French in the mouth of the channel, and only kept back by contrary winds; a terrible invasion hourly expected from France; the army beyond sea, that should have defended us; a real plot and confederacy by many whispered about, by the common people believed; many persons of great quality imprisoned upon that suspicion; all mens' minds prepared to hear of some sudden rising or discovery.

In such a critical time of public terror and distraction, how very little evidence would have sufficed to ruin any man, that had been accused with the least probability of truth? And how then had it been possible for me to have stood the torrent of common fame and passion against so great a notoriety of fact, had that paper of a pretended Association been really found in my house?

What tumult and rage had been on all sides of me, upon such a discovery! How fitly had such a story served to inflame the generality of men against me! How long a time must it have been, before the still voice of innocency could be heard!

Would it not have been said, 'Can he deny it to be his own hand? Are not the hands of the rest well known? Was it not found in his house? In so secret a place there? Who could have laid it there but himself?' This certainly had been the universal clamour.

But, above all, what a mischievous advantage had this given to the enemies of the church of England, to insult and triumph over it on my account! And that, in truth, had more sensibly and deeply wounded me, than any thing else which could have befallen myself.

But God prevented all this, by covering, if I may so say, the hand-writing against me in my chimney, as long as the finding of it there might have been to my destruction; and then, by suffering my accusers to fetch it thence, and produce it in such a time, and in such a way, as could only tend to their own confusion.

To God, therefore, my only deliverer, be the praise: and, as I doubt not, but all good and innocent men, for the common sake of innocency vindicated, will receive this account of my deliverance with kindness and good-will, so I do most solemnly oblige myself, and all mine, to keep the grateful remembrance of it perpetual and sacred.

THO. ROFFEN.

Blackhead and Young were afterwards tried and convicted for this forgery; and in the year 1700, Young was executed at Tyburn for coining, and at the gallows delivered the following Speech to the reverend Mr. Allen the Ordinary.

A True Copy of the PAPER delivered by ROBERT YOUNG to the reverend Mr. Allen, Ordinary, at Tyburn, on the 19th of April, 1700.

Published by Permission of Authority.

I cannot but be very sensible, how justly I have provoked a most merciful and just God to anger, by manifold offences I have committed, and therefore, for the necessary discouragement of others, who shall endeavour to tread in my steps, and parallel my forgeries; I conceived it a duty incumbent on me, to leave to the world a true and faithful narrative of my prevaricating steps: but the shortness of time allotted me, being not sufficient to furnish such a work in, I will mention only these few passages of my life.

And, first, I think myself especially obliged to discover to the public, how far I was concerned in that pretended Plot, supposed to be carried on by the earls of Marlborough and Salisbury, the lord bishop of Rochester, and some others; the truth of which, I call God to witness, is as follows: I was committed to Newgate, 'till I discharged a certain fine imposed on me; during my confinement, one Henry Pearson, a surgeon, I think, was committed to the same place for debt, he perceiving me to be very expert in counterfeiting hands, told me, that if I could contrive a sham plot, and father it upon those noble peers, I might soon have money enough to pay my fine: being in very low circumstances, I readily consented to this proposal, but told him, nothing could be done in that matter, 'till he was released, which in a short time was effected. As soon as he was at liberty, he employed one Blackhead to carry letters between us. I happened, by a certain stratagem, to see the earl of Marlborough's hand; this I counterfeited so cunningly, that it was very difficult to discern the true from the false; then I drew up an Association, and affixed to it the hands of the earls of Marlborough and Salisbury, as also sir Basil Firebrass's; the lord bishop of Rochester's, and the lord Cornbury's was wrote by another hand, according to my request. And that the more credit might be given to this pretended plot, I wrote several letters in the name of the lord Marlborough (for I was perfectly acquainted with his way of writing), supposed to be directed to me, which Blackhead used to bring me again; and yet he swore before the Lords of the council, that the said earl sent them to me; whereas, to his knowledge, I myself forged them, and ordered them to be sent after that manner. This is the truth of that business, which has made so great a noise in the world; and humbly beg the pardon of those noble peers, and do declare once more, in the presence of God, that I did not set the bishop of Rochester's or the lord Cornbury's hand to the said paper, yet it was done by my consent, by another person. And whereas I am accused with writing several threatening letters to the said lord bishop, if he did not leave 100*l.* in a certain place; I declare as I am a dying man, I was not concerned in it. As for this crime of coining, for which I die, I declare before God, I am no otherwise guilty than by being a spectator.

But though I am not guilty of this fact, yet I must lay my hand upon my mouth, and confess that the Lord is righteous, and his judgments upright, for I have injured my neighbour so often by forgeries, cheats, &c. that I think it scarce possible to recount them. But that I may not totally omit them neither: in the year 1695, I removed myself, by Habeas Corpus, from the King's bench to the Fleet, where I came acquainted with Mr. Hunter, now living in Billiter-lane, Mr. George Alliver, alias Block, Mr. Dawson, Mr. Greenfield, Mr. Coin, and others whom I have forgot. In the end, we concluded to cheat one Mr. Thomas Lasenby, of Leeds in Yorkshire, out of cloth, to the value of 135*l.* which accordingly was effected, and the cloth delivered at the Bear-Inn in Basinghall-street. In the year 97, I was, by the warden of the Fleet, removed back again to the King's-bench, where I came acquainted with Mr. John Carey, George Benson, and James Roberts, and by false bills of Exchange, and forged letters, endeavoured to cheat Mr. Seth Lofthouse, a goldsmith in Fleet-street, and Peter Block Mochiels, a merchant in Amsterdam, out of 1,600*l.* but that failed, though Carey was pilloried for it. In the aforesaid year 97, I came acquainted likewise with one Mr. John Griffin of Tuttle-street, Westminster, and by forged leases, as under one Dr. Thomas Lamplugh's hand, I have cheated men in town out of several hundred pounds by way of mortgages. Sir John Johnson, an alderman and goldsmith in Cheapside, since deceased, very narrowly escaped of being cheated out of 200*l.* by virtue of one of the aforementioned leases.

In the year 1698, the aforesaid persons, and I, cheated Mr. Azariah Reynolds, an undertaker in Cheapside, of a velvet pall, two cloaks, &c. by a forged letter, as from his correspondent in the country, for which I was committed to Newgate, and fined 200 marks at Guildhall, where I received my trial, and was convicted.

In Newgate, I came acquainted with Jones, the evidence, whom I saw coin in the debtor's hall, several sums of money. How far I was concerned with him, I have already observed; but I forgive them, and do humbly beg God, and the persons I have wronged, to forgive me those wicked actions I have committed. Into thy hands, O God, I commend my spirit! Lord Jesus, receive the soul of the unhappy and miserable

In the course of the proceedings upon this Petition, their lordships (April 13, 1808) ordered to be printed a Report from the Committee of Privileges, to whom the consideration of his Petition had been referred. By means of that Report, I am enabled to improve the account of this case, given in former editions, by the insertion of matter relating to it, which is contained in the Minute Book and Committee Book, but does not appear upon the Journal. I insert not, however, the whole of the new matter contained in that Report, but only such parts of it as correct or illustrate what was inserted in the former Edition of the "State Trials."

March 22, 1694.

It is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That Mr. Attorney-General do give this House an account in writing of the proceedings in the court of King's Bench, against the person who claims the title of earl of Banbury.

April 11, 1694.

Then their majesties Attorney-General delivered in an Account of the proceedings in the Court of King's-Bench, against the person who claims the title of the earl of Banbury, which was read as follows, viz.

An Account of the Proceedings in the Court of King's-bench, against the person who claims the title of earl of Banbury, delivered in by their Majesties Attorney-General, pursuant to an order of the right honourable the lords spiritual and temporal in Parliament assembled, the 22d of March, 1694.

A bill of indictment being found at Hicks's-hall, in December, 1692, against Charles Knowles, esq. for the murder of Philip Lawson, gent. it was removed into the King's-bench, and the said Charles Knowles was, in Hillary term following, arraigned thereupon in the King's-bench, and put in a special Plea in writing to this effect, That he ought not to be compelled to answer to that indictment, because king Charles the 1st, by letters patents under the great seal, which he produced in court, dated the 18th of August, in the 2nd year of his reign, created William, then viscount Wallingford, earl of Banbury, and conferred upon him the name, stile, title, and dignity of earl of Banbury, to hold to the said William, and the heirs males of his body for ever: that earl William thereby became seized of the honour of earl of Banbury, to him, and the heirs males of his body, and died thereof so seized; and that the said honour descended to Edward, his son and heir male of his body, who became seized thereof in fee-taile to him, and the heirs males of the body of the said William, and that he died seized without any issue male of his body; after whose death, the said title and honour of earl of Banbury, descended to Nicholas Knowles, as heir male of the body of the said William, (that is to say) brother and heir of Edward, who was son and heir of the said William, by which the said Nicholas was earl of Banbury, and seized of the title and honour of earl of Banbury, in his demesne as of fee, to him, and the heirs male of the body of the said William, then earl of Banbury, issuing; and being thereof so seized, the said

Nicholas died; after whose death, the said title and honour of earl of Banbury did descend to the defendant Charles, as heir male of the body of the said William, late earl of Banbury, viz. son and heir of Nicholas, brother and heir of Edward, who was son and heir of William; whereby the defendant came, and yet is seized of, and in the state, degree, and honour of earl of Banbury, in his demesne as of fee-taile, to him, and the heirs males of the body of the said William issuing, and yet is earl of Banbury, which he is ready to verify; and therefore he the said defendant Charles, not being named in the indictment by the name of earl of Banbury, prayed judgment of the indictment, and whether he ought further to be compelled to answer to it.

To this Plea their majesties Attorney-General, by protestation, not acknowledging any thing in the said Plea to be true, replied, That the defendant ought to answer to that indictment, for that the said Charles Knowles, by the name of Charles earl of Banbury, the thirteenth of December, in the fourth year of their majesties reign, exhibited a petition in writing to the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, thereby alledging, and pretending, that he then was by right of inheritance earl of Banbury, and one of the peers of this realm; and then indicted for the death of the said Lawson, and humbly prayed the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the said Charles, of and for the death of the said Lawson, might be tried by the peers of this realm. And that it was thereupon so proceeded, that on the 17th of January following, it was by the said lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, according to the law and custom of parliament, resolved, considered, and ordered, that the said Charles had not any right to the said title and honour of earl of Banbury, and that the petition should be dismissed, as by the record thereof, amongst the records of parliament more fully appeared. And prayed judgment, that the said indictment might be adjudged good, and that the defendant might answer over to the indictment.

Some time having been spent in motions about the pleadings, and in giving rules to the defendant to rejoin to the attorney-general's replication, and about bailing the defendant, and the defendant having demurred to the replication, wherein the attorney-general joined, not moving to have the record a concilium (as is usual for the party to do that demurs); the attorney-general moved it in Michaelmas term last, and by rule of court it was made a concilium, and appointed to be argued the then next term, which was Hilary term last: in which term, near the beginning, it was argued by counsel on both sides. And on the defendant's counsel's motion, another day was appointed for a further argument at the same term; at which day it was argued on the king's behalf, and no counsel then attending for the defendant, the court made a rule that the defendant should answer over, unless cause should he shewed to the contrary the Saturday following; at which time it was argued for the defendant (there being then, and at the last argument, only two judges in court, one judge dying in the beginning of the term, and another being absent by reason of sickness). Upon which last argument the court discharged the former rule; and upon the defendant's counsel's motion, a further concilium was made of it, for the next Easter term.

The Defendant is under bail, corpus for cor-pore.

Upon reading this day, An Account of the proceedings in the court of King's-bench, against the person who claims the title of earl of Banbury, it is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That such of the justices of their majesties court of King's-bench as are now in town, and not sick, do attend this house on Saturday next, at eleven o'clock in the forenoon.

April 13, 1694.

Whereas to-morrow is appointed for the judges to attend upon the Account delivered in the eleventh instant, by their majesties Attorney-General, of the proceedings in their majesties court of King's-bench, against the person who claims the title of earl of Banbury, it is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That all the judges now in town, do attend this house thereupon on Monday next, at eleven of the clock, and that all the lords be summoned then to attend.

Nov. 27, 1694.

A debate arising touching the proceedings in the court of King's-bench, relating to the person who claims the title of earl of Banbury,

The question was put, Whether Mr. Attorney-General shall give this House an account what proceedings have been in the court of King's-bench, since the 11th of April, 1694, in relation to the person who claims the title of earl of Banbury?

It was resolved in the affirmative.

It is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That their majesties Attorney-General do give this House an account on Tuesday the 4th day of December next, what proceedings there have been in the court of King's-bench, relating to the person who claimed the title of earl of Banbury, since the 11th of April, 1694, and that all the lords be summoned then to attend.

Dec. 4, 1694.

After their majesties attorney general had given the house an account of the proceedings in the court of King's-bench, in relation to the person who claimed the title of earl of Banbury, and debate thereupon,

The question was put, whether the house shall be now adjourned?

It was resolved in the negative. And Ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the proper officer in the court of King's-bench, do bring before this house, to morrow at eleven o'clock, the record of the judgment of Charles Knowles, who claimed the title of earl of Banbury, and the proceedings of that court thereupon.

It is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the debate this day touching the proceedings in the court of King's-bench, in relation to the person who claimed the title of earl of Banbury, shall be adjourned till to morrow morning, eleven of the clock in the forenoon.*

Dec. 5, 1694.

The record of the court of King's-bench being this day brought into the House, (pursuant to the order yesterday) relating to the person who claimed the title of earl of Banbury, and a debate arising thereupon, it is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the said debate shall be, and is hereby adjourned until Wednesday next, the 12th day of this instant December, at ten o'clock in the forenoon.

It is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the records of the court of King's-bench, brought in this day, shall be returned to the proper officers, and that they attend with them again, on Wednesday the 12th day of this instant December, at ten o'clock in the forenoon.

Dec. 12, 1694.

This day being appointed to resume the fore-said debate, concerning the person who claimed the title of earl of Banbury, and for the proper officers of the court of King's-bench, to attend with the records of that court relating thereunto, it is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the said debate shall be, and is hereby adjourned, till Monday the 24th day of this instant December, at ten of the clock in the forenoon, and that the proper officers of the court of King's-bench do then attend with the records as was formerly ordered.

Dec. 22, 1694.

It is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That this House will resume the adjourned debate concerning the person who claimed the title of earl of Banbury on Wednesday the second day of January next, at ten o'clock in the forenoon, and that the proper officers of the court of King's bench do then attend with the records as formerly ordered.

Jan. 26, 1697.

A Petition to his majesty being this day offered on behalf of the person who claims the title of earl of Banbury, and his majesty's reference thereupon, it is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the said Petition and reference shall be considered on Saturday the 29th day of January instant, at 12 o'clock, and that all the Lords be summoned then to attend; and the clerks then bring the books wherein the former proceedings in relation to this matter are entered.

Jan. 29, 1697.

The order being read for considering the petition of the person who claims the title of earl of Banbury,

The Petition to his Majesty, and his Majesty's reference thereupon to this House, was read as follows:

To the King's most excellent Majesty,

The humble Petition of Charles Knowles, son and heir of Nicholas, brother and heir of Edward, son and heir of William, late viscount Wallingford, and earl of Banbury,

Humbly sheweth; That his late most excellent majesty king Charles the first, by his letters patents, under his great seal of England, bearing date at Canterbury, the 18th day of August, in the second year of his reign, of his special grace, certain knowledge, and mere motion, did prefer and create William, then viscount Wallingford, to the state, degree, and honour of earl of Banbury, and did give to him the name, style, and dignity thereof, and with the same name, degree, and dignity of earl, did really invest, and nobilitate him, to hold the same to him the said William, and the heirs males of his body issuing for ever: That by force of these letters patents, the said William became seized to him, and the heirs males of his body, of the said earldom, and accordingly had and enjoyed place and precedence in the House of Peers as an earl of this kingdom: That the said William died so seized, leaving Edward and Nicholas his issue. That Edward died under age, and without issue; whereupon the said title descended to your petitioner's said father Nicholas, and he became thereby rightfully entituled to the said name, title, and dignity, and was accordingly deemed, reputed, and taken as earl of Banbury, and as such sat in the House of Lords, in the convention parliament, upon the restoration of king Charles 2. That afterwards, some dispute arising, concerning the precedence of the said Nicholas, and the influence of the late king James, then duke of York, prevailing against him, your petitioner's said father, he was forced to withdraw and forbear the use of his right of sitting in the House as a peer of this realm, during his life, although he had proved his legitimacy and heirship, by four witnesses, sworn at the bar of the House of Peers, and examined at a committee, who made a report accordingly, in favour of his right, as by the proceedings in the House more fully appears: That by his decease, the said title and dignity descended upon your petitioner, as his son and heir: that your petitioner having had the misfortune of being accused and imprisoned for killing Philip Lawson, your petitioner did, for his trial, and in order to have it according to the laws of this realm, by his peers, petition the House of Lords thereupon; whereas your petitioner ought in duty, according to the legal methods in cases of this nature used and approved, to have made his application to your most sacred majesty, as the fountain of all the honour within this realm; and accordingly the misadvised petition was dismissed. And your petitioner further humbly shews, that then your petitioner was indicted for the offence committed, by the name of Charles Knowles; and upon his arraignment in the King's-bench, your petitioner did plead the said title, and the descent thereof to him, in manner aforesaid, and that therefore his name was Charles earl of Banbury; to which your majesty's Attorney General replied the dismissal of the said petition by the House of Peers, and thereupon your petitioner demurred; and after many long arguments, judgment was given by the right honourable the Lord Chief Justice Holt, and the rest of the judges there, in favour of your petitioner's name and title: That your petitioner stands likewise indicted by the name of Charles earl of Banbury, for the same offence, and that the same remains undetermined, for the reasons aforesaid. That by reason of the premises, your petitioner did suffer long imprisonment, and great expences, and is still under the same accusation, by the name of a peer, and as such hath been taxed upon the poll act, and during your petitioner's troubles, writs have issued out of your majesty's court of Exchequer, for the same charge as a peer, which he hath since satisfied.

Now, forasmuch as your petitioner humbly conceives himself well entitled to the said title and dignity, and that your petitioner may the better be enabled to shew and manifest his zeal for your majesty's service, as by the duty of his allegiance he is obliged,

Your petitioner humbly prays your majesty's tender consideration of the premises, and that you would be pleased to declare your royal pleasure in favour of your petitioner's said right, by granting him a writ of summons to parliament, or to recommend your petitioner's case to an examination by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, in order to your majesty's more certain information of the truth of the premises; or otherwise to do herein, as your majesty's great wisdom shall seem most meet.

And your petitioner shall, as in duty bound, daily pray for your majesty's, &c. BANBURY.

WILLIAM R.

We are graciously pleased to refer this Petition to the House of Peers, to examine the petitioner's claim and title therein mentioned, and to certify us how the same shall appear to them, with their opinion thereupon. Given at our court at Kensington, the 18th day of January, 1697, in the 9th year of our reign.

By his majesty's command. JA. VERNON.

After debate thereupon,

These lords following were appointed to draw up a Representation to be presented to his majesty, of what proceedings have been formerly in this House, in relation to this matter, and report the same to this House:

Their lordships, or any five of them, to meet on Tuesday next, at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, in the prince's lodgings, near the House of Peers. And it is ordered, That this committee do meet again on Thursday the 3rd day of February next, at eleven o'clock, in the same place, to consider of the proceedings of the court of King's-bench, since the judgment of this House, 17th of January, 1692, in relation to this matter, and have power to send for persons, papers, and records, and report to this House their opinion thereupon.

February 1, 1697.

A Representation of the form of proceedings in this matter was drawn and ordered to be reported.

Memorandum, that being transcribed, it was left with the lord in the chair.

Ordered by the Lords Committees appointed to draw a Representation to be presented to his majesty of what proceedings have been formerly in the House of Peers relating to Charles Knowles, who claims the title of earl of Banbury, That the proper officer in the court of King's-bench do bring before their lordships on Thursday next, at 11 o'clock, in the prince's lodgings, &c. the records of all the proceedings in the said court of King's-bench, relating to the trial of the said Charles Knowles, who stiles himself earl of Banbury.

February 3, 1697.

Mr. Harcourt is called in.

He saith the indictment is in the Treasury-office.

Mr. Bolt, the officer there, being not yet come with the record, the yeoman usher is sent to him to attend presently with it.

The said officer being come with the record, Mr. Harcourt reads the indictment, the plea, and the following proceedings thereupon, relating to the trial of Charles Knowles, in the court of King's-bench, touching the murder of Philip Lawson.

The officers withdraw.

Mr. Harcourt being called in again, was asked,

Whether there was any further indictment directed by the court of King's-bench than the above mentioned?

He saith there was none directed by the court, but he thinks there was an inquisition found, and that it was by the name of Charles Knowles.

He is directed to search whether he was not since the before mentioned proceedings, indicted by the name of Charles earl of Banbury. He is also ordered to attend at the next meeting with the records now read by him.

Ordered, That the Lord Chief Justice of the court of King's-bench, do attend their lordships on Saturday next, at 11 o'clock, in relation to the proceedings that have been before him in the said court of King's-bench, on the trial of the person that stiles himself earl of Banbury.*

This entry of February 3rd, and the two preceding of February, are not in the Journal; I have extracted them from the Report of the Comm. of Priv. ordered to be printed April 13, 1808, in which they are cited from the Committee Book, in which are likewise contained the following entries of Feb. 5th, and Feb. 7th.

February 3, 1697.

The earl of Rochester reported from the Committee the representation drawn by them to be presented to his majesty, in relation to the

February 5, 1697.

The Lord Chief Justice of the court of King's-bench, being called in and acquainted with the order to the committee, and told, that their lordships have perused the record of the said court, relating to the trial of the person who calls himself earl of Banbury, for the murder of Philip Lawson, and he being acquainted by their lordships there having been an indictment before him and the other judges of the court of King's bench, against the said person, by the name of Charles Knowles, esq. since the House of Lords had come to a judgment that the said person had no right to the title of earl of Banbury, and that the Attorney General had pleaded the said judgment of the House, yet the court of King's-bench had thought fit to quash the said indictment, he was desired to give their lordships an account why that court had so done. He spoke to the effect following:

"I acknowledge the thing. There was such a plea and such a replication. I gave my judgment according to my conscience. We are trusted with the law, we are to be protected, and not arraigned, and are not to give reasons for our judgment, and therefore I desire to be excused from giving any."—He withdraws.

After some time he is called in again, and asked, whether he persists in the answer he hath given.

He answered to the effect following:

"I gave judgment as it appears on the record.

"It would be a submitting to an arraignment for having given judgment if I should give any reasons here. I gave my reasons in another place at large.

"If your lordships report this to the House, I desire to know when you do so, that I may then desire to be heard in point of law.

"The judgment is questionable in a proper method, but I am not to be questioned for my judgment.

"Mr. Justice Eyres (who then sat on the bench with me, and concurred with me and the other judges) is living. I am not any way to be arraigned for what I do judicially. The judgment may be arraigned in a proper method by writ of error. I might answer if I would, but I think it safest for me to keep myself under the protection the law has given me; I look upon this as an arraignment; I insist upon it, if I am arraigned, I ought not to answer."—He withdraws.

Ordered, That Mr. Justice Eyres do attend their lordships on Monday next, at 11 o'clock, in relation to the proceedings that have been before him in the court of King's-bench, on the trial of the person that stiles himself earl of Banbury.

Mr. Harcourt attending with the records of the King's-bench, is called in, he read an ab-proceedings of this House, upon the petition of a person who claims the title of earl of Banbury, which was read, and agreed to as follows, viz.

We the Lords spiritual and temporal in par-stract he had taken of them, and left it with the clerk.

He acquainted their lordships, that Mr. Knowles is now under bail.

Saith there were two indictments. The indictment by the name of Charles Knowles, is quashed. The other by the name of earl of Banbury, is still in being—being asked how the indictments were brought into court, he said it was by rule of court.

Adjourned to Monday, 11 o'clock.

February 7, 1697.

Mr. Justice Eyres attending, was called in, and acquainted in the same manner as the Lord Chief Justice had been, what the Lords Committees had observed upon perusal of the records of the court of King's-bench, relating to the trial of the person claiming to be earl of Banbury, and being asked the same question the said Lord Chief Justice had been asked, he answered to the effect following:

"I remember we adjudged the earl of Banbury's plea to be good in law; he was indicted by the name of Charles Knowles, esq. he pleaded a patent to his grandfather from king Charles the first, and claimed by descent from him; we all held it a good plea, and I was of that opinion, I own it, it was according to my judgment and conscience.

"The king intrusts me with the administration of justice. I have ever given my opinion upon the greatest consideration and upon my conscience.

"I humbly beg pardon if I say I ought not by the law to be called to account for the reasons of my opinion. If we err, the judgment may be rectified by writ of error, but the law acquits us.

"I humbly beg pardon as to the reasons for my opinion; if the matter come before the lords by writ of error I shall give my reasons as well as my opinion, being called by writ ad consulendum. I humbly beg your pardon for giving no reasons at present."

Ordered to report the matter specially.

The following entry of what was done on February 10, is inserted in the Report ordered to be printed April 13th, 1808, from the Minute Book:

February 10, 1697.

The report from the lords committees appointed to consider of the proceedings in the King's-bench since the judgment of the house, January 17, 1692, in relation to the person who claims the title of E. of Banbury, was read as follows:

That their lordships have perused the Records of the said court relating to the trial of the person who calls himself earl of Banbury for the murder of Philip Lawson, and have been attended by the lord chief justice of that court, liament assembled, having received a reference upon a petition to your majesty, from a person who stiles himself earl of Banbury, for a writ of summons to sit as a peer in parliament, do and he being acquainted by their lordships that there having been an indictment before him, and the other judges of the court of King's-bench against the said person by the name of Charles Knowles, esq. since the house of lords had come to a judgment that the said person had no right to the title of earl of Banbury; and that though his majesty's attorney general had pleaded the said judgment, yet they had thought fit to quash the said Indictment. Their lordships desired him to give them an account why that court had so done.

He answered to the effect following:

"I acknowledge the thing; there was such a plea and such a plea and such a replication; I gave my judgment according to my conscience, we are trusted with the law: we are to be protected and not arraigned; and are not to give reasons for our judgment; therefore I desire to be excused for giving any.

"After some time being again asked whether he persisted in the answer he had now given, he answered to the effect following:

"I gave judgment as appears on the record. It would be a submitting to an arraignment for having given judgment if I should give any reasons here; I gave my reasons in another place at large.

"If your lordships report this to the house, I desire to know when you do so, that I may then desire to be heard in point of law.

"The judgment is questionable in a proper method; but I am not to be questioned for my judgment.

"I am not any way to be arraigned for what I do judicially; the judgment may be arraigned in a proper method by writ of error.

"I might answer if I would; but I think it safest for me to keep myself under the protection the law has given me. I look upon this as an arraignment; I insist upon it if I am arraigned I ought not to answer. Mr. Justice Eyre, who then sat on the bench and concurred with me and the other judges, is living.

"Whereupon Mr. Justice Eyre being summoned and attending was acquainted in the same manner as the lord chief justice had been what the lords committees had observed upon perusal of the records of the court of King's-bench, relating to the trial of the person claiming to be earl of Banbury, and being asked the same question the lord chief justice had been asked, he answered to the effect following:

"I remember we adjudged the earl of Banbury's plea to be good in law. He was indicted by the name of Charles Knowles, esq. tion of justice; I have ever given my opinion upon the greatest consideration and upon my conscience.

"I humbly beg pardon if I say I ought not by the law to be called to account for the reasons of my opinion; if we err in judgment the judgment may be rectified by writ of error, but the law acquits us.

"I humbly beg pardon as to the reasons for my opinion; if the matter come before the lords by writ of error, I shall give my reasons as well as my opinion, being called by writ ad consulendum. I humbly beg your pardon for giving no reasons at present.

"Proposed to hear the lord chief justice as to this point, whether he did right in refusing to give account to the committee or not of his reasons for his judgment in the King's-bench in relation to the quashing the indictment of a person who claimed the title of earl of Banbury.

"Ordered, that the lord chief justice of the King's-bench and Mr. justice Eyre do forthwith attend this House.

"The lord chief justice being come, the Speaker acquainted him with the report, and that thereupon the house had sent for him and Mr. Justice Eyre, and that the house expects that he give them an account why he refused to give the committee the account which he refused to do; and that he desiring to be heard when the report was made, they had now sent for him to give your reasons why he does not think fit to give the committee the reasons for your judgment.

"Then the order of reference to the committee was read.—And also the foregoing report from the committee was read.

"The lord chief justice was heard for himself.

"I never heard of any such thing demanded of any judge as to give reasons for his judgment. I did think myself not obliged by law to give that answer.

"What a judge does in open court he can never be arraigned for it as a judge.

"A privy counsellor and a jurymen is obliged to keep secret.

"Mr. Justice Eyre was heard. I have no reason to find fault with the report. I refer to what my lord chief justice hath said."

It was moved that the lord chief justice and J. Eyre withdraw.—Agreed that they do not withdraw.—After debate

The lord chief justice was heard, after the house in debate agreed, that the questions asked him at the committee were not intended as to accuse.

He said he had other reasons to induce him not to do it. Moved to adjourn the debate.

Ordered that this debate shall be adjourned to Monday next 11 o'clock.

Ordered, That the lord chief justice and Mr. justice Eyre attend this house on Monday next, his trial by his peers; and that if any question should arise thereupon, that he might be heard by his counsel at the bar of this House: upon which the lords did order the petitioner to be heard by his counsel at the bar of their House, for the making out this title to the said earldom; and also your majesty's Attorney-General to be heard on your majesty's behalf; and upon full hearing on both sides, the House came to this resolution and judgment,

That the petitioner had no right to the title of earl of Banbury, and ordered his petition to be dismissed; which judgment, the lords have great reason to believe, was not made known to your majesty at the time of making the aforesaid reference. All which is humbly represented to your majesty.

Ordered, That the lords, with white staves, do attend his majesty with the Representation of this House, concerning the person that claims the title of earl of Banbury.

February 7, 1697.

The earl of Rochester having offered to the House what he was ordered to report from the Lords' Committee, appointed to consider of the proceedings in the court of King's-bench, since the judgment of this House, of the 17th of January, 1692, in relation to the person who claimed the title of earl of Banbury, it is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That this matter shall be considered on Thursday next at eleven of the clock.

February 10, 1697.

After reading this day the reports from the Lords' Committees, appointed to consider of the proceedings in the court of King's-bench, since the judgment of this House, the 17th of January, 1692, in relation to the person claiming the title of earl of Banbury, and sending for, and hearing the lord-chief-justice of that court, and Mr. Justice Eyre, to the matter of the said report, and debate thereupon; it is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That this debate shall be, and is hereby adjourned to Monday next, at 11 o'clock in the forenoon; and that the said lord-chief-justice, and Mr. Justice Eyre, do then attend, and also one other judge of each court in Westminster-hall.

But there was no further proceeding in this business.

The Proceedings in the House relating to the title of the earl of Banbury, before March 22, 1693, is as followeth:

Earl of Banbury. July 13, 1660.

It was moved, That there being a person that now sits in this House as a peer, who, as is conceived, hath no title to be a peer, viz. the earl of Banbury, it is ordered, That this business shall be heard at the bar by counsel, on Monday come sennight.

June 6, 1661.

The lord-great-chamberlain signified to the House, That the king appointed him to deliver a paper to their lordships consideration, which was presented to his majesty, and the House commanded the same to be read, which was done, viz.

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty: The humble PETITION of NICHOLAS, Earl of BANBURY,

Humbly sheweth; That your majesty's royal father, king Charles, by his letters patents, under the great seal of England, bearing date the 18th of August, 2 Car. for the great and many services done by your petitioner's father, sir William Knowles, knight, and viscount Wallingford, granted to him, and his heirs males of his body issuing, the name, title, and dignity of earl of Banbury, with all privileges of state, and voice in parliament, as other peers of the kingdom had, as by the said letters patents more fully appears.

That the said earl, after marrying with Elizabeth, daughter of the earl of Suffolk, had issue by her, Edward, his eldest son, who died without issue, and your petitioner* was born in January, 1630, about a year and a half before the said earl's death.

That your petitioner, as son and heir of the said late earl, sate in the last parliament as earl of Banbury, as of right he might, and hath used and had all privileges as other earls there; but having no writ of summons to this present parliament from your majesty, as other the peers have, hath forborne to sit there, although he hath done nothing to deprive him of his title thereto, nor to his knowledge to incur your majesty's displeasure.

Your petitioner therefore humbly prays, That your majesty will be graciously pleased, that he may have a writ of summons to this parliament, as earl of Banbury, and enjoy all the precedency and privilege thereunto belonging, granted by your majesty's royal father, by his said letters patents.

And your petitioner shall acknowledge your majesty's justice therein, with due gratitude, and with all alacrity and fidelity endeavour to serve your majesty with his life and fortune, and ever pray for your majesty's long and happy reign.

BANBURY.

This being read, the Lord Chancellor acquainted the House, That his majesty signified his pleasure to him, that no writ should be issued out to summon the earl of Banbury to this parliament, upon some question that was made in this House last parliament, concerning him.

* Perhaps in the original Petition the word "who" was here inserted.

Hereupon it is ordered, That the said Petition, and contents thereof, are hereby referred to the Lords committees for privileges, who having heard the Petitioner by his counsel, or otherwise, and Mr. Attorney-General on the king's behalf, are afterwards to make report thereof to this House, and their lordships to meet when they please.

June 15, 1661.

Upon report of the committee of privileges, that the earl of Banbury desires some witnesses may be examined on his behalf, among whom is the countess of Salisbury, it is ordered, That the committee have hereby power to send for such witnesses as they think fit; observing such decorum as the quality of the person requires: and further, that Mr. Attorney-General do attend that committee on Monday next in the afternoon.

June 20, 1661.

Ordered, That the report from the committee of privileges, concerning the earl of Banbury, shall be made on Friday the 28th of this instant June.

July 1, 1661.

Upon the report this day made, concerning the Petition of Nicholas earl of Banbury, formerly brought into this House by a peer of this realm from his majesty, whereby the petitioner prayeth a writ of summons to this parliament, as earl of Banbury, and to enjoy all the precedencies and privileges thereunto belonging, granted by his majesty's letters patents to the last earl of Banbury; it is ordered, That the cause shall be heard at the bar on Monday, the 8th day of this instant July, by counsel, and witnesses are to attend at the said hearing; at which time, Mr. Attorney-General, and others of his majesty's counsel, (having timely notice given) are likewise to be heard on the King's behalf.

July 9, 1661.

This day the cause of Nicholas earl of Banbury, upon his Petition, wherein he prays a writ of summons to this parliament, as earl of Banbury, and to enjoy all the precedencies and privileges thereunto belonging, granted by his majesty's letters patents to the last earl of Banbury, was heard by counsel on the earl's part; and also Mr. Attorney-General, serjeant Maynard, and serjeant Glynn, counsel on the king's behalf, were heard: and in regard it was now late, it is ordered, That the resolution of this business shall be taken into consideration to-morrow morning.

July 10.

Upon consideration of the business of the earl of Banbury, heard at this bar yesterday, and after a long debate thereof, it is ordered, That the matter now in debate, concerning the earl of Banbury, is referred to the consideration of the committee of privileges; and also the matter of the right of precedency between the said earl of Banbury, and several peers of this realm, and to make report thereof to this House; the committee to meet on Monday next, at three o'clock in the afternoon.

July 19.

The earl of Northampton reported from the committee of privileges, that their lordships have considered of the earl of Banbury's business referred unto them, and their opinion is, That the earl of Banbury is, in the eye of the law, son of the late William, earl of Banbury; the House of Peers should therefore advise the king to send him a writ to come to parliament.

Also their lordships are of opinion, that the earl of Banbury ought to have place in the House of Peers, according to the date of his patent, and not according to the tenor of that part thereof which ranks him before other earls created before William, earl of Banbury. All which the Committee offer to their lordships judgment.

Ordered, That this House will take this report into consideration to-morrow morning.

July 25.

Ordered, That on the second Thursday after the next meeting of this House, after the adjournment, this House will take into consideration the report of the earl of Banbury's business.

Nov. 28, 1661.

The House took into debate the report concerning the earl of Banbury formerly made to this House; and the question being put, Whether to put off the consideration of this business to a further prefixed day? It was resolved in the affirmative.

Dec. 9, 1661.

An Act was read a first time, declaring Nicholas, earl of Banbury, to be illegitimate.

Oct. 26, 1669.

Upon calling of the House of Peers this day, the House taking notice that the earl of Banbury's name is not in the list by which the lords were called, it is ordered, That it be referred to the committee of privileges, to examine why the said earl of Banbury's name is left out of the said list, he having formerly sate as a peer in this House, and to peruse all former proceedings in this House concerning him, and to make report thereof to the House.

Nov. 25, 1669.

The earl of Essex reported to the House, that the committee of privileges, in pursuance of the order of this House, have examined their proceedings concerning the earl of Banbury; the order consisted of two parts, First, Why his lordship's name was left out of the list of the peers, touching which the lords have spoken with sir Edward Walker, principal king of arms, who delivered in the list, and he produced a book out of the herald's office, where it appears that the last William, earl of Banbury, died in the year 1632, and having had two wives, left no children.

Likewise he produced a roll, being a procedure of the king and the peers to Parliament in 1640, in which list there is no mention of the earl of Banbury's name among the peers.

Upon these grounds the said Edward Walker left out the name of the earl of Banbury in his list given unto this house.

The second part of the order was to present to the house, an account of the former proceedings in this house, concerning the earl of Banbury, and the lords committee find, That June 6, 1661, &c. being a recital of the proceedings before set forth.

February 23, 1669.

A Petition was presented to this house from the earl of Banbury, which was read as follows :

To the Right Honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled :
The humble PETITION of NICHOLAS, Earl of BANBURY,

Sheweth ; That your humble Petitioner hath the honour to be a peer of this realm by descent, and is legally entitled by right of inheritance, to the dignity and honour of the earl of Banbury, and ought therefore to have and enjoy his voice and seat in parliament, and all other pre-eminences to such dignity belonging ; and hath always, in all taxes, and payments of poll-money, and benevolencies, paid such sums, and in such proportions, as to the quality and degree of an English earl did appertain.

Nevertheless your Petitioner hath not yet had the honour to receive from his majesty such a writ of summons to parliament as is usually granted to other peers of this realm. Wherefore, since your petitioner is well assured that no legal impediment can be objected and proved against him, he most humbly prays this most honourable house, that he may receive such a writ of summons to the parliament now sitting, as may enable him to serve his majesty there, according to the duty of his place and quality. And your Petitioner shall pray, &c.

BANBURY.

Upon this, the House made this order following :

Upon reading the humble petition of Nicholas earl of Banbury this day, praying, that he may receive such a writ of summons to the parliament now sitting, as may enable him to serve his majesty there, according to the duty of his place and quality, it is ordered, That the said petition be referred to the lords committee for privileges, whose lordships having considered thereof, are afterwards to report their opinions to the house.

June 10, 1685.

Upon reading the Petition of a person that claimeth the title of earl of Banbury, it is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That it be referred to the lords committee for privileges, to examine all former proceedings of this house, relating to that case, and to report the same to this house.

June 23, 1685.

The earl of Aylesbury reported from the committee of privileges, that their lordships had read the petition of the person that claimeth the title of earl of Banbury, referred by the house to them to examine all former proceedings of the house relating to that cause ; that their lordships find, &c. being a narrative of all proceedings before recited, Whereupon the following order was made :

Upon report from the committee for privileges of the state of proceedings in the journals of this house in the business referred to them, concerning the claim of a person to the title of earl of Banbury, it is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That this house will hear his majesty's attorney-general on his majesty's behalf against the said claim, as also counsel for the person who claims the said title of earl of Banbury, on Monday the sixth of July next, at ten of the clock in the forenoon.

December 13, 1692.

Upon reading the Petition of a person that claims the title of earl of Banbury, it is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That this house will hear his majesty's attorney-general on his majesty's behalf, and all other persons that may be concerned therein, against the said claim, as also counsel for the person who claims the said title of earl of Banbury, on Monday the 9th day of January next, at ten of the clock in the forenoon, whereof the petitioner is to cause timely notice to be given to his majesty's attorney-general, and all other persons that may be concerned in the said claim.

January 9, 1692.

After hearing counsel this day at the bar, upon the petition of the person that claimeth the title of earl of Banbury, and their majesties attorney general, and debate thereupon, it is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the consideration of this business shall be, and is hereby adjourned to Saturday next at twelve o'clock, and that the two inquisitions taken formerly concerning this case, shall be then brought, and that the heralds do then attend, and bring with them all such papers and evidence as are in their office, relating to this matter, and that their majesties attorney-general be then further heard on their majesties behalf, and all others that may be any wise concerned.

January 14, 1692.

Counsel being called in, and after some time withdrawn, the order following was made:

It is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the officer, who hath the custody of the inquisitions taken after the death of William earl of Banbury, in the counties of Berks and Oxon, do forthwith attend this house with the said inquisitions.

The attorney-general being appointed to attend this day, and not being present when the cause of the person claiming the title of earl of Banbury was to be argued at the bar of this house, the following order was made: It is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That an address shall be made to his majesty, that the attorney-general for the time being may attend this house as an assistant, and that it be referred to the lords committee for privileges, to draw the same, and that the committee meet on Tuesday next, at four of the clock in the afternoon.

After hearing this day the heralds at arms, as to the petition of the person that claims the title of earl of Banbury, as also the attorney-general on their majesties behalf, against the said claim, and counsel for the person claiming; it was resolved, upon the question, That the debate thereupon shall be adjourned until Tuesday morning next, the first business.

January 17, 1692.

Then the order of the 14th instant being read for resuming the adjourned debate concerning the petitioner who claims the title of earl of Banbury, and the inquisition formerly taken upon the death of William earl of Banbury being also read, and after debate upon the said claim,

This question was put, Whether all the judges shall be heard in this case?

It was resolved in the negative. Cont. 29. Not Cont. 38.

It is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the Petition presented to this house the 13th of December last, by a person claiming the title of earl of Banbury, shall be, and is hereby dismissed this house.

The ARGUMENTS of the Lord Chief Justice HOLT, and Judge POWELL, in the controverted point of PEERAGE: in the case of the King and Queen against Charles Knowles, otherwise earl of Banbury.

The KING and QUEEN against CHARLES KNOWLES, otherwise the Earl of BANBURY.

He was indicted at the Old-Bailey of murder, and removed the indictment by Certiorari into the King's-bench, and there pleaded an abatement of the indictment, that he being indicted by the name of Charles Knowles, esq. at the time of the taking of the indictment, was earl of Banbury, and ought to have been indicted Emendat, 22 Junii, 1715.

"Die Martis, 24 Februarii, 1721, N^o 114.

"Ordered, That such lords as shall make Protestation or enter their dissents, to any votes of this House, as they have a right to do, without asking leave of the House, either with or without their Reasons, shall cause their protestation, or dissents, to be entered in the Clerk's Book, the next sitting day of this House, before the hour of two o'clock, otherwise the same shall not be entered, and shall sign the same before the rising of the House the same day." Ent. per Ord. 3 Martii, 1721.

by that name,* and by his plea intitles himself to that dignity, under Edward late earl of Banbury, whom he alledgeth to be seized, and being seized 'obiit inde Seisitus,' but omitted in the plea 'sine Herede Masculo de Corpore suo exind,' he making his title on failure of issue male of Edward. Then in another part of his plea it is alledged, 'Per quod idem Carolus fuit et adhuc existit Seisitus, omitting, 'Tempore Captionis Indictamenti predict,' the attorney-general had replied to the plea: But before any other thing done, or the plea, or replication entered on record, the defendant's counsel moved they might have leave to amend their plea in the particulars before-mentioned. The chief justice Holt, my brother Dolben, and myself, being only in court, and taking time to consider of it, my brother Dolben, and myself, delivered our opinions, that he might amend it; and my reasons were, that many amendments had been made in criminal matters by the court, as appears by sir John Curson's case, 2 Cr. 529. and Rolls 2 Rep. 59. Delvridge's case, Siderf. 243, 225. and Car. Cr. 144. And that none of these amendments could be made by force of any of the statutes of Jeofailes, none of them extending to any criminal cause, or other causes wherein the king is a party; as an information of instruction, or Quo Warranto, Car. Cr. 312. the king against Sherington Talbot; and therefore those amendments must be made by the warrant of the common law; and if the common law warrants any amendments in criminal matters, certainly while matters are in Fieri, and in the court by pleadings, in order to bring them before the court for judgment, before they are entered on record, the court may give the party leave to amend, as well in criminal causes as civil, before the matters are completed and entered on record. And I said, I could see no difference, in that the pleadings in the civil-side were brought into the office in paper; and in the crown-side, in treason, or felony, they were brought into the office in parchment. For to say it is all paper, in order to induce the court to allow the amendments, is but a phrase used to signify to the court that nothing is entered on record; and until then the court hath power over what is agitated there to allow reasonable amendments, in order to bring the matter before the court, and relied on the case of the attorney-general against Trinity-house; Siderf. fol. 54. But the chief-justice was totis viribus against the amendments, saying, it was never done but by reason of our opinions.

The KING and QUEEN against KNOWLES.

The defendant stands indicted by the name of Charles Knowles, esq. for the murder of Philip Lawson, who comes and pleads in abatement of this indictment, that king Charles the 1st, by his letters patent, under the great seal of Great Britain, dated the 18th of August, in the second year of his reign, which he shews to the court, did create William, then viscount Wallingford, earl of Banbury, to hold to him, and the heirs-males of his body; by virtue of which letters patent he was seized of the honour in his demesne, as of fee-taile, and being so seized, died thereof seized; after whose death, the honour of the earl of Banbury descended to Edward Knowles, as heir male of his body; who afterwards died seized of that honour without heir-male of his body; after whose death, the honour descended to Nicholas Knowles, brother of the said Edward Knowles, as heir-male of the body of William, whereby he became earl of Banbury; and being so seized of that honour, the said Nicholas died thereof seized, whereby the honour descended to the defendant, Charles Knowles, as heir-male of the body of Nicholas, whereby he is seized of the honour in fee-taile to him, and the heirs-males of his body; and concludes, et hoc parat est verificare; and demands the judgment of the court, whether he ought to answer to the indictment, not being indicted by the name of earl of Banbury. To which plea the king's attorney hath replied, that the defendant, by the name of earl of Banbury, did exhibit a petition to the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, thereby alledging and pretending, that, by right of inheritance, he was earl of Banbury, and one of the peers, and was indicted for the death of Lawson, and prayed he might be tried by his peers: and that 'talitur superinde processum fuit;' that by the said lords spiritual and temporal, 'secundum legem et consuetudinem parliamenti resolutem, consideratum, et ordinatum fuit,' that the defendant, Charles Knowles, had not any right to the titles and honours of earl of Banbury, and that his petition should stand dismissed; whereupon the defendant demurs. And I am of opinion that judgment in this case ought to be given for the defendant, and that his plea is good, and no ways avoided by the replication; there having been two exceptions taken by the king's counsel against the plea, which I shall first answer, before I speak to the matter of the replication. The first is, That the defendant hath concluded his plea with hoc parat est verificare, and not per recordum; whereas peerage can no way be tried but by matter of record, which is most true, that peerage by creation is triable only by record, but it is a non sequitur, that therefore his plea ought to conclude with a verificare per recordum; and indeed the plea which now is good, had been bad, if it had so concluded; for he having pleaded his letters patent of peerage to his ancestor, under whom he derives his honour with a profert in cur, he hath sufficiently certified the foundation of his peerage by matter of record, he being a complete nobleman by his creation, by his letters patent, without any other ceremonies, as appears by Penson and Redhead's case, Noy, 150. Inst. 16. G. 10. the 12 Rep. 71. And if he be to be arraigned after such creation, and before the parliament sits, he shall be tried by his peers. And where letters patent are pleaded and shewn to the court under the great seal, the adverse party cannot deny them, nor plead nul tiel record, Eden's case in the 6th report, and need not conclude with a verificare per recordum, for he cannot have a day to bring in the record which he hath already shewn to the court, besides the descent of Edward to the honour, his dying without issue, whereby it came to Nicholas; and his death, and the descent to the defendant pleaded, after the letters patent set forth, are all matters of fact, triable by the country, and not by the record, by reason whereof he could not so conclude his plea, there being no authority in law to warrant the conceit of the king's counsel, that there must be a writ out of chancery under the great seal, certifying all these matters the defendant hath pleaded to make out his peerage, the books cited by them no ways warranting that opinion; for the books of 35 Hen. 6, 46. No. 3. 165, and 347. Reg. 287. Dyer, 314. 48 Edw. 3, 30, 48 Ass. Pl. 6. and 4 Inst. 126, are all writs of Privilege, or Cautionary Writs, as may be seen in the lord Savile's case, Car. Croke, 205. not to put peers in Juries, or make other process against them than by the law ought to be, and nothing to the purpose. And the books of 22 Assize Pl. 24. which is abridged in Br. sit' Ass. 240. which gives the greatest umbrage. So this opinion makes out no more but that peerage is triable by record, and not by jury; for it is plain the plea there pleaded in abatement was ill, that he was the son of an earl, and not named earl; for the foundation and substance of his plea being a matter of record, ought to have been certainly alledged by him, 1 Inst. 303. And he ought to have began his plea in his ancestor nobilitated by the matter of record, and then deduced his descent under him, which caused the saying there, 'That Peerage was not triable by the assizes, but by the record out of Chancery.' And it is plain from that book, the plea was not allowed; for they did plead over to the assize: so how this can be made an authority, that a writ must be had out of Chancery, certifying all these matters of fact, and that they must be so said, I do not understand. My lord Coke, in his 1 Inst. 74. tells us of six manners of trial by certificate, of which I am sure this is none: neither is there any such writ or precedent of such a trial to be found in any of our law-books, of which a certificate by writ appears; and writs being, as Fitz-Herbert tells us in the preface to his Natara Brevium, the foundation on which the law depends. If there be no such writ, we may safely conclude there is no such law; and it is evident by 1 Inst. 16. and the countess of Rutland's case in the sixth report, that nobility may be gained by matter in fact, as marriage, as well as by creation and inheritance. Nobility may be also gained by descent after creation; which descent and marriage are matters of fact, and triable by jury, as is held in the 6th Report 53. and therefore the plea here well concluded, and is good, notwithstanding the exception. Neither is the other exception, which hath been taken to the plea, of more weight; which is, that it doth not appear by the defendant's plea he is a peer, the defendant having not pleaded his unus pariu' hujus Regni Angliæ, nor averred Banbury to be in any county of England; which, I think, he need not to do, and that it is now better pleaded than if it had been so pleaded; for he hath by his plea certainly pleaded the letters patent of creation to his ancestor under the great seal of England, whereby he was made earl of Banbury, and shews them to the court; and being nobilitated under the great seal of England, he is a peer of England, though the place from which he has his name of honour be not in England, but in a foreign country; for, that a lord hath the name of a place in his style, is of no further necessity than that the patentee might have an estate in his honour within the statute de Donis, which, without such a name, would be a fee-simple conditional, 22 Rep. 81. 7 Rep. 33. Nevil's case. And I believe no patent of creation of an earl can be shewn, wherein the name of honour is mentioned in the patent to be in any county: of Barons, there are some in which the place is named to be in such a county, but very many are otherwise, which shews it not necessary. But I must agree that an Irish peer must be created under the great seal of England; but then they are distinguished from English creations by 'in Terra,' or 'in Regno,' or 'in Domino nostro Hiberniæ,' or the like, in due places of the patent, Selden's Titles of Honour, 696. Pryn's Animadversions, 316. which makes the distinction: for, without those words, it would be an English creation passing the great seal; and though this be in a plea in abatement, which requires a certainty, yet that certainty is to be but to a certain intent in general, 1 Inst. 303. And if noblemen made under the great seal of England, are generally to be intended peers of England, then this plea, so pleaded, contains in it sufficient certainty without other averment, or the precise words of 'unus parium.' It is true, had a bishop, who is a peer 'ratione baroniz,' which he holds in 'jure ecclesiæ,' had occasion to have pleaded such a plea, or a plea to the jurisdiction of the court, he must have pleaded his peerage in that manner that he is 'unus de paribus Regni;' for he hath no letters patent to plead, 4 Inst. 15. But he who is a peer 'ratione nobilitatis,' needs not plead his peerage otherwise than according to his creation. So that the defendant's plea, notwithstanding these objections to it, I hold good.

The next thing to be considered is, whether the replication to it doth any ways avoid it; which is no more, but whether this vote, judgment, or order of the House of Peers, for in all the words of it, it is pleaded 'resolutum, consideratum, et ordinatum fuit,' (and I would take it in its largest extent the matter itself will bear) doth any ways take away or barr the defendant of his name of dignity. And I am of opinion it doth not. Nobility is fixed to the identity of the person, and inherent in the blood nobilitated by the king, and cannot be granted over or barr'd by him who hath it, as is held in Jones's Rep. 116, and the 4th Inst. 126, and resolved in parliament in my lord Purbeck's cases, Shower's cases in parliament, pag. 1. And if it be an honour of inheritance, the heir of the peer on whom it descends cannot waive it, or the privilege of it as to be tried by his peers, and is so held in the lord Delaware's case in 11 Rep. and 3 Inst. 30. And as a peer cannot divest himself of his own honour, or the privilege of it, so his peerage can by no law of this kingdom, as I know, be taken from him, but by act of parliament, attainder of his person, or by the scire facias, to repeal his patent, if the creation is by letters patent; for where the creation is by letters patent, they being once under seal, the king cannot countermand them, as is held in the lord Abergavenny's case, 12 Rep. 71, though where he is designed to be ennobled by writ, the king may supersede the writ after it is under seal, and before the parliament; but letters patent under the great seal are a conveyance at the common law, and the patentee hath an interest settled in him in things thereby granted, which is to be directed and governed by the rules of law; and therefore a peer, if he be created by letters patent, his estate of inheritance in those patents must be limited by apt words, or else the grant will be void; because it is settled in him, and by a conveyance at the common law, as is held 1 Inst. 16.

And, by such a creation, an honour may be entailed within the statute Westm. 2, and the descent of it is to be governed according to the rules of the common law; and it is resolved to be an hereditament forfeitable for treason within 26 H. 8, Nevill's case, 7 Rep. 34, and therefore the defendant having by his plea entitled himself to an estate taile in this honour, under the letters patent to viscount Wallingford, and the heirs males of his body, as a lineal descendant under that intail, hath a freehold and inheritance in that honour vested in him by common law, to be protected in it, and governed according to the rules of law; and cannot be disinherited, or debarred of it by the known laws of the kingdom, unless it be 'judicium parium,' or 'per legem terræ,' which my lord Coke in his 2 Inst. fol. 49 and 50, says, is by due process of law, or lawful trial in course of judicature, on neither of which is this vote or order founded. For though the House of Peers be a supreme court of record, yet every vote there passed is not an act of judicature, unless the proceedings in order to it had been judicial; which in this case, I think, is pretty clear they were not: For the defendant's petition to be tried, being indicted of felony, could give them no jurisdiction over his peerage; and as a House of Peers, I take it, have no such power, unless the king, on a petition, refers the matter to them, which gives them a jurisdiction, which before they had not. And this appears by the lord Delaware's case in the 11 Rep. And the lord Willoughby's and the earl of Oxford's case, in Jones's Rep. 96, and the other precedents cited by my brother Levinz of my lord Abergavenny's, the lord Purbeck's, the lord Fitzwalter's, * the lord Berkley's, the lady Obrian's, the lady Frescheivill's, and the lady Felton's cases, which were all determined by the king's reference on their petitions to him in the House of Peers: For the king, being the fountain of honour from whence all dignities are derived (for none can be a peer without the king's creation, or his consent by act of parliament; for it is held in Jones's Rep. 104, an ordinance of the House of Lords cannot make a peer), the king hath an interest in the person so dignified for his council in peace, and defence in war, as appears in the 7th Rep. 34, and 9 Rep. 49. And by reason of his great trust and confidence, the honour cannot be taken from the peer, or transferred by him, being an incident inseparable to him, without the king's consent; 12 Rep. 28, 4 Inst. 126, and by the common law, the king having a prerogative to try his cause in what court he pleases, 4 Inst. 17, when a petition is exhibited to him for any right the subject pretends to, be it peerage, or other thing, the king may indorse that petition as he pleaseth; which indorsement the party must pursue, for the indorsement is the warrant, and gives the jurisdiction: Stanford's Prerogative, 738. Therefore without such reference, by indorsement of a petition, they can have no jurisdiction; for then peerage might be taken away without the king's consent, which by law I have proved it cannot be: And no precedent hath been cited, nor I believe can be found, where the House of Lords did ever take on them to determine right of peerage without such reference on a petition first made to the king, or did vote or adjudge a man to have no right to his peerage, who petitioned to be tried by his peers; and, where there is no example, nor precedent, it is a forceable argument that the law will not bear it, for what never has been done shall be presumed never could be done: I must agree that the House of Peers have jurisdiction over their own members in matters of privilege, precedence, and for any other thing relating to the parliament, which are to be determined 'secundum legem et consuetudinem parliamenti,' but not by the common law, 4 Inst. 15, and 363. But over the estates or honours of their own members, in which they have freeholds and inheritance, no law, as I know, has given them power; nor made them any judicature for that purpose, they being to be determined and governed by the known rules of the common law, which is every subject's birth-right, and to which he is born inheritable; and by any other law or custom, though the House of Lords be the supreme court of record in the kingdom, and its jurisdictions, and the methods of its proceedings are ascertained by that law; and therefore though it were ordered in the Lords' House, that those who were sent justices to Ireland should have no excuse; yet that being but an order, was void to bind the subject, 2 Inst. 47. And, I hope, it can be no diminution of the power of that honourable House, whilst I affirm they can do in that supreme court no more than what by law they may do; and if they exceed that power by holding plea, of which the common law hath not given a jurisdiction, what they do will be void, and of void things all persons may take advantage. And no such judgment or proceeding can bind any inferior court from examining of it, or declaring it to be void in law; for suppose a writ of error was brought in the House of Lords of a judgment given in the common pleas, as was attempted by the bishop of Norwich in Edward 3rd's time, which you may see in the 4 Inst. 31, and the Lords should reverse such judgment, might not the common pleas, though they are an inferior court, judge it to be void, and issue an execution on that judgment, the reversal being void, no writ of error lying in parliament of any such judgment? And if this be a judgment or binding order, which is set out in the replication, that the defendant hath no right to the title or honour of earl of Banbury: One or both of these two things must be wrought by it, viz. The patent of creation vacated and damned, or the defendant, or some under whom he derives his descent to this honour illegitimated, neither of which can be done by this method of proceedings in this supreme court on the defendant's petition to be tried: for the letters patent being a conveyance at the common law, the patentee is entitled to the thing thereby granted by matter of record, which cannot be vacated but by a Scire Facias at the suit of the king, to which the patentee may have his answer, Dyer 198. For our law judgeth no man before he be heard; and the defendant, or any other of the descendants in the estate taile to their honour, cannot in this summary way by a vote be bastardized without a lawful trial; which in general bastardy must be by certificate of the ordinary; or in particular bastardy alledged, it must be tried by jury, 2 Inst. 99. Sir John Davies, Rep. 52. And no man by the law can by any means, unless by act of parliament, be made illegitimate after his death, 1 Inst. 244, and it would be of mischievous consequence to the noble peers, did they hold their honour in which they have freeholds and inheritances, subject to a law differing from the known laws of the kingdom, which law is, as Mr. Attorney phraseth it, 'inter arcana Imperii;' and not to be understood by inferior courts of Westminster-hall, for then, I fear, they would have but a dark title to their honours. And as it is the defendant's turn at present, what nobleman's case it may be next to be voted no peer, I know not; therefore it being the interest and title of every peer to his honour, which I here assert and maintain, I trust I shall not offend against the jurisdiction of that house, in adjudging this order void, and no bar to the defendant's honour, being warranted so to do by the supremest power; viz. an act of parliament 55 Edw. 3, which enacts, That none be put out of his franchises or freeholds, unless he be duly brought in to answer, and forejudged of the same by course of law; and if any thing be done to the contrary, it shall be judged for none: and if the peers enjoy their honours under the security of the same laws they hold their estates, as it is most evident they do, then this law has made the proceedings void, unless it can be shewn that the House of Peers since this act hath some authority given them to warrant this vote, which hath not yet been pretended to, otherwise than by the precedents cited by Mr. Attorney; to which I shall give an answer presently; and to say that the demurrer is a confession, that there is a judgment 'Secundum Legem et Consuetudinem Parliamenti,' I never heard that a demurrer was a confessal of more than matters of fact well pleaded, and not of any matters of law in the judgment of the court, and confesseth not the law by it against himself, Plowd. 85. 5 Rep. 69. Burton's case; and, I presume, neither Mr. Attorney, nor Solicitor, who made this objection, do think that: Whether this be a judgment according to law and custom of parliament, is matter of fact: then for the precedents cited by Mr. Attorney, of the earl of Pembroke, the earl of Stafford, the earl of Torrington, and the lord Mohun's cases, which are all petitions for trial, sitting the parliament, I think no man who heard them can judge that they any ways warrant this case or come up to it; for a peer, indicted for treason or felony, can no ways wave his trial by his peers, 3 Inst. 30, and therefore if he be desirous to be tried sitting the parliament, although the peers be during the time of parliament judges of the offence, 4 Inst. 28, it is decent and usual for him, to apply to them by petition for such trial; but by it he doth not submit his title to peerage to their determination; for, that, he asserts, he is entitled to by his petition. Neither is the king, I think, bound by their order, be it what it will, on such petition; for the king may chuse whether he will appoint a high-steward for the trial, and without such an appointment the offender cannot be tried, 3 Inst. 31. And therefore until a precedent be formed, that on such petitions for trial, the petitioners have been voted no peers, I cannot be of opinion, that this order or judgment is 'secundum Legem et Consuetudinem Parliamenti,' which hath its foundation built on usages and precedents; and where there is no precedent to be found, it may warrantably be concluded, there is no such law or custom of parliament. Then as to the precedent of the lord Mountjoy's case, cited by Mr. Attorney, relating to the clause in his patent for precedency, who was created a baron, 5 Inst. 3. case, Pri. it is nothing to the case before us; for it is plain, though the king by his prerogative, at the common law, might give precedency to his subjects as he pleased, yet that prerogative is now bound by the stat. of 31 Hen. 8, ca. 10, and if any question be moved in parliament for the privilege or precedency of a lord in parliament, it is to be decided by the lords in parliament, and so it is expressly resolved in the 4 Inst. 363. And for the lord Preston's case, I know not how it comes to be made use of for a precedent of determining peerage, who had no creation under the great seal, nor ever was a lord: his insisting on the pretended patent, produced by him, being a high misdemeanor bordering on high-treason; for which he was ordered to be presented as a criminal, in a course of law; and for James Piercy's* case, it was a case of privilege, of which there is no question but their lordships have a jurisdiction, his petition being to the place in the House of Lords of the earl of Northumberland, and submitting to them his pedigree, and title by descent to that earldom, in order to restore him to that place; and after several trials at law had against him, and the matter determined in a course of law, on solemn hearing at the bar of the House on both sides, on depositions taken in the cause, agitated in inferior courts, they voted him an impostor, which is very far from being a precedent of their lordships original determining right of peerage, which are all the precedents which have been cited, and unto which I trust that I have given full answer; and therefore this order, here pleaded, being without a precedent, I am of opinion, for the reasons I have given, that the indictment ought to be abated.

Holt, the chief justice, held the plea good, the defendant having pleaded the creation of the lords his ancestors, and a plain descent under them: and for the earldom, that Banbury was averred to be in England, he said, it was needless, the creation being under the Great Seal; the Great Seal of England being only peculiar to England, for thereby the king acts as king; and had the grant been made before the conquest of Ireland, without doubt it had been a good grant; and the conquest of Ireland cannot alter the law of England; besides, it would be a foreign construction, to intend Banbury in Ireland; and a plea shall not be made had by such a construction.

And that the king doth grant honours in Ireland, under the Great Seal of England, is by his absolute prerogative, and therefore there must be special words in the patent, to shew that it is an Irish title; and patents, as well as acts of parliament, extend not to Ireland, unless it be specially named; but for England, they be without any such meaning. And he said, that before Edward the third's time, there were but two titles of honour, earls and barons, and the latter were created by writs, by being called to the parliament; there were also barons by tenure, and after, in Richard the second's time; they came to be created by letters patent, and it was anciently an office of great dignity, as also of trust, for the defence of the kingdom; and they were called Comites a Societate regis, 9 Rep. 49, and being an office, might be intailed within the statute de Donis, and they had formerly large possessions; and for the relief of an earl, was 100*l*. because he died seized De integro Comit'. 1 Inst. 83. But the estate and office is now vanished, and nothing but the dignity, or title remains; and in these letters patent of creation, in Henry the eighth's time, the words to have 'Vocem et Sedem in Parliamentis et Consiliis nostris' were added; but before that time they were not put in these letters patent; but he became a perfect peer by the letters patent without them: and as to the objection, that the defendant had not pleaded that he was 'unus Parium hujus Regni Angliæ,' he said, the plea was only pleaded as Misnomer, in abatement of his name; and all one with his Christian name, and he was to be named by it; but by this plea he pleaded no privilege of parliament, and therefore need not plead that he was unus Parium, 6 Rep. 53, 8 Hen. 6, 9, 10, nor to have concluded his plea with 'verificare per Recordum,' or had a writ out of chancery to certify the truth of this plea; the book of 22 Ass. Pl. 24, he agreed it to be law, but misunderstood; for he had not in that plea laid a foundation in his ancestor's being made lord; and produced a writ to ascertain that matter of record: There can be no trial of it, nor plea of Nul Tiel Record to it. But notwithstanding the matters of record are so ascertained, yet the matters of fact also pleaded are issuable, and to be tried; and therefore in the letters patent, being here pleaded, there can be no issue taken of earl, or not earl, but only on the matter of fact here pleaded: so the conclusion of the plea with a 'Parat' est verificare,' is proper, and as it ought to conclude; and he held the replication ill, and that the order of the House of Lords therein pleaded, did no ways preclude the defendant of his title and name of honour; and that for these reasons: First, Because this determination was not a judgment, in the court of parliament, which consists of King, Lords, and Commons, 4 Inst. 1 Dyer, 60. Compton's Jurisdiction of Courts, 1. And though the judicial power of this court be exercised by the Lords Reply, yet the Writs of Error are returnable Coram Nobis, and the judgment is always per Cur' Parliamenti; but the determination here is only by the lords spiritual and temporal, which excludes the king; for where the king's authority is not expressed, or implied, the king is excluded, and the Lords have a double capacity; and by the title of their orders, we are to distinguish what capacity they act by: when the determination is by them, as lords spiritual and temporal, they act as a house; but when they act as judges, and give judgment, the stile is, per Cur' Parliamenti, and their journals are not the records of parliament, Hob. 110. Secondly, This, as to the determination of the defendant's being an earl, is as an original cause, which the House of Peers being the dernier resort, have no connuzance of, such causes being mixed with many matters of fact which the House of Peers cannot try; and by reason of their supreme jurisdiction, are not to be troubled with; and therefore no Writ of Error lies in parliament for an error in fact out of this court, though it doth on all judgments here for any error in law: but for any error in fact, in this court, the writ must be Coram Nobis, and we are to correct our own judgments for such errors, which the Commons could not their judgment for errors in fact, by any such writ to be brought before them; but the Writ of Error is to be brought into this court; and he said, he knew not any other reason of the difference, but the dignity and supremacy of the court of parliament; that it was below that house to be troubled with facts, and this lessened not the jurisdiction of the Lords, it being below their jurisdiction to hold plea of it; and should they try causes original, the party against whom sentence is given would lose the benefit of his appeal; for from their determination no appeal or review lies; and therefore in the earl of Macclesfield's case, it was held, that no Writ of Error lay in parliament, until he had first brought a Writ of Error in the exchequer-chamber; and this case differs not from common, the dignity being created under the Great Seal, and the descent of it directed by rules of law: and if the defendant had been obstructed in the enjoyment of his dignity, his remedy had been by petition to the king, Standford, Prer' 72. Thirdly, There was no plea depending in parliament, containing the right of earldom; for the petition asserts, he was an earl, and the judgment is, that he hath no title to the honour; and every judgment must be proportionable to the demand: and it is plain in this case, they could not have given judgment for him, to have had the earldom, and therefore could not by it have him out of it. Fourthly, Here is no judgment given that he be excluded from the honour, only that the petition be dismissed, which is only a discharging the petitioner; and every suit must have its proper judgment, 2 Car. 284, and no man's inheritance was ever determined 'Secundum Legem et Consuetu-

'dinem Parliamenti.' And my brother Gregory, and my brother Eyre, being of the same opinion, judgment by the whole court was given for the defendant.

And the Defendant remains untried to this day.

"Lord Holt having spoke upon the four points which he considered upon the Replication, proceeded to consider the allegation, that this judgment was secundum legem et consuetudinem, and as to this he said, that he did not know any reason for this allegation, which the king's counsel had inserted, if it was not to frighten the judges; but he said that he did not regard it, for though he had all respect and deference for that honourable body, yet he sat there to administer justice according to the law of the land, and according to his oath, and that he ought not to regard any thing but the discharge of his duty; and as to the law and custom of parliament for the determination of inheritances, he knew not any but the common law of England, the which is the birth-right of every Englishman; and he would be glad to be satisfied by any man if there be any such custom and law of parliament, where it is, for a custom ought to consist in usage, and he desired to see the precedents of such judgments; and as to the law of parliament he did not know of any such law, and every law which binds the subjects of this realm ought to be either the common law and usage of the realm, or act of parliament. 'Nec super eum ibimus, nec super eum mittemus nisi per legale iudicium parium suorum, aut per legem terræ;' and therefore the Earl of Banbury cannot be ousted of his dignity but by attainder, or act of parliament, or a judgment in a Scire Facias upon his patent, but if there was any such law and custom of parliament [the which Mr. Attorney said was inter arcana imperii, which is a strange notion of a law, though it may be good in politics; and for which the lords would not thank him, when they considered that the law which governs the inheritance of their dignities is inter arcana, for 'misera est servitus ubi jus est vagum et incertum'] yet, when this comes incidently in question before them, they ought to adjudge and intermeddle with it, and they adjudge things of as high a nature every day, for they construe and expound acts of parliament, and adjudge them to be void, they discharge men committed by parliament, upon a prorogation, they adjudge of privilege of parliament, and instanced in the case of sir George Binion, and sir John Evelyn in C. B. [see vol. 6, p. 1126] where the question was, if the filing of an original during a session, against a member, be a breach of privilege, and adjudged no breach; and he said that they did but march in the steps of their predecessors, who have adjudged and determined of matters of as high a nature as this, and he cited the case out of an Oxford manuscript, where upon a counter-plea of voucher, the court of C. B. was divided in opinion, and upon this there was an order by the Lords that they should adjudge the counter-plea good, but when this order came into C. B. Parning, Chief Justice, refused to give judgment, but Chard, in his absence, took an opportunity and gave judgment, upon which a Writ of Error was brought, and all this matter shewn in B. R. and that there was an order by the Lords, &c. but the court did not regard it, but reversed the judgment, and he said that the Journal of the Lords is not any record, but notes and memorials for the clerks to perfect and enter the record, and cited Hobart; and so the judgment which they have shewn in their replication is not any judgment or determination in parliament; and if it was, yet it is in an original cause of which they have not consance, and of a matter which was not submitted, or before them for their determination, and they have not given any judgment, by which he shall be barred or excluded from his peerage; and he having made a good title in his plea, the which is not answered or avoided by the replication, it appears that he is a peer, and ought to be indicted by his proper name, scil. Charles earl of Banbury; and being indicted by the name of Charles Knollys, esq. this is a misnomer, for which the indictment ought to be abated; and therefore he ruled that it be abated.

“The other justices argued to the same purpose, though not so particularly; and it was, inter alia, said by them that the Lords can only do that which they can do by law; and if they exceed their authority their proceedings are void; and of a thing which is void, every man may take advantage.”

Note: in 7 Mod. 15 (Prideaux v. Morrice) the court is represented to have said, “As to the Case of the earl of Banbury, where the court of Queen’s-bench did determine the right of peerage, the answer is, That cause is not a precedent and not to be followed, for the consequence of it is a failure of justice to this day.”

Mr. Hargrave notices this Case in his learned Preface to Lord Hale’s Treatise on the Jurisdiction of the Lords’ House of Parliament. After briefly stating the pleadings, he thus proceeds:

“The King’s-bench was put to decide upon the effect of the order of the Lords in point of conclusion; that is, whether it ought to operate as the judgment of a court competent by their decision to estop the claimant from asserting his claim to the peerage elsewhere. It was a delicate subject for the court; and they appear to have so considered it, and to have had it upon their hands for so considerable a time, as caused the House of Lords to enquire into the reason. At length the court unanimously decided against the sufficiency of the replication; and lord chief justice Holt more particularly delivered his sentiments on the occasion in a very courageous and learned manner. The great principle of the decision was, that the order of the Lords was not a judgment. The reasons, upon which the quality of a judgment was denied to their order, were not a little pertinent to the contest about parliamentary judicature: for they included the position, that the House of Lords is not a court of original jurisdiction; and that even their appellant jurisdiction over law, as being founded on the King’s Writ of Error, is derivative from the crown. The principle therefore of this noted decision is, not only a direct denial of one great portion of the jurisdiction claimed by the Lords; but founds another great portion of their judicature, upon a title far less proud and independent than themselves, or at least the chief writers in support of their pretensions, have usually plumed themselves upon. At the same time, it might seem partial, not to mention, that the Court of King’s-bench, thus disowning the Lords as an original judicature, and thus as it were humbling them as an appellant one over law into royal commissioners, was exceedingly bountiful in some other respects. At least the printed Notes of lord chief justice Holt’s argument so state the matter: for according to them, he treated the Lords as if they were the supreme judicature of the kingdom, and as if the sole judicature of parliament was substantially and in point of actual exercise in their body. The manly character of lord chief justice Holt renders it difficult to suppose, that such language could come from him, to pacify those to whom it was plain the Court’s judgment would be offensive. Yet if he did state the Lords to be the dernier resort, and to have the sole judicature of parliament, and in so doing meant any thing beyond that verbiage of complimentary stile, which even in his time had somehow or other grown into a sort of fashion amongst those who addressed or spoke of them, it may not perhaps be too much to say, that such vast concession was, not only very extra-judicial, but very oblivious both of the recent opinions of lord chief justice Hale and others of the first description of Westminster Hall, and of the recent contests between the two houses about judicature. Nay, it may be doubted, whether this extra-judicial language, if it was really meant to convey an opinion, was not of a tendency destructive of the very principle, upon which the judgment of the court was founded. In that view also the decision would lose some little portion of its weight. However it should seem, that even the House of Lords did not so consider this manner of mentioning them. Had they so done, it would scarce have happened, that they should have seriously complained: for in that view, if their judicative power was depressed, it was also exalted. But in fact they treated the whole proceeding as if it was very hostile to them. Before the judgment, they ordered the attorney general to give an account of the business; and upon his report ordered the judges of the King's-bench to attend. After the judgment, the attorney general was called upon in like manner, and the Lords ordered the King's-bench record to be brought before them. It appears also, that lord chief justice Holt was called upon to give the reasons of the judgment to the Lords; but that he resolutely refused yielding to this extra-judicial question; and that after some threats of further steps the business was dropped."

"What followed upon this case of Charles Knollis esquire claiming to be earl of Banbury and viscount Wallingford deserves attention. The criminal prosecution of him was not further proceeded in; the crown neither chusing to try the judgment upon a Writ of Error, nor to give way to the claim of peerage by having him indicted by the title of earl of Banbury. On the other hand he persevered in his pretensions to the titles, and always assumed the title of earl.

"In 1697, his claim was so far listened to, that his petition of claim was referred by the crown to the House of Lords: and thence perhaps it may be presumed, that the case had been laid before the king's attorney general or solicitor general, and that the report of that officer was not wholly unfavourable to the claimant. But notwithstanding this regal call upon the Lords to exercise their consultive function, they were inflexible; and instead of examining the justice of the claim, they referred it to a committee to draw a representation of the former proceedings of the House in order to have it presented to the king. The Lords Committees made their report: and after reading it and hearing lord chief justice Holt and judge Eyre, there was a debate. But it ended with an order, adjourning the matter for four days, and directing the two judges of the King's-bench and one judge of each of the other courts to attend on the adjourned day. Yet when the latter day came nothing was done. Thus the proceeding terminated in the House of Lords, without either their acting upon the reference from the crown, or their condescending to inform the crown of the reason of so declining to perform their function. See Journ. Dom. Proc. 26 and 29 Jan. and 7 and 10 Feb. 1697-8. Such a declining of the case was the more extraordinary, as very striking circumstances concurred in favour of the claim.

"The question upon it was, whether Nicholas Knollis the father of the claimant was really the son of William Knollis the first earl of Banbury.

"Against the claim in this respect, the circumstances stated are, the great age of the first earl, being between eighty and ninety at the birth of the claimant's father;—the character and suspicious conduct of the first earl's second wife, the mother of Nicholas Knollis;—an office finding the first earl's death without issue, with some paper of the mother, in the nature of a certificate or acknowledgment, as it should seem, that the claimant's father and his elder brother who died without issue were not the children of the first earl;—and a resolution of the Lords against the pretension of Charles Knollis the claimant in 1692-3. See 2 and 3 Dugdale's Baronage 413, and Journ. Dom. Proc. 17 Jan. 1692-3.

"On the other hand the claim had many things to sustain it.

"1. There was the evidence of the birth of the claimant's father and of the father's elder brother in the lifetime of the first earl, and of the first earl's cohabiting with the countess, his second and last wife, and of his being well enough to ride abroad hawking and hunting: and to prove this four witnesses appear to have been examined.

"2. The office finding the first earl's death without issue was encountered by a second office finding the contrary.

"3. The claimant's father was allowed to take his seat in the Convention Parliament, and to continue sitting for some months without objection; and when objection was taken, it went off without hearing. See Journ. Dom. Proc. 13 July 1660.

"4. The claimant's father, finding himself not summoned, petitioned the king for a writ of summons; and the king referred it to the Lords; and after hearing counsel on each side at the bar of the House on one day and a long debate of the Lords on another, the case was referred to the committee for privileges; and the lords committees reported, that the petitioner was in the eye of the law son of the first earl, and that the House of Lords ought to advise the king to summon the petitioner. Journ. Dom. Proc. 6, June 1, 9, 10, 19, and 25 July, and 23 Nov. 1661.

"5. The House, instead of hearing the case on the report of the committee, adopted the violent measure of permitting a Bill, declaring the petitioner of 1661 illegitimate, to be read the first time: but the bill was not proceeded on with effect.

"6. In 1669, it appearing on a call of the House of Peers, that the earl of Banbury's name was omitted in the list, the house referred it to the committee of privileges to examine why his name was omitted, "he having formerly sat as a peer;" and this raises some suspicion, that there was at least for the time considerable dissatisfaction at the omission of him. Journ. Dom. Proc. 26 Oct. 1669.

"7. Under this encouragement the claimant's father as-son and heir of the first earl of Banbury appears to have petitioned the Lords for a Writ of Summons; and the House so far yielded, as to refer it to the committee of privileges. Journ. Dom. Proc. 23 Feb. 1669-70.

"8. Nicholas Knollis, who had thus once sat as Earl of Banbury, dying, the claimant Charles his son and heir, upon coming of age and not being summoned, petitioned the Lords to represent his case to the king: and the House so far attended to the claim, as to refer it to the committee of privileges to report, and upon their report ordered a hearing of counsel for and against the claim. Journ. Dom. Proc. 10, and 23 June 1685.

" 9. In 1692, when the claimant Charles Knollis renewed his petition to the lords and counsel were heard for and against his claim, the House refused a motion to hear the opinion of the judges on the case; whence it should seem, as if there was an apprehension that if they were heard, their opinion would be for the claimant. Journ. Dom. Proc. 13 Dec. 1692, 9, 14, and 17 Jan. 1692-3.

" 10. The refusal to hear the judges on the case of the claimant Charles Knollis caused a protest of seventeen peers. Journ. Dom. Proc. 17 Jan. 1692-3.

" 11. The decision of the House against the same claimant on his last petition, was protested against by twenty peers. Ibid.

" Thus it appears, that the claim of Charles Knollis to the earldom of Banbury not only was founded upon the actual possession of his father, and when his father's legitimacy was questioned, was fortified by very striking evidence in favour of it; but at one time received the decision of a committee of the Lords in its favour. Thus too it appears, that though the claim was finally rejected, yet it was against the sense of a great number of peers, and upon a protestation by twenty of them, and under such circumstances, as go far toward inducing great probability, that had it not been refused to hear the judges, the claimant would have had the opinion both on the fact and the law of the case with him.

" From these views of the case, it seems, as if this claim of the earldom of Banbury had been treated with peculiar rigor; and as if the claim had at last miscarried, because it was opposed by some violent prejudices, which were suffered so to operate as to prevent a cool and impartial consideration. The consequence of the rejection of the claim countenances this construction of the proceedings of the Lords: for it is remarkable, that from the rejection of the claim in 1692 to the present moment, there has been, not only an unmolested and uniform assumption of the earldom by the head of the family and of the viscounty by his eldest son for the time being, but so strong an impression in favour of the right, as to induce a general acceptance of them by the titles so assumed. As the prefacer understands, this sort of possession of the titles of earl and viscount has been even countenanced in some degree by the description of recent commissions from the crown. Nay, an idea even prevails, that if the head of the family for the time should be sued or prosecuted as a commoner, it would probably again cause a plea of misnomer and be followed with the same success, as so conspicuously attended the plea, when the replication of the order of the Lords rejecting the claim of peerage was adjudged against by the King's-bench a century ago.

" The prefacer has been unexpectedly carried into this long note by an impression of the hardship of the order rejecting the claim of the earldom of Banbury in 1692. If it should have the effect of promoting or assisting any revision of the case, the interruption, which it has caused in the close of the prefacer's narrative of judicature in parliament, will, so far as the prefacer is singly concerned, be compensated.—Concerning this case of the earldom of Banbury, see, besides the references already made, the Case printed for the claimant in 1685, and the new Case printed for him in 1697."

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

June 13, 1689.

THE House was informed that sir Adam Blair, captain Vaughan, captain Moyle, Dr. Elliott, Dr. Grey and several others, had dispersed a seditious and treasonable paper, printed, and entitled, "A Declaration of King James the Second."

Mr. Hampden. Before you read the Declaration, I would not have it pass for doctrine, that there is no treason but what is declared by mation was published for apprehending sir Adam Blair and Dr. Grey for High Treason in dispersing king James's Declaration, promising the reward of 100*l.* for each of them to any one shall take them.

25 Edw. 3. If you take not that for granted, we shall never be safe, nor any government, if you cannot declare treason. There are other ways of destroying the government than by raising armies. But it would be strange if you should not call that treason which is tantamount to treason. Read the Declaration, but let not that pass for doctrine.

Col. Birch. I did expect this, and ten times more, when a Bill from the Lords lies by us about Treason. I desire one of those Declarations may be read, found upon the persons taken.

Sir Robert Clayton. I found my lord mayor at his house, examining those persons; and the people that took them took these declarations upon them.

The Declaration was then read, as follows :

‘ James R. Although the many calumnies and dismal stories, by which our enemies have endeavoured to render us and our government odious to the world, do now appear to have been advanced by them, not only without any ground, but against their own certain knowledge; as is evident by their not daring to attempt the proving these charges to the world, which we cannot but hope hath opened the eyes of our good subjects to see how they have been imposed upon by designing men; who, to promote their own ambitious ends, care not what slavery they reduce our kingdoms to: yet we cannot but rejoice that we have had an opportunity to demonstrate the falseness and malice of their pretences, since our arrival in this kingdom of Ireland, by making it our chief concern to satisfy the minds of our Protestant subjects, the defence of their religion, privileges and properties, is equally our care, with the recovery of our rights. To this end, we have preferred such of them, of whose loyalty and affection we are satisfied, to places both of the highest honour and trust about our person, as well as in our army. We have by granting our royal Mold: and it appearing upon the return, they were committed for High Treason (in dispersing the late king James’s Declaration) and were thereof impeached by the House of Commons, they prayed to be bailed because of the dissolution of parliament they were impeached by, which had discharged the same; but the court thought the impeachment still continued, so they were denied to be bailed, and were remanded.” Narcissus Luttrell’s MS. In the same MS. it appears, that in July 1690, colonel Vaughan and captain Ryder were admitted to bail. See in this Volume the Proceedings against Crone.

‘ protection to such whose minds are shaken by the arts of our rebellious subjects, dispelled their apprehensions, and effectually secured them against the attempts of their private enemies. Our ear hath been always open to their just complaints; and so far hath our royal mercy been extended to those who were in arms against us, that we have actually pardoned several hundreds of them; and most notorious criminals are kept in an easy confinement, as they themselves acknowledge.

‘ We have taken care that our subjects of the Church of England be not disturbed in the exercise of their religion, the possession of their benefices and other properties; and all Protestant Dissenters enjoy the liberty of their consciences, without any molestation: and out of our royal care for the prosperity of our people, we have recommended to our parliament, as the first thing necessary to be dispatched, to settle such a security and liberty, both in spiritual and temporal matters, as may put an end to these divisions, which have been the source of all our miseries; being resolved, as much as in us lies, to entail liberty and happiness upon our people, so far as to put it out of the power of our successors to invade the one, or infringe the other. And this, we take God to witness, was always our design; of which we see our good subjects here are more and more convinced, by the great numbers of those who, having been seduced or frightened by the restless importunities of our enemies, are returned to their country and habitations, and who assure us daily, more would follow, if the ports were open: but the usurpers know too well the sincerity of our intentions, to permit a free passage of our said subjects, fearing nothing more than that their experience should deceive the rest, who are restrained more through ignorance than any ill intention; and therefore deny them that liberty which we afford to all, whose designs, we are satisfied tend not to the disturbance of the peace.

‘ By this our gracious and royal care of our Protestant subjects here (where the greatest part of our nation is Catholic) and have, as well as we received the highest provocation from their fellow-subjects of contrary persuasions; so that nothing but our own inclination to justice, and desire to see our people flourish, could move us to such a proceeding; we hope our subjects in England will make a judgment of what they expected from us: and we do hereby promise and declare, That nothing shall ever alter our resolutions, to pursue such and no other methods, as by our said subjects in parliament should be found proper for our common security, peace and happiness. And that none may be debarred of assisting us in recovering our rights, and redeeming our people from their present slavery, out of any apprehension from past miscarriages, we do hereby assure all our subjects, of what quality soever, let their 'crimes against us be never so great, that, if, in 'twenty days after our appearing in person in 'our kingdom of England, they return to their 'obedience, by deserting our enemies, and join'ing with us, we will grant them our full par'don, and all past miscarriages shall be forgot;

'so little do we delight in the blood or ruin of 'our people. But if after this our gracious
'condescension, they shall still continue to as'sist our enemies and rebels, we do, before
'God, charge all the blood which shall be af'terwards shed, upon them and their adherents.
'And, we doubt not, by the blessing of God 'upon our arms, to force the most obstinate to 'their duty; though, as we have made appear
'in reducing our rebellious subjects in this 'kingdom, we desire to use no other methods
'than lenity and mercy.

'Given at our Court in Dublin Castle, the '18th of May, 1689, in the fifth year of our 'reign. God save the king.'

Mr. Garroway. You have now some names of persons taken with these Declarations; and when you charge any by Bill, you may add these; and I hope it will strike such a terror upon others, that you will have the effect.

Sir Tho. Clarges. You have but two Christian names. I am not of opinion to impeach men by other names than their Christian names; it may be reflection upon families of the same name, who are innocent. Order my Lord Mayor to send their Names and Examinations to-morrow.

Mr. Hampden. I think we are under some dispute, to vote before we know their Christian names. I would not have imputations upon persons of the same name. You may say, 'Dr. Grey to be impeached, who spread such a Declaration;' and then to-morrow, when you please, send up an Impeachment to the Lords; you may pass such a vote and describe them.

Sir Wm. Williams. A person that draws his sword against the king, by description of the person, is committed. It may fall out that you cannot know his name; therefore you may commit him by description.

Serjeant Maynard. I am against impeachment of these persons, that they may be punished. These Papers are high treason; an impeachment may walk long, before it comes to issue. Prosecute them by way of indictment, and then you may punish them severely and legally. Let the Judges lay it as a charge upon the Attorney and Solicitor General, that they effectually prosecute them at common-law.

Mr. Garroway. You see many people abroad in the nation, who refuse to own the government. We cannot give too much assistance to support it. I desire this prosecution may be by impeachment, and not by indictment, that the world may see you stand by your government.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I was of opinion, that impeachment was the best way for your justice. I am altered since, from what I have heard, viz. 'That you should bear your testi'mony of it.' If you send to the Lords, to order the Attorney General to prosecute, you may have speedy justice, the term now in being, three or four days in term time; indictments may be found by the grand jury, and you may have speedy trial, and speedy execution. I am afraid that these things have gone all over the nation, and I would have prosecution at the assizes all over the nation. Whereas the danger is great, so the resentments should be quick, and the like prosecution all England over.

Sir Rob. Howard. If any thing be done against the government, I would bring in the old manner of impeachments; nothing will settle your government better.

Sir Henry Capel. This is a point of safety, and that has led the House into this of impeachment. As for sending to the Lords, to order the Attorney General to prosecute these, have we not a king to command his officers and judges to try them? For many reasons offered, and many more that may be, I am for impeaching.

Sir Wm. Williams. If you proceed against him in the King's-bench, he cannot be tried till next term. If he be tried in London by a special Commission of Oyer and Terminer,—I like well trial in the King's-bench, solemn in the face of the kingdom; but if he be impeached in the name of all the Commons of England, it gives a dignity and honour to the king. If impeached by the Commons, it is not tied to this or that county; it is left indefinite and not confined to the formalities of other courts.

Sir Tho. Littleton. The greatest consideration of all with me is, Whether the House of Commons dare take notice of this? and men may take farther encouragement, and say, 'it seems the House of Commons dare not med'dle, but put it to the inferior courts;' therefore I am for impeachment.

Serj. Maynard. I have as much zeal for the punishment of these men as any man here, and am grieved at the slowness of proceedings; but when you may do it by law—This act was done in London, in a tavern in London—It may be, he cannot be tried in eight or ten days; but here is a clear offence: when you have brought it up to the Lords, the men are in their judgment, not yours. One man tried and condemned at common law, will work more upon the people than ten impeachments. If once you make that an example, not to try without the Lords, I do not know the consequence. I come here with grief of heart, to be here five months, and do nothing at all of this nature. Therefore I would not go before the Lords, when the law is clear, and may be tried by juries.

Mr. Hawles. The question is, Whether you will go by impeachment, or indictment? I am for impeachment. I do not think this to be a plain case of treason, by 25 Edw. 3. I do say, no court can judge this offence to be treason; and that statute did plainly not bind the superior court of parliament, but the inferior only. Look but over the statute of 25 Edw. 3, and you will not find any words to reach this Declaration, &c. to be treason. The proper way is, to judge this high treason; and therefore I am for proceeding by impeachment.

Resolved, "That the persons who dispersed the Declaration, viz. Dr. Elliot, capt. Vaughan, sir Adam Blair, capt. Mole, Dr. Grey, &c. be impeached of High Treason."

June 24.

Mr. Attorney General* reported from the Committee, to whom it was referred to prepare Impeachments against sir Adam Blair, captain Vaughan, captain Mole, Dr. Elliot, and Dr. Grey, That they had prepared and agreed upon an Impeachment, accordingly: which he read in his place; as followeth:

ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT OF HIGH TREASON, and other High Crimes and Offences, against Sir ADAM BLAIR, Captain HENRY VAUGHAN, Captain FREDERICK MOLE, JOHN ELLIOT, Doctor in Physic, and ROBERT GREY, Doctor in Physic;

"Whereas king James 2, having abdicated the government; and their majesties king William and queen Mary having, on the 13th day of February, 1688, accepted the crown and royal dignity of this kingdom, according to the resolution and desire of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, now assembled in parliament: their said majesties did become, were, are, and of right ought to be, by the laws of this realm, our sovereign liege lord and lady, king and queen of England, and the dominions thereunto belonging, in and to whose princely persons the royal state, crown, and dignity of this realm, with all honours, styles, titles, regalities, prerogatives, powers, jurisdictions, and authorities, to the same belonging and appertaining, were and are most fully, rightfully and entirely, invested and incorporated, united and annexed; and their said majesties have been solemnly and publicly crowned, according to law, and the laudable custom of this realm: and whereas, in and upon their majesties preservation and government, the unity, peace, tranquillity and safety of this nation, doth, under God, consist and depend: nevertheless sir Adam Blair, captain Henry Vaughan, captain Frederick Mole, John Elliot, doctor in physic, and Robert Grey, doctor in physic, being subjects of their majesties, together with divers others their complices and confederates, wholly withdrawing the faith, and due allegiance, which true and faithful subjects should, and of right ought to bear to their majesties, as false traitors to their majesties, and this realm, did, upon the 10th day of June, 1689, and at divers other times, most wickedly and traitorously design, contrive, agree, conspire, resolve, and, to the utmost of their power, endeavour to disturb and destroy the said peace and common tranquillity enjoyed within this realm; and to move, make, raise, and levy war, rebellion and insurrection, within the same; and to persuade, induce, and incite their majesties subjects to abett and assist them therein; and to deprive and depose their majesties of and from their royal state, title, crown and dignity; and to subvert the government of this kingdom, so happily preserved and settled by and under their majesties: and to that end they did traitorously assemble themselves, meet, and consult concerning the most proper means to be used, to execute and accomplish the aforesaid wicked and traitorous designs: and, in pursuance of the same, and for the purposes aforesaid, they did traitorously hold, maintain, set forth, declare, and publish, That their majesties were Usurpers; and that the said late king James the 2nd did continue lawful and rightful king of this realm; and did attribute to him the honours, styles, titles, regalities, prerogatives, powers, jurisdictions, and authorities, belonging and appertaining to the imperial crown of the same: and, to compass, fulfil, complete, and bring to effect, their said treason, and wicked purposes, they did traitorously, maliciously, and advisedly, contrive, make and procure, and cause to be made and procured, a certain detestable and traitorous Libel, purporting a Declaration of the said late king, by and under the name of king James 2; in which Libel it is contained, expressed, and declared, as followeth; viz. 'A Declaration of his most sacred majesty king James the 2nd, to all his loving subjects in the kingdom of England.'"—[Here follows the Declaration, see p. 1209.]

"And they did conceal the said Libel from their majesties, their magistrates, and ministers of justice; and the same did traitorously print, publish, and disperse, and did cause to be printed, published, and dispersed, to and amongst divers of their majesties subjects: and this was most maliciously contrived, prosecuted and done, whilst their majesties were engaged in a just and necessary war, for the defence of this kingdom against the French king, and in the suppressing a rebellion, procured, supported, and carried on, by the means and for the interest of the said French king, against their majesties, in their kingdom of Ireland. All which treasons, crimes, and offences above-mentioned, were contrived, committed, perpetrated, acted, and done, by the said sir Adam Blair, &c. and their complices, against our sovereign lord and lady the king and queen, their crown and dignity, and against the laws of this kingdom. Of

* Sir George Treby was at this time Attorney General, and sir John Sommers, Solicitor General; sir William Williams, Mr. Hawles, and sir Thomas Littleton were also of the Committee appointed to draw up these Articles, but it does not appear, that any of them doubted, "Whether the House of Commons were competent to impeach a commoner of high treason?" See 4 Hatsell, 240.

all which treasons, crimes, and offences, the knights, citizens, and burgesses, in parliament assembled, do, in the name of themselves, and of all the Commons of England, impeach the said sir Adam Blair, &c. and every of them.

"And the said Commons, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting, at any time hereafter, any other Accusations or Impeachments against the said sir Adam Blair, &c. and also of replying to the Answers, which they, and every of them, shall make to the premises, or any of them, or to any other Accusation, or Impeachment which shall be by them exhibited (as the cause, according to course and proceedings of parliament, shall require); do pray, That the said sir Adam Blair, &c. be put to answer all and every the premises; and that such Proceedings, Examinations, Trials, and Judgments, may be, upon them, and every of them, had and used, as shall be agreeable to law and justice, and course of parliament."

Sir Tho. Clarges. This is a case of blood, and I hope, if I am tender you will excuse me. In 19 Ch. 2, there was a committee appointed to consider lord Clarendon's Impeachment. Nov. 6, the Articles were brought in. The course then was, that a day was set to consider, upon debate of the House, 'Whether the facts charged were, in the judgment of the House, treason.' Nov. 9, the consideration of the first Head of the fact of Treason took up from nine in the morning to five at night, 'Whether Treason should be assigned?' Then it was declared, 'That there should be no impeachment, but on the statute 25 Edw. 3.' Then lord Vaughan stood up, and would make good the 16th article; and said, 'I do accuse lord Clarendon of corresponding with the king's enemies.* I observe that in this parliament more attainders have been reversed than in any one parliament, and the reason is, the great oppression of Westminster-hall; and these are cautions for succeeding parliaments to be careful; and I move for a day to consider, whether this be Treason or no.

The Articles were then ordered to be engrossed.

June 26,

The Articles of Impeachment were read.

Sir Tho. Clarges. This Impeachment being matter of blood, I would have it debated, Whether the matter contained in it be Treason? In lord Clarendon's Case, it was said, there was never any precedent from Henry 4; nor by the words of the statute 25 Edw. 3, and I believe no precedent since that time. Fitzharris† was impeached, and that was for conspiring the death of the king. We are the grand inquest of England, and I hope I shall never be wanting in my duty. I would know, whether, if an indictment be brought to a grand jury, the question ever was, 'Agree, agree,' [some calling out so] enquire whether the Indictment be according to law. I desire so much satisfaction as a jury would have. A consultation held, and no war levied, as in lord Russel's case, is no Treason. If the king's counsel will declare it to be Treason, I shall agree; if not, I doubt it.

Mr. Howe. Though we have no power to make treason, I hope we shall not have power to connive at it.

Sir Tho. Clarges. This is an extraordinary thing for a gentleman to say, 'that when a man speaks his mind here, he connives at treason.' Lord St. John, in his Argument* against lord Strafford, says, 'that judgment cannot be exercised but by Bill.'

Sir Tho. Lee. I confess, that I have not read that Argument this long time, therefore I will not controvert it, but I never heard that a parliament could not judge; but it is a power to be kept solely in parliament, lest it should be an example to Westminster hall; and therefore judged by Bill of Attainder. Before Edw. 3rd's time, Treason was dressed up as in the late Informations. If men act such things, it is destructive to the whole, and this was put into the statute of Edw. 3, by way of caution, like firing of a beacon. You send not up the Impeachment till the House dares venture their credit upon making it good, and the Commons ought to be satisfied that the evidence will hold out with the Lords as well as here; else the evidence should be punished. It is a mischievous practice, when the courts of justice have been exorbitant, and would be safe in so doing. This Declaration that sir Adam Blair has published, declares another king, and dethrones this. If this be a general opinion, I think we ought not to carry up this Impeachment, if it be a crime (which every body thinks) it ought to be carried up to the Lords, that it may be judged treason.

Sir Tho. Clarges. Lee was of opinion, in lord Clarendon's Impeachment, 'That there was no common law treason;' upon debate, that Impeachment was not carried up till it was clear, that the Article was treason. Before the statute 25 Edw. 3, Treason was so ubiquitous, that it was treason, to assert treason with the proviso relating to the judges in doubtful cases, &c. After that act, Treason was banded more than before. In R. 2nd's time, sir Thomas Hawksley was adjudged for making a motion in parliament, insomuch that Hen. 4 was petitioned by the Lords and Commons, 'That Treason might not be so hackneyed about;' and in queen Mary's time it was repealed. I dare put my credit upon it, there has been no Judgment of Treason from H. 3rd's time; and lord Coke is express, in his chapter of Treason, 'That the statute Edw. 3, was taken away by the statute of queen Mary.' Lord chief justice Vaughan used this argument, 'That there was no common law treason, no constructive treason.' Lord Vaughan, (now lord Carberry,) brought in an Article in Clarendon's Impeachment of his 'corresponding with the king's enemies, and betraying his secret counsels,' which was special matter; and then the Article was voted Treason.

Sir Tho. Lee. My friendship to lord Clarendon induced me no farther, than that I was against the Address for removal of him from the king; but I concurred with the House, and went through every vote to make impeachments easy here. At that time the king was angry with Clarendon, and took the seal from him, that he might go out of town into the country. The duke of York did support Clarendon, who at that time went to church, and was reputed a Protestant; at the same time, all the lawyers, raised by Clarendon, followed him, and a gentleman then said (Waller) 'Touch a lawyer, and all the lawyers will squeak.' Vaughan (who was quickly after made Chief Justice) argued as strongly against the Impeachment, as he had done before for it, but told you he had changed his opinion. There are two ways of delivering in an Impeachment; one at the Lords bar, another at a conference. The Impeachment of lord Mordaunt was delivered at a conference, by Mr. Seymour. I leave the House to consider, whether you will deliver this Impeachment at a conference.

Col. Birch. I have sat here long, and seen many things done. It is usual that the most able lawyers go up with an Impeachment to enforce it. I see in my eye a person of great worth, though aged (serjeant Maynard) I would have him go up with it.

Serjeant Maynard. Pray put not that upon me, who know nothing of the business. Pray let Birch go, who knows the whole business.

Col. Birch. I never refused the service of the House. The reason why I moved for serjeant Maynard was, because never any man did argue better in the Impeachment of lord Strafford. Clipping a shilling is treason, and is not subverting the government? I would have the person to carry it up, who is the fittest to carry it on.

The Impeachment was ordered to be carried up to the Lords by colonel Birch.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

June 26.

A Message was brought from the House of Commons, by colonel Birch and others: who brought up Articles of High Treason. Upon this, the House appointed the earl of Huntingdon, earl of Bridgewater, earl of Rochester, earl of Fauconberg, the lord Paget, lord Cornwallis, to meet this afternoon at five o'clock, and inspect the Journals, what hath been the Method and Proceedings upon Impeachments from the House of Commons; and make Report thereof to-morrow morning.

June 27.

The said Committee reported, "That they have considered the Journals as far as the Impeachment of the first duke of Bucks in 1626; and did not examine further off, because they found the entries still shorter the further they went. Their lordships do not find, as far as they went, any particular account touching the method of receiving Impeachments. They find sometimes Impeachments have been delivered at conferences, and sometimes with and sometimes without Articles; but when they have been delivered at the bar of the House, it hath always been by way of message from the House of Commons: but it does not appear whether the Lords on the woolsack were sitting while the Articles were reading; nor doth it appear that any difference hath been made between the receiving a Message where an Impeachment hath been brought up, and any other Message."

The House agreed to this Report.

June 29.

This day being appointed to take into consideration the said Articles of Impeachment, the House ordered the Impeachment to be read: which was done. And, after debate, a committee was appointed to inspect the Journals of this House, as to Precedents of Impeachments, and the Grounds and Reasons of those Precedents; and to report to the House.

The Earl of Rochester reported what Precedents the Committee have found in the

* The 16th chapter of lord Hale's Treatise on the Jurisdiction of the Lords House or Parliament relates to Parliamentary Impeachments as well of Commoners as Peers, and exhibits much curious learning respecting them. It is as follows:

"CONCERNING THE JURISDICTION OF THE LORDS HOUSE IN CRIMINAL CAUSES.

"Criminal causes are of two kinds. 1. Such as are capital, where the judgment is loss of life, as treason and felony.—2. Such as are less than capital, where judgment commonly is fine, imprisonment, and sometimes other corporal punishment, as the pillory, &c.

"As to the former of those, there were anciently in parliament these several ways of proceedings:

"1. By way of authoritative declaration of treason pursuant to the clause of 25 E. 3. touching treasons not therein specified. And this was and ought to be done by the king, lords, and commons by act of parliament [Nota, the case of the judgment of the earl of Salisbury, though dead 2 H. 4, n. 30, was upon a kind of conditional attainder by act of parliament 1 H. 4, n. if they should after take part with R. 2. the petition of the commons.] And this equally concerns all persons whether peers or other. Such were the declarations of treasons touching John Imperial Rot. Parl. R. 2. the treason of [The case of sir John Mortimer in 2 H. 6. is probably meant. See Rot. Parl. v. 3, p. 202. Hargrave.] for breaking prison, Rot. Parl. H. 6. And therefore the declaration of the lords only acquitting the fact of the earl of Northumberland from treason. Rot. Parl. 5, H. 4. being only by the lords, was not such a declaration as was warranted by 25 E. 3. de proditionibus. But this concerns not the business in hand.

" 2. There was antiently a course, upon an accusation in the behalf of the king or by his command, to give judgment of death by the lords with the king's assent. And such was the proceeding Rot. Parl. 4 E. 3. against some peers, as Mortimer and Matravers, about the death of E. 2. at which time also the lord Thomas de Barclay, though he were unquestionably a peer of the realm, and was summoned to and sat in divers parliaments before and after, yet waived his trial by peers and pleaded not guilty to the accusation, 'et de bono et malo ponit se super patriam;' and a trial was thereupon had by twelve knights and esquires of the county of Gloucester 'in pleno parlamento' at the lords bar, and by them he was acquitted ; the only precedent that ever I saw of a trial of a peer by other than his peers, and that by a jury appearing at the lords bar in parliament.

" But besides these peers, that were tried upon an accusation of treason thus exhibited, there were some that were not peers had judgment of death given upon them, as Beresford Gurney and others for the same offence. But there is a solemn memorial entered upon the roll n. 6. 'ne trahatur in consequentiam,' viz.

'Est assentu et accorde per notre seigneur le roy et tous les seigneurs en plein parlement, que tout soit il que les dits peeres come judges de parlement empristrent en la presence notre seigneur le roy a faire et rendre les dits judgments per assent du roy sur aucunes de eux que ne fuerent pas leur peres, et ce par encheson de murder de seigneur lige et destruction de celui que fut cy pres de sanc royall et fitz du roi. Que pourtant, que les dits peres que ore sont, ou les peres que seront a temps a vener, ne soient nies tenus ne charges a rendre judgment sur autres que sur peres, ne a ce faire. Mes ayent les peres de la terre poer eins de ceo pur tous jours soient discharges et quietes. Et que les avant dits judgments ore rendus ne soient my trete en ensample ne'en consequence en temps en venir, par quoi les

" Mr. Attorney General acquainted the House of the Examinations taken against him; and that he had an order of the king's, dated the 9th of March instant, to prosecute him at law.

" Resolved, he shall be proceeded with at common law.

'dits peres puissent Dure charges desores d'adjudger autres que lur peres contre le ley de la terre, si autiel case aveigne, que Dieu defend.'

" Though this declaration is in part to own their power, and to disown any compulsion upon them to give judgment upon others than their peers ; yet the conclusion tells us, that such a judgment is against the law of the land. [Vid. Journ. Dom. Proc. 2 July 1689. Hargrave.] And it is observable, that though the case then in hand was a judgment of death, yet the tenor of the declaration is general.

" And yet the lords were not as good as their words; for in the case of Gomenies and Weston 1 R. 2. though they were no peers, judgment was given against them for treason ; and the like was done in Hall's case 1 H. 4.

" Yet it seems, even before the statute of 1 H. 4. hereafter mentioned touching appeals of treason and other misdemeanors, the party accused by such a private impeachment might decline the trial by the lords by examination of witnesses, and put himself upon a trial by the country.

" And thus Rot. Parl. 5 R. 2. n. 43. when Clivedon accused Cogan in the lords house in parliament for a treasonable offence, the party impeached, being only a commoner and no peer, pleaded not guilty to the impeachment, 'et de ceo il soy mette de bone et male sur le verdit de payis, et sur ce al fyne de ce parlement fuerent les partyes adjournes devant les justices a la commun ley de quont que appartient a ce ley.'

" And this is agreeable to Magna Charta, cap. 29. 'nec super eum ibimus nisi per legale judicium parium suorum.' And this being duly considered, may perchance go far in impeachments of commoners, especially by private impeachments, and possibly by others, as to the point of trial by examination of witnesses before the lords in criminal causes.

" Some indeed have thought this declaration of 4 E. 3. being done thus solemnly 'in pleno parlamento' was a statute [The judges in 1689 inclined to this opinion. See Journ. Dom. Proc. 2 July 1689.—Hargrave.] or act of parliament. But that seems not so clear. But it was certainly as solemn a declaration by the lords as could be made less than an act of parliament, and is as high an evidence against the jurisdiction of the lords to try or judge a commoner in a criminal cause as can possibly be thought of: 1. Because done by way of declaration to be against law: 2. Because it is a declaration by the lords in disaffirmance of their own jurisdiction, which commonly judges chuse rather to amplify, if it may be, than to abridge.

" 3. The third method of proceeding in capital cases, as also sometimes in causes merely criminal, was by a kind of parliamentary appeal by certain lords appellants. Thus it was done in the great process in parliament 11 R. 2. by the lords appellants, and afterwards in 21 R. 2. by lords appellants of the contrary faction. And this not only, where peers were appealed, but where commoners were also appealed, who had in those cases judgment of death.

Earl of Tyrone.

" January 7, 1680. The earl of Tyrone impeached of high treason. No Articles brought up. The parliament prorogued two days after ; so no further proceedings.

" 4. The fourth course of proceeding even in capital causes was by articles of impeachment by the House of Commons. And this was commonly used, not only before the statute of 1 H. 4. 'de quo infra,' but after, as in the impeachments of Gomenies and Weston and the bishop of Norwich 1 & 7 R. 2. Lyons and Alice Peres 50 E. 3. the duke of Suffolk in 28 H. 6. the duke of Buckingham 3 Cha. the earl of Strafford in 16 Cha. and divers others : and that not only in cases capital, but such as were only misdemeanors.

" Now to give an account how the law hath been taken touching these kinds of proceedings, and what hath intervened touching them.

" 1. For the first of these there is no question ; for such declarations by the king and both Houses in pursuance of the statute of 25 E. 3. are of the strength of acts of parliament.

" 2. For the second of these, viz. impeachments of treason by the king's ministers, as his attorney generals, this hath been held against law, and particularly against the statute of 25 E. 3. st. 5. cap. 4. before recited. And though it were a turbulent time, yet it was so granted by the lords themselves in the impeachment presented by Mr. Attorney Herbert against lord Kimbolton and the five members of the House of Commons, and the prosecution thereby desisted from, and the accusation withdrawn. And indeed the statute of 1 H. 4. seems to include this case.

" 3. As to appeals of treason and misdemeanors, though they were in use at the common law, as appears by Britton cap. , and much used in parliament, especially in the time of R. 2, yet by the statute of 1 H. 4, cap. 14, all appeals of treason and also of misdemeanors in parliament at the prosecution of any private person are wholly taken away. For the words are general, that no appeals be from henceforth made or in anywise pursued in parliament in time to come. Vid. Rot. Parl. 3 H. 6, n. 38.

" And therefore in this parliament now continuing by prorogation, where the earl of Bristol delivered in articles intitled of high treason and other misdemeanors against the earl of Clarendon, upon a solemn reference by the House of Lords to all the judges, it was unanimously resolved and so reported, that both as Scroggs.

" January 7, 1680. Sir William Scroggs impeached of treason and misdemeanors, and Articles brought up ; one whereof was a general article of treason, for endeavouring to to the matters of misdemeanors as well as those of high treason this impeachment was against law and against the statute of 1 H. 4, c. 14.

" It is true, that Rot. Parl. 15 E. 3, n. 41, there was a judicature set up by act of parliament in the Lords House for miscarriage of public ministers, viz. 'que soient oustes et punies par le jugement des peres et autres covenables y mises : et sur ce le roy ferra prononcier et faire execution sans delay selonc le jugement des peres en parlement.' But this jurisdiction lasted not long ; for by the parliament of 17 E. 3, n. 23, that whole parliament is at once repealed, 'et perdu le nosme de statut come cel qu'est prejudicial et contraire as leyes et usages de realme et as droits et prerogatives de nostre seigneur le roy,' and was never enacted again.

" 4. But as to a criminal proceeding upon an impeachment sent up to the Lords by the House of Commons, that was never esteemed within the prohibition of the statute of 1 H. 4, and accordingly it was declared by the judges in that resolution above mentioned in the case between the earls of Bristol and Clarendon. And the reason is ; because the accusation or impeachment of the House of Commons is in nature of the highest presentment or indictment by the grand inquest of the whole kingdom.

" In Rot. Parl. 2 H. 4, n. 30, after the making of the statute of 1 H. 4, there was a strange judgment of treason given against the earl of Salisbury after his death by the House of Lords. [But nota, this judgment against the earl of Salisbury after his death was in pursuance of a kind of conditional attainder, if ever he took part with R. 2. Vid. Rot. Parl. 1 H. 4.] Rot. Parl. 2 H. 5, p. 1, n. 12, a petition of error by his heir was preferred and received by the Lords ; and among other apparent errors, which are entered Rot. Parl. 2 H. 5, p. 2, n. 13, he assigns this for error, that the judgment was given 'sans petition ou assent de communes en le dit parlement, queux de droit serront petitioners ou assentours de ceo que serra ordeine pur ley en parlement.' The lords nevertheless affirmed their judgment ; and in 9 H. 5, the earl obtained an act of restitution. I only mention it to this purpose, that notwithstanding the statute of 1 H. 4, an impeachment by the commons was always allowed ; and accordingly it hath been practised in all succeeding ages since.

" The causes before mentioned are indeed principally capital causes, as treason and felony. But withal the resolutions in the case of the earls of Bristol and Clarendon extend the statute of 1 H. 4, to criminal causes that are not capital : and the plain words of the statutes of 25, 28, and 42 E. 3, against putting men to subvert the fundamental laws of the kingdom, without specifying any particular fact. He gives 10,000*l.* bail for his appearance, and two sureties, with 5,000*l.* apiece. No further proceedings.*

answer upon suggestion without presentment extend equally to all criminal causes as well as capital.

"And yet I must grant, that even in criminals the House of Lords did exercise a jurisdiction as well after those statutes as before.

"1. In all cases, where by special acts of parliament the king's council had jurisdiction, which are remembered supra, chap. 4, there the 'magnum consilium' or the Lords House had a jurisdiction. And although it seems, that at first or in the more antient times the lords and 'consilium regis' made as it were but one 'magnum consilium' in parliament; yet when in process of time the whole power was assumed by the Lords House, so that they became the court, and the judges and others of the 'consilium ordinarium' became but assistants, the lords in parliament carried with them the authoritative jurisdiction in these cases.

"2. Whereas by the tacit concession of the Commons petition in parliament Rot. Parl. 1 R. 2, n. 87. [Vid. Rot. 1 H. 4. n. 162, confirming the statute 1 R. 2,] and the fuller enforcement thereof Rot. Parl. 2 R. 2, p. 2, n. 4, both mentioned at large supra, chap. 4, there was a loose left for some jurisdiction in the council, where the offenders seemed too great for an ordinary prosecution, or the nature of the offence carried on by oppression with a high hand; the House of Lords after the abovementioned statutes did many times interpose with their power, and called the offenders before them upon complaint of private persons. But it rarely ended in any judicial punishment, unless the parties submitted thereunto; but only a due provision to amend the inconvenience.

"Such were these that follow.

Penn.

"April 24, 1668. Sir William Penn impeached of several high crimes and misdemeanors. The articles delivered at a confer-

"After the time of H. 4, I find very little footsteps of proceeding in the lords house in cases criminal: but people took their ordinary course at law; or if they resorted to parliament, they began in the house of commons, and then it was transmitted by them to the lords, and it ended in a bill or act of parliament.

"And those cases above mentioned are the most that I find after 25 E. 3, which nevertheless appear for the most part to be, either in such cases where the house of lords as the 'magnum consilium regis' had jurisdiction by acts of parliament, as in great riots, false accusations before themselves; or where by the power and outrageous oppression and violence of men of power the proceeding of the common law was obstructed: and by the power of the lords house and their interposition that obstruction removed, and suits remitted to their ordinary regular course in the ordinary courts of justice.

"And indeed in those turbulent times there was great necessity and use of such interposition of the lords house to preserve the peace, and to afford the law its due course and current; and therefore in those acts of 1 R. 2, and 2 R. 2, above mentioned tacitly allowed even to the 'consilium ordinarium.'

"And hence it was, that when rot. parl. 2 H. 6, n. 16, the private council of that young prince was established, and their power declared by act of parliament, it is specially provided, that all bills before them, that contain matters terminable at common law, be remitted there to be determined; but if so be the discretion of the council feel too great might on the one side and unmight on the other, there they might discreetly interpose, that suits be fairly carried.

"And though possibly as well the lords house, as the king's council, by occasion of these admissions and exceptions, might in some cases exceed; yet neither the one nor the other took upon them an universal or common jurisdiction in criminal cases, but left them ordinarily to the ordinary courts of justice.

"But in all cases, where the evidence of the fact was not clear by the confession of the parties or great notoriety of the fact, the party complained of might plead the general issue, and put himself upon the country. And then the complaint was either sent into the king's bench to be tried, which was the usual course; or special commissions of enquiry issued to try it by inquest; or (which was very rare) it Drake.

"December 6, 1660. William Drake impeached, for writing a scandalous, seditious, and wicked Pamphlet.

"December 11. Ordered to be brought to the bar.

"December 19. The Lords declare, That was tried by a jury returned 'coram rege et consilio,' as was done in the case between Bartholomew Badlesmer constable of the castle of Bristol and the mayor and commonalty of Bristol; where the jury was returned 'coram consilio,' and found the defendants guilty, for which they made fine of two hundred marks, rot. parl. 9 E. 2, n. 7, which though it were a process 'coram consilio,' yet it seems to be in the lords house in parliament, because entered there of record; the only example of such a trial in parliament, except that of 4 E. 3, of the lord Barclay abovementioned, and that of Alice Peres, rot. parl. 1 R. 2, who pleaded not guilty, and was tried by a kind of jury.

"And thus much of criminal proceedings in the lords house. Wherein I meddle not with proceedings in cases of breach of privilege, because of another nature. Nor have I mentioned many cases before 25 E. 3, in the times of E. 1, and some in the beginning of E. 3, because before the statutes of 5, 25, & 42 Ed. 3, which were made against proceedings without due presentment. Nor have I mentioned the proceeding against Lee Rot. Parl. 42 E. 3, n. 21, 22, &c. that against Lyons the lord Latimer and others Rot. Parl. 50 E. 3, n. 17. 20, against Gomines and Weston Rot. Parl. 1 R. 2, n. 38, that against the bishop of Norwich, [Rot. Parl. 7 R. 2, n. 15. Hargrave.] R. 2; that against the dukes of Surrey and Aumerle, marquis of Dorset, earl of Gloucester and John Hall touching the murder of the duke of Gloucester: [Rot. Parl. 1 Hen. 4. Hargrave]: for he, that carefully looks into all parts of the records of these proceedings, will find them, either by the promotion or petition of the House of Commons, or in pursuance of acts of parliament directing; and therefore I do not mention them.

"And the like method of impeachments of the House of Commons delivered into the Lords House, against as well commoners as peers, hath been frequently used in latter times. Whereupon the Lords took the defence or answer of the persons impeached; received proofs; and upon a private debate among themselves first had, agreed touching the censure whether guilty or not guilty; and if guilty, then proceeded to the particulars of their censure, and oftentimes acquainted the king with their sentence. And when the Lords were agreed of their judgment, they sent to the House of Commons to acquaint them they were ready for judgment. Whereupon the House of Commons came up to the Lords if this parliament be dissolved before that they shall have time to give judgment against the said Drake, that then the king's Attorney do proceed against him.

After the reading the copy of the abovesaid Record, which was affirmed by one of the peers to be authentic, he having examined it with the Roll; and debate thereupon;

This question was asked the Judges, "Whether the said Record is a statute?"

The Judges answer, "As it appears to them by the aforesaid copy, they believe it is a statute; but, if they saw the Roll itself, they could be more positive therein."

And after further debate, this question was proposed to be asked the Judges:

"Whether the Lords, by this statute, be barred from trying a commoner upon an impeachment of the House of Commons?"

Then this previous question was put, "Whether that question shall be put to the Judges?"

It was resolved in the negative.

And, after further debate, this question was put, "Whether this House will proceed upon the Impeachment brought from the House of Commons against sir Adam Blaire, captain Henry Vaughan, captain Frederick Mole, John Elliot, doctor in physic, and Robert Grey, doctor in physic?" It was resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That the keeper of Newgate be, and is hereby required, to bring in safe custody to the bar of this House, the bodies of the said sir Adam Blair, captain Henry Vaughan, captain Frederick Mole, John Elliot, doctor in physic, and Robert Grey, doctor in physic, or such of them as are in his custody, on Thursday next, at ten o'clock in the forenoon, to hear the said Articles read.

July 4.

This day being appointed for the persons impeached by the House of Commons of high treason, and other high crimes and offences, to be brought to the bar, to have their charge of impeachment read unto them: who being come, they were sent for in.

The keeper of Newgate brought to the bar, captain Henry Vaughan, captain Frederick Mole, and John Elliot doctor of physic, these only being in his custody; who kneeled at the bar.

And the marquis of Halifax lord privy seal, Speaker pro tempore, told them, 'That they stood impeached by the House of Commons, in the name of all the Commons of England, of high treason and other high crimes and offences; and that the articles of impeachment should be read unto them; and bid them stand up.'

Then the clerk read the said Articles of Impeachment. Which being ended, the Speaker asked captain Henry Vaughan, 'what he had to say for himself?' He desired, 'That he might have a copy of the Articles of Impeachment, and time to answer, and counsel allowed him, and his wife and friends to come to him.'

Then captain Frederick Mole was asked by the Speaker, 'What he had to say for himself?' He said, 'He was a stranger to the laws of this country; desired the same as captain Vaughan did.'

Then John Elliott, doctor in physic, was asked by the Speaker, 'What he had to say for himself?' He desired the same as captain Vaughan had done. Then they withdrew.

The House taking their desires into consideration; Then they were called in again, and kneeled at the bar until they were bid stand up. And the Speaker said, 'That the lords had considered of their desires; and had ordered that they should have a copy of their charge, of Articles of Impeachment, and counsel allowed them, such as they should name (then captain Henry Vaughan did name those in the following order,) and their friends allowed to come to them; and that they stood committed to the prison of Newgate by order of this House.' Then they withdrew.

Ordered, That the said captain Henry Vaughan, captain Frederick Mole, and John Elliott doctor in physic, shall stand committed to the prison of Newgate, there to be kept in safe custody, in order to their trials.

July 22.

This day being appointed for sir Adam Blair and doctor Gray to put in their Answers to the Impeachment of the House of Commons against them; they were brought to the bar, and kneeled until they were bid to stand up.

They delivered in their several Answers, which were read, as follow:

"The humble ANSWER of Sir ADAM BLAIR, now Prisoner in the Gate-House, to the Articles of Impeachment of High Treason, and other high Crimes and Offences, exhibited to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled against the said Sir Adam Blair and others therein named, whereof he stands impeached, by the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses in Parliament assembled, in the name of themselves and the Commons of England.

"The said sir Adam Blair, in the first place, protesting his innocency of and from all the treasons, and crimes, and offences whatsoever, in the said articles contained, and no way acknowledging, granting, or admitting, all or any the clauses, articles, or matters in the said articles of impeachment contained or specified (so far as the same any way concerns him) to be true, as in and by the said articles of impeachment is supposed; and humbly craving, that all benefit and advantage may be saved to him, of excepting to the generality, uncertainty, and deficiency of the said charge; as likewise the benefit of having and relying upon your lordships great judgment, whether the crimes and offences so imposed upon him by the said impeachment, do, by the certain known laws of this realm, (so renowned for right and justice) amount to the high crime of treason:

"Which being prayed; and, as he hopeth, being granted; for answer thereunto he saith, that he is not nor ever was guilty of the treasons, crimes, and offences, or any or either of them, of which he stands charged by the said impeachment; and, for trial thereof, putteth himself upon, and humbly submitteth to, the judgment of your lordships; whose justice he doth and always shall rely upon, and therein acquiesce.

AD. BLAIR."

"The humble ANSWER of ROBERT GRAY, doctor in physic, now prisoner in the Gate House, in the Articles of Impeachment of High Treason, and other high Crimes and Offences, exhibited to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, against the said Robert Gray and others therein named, whereof he stands impeached, by the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses in Parliament assembled, in the name of themselves and the Commons of England.

"The said Robert Gray, in the first place, protesting his innocency of and from all the treasons and other crimes and offences whatsoever in the said articles contained, and no way acknowledging, granting, or admitting, all or any the clauses, articles, or matters in the said articles of impeachment contained or specified (so far as the same any way concerns him) to be true, as in and by the same articles of impeachment is supposed; and humbly craving that all benefit and advantage may be saved to him, of excepting to the generality, uncertainty, and deficiency of the said charge; as likewise the benefit of having and relying upon your lordships great judgment, whether the crimes and offences so imposed upon him by the said impeachment do by the certain known laws of this realm (so renowned for right and justice) amount to the high crime of treason:

"Which being prayed; and, as he hopeth, being granted; for answer thereunto he saith, that he is not, nor ever was, guilty of the treasons, crimes, and offences, or of any or either of them, of which he stands charged by the said impeachment; and, for his trial thereof, putteth himself upon, and humbly submitteth to, the judgment of your lordships, whose justice he doth and always shall rely upon, and therein acquiesce. ROBERT GRAY."

Ordered, that the copies of the said Answers be communicated to the Commons.

It does not appear that the Commons made any replication to these answers.

March 31, 1690.

Upon reading the Petition of sir Adam Blair prisoner in the Gate House; praying, he may be at liberty, giving sufficient bail to attend this House:

It is ordered, That the consideration of the said petition be, and is hereby, referred to the Lords committees for privileges.

April 5.

The question being put, "Whether sir Adam Blair shall be admitted to bail?" It was resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That on Wednesday next, this House will take into consideration, "Whether Impeachments continue from Parliament to Parliament?"

Ordered, That the keeper of the Gate House at Westminster, do bring to the bar of this House, sir Adam Blair, now in his custody, on Monday next, in order to his being bailed; and that the said sir Adam Blair do bring with him two sureties, each to be bound in 2,500*l.* and he in 5,000*l.* for his appearing before this House at all times when he shall be so ordered.

April 7.

Sir Adam Blair was bailed, and the condition of the recognizance is, That if the said sir Adam Blair shall appear before this House at all times when he shall be so ordered, then this recognizance to be void and of none effect; or else to stand in full force and virtue.

On the 8th and 9th of April similar recognizances were taken from the other persons impeached.

In the next session of parliament, on the 2d and 5th of December, 1690, sir Adam Blair and the others, were upon their petition discharged from their bail.

375. Proceedings in Parliament against JAMES Earl of SALISBURY, and HENRY Earl of PETERBOROUGH, on an Impeachment of High Treason, "For departing from their Allegiance, and "being reconciled to the Church of Rome:"* 1 & 2 WILLIAM & MARY, A. D. 1689—1690.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

October 26, 1689.

RESOLVED, That an Impeachment of high-treason be sent to the Lords against the earls of Salisbury and Peterborough for departing from their Allegiance, and being reconciled to the Church of Rome. And that Mr. Foley do impeach the said earls at the bar of the House of Lords, in the name of the House of Commons, and of all the Commons of England.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

October 26, 1689.

A Message was brought from the Commons, by Mr. Paul Foley and others: who did, in the name of the House of Commons, and all the Commons of England, impeach the earl of Salisbury and the earl of Peterborough of high-treason, in departing from their Allegiance, and being reconciled to the Church of Rome; and that they will send further Articles against them in convenient time, and did desire that they may be committed.

Then the ensuing Order was made:

* This offence was constituted treason by the stat. 23 Eliz. c. 1, s. 2, and by 3 James 1, c. 4, s. 23.

VOL. XII.

"Whereas James earl of Salisbury and Henry earl of Peterborough stand impeached by the House of Commons of high-treason, in departing from their Allegiance, and being reconciled to the Church of Rome: It is ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the gentleman usher of the black rod attending this House do forthwith attach the body of Henry earl of Peterborough, and bring him in safe custody to the bar of this House."

The gentleman of the black rod gave the House an account, "That he had taken the earl of Peterborough; and he was now attending at the door."

Then he was called in; and, having kneeled at the bar, the Speaker acquainted him, "That their lordships had received an Impeachment from the House of Commons against him, for high-treason, in departing from his allegiance, and being reconciled to the Church of Rome; and that they would send further Articles against him in convenient time, and desired that he might be committed."

Then his lordship spoke to this effect:

"I am sorry it is my fortune to come before your lordships as a delinquent. As for the rest, I desire, that, if I am to be committed, I may have a copy of what is objected against me, and time to answer, and counsel allowed, and them and my friends (considering the name of the treason) to come to me: and I shall be ready to obey your orders, whatsoever they be."—And so withdrew.

Ordered, That the chief governor of the Tower of London, his deputy or deputies, do take into his custody the body of the said Henry earl of Peterborough, and keep him in safe custody, until he shall be delivered by due course of law.

Ordered, That the chief governor of their majesty's Tower of London, his deputy or deputies, do bring to the bar of this House, on Monday next, at ten o'clock in the forenoon, the said James earl of Salisbury, now in his custody.

Ordered, That the earl of Peterborough, now prisoner in the Tower of London, shall be allowed to have his lady, friends, and servants, to have access to him, so as the governor of the Tower of London do give this House an account of the names of such persons as shall come to his lordship.

October 28.

The lord Lucas, chief governor of the Tower of London, acquainted the House, "He had brought the earl of Salisbury, according to their lordships order."

Who being brought to the bar; having kneeled: the Speaker, by directions of the House, told his lordship, "That he stands impeached by the House of Commons, and in the name of all the Commons of England, of high-treason, in departing from his Allegiance, and being reconciled to the Church of Rome: and that they would send further Articles against him in convenient time; and that they desire he may be committed."

The earl of Salisbury said to this effect:

"I went abroad young, and was seven years out, and did not return a year before I was committed. As for my religion, when I come to defend it, I will defend myself as well as I can: I hope this honourable House doth not expect I should accuse myself."

After this, his lordship withdrew; and the House made the ensuing Orders:

"Whereas James earl of Salisbury stands impeached by the House of Commons of high-treason, in departing from his Allegiance, and being reconciled to the Church of Rome: it is ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the chief governor of the Tower of London, his deputy or deputies, do take into his custody the body of the said James earl of Salisbury, and keep him in safe custody until he shall be delivered by due course of law; and this shall be a sufficient warrant on that behalf.

"Ordered, That the earl of Salisbury, now prisoner in the Tower of London, shall be allowed to have his lady, friends, and servants, to have access to him, so as the governor of the Tower of London do give this House an account of the names of such persons as shall come to his lordship."

October 2, 1690.

Upon reading the Petition of the earl of Peterborough: shewing, "That he hath been kept prisoner in the Tower for almost two years, notwithstanding a dissolution and several prorogations of parliament have intervened,* as also an act of free and general pardon; and praying to be discharged by order of this House."

Ordered, That all the judges do attend this House on Monday next, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon, to give their opinion, "Whether the earl of Peterborough be pardoned by the act of the king and queen's most gracious, general and free pardon."

Upon reading the Petition of the earl of Salisbury; shewing, "That he hath been a prisoner for a year and nine months, notwithstanding the late act of free and general pardon, and praying to be discharged:"

Ordered, That all the judges do attend this House on Monday next, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon, to give their opinions, "Whether the earl of Salisbury be pardoned by the act for the king and queen's most gracious, general and free pardon."

October 6.

The Judges did deliver their Opinions, "Whether the crimes of the earl of Peterborough and the earl of Salisbury be pardoned by the act of the king and queen's most gracious, general and free pardon." And they were of opinion, "That if their crimes and offences were committed before the 13th day of February, 1688-9, and not in Ireland, nor beyond the seas, they are pardoned by the said act."

After a long debate; this question was put, "Whether the earl of Peterborough and the earl of Salisbury shall be now discharged of their imprisonments?" It was resolved in the negative.

Then this question was put, "Whether the earl of Salisbury and the earl of Peterborough shall be admitted to bail?" It was resolved in the affirmative.

They were accordingly both ordered to be admitted to bail.

This day, the Lords appoint a Committee to inspect and consider precedents, "Whether impeachments continue in statu quo from parliament to parliament?†"

* The parliament had been dissolved the 6th of February, and a new parliament met the 20th of March 1690.

† "The same question was raised, just a century after, on the 9th of December, 1790, in the case of the impeachment of Warren Hastings, esq.; but very few persons were found, in either house of parliament, to maintain, 'That the act of the crown in dissolving the parliament could, by law, put an end to a criminal prosecution, instituted by the House of Commons on the part of the people.' Whoever will consult the report of precedents, made to the Lords from a Committee appointed for that purpose (and which was ordered to be printed on the 19th of April, 1791) and will read the printed debates in both Houses, on that question, will be convinced, that the arguments, on which the decision was founded, 'That impeachments do continue in statu quo from Parliament to Parliament,' and which produced so large a majority both in the Lords and Commons, were drawn from what had been the ancient course and methods of parliament in former instances of impeachment; and that this practice, in cases of impeachment, was analogous and conformable to the invariable course of precedents in all other judicial proceedings, before the House of Lords, even from the earliest times.—See several of these precedents in the note †, in p. 74, of this volume.—A very judicious and clear argument upon this subject was printed in 1791, intitled, 'A Review of the Arguments in favour of the continuance of impeachments notwithstanding a dissolution,' by a Barrister; supposed to be written by the hon. Spencer Perceval. The numbers on the division in this question in the House of Commons were 143 to 30; and in the House of Lords 69 to 20.* 4 Hatsell's Precedents, 253, Ed. 1796.

This question was proposed, "Whether James earl of Sarum and Henry earl of Peterborough shall be now discharged from their bail?"

Then this previous question was put, "Whether this question shall be now put?" It was resolved in the affirmative,

Then the main question was put, "Whether James earl of Salisbury and Henry earl of Peterborough shall be now discharged from their bail?" It was resolved in the affirmative.

"Leave having been given to any lords, to enter their dissents, if the question was carried in the affirmative: and these lords following do enter their dissents, in these reasons:

"1. Because we conceive it is a question not at all relating to the real debate before us; but urged upon us, not for the sake only of the two lords mentioned.

"2. Because we ought to have examined precedents of pardons, to see how far an impeachment was concerned, before we had adjudged the lords discharged; or whether an impeachment could be pardoned without particular mention in an act of grace; and what difference there is between an act of grace and an act of indemnity.

"3. Because we did not hear the House of Commons, who are parties, and who in common justice ought to have been heard before we had passed this vote.

"Bolton; North and Grey; Stamford; J. Bridgewater; Bathe; Mablesfeld; Granville; Herbert."

They were both discharged accordingly.*

376. Proceedings against MATTHEW CRONE, for High Treason: 2 WILLIAM & MARY, A. D. 1690. [From the Diary of Henry Earl of Clarendon, and Narcissus Luttrell's MS. "Brief Historical Relation."]

Thursday, March 6, 1690.

ONE Mrs. Clifford's house was searched last night, about midnight, for one Crone; who, they say, came lately out of France. He was betrayed by one Fowler, who came over with

* This Henry earl of Clarendon (of whom some particulars are related in p. 144, of this volume) in his own account, as printed in the text, gives ground for a suspicion that he was not altogether unconnected with Crone, and he was himself about this time committed to the Tower upon a charge of high treason. Of the proceedings against him and various other persons, many particulars are related in his Diary, and also in Narcissus Luttrell's Brief Historical Relation, &c. From the latter work, I will select one extract:

"June, 1690. A great discovery is made of a dangerous conspiracy that was carrying on in this kingdom against this government, by Papists and other disaffected persons inviting the French here upon our coast, giving them an account of affairs here, and the posture of high treason, in levying war against their majesties.

"Monday, May 19, 1690. Crone's trial, which had been put off once before; and it being alleged, that one of the witnesses was not to be found, it was put off till Friday fortnight.

"Friday, June 6. Crone was brought to his trial; in which were many remarkable passages. The judges were very severe, especially the chief baron. The jury sat up all night.

"Saturday, June 7. About noon the jury brought in their verdict, that Crone was guilty; our fleet, so that the French intended to have met with our fleet at anchor and burnt them, and then they were to have landed a body of men here with whom the mal-contents were to join, and accordingly the French came and had surprised the English fleet at anchor (if it had not pleased God to becalm them for six or eight hours off of Plymouth, whereby the express came timely enough for our fleet to weigh anchor and get to sea: at the same time that this was carrying on here, another plot was carrying on in Scotland for subverting that government.

"Several persons have been taken up there, and others have absented themselves; and here, in this kingdom, many warrants have been granted for taking up several persons; many are already taken up, as the earl of Clarendon, lord Newburgh, sir John Fenwick, Mr. Stafford (son to the late lord Stafford) lord Forbes, Mr. Knevet Hastings, are committed to the Tower; and captain Ryder, Charles Turner, sir Nicholas Butler, captain Oliver St. George, are sent to Newgate; Mr. Pepys and sir Adam Blair to the Gatehouse: it is said all their warrants run for high treason, in corresponding with their majesties enemies; warrants are out, and messengers in search for several others, as the earls of Aylesbury and Litchfield, sir Roger L'Estrange, &c.: we hear not on whose information this is; some think Crone, others Gadsbury; it is yet uncertain. Captain Hatton, brother to the lord Hatton, is committed to the Tower for handing to the press a treasonable paper against the government.

"The lord Griffin's son and major Mathews, are taken up and sent to the Tower for treason, and sir Henry Shiers to Newgate.

"The earl of Clarendon made his prayer in the court of King's-bench according to the Habeas Corpus Act, to be either bailed or tried; but was told it was too late, it not being in the first week of the term as required. Bishop Labourn and bishop Gifford came up also by Ha-though one of them declared, he was not satisfied that the evidence spoke truth; and he urged sir Robert Atkyns's book in defence of lord Russel's innocency; (see vol. 9, p. 719,) but it signified nothing. The prisoner being then asked, why sentence should not be awarded against him, he said, there was an error in the indictment before the grand jury; that the bill was indorsed Billa verra instead of vera. The king's counsel not being there, it was put off till five in the afternoon; and then the prisoner insisting to be heard, the court appointed to hear it argued on Thursday next, and assigned counsel to the prisoner: in the mean time sentence was respited.

"Whitsunday, June 8. In the morning Mrs. Clifford was with me. She told me, she had been to see Crone; that he was in a rage to think of death; that he said, he was too young to be a martyr; and that she did believe, rather than die, he would tell all he knew.

"Monday, June 9. Mrs. Clifford told me, she had been again with Crone; that he was in a better humour, and talked courageously.

"Thursday, June 12. In the morning Crone's plea was argued and over-ruled. The three chief judges and Eyres were in court.

"Thursday, June 19. In the morning, lord Nottingham went to Crone in Newgate, upon a letter (as was said) he had from him last night. My lord (as it is given out) urged him much to confess, that he might deserve his life; but "July. The earl of Yarmouth is brought up out of the country, under the custody of a messenger.

"Several of the eminent and noted Roman Catholics are taken up and committed to prison.

"Lieutenant colonel Vaughan is also committed to prison, and sir Lionel Walden upon account of this new plot.

"Bernard Howard, esq. and colonel Butler, are both taken up and committed to the Tower. Captain Frogmorton is taken up and committed for high treason.

"July 8. The lord Griffin* is also taken up and sent to the Tower for high treason.

"The earl of Yarmouth came up to the King's-bench by Habeas Corpus from the Tower; and, upon the return, it appeared he was committed by a warrant from the lords of the council, being charged with high treason, in abetting and adhering to the king's enemies. He prayed, by his counsel, to be bailed, and they took several exceptions to the warrant of commitment; which the whole court thought not material, so he was denied to be bailed, and remanded to the Tower."

the fellow said, he had told all at his trial, and that he knew nothing more. Upon which his lordship said, he doubted he should see him no more, for he would certainly die to-morrow, if he did not confess; but he would acquaint the queen with what he had said. In the evening lord Monmouth and lord Lincoln were at Newgate, pressing Crone to make a full confession, making him many fair promises, in case he would be ingenuous: but he still said, he could say nothing. At ten at night Mr. Finch brought him a reprieve till Wednesday next.

"Wednesday, June 25. Crone was this day to have been executed; the sledge was at Newgate, and all the people thronged together, as usual upon those occasions; but he was again reprieved, in hopes he would deserve his life by the confession he might make."

[Thus far from lord Clarendon.]

The next day, June 26, he was sent for, as appears by the following warrant.*

'These are, in his majesty's name, to require you to bring Mr. Matthew Crone, a prisoner in your custody, attainted of high-treason, to my office in Whitehall this afternoon; for which this shall be your warrant. Given at the court at Whitehall, the 26th day of June, 1690. NOTTINGHAM.'

Your reall friend and humble servantt,
Thursday Night. M. CRONE."

The famous, or rather infamous, Mr. Fuller in his pamphlet, intituled, "A Brief Discovery of the true mother of the prince of Wales," p. 24, says, (if he is to be credited) "Mr. Crone, with myself, was sent to England with several commissions and letters from king James, for raising men."—Page 28, "After my last return from France with Mr. Crone, I informed his majesty of all I knew: Mr. Crone was seized, and sent prisoner to the Tower."—Page 29, "They (the jacobites) finding their whole design unraveled, and that I had discovered all I knew, and Mr. Crone safe, and to be suddenly tried, which might make him confess, they (the Jacobites) got me poisoned, in hopes to have prevented Crone's trial: but it pleased Almighty God to restore me to my health after ten weeks sickness. I was able to come to the Old Bailey, where Mr. Crone was tried and condemned for high treason. He had several reprieves from time to time, on his promise of making a full confession; but as he was lingering it out, about six months after his conviction, I received a letter from the earl of Melford, king James's secretary, in which I was promised king James's pardon, and all the favour I could desire from him and the court of France, and 500*l*. if I would return to France, and recant what I had done. I carried this letter to king William, who sent me to Lord Chief Justice Holt for his advice; but his lordship was of opinion, it was all a trick to invalidate my evidence, they being apprehensive of Mr. Crone's confessions, which they must know would be so agreeable to my informations, that the heads of king James's party had been entirely at king William's mercy: And this matter highly concerned the French court; for had Crone been just to him that gave him his life, there might have been but small encouragement from England to the French, and consequently no plotting now. They of king James's party made it their interest to have Crone hanged, and stop his mouth: and that, as I am well informed, occasioned his making almost a full discovery: Though he went for France, as soon as he was let out of Newgate, being invited back with great promises. I must thank him for his justice to me in his last and most authentic confession: He affirms on oath, That all my information was true. For the confirmation of this, I appeal to any member of parliament that heard Mr. Crone's or lord Preston's confessions read before that honourable house. After this, it may seem strange to some, how the House came to be so angry with me. I beg leave to inform them, That the Jacobites, by Mr. Crone's going off, knew they had partly secured themselves from the just power of the law."

A REPORT OF THE PROCEEDINGS AGAINST MATTHEW CRONE. From the All Souls MS. "Brief Historical Relation," &c. by Narcissus Luttrell.

[In addition to the account of Crone's Case, published as above, in preceding editions of the State Trials, I will here insert a report of the proceedings against him, which I have found in the valuable All Souls MS. "Brief Historical Relation," &c. by Narcissus Luttrell.]

"June 6, 1690. Mr. Crone was tried at the sessions at the Old Bailey, which held nine hours, where three witnesses swore positively against him, that he did receive a bill of exchange to buy arms and raise men, and also transmitted money into Scotland for king James. He made a very slight defence; the court left the matter very plain to the jury, who withdrew about three in the afternoon, and a tipstaff being sworn to keep them, they lay by it all night, (one standing out against the other eleven, to find him not guilty) and so till twelve at noon the next day, when they all agreed to find him guilty of high treason: then being asked why judgment of death should not be pronounced against him, he took exception to some matters in the indictment, and desired to have counsel assigned him to argue the same. The exception was to the indorsement on the back of the indictment, being billa verra, with a double R for vera, the council desired were Mr. Darnel, Mr. Thornbury, Mr. Selby, &c. which the court told him, to prevent clamour, they would grant it; but it was a favour had not been allowed in the two last reigns.

"12th. The judges met at the Old Bailey, when Crone was brought, and his counsel argued upon the mistake of billa verra for vera, after a long debate the judges upon the bench, namely the two Chief Justices Holt and Pollexfen, the Lord Chief Baron Atkins, and Mr. Justice Eyre, delivered their opinions seriatim, that the mistake of the indorsement was not sufficient to invalidate the proceedings upon the indictment, that the indorsement was no part of the indictment, but only for the memory of the clerk, to enter it on record. After which the Deputy Recorder passed sentence of death on him, as usual in cases of high treason; which being done, the prisoner thanked the judges for his fair trial, and their patience in hearing him, and desired they would intercede with her majesty for his pardon.

"The earl of Nottingham hath been at Newgate to examine Mr. Crone, and to take his confession, who seems inclinable to discover; he hath been already reprieved once or twice in order to the same, after a warrant signed for his execution."

[In this year, 1690, also occurred the Trial, before a Court Martial, of the earl of Torrington (Herbert), for his conduct in the action off Beachy, on the 30th of June, in the same year. Of this Case, a report would be interesting, because it would illustrate an important topic of English History, and because, moreover, the Case involved a question concerning the Privilege of the Peerage, and another concerning the identity of the powers possessed by a Lord High Admiral, and by those Commissioners appointed to execute that office, and gave rise to the statute (2 W. et M.) "concerning the Commissioners of the Admiralty." I conjecture, that the Minutes of the Court Martial are in existence, because Dr. Campbell repeatedly refers to them in his Life of lord Torrington; yet they are not to be found among the Papers of the House of Lords, House of Commons, or Admiralty Office, which have been carefully searched by the respective permissions of Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, Mr. Rose, and Mr. Croker. Among the Papers of the House of Commons, there is the Speech or Narrative of lord Torrington, delivered in the House on the 12th of November, accompanied with a drawing. I possess the same Speech, together with an engraving, published in the year 1710. Burnet speaks with displeasure of the composition of the Court Martial, and with anger of their acquittal of Torrington, as reflecting on the justice of the nation. It is not impossible that a report of this case may yet be found.

I find the following mention of lord Torrington, in Narcissus Luttrell's MS. "Brief Historical Relation," &c.

* July 10, 1690. Lord Torrington came to Whitehall, the council sitting: and after some stay in the secretaries' office, a serjeant at arms came to him with a warrant, to carry him to the Tower, for high misdemeanours.

"We hear the lord Torrington hath a new warrant for high treason laid upon him.

"We hear that the Dutch ambassador here, presses very much for the trial of the lord Torrington.

"July 23. The Judges have had several meetings to consult about the trial of the lord Torrington, and whether, being a peer, he can be tried by the Court of Admiralty."]

377. The Trial of WILLIAM ANDERTON, Printer, before the Lord Chief Justice Treby, Baron Powell, Sir John Fleet, knt. Lord Mayor, and Sir Salathiel Lovell, knt. Recorder, at the Old-Bailey, for High Treason: 5 WILLIAM & MARY, A. D. 1693. [As printed in the Sessions Paper of that Time.*]

ON Thursday, June 1, 1693, in the afternoon, William Anderton, printer, was brought to the bar, and an indictment of high-treason was read against him; for that he did compose, print, and publish, two malicious, scandalous, and traitorous libels. The first entitled, "Remarks upon the present Confederacy, and late Revolution in England." The second, entitled, "A French conquest, neither desirable nor practicable."

After the Indictment was read, the Prisoner pleaded, Not Guilty; and the court, upon his request, ordered him a copy of the pannel, and gave him till Saturday to prepare for his trial: accordingly on Saturday morning, about nine of the clock, he was again brought to the bar, and the gentlemen that were summoned to appear to try the issue were called over, and their appearances recorded, and the prisoner had liberty to make his exceptions, according to the prescription of law, which he did, to the number of thirty-five, being the full number, &c.

The jurors sworn, were these gentlemen whose names follow, viz. Crispe Grainge, Joseph Blisset, Joseph Bowler, John Hynde, Robert Hinde, Simon Smith, Tho. Ramidge, Robert Longland, Ralph Hutchinson, John Outing, Samuel Freebody, Moses Colwell.

Then the king's counsel opened the nature of the matter of fact contained in the indictment, telling them, That the offence that was contained in it was high-treason in the highest degree, viz. The compassing and designing the death of the king and queen; and there must be some overt-act to discover the intention of the man: and that which made the overt-act in this case, was in composing, printing, publishing, and dispersing of two treasonable libels, as they had heard read to them; in which there was contained the rankest, vilest, and most malicious treasons that ever could be imagined by any man to be put into paper; for he had no other name for the king, but the prince of Orange; and the design of it was merely to incite all the king's subjects to stir up, and raise war and rebellion against him, and to restore the late king James.

After which, the evidence for the king were called and sworn: the first of which was Mr. Robert Stephens, messenger of the press, who declared, That he had known the prisoner for above these two years to be an offender against the government, in printing seditious libels, but never could tell where he worked, until on the second day of May last, spying two journeymen printers, who he had missed from public-printing-houses this half-year, he followed them, and saw them go exactly into the house of one Skudamore, (where the prisoner was found), and where he suspected they worked privately: so having got the beadle, and another person or two with him, to assist him, he went to the door, leaving the others a little way off, to avoid any suspicion, &c. When he came to the door, he first asked, What lodgers they had; then turning his head aside, he saw the prisoner's mother in the yard, and she well knowing Mr. Stephens, she immediately cried out Thieves, and came up to him, (her daughter, the prisoner's wife, being with her) fell upon him, and tore his hair off his head, crying out Murder; at which time the prisoner came out of the house, and fell upon him, and abused him in a very uncivil manner, telling him, he scorned to be a subject to Hook-Nose. Then the beadle and the other person came to his assistance, and took the prisoner, but not without a great deal of trouble.

Mr. Stephens, and the others who were with him, made a particular search, and in a chamber, which the landlady said was the prisoner's lodgings, and that he went by the name of Williams, and a lapidary by trade, and where he owned he had been asleep. There they saw him shoving a bed, which run upon wheels, close up against a wall, which gave suspicion to Mr. Stephens to remove it; which having done, there he found a door which opened with a latch, and entering a room, there he found a printing-press, letters, and all other materials fit for the trade; and searching further, he found, in an old trunk, a great quantity of libels, and libellous pamphlets, one entitled, "A Caution to the Navy;" Another, "An Historical Romance upon the Wars;" A third, "A Second Letter to the Lord Bishop of Salisbury;" and there was an Errata, and an &c. found set in the press, the very same that were in the book, called "Remarks upon the Confederacy;" and in the chamber where he lay, there was a desk, (which Mr. Stephens knew well to be the prisoner's, because he had seized it before) in which desk there was found the two libels, (as in the beginning of the trial) and divers others of the same sort, which desk the prisoner owned to be his. These they seized and secured, having first put their private marks upon the libels, that they might know them to be the same, and conveyed them with the prisoner to the lord chief-justice Holt's chamber in a coach; and being alighted at the door, whilst Mr. Stephens was looking money to pay the coachman, the prisoner made his escape through Serjeants-Inn, but was soon overtaken by the porter: he was examined by my lord, and committed to Newgate for high-treason; this was fully and clearly proved against him on the king's side, and the libels were some part of them read in court, in which was found abundance of base, vile, scandalous, and traitorous expressions, enough to make any honest Englishman to hate and abominate all such traitorous, disaffected principles. That libel, called "A Caution to the Navy," which was taken in the printing-room, was proved to be corrected by the hand of the prisoner; and those letters that were in the form, upon which the "Caution to the Navy" was printed, was also proved to be printed with one and the same letter and character, &c. as the libels he was indicted for.

Then the prisoner made his defence, telling the court, that the matter that was given in evidence against him, was not sufficient to make it an overt-act, therefore could not be adjudged high-treason, praying, that he might have counsel allowed him to plead it, being a matter of law. To which he was answered by the court, that the question was, Whether he printed those treasonable books? Which plainly appeared that he did, for they were all found (with the press also) upon him, and his so printing of them was an overt-act in the judgment of the law; therefore the person so offending must be guilty of high-treason; desiring him, if he had any witnesses, to call them; to which he replied, that he had none, but desired that he might have leave to put the jury in mind of two or three things, which in general was the opinion of my lord Coke, as to matter of law in this case, who says, "That it must be done with the intention of the mind, and that it must be some injury done to the king's person, by buying a gun, or gunpowder, or poison, or the like, before it can be accounted an overt-act;" and there was no such thing proved against him. To which the court replied, that in primitive times, before printing was invented, writing was found to be an overt-act; and made high-treason; therefore printing was more manifestly an overt-act;* and there was no room for any counsel to be assigned him, for there was no matter of law for them to plead to, and therefore desired him not to give the court any unnecessary trouble. Adding, that it was the opinion of the whole court, that he had no grounds for such a plea; but if he had any thing to offer that might be any ways advantageous to him, they would very patiently hear it.†

Then the lord chief-justice Treby summed up the evidence to the gentlemen of the jury, telling them what dangerous consequence such treasonable libels were of; and that it was as great and malicious a treason as ever could be imagined; but especially when considered to be done against so good a prince, who had done so much for this nation, with so great a mind, and so good an intent. This was done only to exasperate and to stir up sedition and rebellion amongst us; therefore, if they did believe what the witnesses for the king had sworn, to be sufficient evidence, that he printed the libel, then they must find him guilty, otherwise acquit him.

Then the jury having withdrawn for about three hours time, they brought a verdict, that the prisoner, Mr. William Anderton, was guilty of high-treason.‡

‡ The Author of A Letter concerning sir William Whitlock's Bill for regulating of Trials in cases of high-treason, written 1695, page 1, says; "What good Englishman is not afflicted for the death both of Essex and Raleigh? Can any man that knows our laws, think sir Henry

The last day of the Sessions he was brought to the bar, and asked, what he had to say, why sentence should not pass upon him according to law? He read a Petition, wherein he desired the court would please to allow him counsel to plead to a point of law; the court told him, there was no matter of law did arise. Then he desired, that he might have a longer time than the rest; to which he was answered, that it was in the power of the queen, and not in the court.

Friday, June 16, 1693, he was executed.

Mr. Samuel Smith, the Ordinary, gives this account of Mr. Anderton, in his account of the behaviour of the criminals:

William Anderton, Printer, condemned for high-treason, in composing, printing, publishing, and dispersing malicious, scandalous, and traitorous libels: the design of it being to incite the king's subjects to war and rebellion against him, and to restore the late king James. He refused to come at any time to the ordinary; whereupon he went to the chamber of the said Anderton, and offered to pray with him, but he said, That he had such came to him, who gave him contentment: and after a second offer to pray with him, he refused it. The ordinary told him, that he ought to take care, that no man might extenuate his high crimes, nor flatter him with false hopes of heaven, men's hearts being very prone to deceive themselves in that respect; upon which Anderton said, Leave me to myself, I desire Vane was fairly dealt with? That Plunket ought to have been tried twice? Sidney executed upon similitude of hands, and one witness? Sir Thomas Armstrong without a trial, before the outlawry compelled his coming in? Ashton upon presumptive treason? And Anderton against the plain sense of so many statutes? The blood of these, and many more, cry for vengeance, and admonish us to provide against such extravagancies hereafter. Colledge and Cornish call aloud for such a Bill. Had such a statute been in force, could the great lord Russel have died for only endeavouring to prevent the wild attempts of others; and because sir Thomas Armstrong had viewed the Guards? But it is needless to set down the several instances in other reigns, when the trials under this afford but too pregnant reasons to conclude, the judges very untoward counsel for the prisoner, and that jurymen may be biassed by piques and animosities; and also that well-meaning men of a jury ought to hear the law stated by such of the robe as are not in the pay of the crown; not only because the Bench too often prevaricates, but because the prisoners are often wearied out, as the great Raleigh was, with the clamorous harangues of the King's Counsel, and so drop their defence, when their lungs (which are not so well breathed as those of pleaders) fail them." not to be further solicited or exhorted by you. Upon this the ordinary withdrew himself.

William Anderton for high-treason, and John Dudley, for clipping, were drawn on a sledge to Tyburn, and were first executed. The right worshipful the sheriffs being present, Anderton desired that his brother, and a minister his friend, might come into the cart, which was granted.

The Minister only prayed for him in the office of visiting the sick: when he had finished, and went out of the cart, the ordinary exhorted Anderton and Dudley to beg of God, that they might be examples of true repentance, and to warn the people by their sad untimely end, but they did not; therefore the ordinary commanding silence, spoke thus: Be persuaded by the sight of these dying persons, not to contrive any thing against the government of this kingdom; God will bring it to light, and in justice punish it; and exhorted the people not to prophane the Sabbath, which all criminals bewail when they come to die publicly, as that sin which brings on all other crimes. Anderton told the spectators, that his sentence was very hard and severe. I told him, that he had endeavoured to overthrow the established government. He said, that he forgave his judges. I replied, that they needed not his forgiveness, for they were satisfied in their consciences that they had acted justly. Then I prayed with them, and they had a considerable time to pray for themselves, which they did fervently. Anderton's carriage was with much confidence. There was a Paper came to the sheriff's hand for the suspending the quartering of Anderton. He thought it to be a reprieve, which did much affect him with thanksgiving to God; but understanding it was only that his dead body should be delivered to his friends, he did not acknowledge that as any great favour. After they had prayed for themselves, the ordinary committed them to God's mercy, with a short prayer at last: so praying again for themselves, they gave a sign, when they expected to be executed, and the cart thereupon drew away.

The TRIAL of WILLIAM ANDERTON, Printer, at the Old-Baily, before the Lord Chief Justice Treby, Mr. Justice Powell, sir John Fleet, knt. Lord Mayor, and sir Salathiel Lovel, knt. Recorder of London. June 1, and '3, 1693, 5 Will. and Mar. for High-Treason*.

Mr. William Anderton knowing himself to be mortally hated by some persons, had absconded for a considerable time, as it had been the hard fortune of divers great and good men to do in these difficult times; but being betrayed to Mr. Robert Stephens, messenger of the press, and his sworn enemy, he was apprehended on the second of May, this present 1693; and Stephens, not content with his person, plainly plundered the house, carrying away goods to a considerable value, which there was no colour of law for him, or any man else to seize; and this, I suppose, might be one great motive to make him swear so desperately at the trial, that he might take away a man's life, who otherwise might come upon him for robbing him of his goods; the booty secured, away he goes in triumph with his prisoner, to my Lord Chief Justice Holt, where he railed against him in a very indecent manner; the judge was very calm, and said very little to the matter; but, upon the accusation, committed Mr. Anderton to Newgate, not for high-treason, as is falsely alledged; that judge knew the law better, and, I believe, is not in himself so very forward to over-strain it. Whilst he stood thus committed for misdemeanor he was bailable; and accordingly very sufficient bail was offered for him; but Aaron Smith, who wisely weighs what advantage is to be made of every prisoner, and considers not only the person himself, but the interest he is engaged in, and the friends he may be supposed to have, thought too few guineas were offered; and therefore still kept off the bail, endeavouring to make a better market; but while things hung thus between the bail and the bail-master, on a sudden the controversy was ended by the coming of a fresh warrant upon the former: which committed the prisoner for high-treason.

* "Taken chiefly from a quarto pamphlet, entitled, An Appeal of Murder, &c. wrote by Mr. Grascomb, a nonjuror. But Mr. Anderton was assisted in his defence by Mr. Thornbury, a counsellor at law, who, it is supposed, drew his plea, petition, &c." Former Edition.

The trial began Thursday, June 1, but respited till the Saturday following, June 3, that this scene might be acted with the greater solemnity; Mr. Anderton being brought to the bar, was arraigned, and pleaded not guilty, and made it his request, that he might have a copy of his indictment; but it would not be granted. The crime laid to his charge was, the composing, printing, and publishing, two malicious, treasonable libels: the first entitled, "Remarks upon the present Confederacy and late Revolution in England:" the second, "A French Conquest, neither desirable nor practicable."

The principal evidence against the prisoner was Robert Stephens, the messenger of the press, who made oath, That coming to Scudamore's house, where the prisoner lodged, and asking what lodgers they had, he saw the prisoner's mother in the yard, who crying out murder, the prisoner came out of the house, and fell upon him; and that at the time of Mr. Anderton's apprehension, he did in words disown the government, and called king William hook-nose, not submitting himself: that he took at the said house an old trunk filled with seditious papers and pamphlets, and that he had seen the trunk formerly, and knew it to be Mr. Anderton's, and that he also found a desk, and took out of the said desk forty or fifty of a sort of "The Remarks," and "French Conquest*," and that he saw the prisoner shove up a bed, which run upon wheels, behind which was a door, which he opened, and there found a printing press, letters and other materials proper for that trade; that he also found an errata, with an &c. set in the press, the very same which he believed were in the book, called Remarks upon the present Confederacy.

Hooper, the beadle of Stationers-hall, seconded the aforesaid testimony, as also the constable and his beadle; they also alledged forty or fifty of the French Conquest to be there.†

* "As to the latter of these, it is now certainly known that he had no hand in it, and that it was printed at a press which he never saw, and by persons with whom, for a long time, he had no communication: for the government had at that time in their custody those persons, who knew when and where it was printed, and (as it was said) had made a discovery of all, perhaps, of more than they knew. The papers of that sort taken upon the prisoner were sent to him the day before he was seized: and some have a vehement suspicion, that it being resolved he should be taken the next day, those pamphlets were sent before-hand, that something might certainly be found upon him; but his innocence in that matter hath since been made evident to all the world, by an irrefragable testimony; for this September sessions at the Old Bailey, Price, in open court, made oath, That he, and the prisoners then at the bar, Newbolt and Butler, printed the French Conquest." Appeal of Murder, page 6.—Former Edition.

† "It is certain, there was not the fourth part of so many in the house, which were sent him the day before, and which the government itself now (if it did not then) well knows were not printed by him. And yet after all this multitude they were content to fall to one of each, that they might be particularly sworn to; and when Mr. Constable was asked, How he knew those to be the books, and was desired by the prisoner to read the titles of those books whereof he accused him, truly it appeared, that the gentleman had been bred to no such dangerous things as writing or reading. Now could a more unquestionable witness have been produced to printed books, and their titles, than a man that cannot read? But for a help at a dead lift, it was said, That he had made his private mark on the said books; but then it ought to be considered, that his private mark was made to the two books at the lord-chief-justice Holt's chamber, which Robin Stephens produced out of his pocket, when the prisoner was brought to be examined. Now what did his marks, set on two books at the lord-chief-justice's chamber, which were all the while before in another man's custody, signify to prove that those were the books, which were about four hours before taken out of a desk in St. James's? Robin Stephens might have produced what books he pleased, and in all likelihood, this

Besides Stephens, the constable, and the beadles, there were also two printers sworn, viz.
Roberts and Snowden, (a dissenter to whom Anderton was some time an apprentice) the substance of whose evidence was, That they had seen the characters in the hall, together with the &c. and that they did believe it was the letter that printed that book, (i. e. the book then shewed in court) as also, That the two books were printed with one and the same letter or character.* Another witness made oath, that about three quarters of a year before, he had sold the prisoner paper, by the name of Williamson.

man would have set his private mark on them ;
but if he would have been sure, he ought to have set his private mark at the time of their being taken out of the desk." See an Appeal of Murder, page 11 and 12.—Former Edition.

* "Now if this evidence be true, it ought to have acquitted him ; if it be false, it ought not to have hurt him. For the government well knows where and by whom one of the books was printed, and that it was not printed by Mr. Anderton, nor had he any manner of hand in it, or any communication at that time with those printers ; and if both the books were printed with the same letter or character, then I think it is a pretty fair and clear inference, that he printed neither of the said books, and consequently ought, upon this evidence, to have been discharged. But be the matter true or false, what signifies believing in this case ? Is one man to be hanged for another's believing ? Malice is put to its shifts, when without any colour of legal evidence it is forced to believe a man out of his life. But if such evidence as this shall be looked on as good and satisfactory in matter of life, I think the whole society of printers are deeply concerned in it, and that they are all in very dangerous circumstances ; for I am assured by a very understanding printer, that there is not a printing-house in town, but hath of the same sort of letter or character, so that upon such an oath as this, any or all the printers of the town might have been taken, and whom they thought fit hanged. For there is none of them but had characters as suitable to the book, as that which was sworn to ; and if it had been seized, and thus sworn to, they were as liable to be hanged as Anderton. At this rate the government need not give themselves the charge of a messenger of the press, nor the trouble of such frequent searches ; but as soon as any seditious or treasonable pamphlet comes broad, it is but going to the next printer's, and seizing his letter, and having found some of the same sort of character, to get a couple of rattle-headed fellows to swear it, and hang him ; and thus they may pick and chuse what printers they please to hang. Was ever such a wise oath made by two printers ? But Snowden was made choice of, for his notoriously known malice against the prisoner." See an Appeal of Murder, p. 13 and 14.—Former Edition.

The prisoner with a great deal of calmness, and clearness made appear the insufficiency of the evidence : he peremptorily denied any such books to have been there, as sworn to, though he owned the desk ; and he used an argument to convince the bench of the truth of what he said, drawn from the very evidence given against him, viz. That the desk was small, and not able to contain half so many books as were sworn to be taken out of it ; and for proof, desired that the desk might be brought into court, for the jury's satisfaction ; but this request was not complied with, and the matter put off saying, the number of books was only matter of supposal.
But then from this false supposition of the proof of matter of fact, there arose matter of law, viz.
Whether printing were treason ? And in consequence hereof, whether it were within the purview of the statute of 25 Edw. 3? To this, the prisoner desired he might have the benefit of counsel, and pleaded his right to it, urging not only the privilege of every Englishman, but that it was the practice of all our courts of justice, and that no man was denied counsel where any point of law arose ; and instanced in the case of Sidney and others, to whom the judges freely and readily assigned counsel as to matter of law, and owned it to be their right. But the court peremptorily denied to him, what was (as the learned in the law tell me) never denied to any man before, counsel as to matter of law.
Being thus shamefully over-ruled, he was constrained to be his own counsel, and delivered in the following Plea.

Mr. Anderton's PLEA at the Old-Bailey.

My lord ;

I have a few things, humbly to offer to your lordship's consideration, as to this indictment.

1. As to the compassing, or imagining the death of the king and queen, my lord Coke saith expressly in his 3^d Inst. p. 6. That it is the very rule of the act, that 'Actus non facit
'Reum, nisi Mens sit Rea ;' and if the said act be not within the express words of the act, then by force of a clause hereafter, viz. 'Et pur ceo 'que plusers auters ne,' it cannot be adjudged treason, until it be declared treason in parliament ; which is the remedy which the lawmakers have provided in that case.

2. As to the levying war, he says, p. 9,
That a compassing, or conspiring to levy war is no treason ; for there must be a levying war in facto. Pag. 10, he says, in citing the lord Dyer's case, in sir N. Throgmorton's, that during the life of the queen, viz. Eliz. a conspiracy to levy war was high-treason, though no war levied : but when Bradshaw and Burton, and others, were indicted of high-treason, for conspiring to make war, it was resolved by all the judges, that it was no treason within the 25
Ed. 3. for the words of this law are Levis Guerre : An actual rebellion, or insurrection is a levying war within this act ; as if any with strength and weapons invasive and defensive, doth hold and defend a castle or fort against the king and his power ; that is levying war within this statute.

3. Adhering to the enemies of the king and queen. This, my lord, in the same p. 10, he likewise explains ; viz. in giving aid and comfort to the king's enemies within the realm, or without, delivery or surrender of the king's castles, or forts, by the king's captains thereof, to the king's enemies within the realm, or without, for reward. This, says he, is adhering to the king's enemies, and declared treason by this act : And for this, my lord, he cites several acknowledged authorities and acts of parliament.

4. As to the proof of these, or any of these particulars, the said lord Coke, p. 12, explaining this branch of the statute, ' Et de ceo provablement soit attaint per overt fait per gens de leur condition,' saith thus ; which, gentlemen of the jury, I beg of you take particular notice of. In this branch, saith he, four things are to be observed ; but I shall only take notice of three, first, this word ' provablement,' probably, i. e. upon direct and manifest proof, not upon conjectural presumptions, or inferences, or strains of wit ; but upon good and sufficient proof. And herein the adverb, ' provablement,' probably, hath a great force, and signifieth a direct and plain proof ; which word, the King, Lords and Commons in parliament did use, for that the offence was so heinous, and was so heavily and so severely punished, as none other the like ; and therefore the offender must probably be attained ; which words are as forceable as upon direct and manifest proof. Note, saith he, The word is not ' probably,' for the ' commune argumentum' might have served ; but the word is ' provably' be attained : And pag. 26, he tells us, that two witnesses are required, and I remember, saith he, no authority in our books to the contrary ; and the common law herein is grounded upon the law of God, expressed both in the Old Testament and the New. ' In ore duorum aut trium testium peribit qui interficietur. Nemo occidatur uno contra se dicente testimonium,' M. Bract. Fortes. 1 E. 6. 5 E. 6, 11. Secondly, This word ' attaint,' necessarily implieth that he be proceeded with, and attained according to the due course and proceedings of law, and not by absolute power, or by other means, as in former times hath been used. Thirdly, ' Per overt fait, per apertum factum.' This, saith he, doth also strengthen the former exposition of the word ' provablement,' that it must be ' provably' by an open act, which must be manifestly proved ; and this manifest proof he thus explains : As if, saith he, divers do conspire the death of the king, the manner how, and thereupon provide weapons, powder, poison, assays with harness, or sending letters to put this their conspiracy in execution. These, gentlemen of the jury, are the expositions of the unexceptionable lord Coke, whose authority I the rather chose to rely on, because his learning in the law, and his veracity in the delivery of his opinion, is universally acknowledged.

5. As to the fact alledged in this indictment, which is to prove the aforesaid crime, or otherwise the whole indictment falls to the ground ; and that, my lord, is printing. Now the question is, my lord, whether printing, as such, can be construed to be within the purview of this statute ? and I humbly conceive not ; because the statute of 1 Mary enacts, That no act, deed, or offence, being by act of parliament, or statute made treason, petit-treason, or misprision of treason, by words, writing, ciphering, deeds, or otherwise whatsoever, shall be taken, had, deemed, or adjudged to be high treason, petit-treason, or misprision of treason, but only such as be declared and expressed to be treason, petit-treason, or misprision of treason, in, or by the act of parliament made in the 25th year of the reign of the most noble king of famous memory, king Edward the 3rd, or any other declaration, or matter to the contrary, in any wise notwithstanding. Now, my lord, the world well knows, that printing was not practised in England till several hundred years after the making of this statute of 25 E. 3, and therefore impossible to be expressed, and consequently not treason. And it is likewise well known, that printing was in use in England long before the reign of queen Mary, and yet this statute positively excepts it, as not being mentioned in that of 25 E. 3. And my lord Coke, p. 23, says, That before this act of 1 Mary, so many treasons had been made, and declared by parliament, since that of 25 E. 3, some in particular, some in general, and in such sort penned, that not only the ignorant, but the learned were many times trapt and snared, and treasons made in one king's reign were abrogated in another. So that the mischief before 25 E. 3, of the uncertainty what was treason, and what not, became so frequent and dangerous, that the safest and surest remedy was by this excellent act of 1 Mary, to abrogate and repeal all but such as are specified and expressed in this statute of 25 E. 3. By which law, says he, the safety of the king and his subjects, is wisely and sufficiently provided for in such certainty, as ' nihil relictum est arbitrio judicis.' And p. 21, explaining the words, semblable treason, he says, In this case the judge shall not judge a simili, or by equity, argument, or inference of any treason, high, or petit, for no like case shall be adjudged treason, high, or petit, nor no other case, though of as high, or higher nature, shall be adjudged treason, high, or petit, as appeareth in the case of parricide. And p. 22, explaining this branch, ' Que n'est specifice paramount,' this word ' specifice,' saith he, is to be specially observed ; for it as much as to say, particularised or set down particularly, so as nothing is left to the construction of the judge, if it be not specified or particularised by this act. And, my lord, he breaks out into this rapture, A happy sanctuary for judges to fly to, that no man's blood, and ruin of his family, do lie upon their consciences against law ! And if that the construction by arguments ' a simili,' or ' a minori ad

'majus,' had been left to the judges, the mischief before this statute would have remained; viz. diversity of opinions, what ought to be adjudged treason, which this statute hath taken away by express words. And the statute 1 Mary, doth repeal all treason, &c. but only such as be declared and expressed in this act of 25 E. 3, wherein this word, 'expressed,' is to be observed. And again, my lord, on the branch, 'Tanque per d'evant le roy et son parlement.' By this, saith he, it is apparent, that any like case, or other case, ought to be declared by the whole parliament; and so it was done by the whole parliament in 3 R. 2, and many other acts of parliament. Nay, p. 24, he says, That no former judgment, attainder, precedent, resolution, or opinion of judges, or justice, of high treason, petit-treason, or misprision of treason, other than such as are specified and expressed in the said act of 25 E. 3, are to be followed, or drawn to example; for the words are direct and plain, that no act, deed, or offence, &c. shall be taken, had, deemed, or adjudged to be treason, petit-treason, or misprision of treason, but only such as be declared and expressed in the said act of 25 E. 3, any act, statute, declaration, or matter to the contrary notwithstanding. But now, my lord, to come a little nearer to the matter: how can bare printing be deemed in law an overt-act of compassing, or imagining the king's death? (which is the treason alledged), when it is so far from necessarily proving it, that it is ten times more natural to suppose that the printer (whoever he be) prints for his gain in his way of business, than out of any intendedly treasonable design. Besides, in treason books, the law ever looked severely after the author, or procurer, but very little, or not at all regarded the printer as such, being looked on in law as a mere mechanic, till the statute 13 and 14 Car. 2, c. 33, which makes it an offence, and allows the punishment, which is for the first offence, disability for following the trade for three years; and for the second, a perpetual disability and a fine, imprisonment, or other corporal punishment, not extending to life or limb. My lord, the very stile of the act is, 'An act for preventing abuses in printing seditious, treasonable, and unlicensed books and pamphlets, and for regulating of printing, and printing-presses;' which plainly shews, that the government was at a loss how to punish printing, as such, before; which the government could not have been at, if the printer had stood chargeable before, for matters and things contained in the books and pamphlets he printed. Nay, my lord, the very statute of 13 Car. 2, c. 1, which made several things treason during his life, did not, as I conceive, extend to the printer, but to such as should procure to be printed the treasons therein contained. I have but one thing more, my lord, to urge upon the matter, and that is the case of Algernon Sidney.

In short, he acquitted himself so well, that all indifferent persons were abundantly satisfied, and yet it proved to no more purpose than a Wall-Lecture.

In summing up the Evidence, two or three old, musty, impertinent precedents were brought in, which had not seen the sun for many ages, the chief of which was that of sir John Oldcastle, lord Cobham, and he might as well have urged the case of the Man in the Moon: for what was my lord Cobham's case to printing? That famous Wicklevite lived in the reign of Richard 2, some scores of years before printing was thought on, which came not into England till the reign of Henry 7; and the prisoner had very well observed, that what is not expressed in the statute, 25 Edw. 3, (and it is impossible printing should be expressed there,) is barred from being any ways adjudged, or interpreted treason, by the statute, 1 Mary. In short, in summing up the evidence to the jury, every thing was aggravated to the utmost, every little punctilio was made use of, which was thought might be any thing serviceable to beget in the jury an hard opinion of the prisoner; the bed with wheels was not let alone: every little trifle was fetched in, with all the witty malice imaginable; nay, the very soul of the man was looked into, and the jury told what was within him; he was an ill-minded man, a disaffected person; he was no lover of the government; and that printing was an overt-act: so the jury were sent out to consider of their verdict.

After two hours debate, the greater part of the jury became very well inclined to have found Not Guilty; but there was one amongst them who loved mischief, and he was for hanging men for being Jacobites, not for being guilty: and being since told of the severity of their verdict, he readily acknowledged, That the evidence did not amount to the proof of the fact; but, saith he, What of that? I believed he was guilty, and I will hang a hundred of them for half so much evidence.

When the jury appeared, the question was asked, Whether they were agreed of their verdict? A zealous man answered, No. Whereat the court frowned, and shewed themselves much displeased, when the foreman of the jury, (desirous that all men may have fair play for their lives) put this question to the bench, Whether the having those things by him, without making any further use of them, did affect the prisoner as to life? Now this question was very pertinent, though nothing pleasing; but after some frowning and pouting, the court answered, No. But that was not their business, they were to find it printing, and that was a sufficient overt-act.

Some of the Jurymen, by way of complaint, said thus: My lord, our foreman is of opinion, this fact is not proved. Court. Whether it be proved or no, you ought to determine; the bare finding the books in his custody would not be treason; but the case is, gentlemen, here is a man that has a printing-press, to which no man has admission but himself; and this man is found with an errata, and &c., so that he must needs print the treason. To this a Jury-man answered, 'Tis a very strong presumption, my lord. And then baron Powell clenched the nail with this grave saying, A violent presumption is as much as if a man had been there and done it himself.

These Answers being returned to the questions, the Jury were sent back again, where almost three hours more spent in debating the matter, before they could come to a conclusion, and then complied, and brought in the prisoner Guilty. The court told them, That they had done like honest and good men, and had brought in a verdict agreeable to their evidence.* Sentence according to course, was put off to the last day of the sessions; in the mean time the prisoner, that he might save his life, or leave those who sought his blood without excuse, had a Petition drawn and delivered, which is as followeth:

To the Right Honourable Sir John Fleet, Lord Mayor of the City of London, and the rest of the Commissioners, for the gaol-delivery of Newgate: The humble PETITION of WILLIAM ANDERTON, a convicted prisoner in Newgate, Sheweth; That whereas your petitioner has been by the jury found guilty of printing the books laid in the indictment, and thereby is concluded from questioning the legal evidence they had for it, though your petitioner humbly appeals to your lordships observations, and consciences, whether all that was sworn, came up to more than bare circumstantial evidence of his bare printing them; which in cases of treason, as your petitioner is informed,

* "For Anderton, who is the last that since the Revolution hath been executed for High-Treason of this kind, there needeth no more to shew both the perjury of the witnesses that swore against him, and the severity and hastiness of his conviction and condemnation, than that a person arraigned, and condemned since at the same place, hath openly confessed and avowed, that he printed and published the book, for which poor Anderton was cast and executed. Nor is it for the credit of those that sat as judges, or were upon the jury, that so infamous a fellow as Stephens was the principal witness at the trial, and the person upon whose testimony especially the arraigned was cast: for, besides his being universally known for a rascal, that will be purchased to perpetrate any villainy, provided he may find impunity in doing it, his whole behaviour at that time, when he gave his evidence, was so excessive rude and rancorous towards the prisoner, as might give any indifferent man a just cause to believe, that he was provoked by malice, or swayed by command, and encouraged by reward, to what he did." See a Letter to the right honourable sir John Holt, knt. Lord-Chief-Justice of the King's-bench, occasioned by the noise of a plot. The Second Edition, 1694, page 8 and 9.—Former Edition.

has never been allowed. And whereas your petitioner was advised, That bare printing these books (admitting the same was proved), could not by the laws be construed as an overt-act of treason in the bare printer; and your petitioner requested the court again and again, That this matter might be argued by his counsel, which the court were pleased not to permit. Your petitioner yet, notwithstanding, not doubting of your lordships inclinations, not only to do him all justice, but to shew him all the mercy and favour you can, that may consist with your lordships justice; and humbly conceiving, That this court, by further considering your petitioner's case, may, even yet, be capable of relieving your petitioner, especially, if, upon hearing what your petitioner can say, your lordships shall be satisfied, That your petitioner happened to be convicted through any error or mistake (as no man was ever exempt from error, and the best of men are always readiest to confess it). Your petitioner therefore humbly beseecheth your lordships patience, seriously to read and consider some few (of many) reasons which your petitioner hath heard from others, which he herein has set down as briefly as he can, as followeth: First, They lay down, that the treason laid in the indictment, being that of the intent of the heart, (expressed in the statute, by compassing and imagining the king's death) requires by law two proofs, the one of the fact, the other of the inference, and that both these must be plain: That of fact, (called the overt act), must be proved by direct and positive evidence by two witnesses at least, and not by circumstantials only (as this of printing was against your petitioner, there being no positive proof at all, not so much by one witness, given of his printing either of the books laid in the indictment.) And then that of fact being thus proved, must by necessity of inference as evidently and certainly prove, That the party in doing such overt-act, could intend, or imagine thereby nothing less than the king's death: and if either of these proofs fall short of such necessary certainty, such indictment must fail, the law, for great reasons, regarding only such plain and direct proofs in these great charges.

"Now, can a printer, quatenus only the printer of these books, be thereby inferred to assent to, and approve of the matters and things contained in these books, and that necessarily too, quatenus the printer? By the same legal logic, every printer may be proved to have in his heart, and approve of all the opinions, notions, and imaginations contained in all the books he ever printed: for a 'quatenus ad omne valet consequentia.'

"'Tis true, (say they) writing and speaking have, in some instances, been accounted as overt-acts, and there might be good reason for it, as a man expressing his own mind by his own writing, and by his own words, which, according to the manner of his writing, or speaking, may evidently appear to come from his own heart: and your petitioner doth not doubt, but that the writing a book, as in cardinal Poole's case, and the signing the warrant for the execution of king Charles the 1st, as in the case of the regicides, which cases were urged by some of the court against your petitioner, were sufficient overt-acts, to prove the compassing and imagining the king's death. But can these instances be any thing to the case of a printer, whose business it is, as a printer only, to print the thoughts of others, being accounted in law only as a mere mechanic, and whose end thereby is to get money for his work? And for further reason in this matter, they observe, That as it doth not appear that bare printing was ever pretended to be an overt-act within stat. 25 Edw. 3, so when the parliament of 13 Car. 2, carried up treason to the highest, for the preservation of the king's person during his life, and (among other things) particularly therein took notice of printing, yet would they not thereby lay so great a penalty upon the printers, as, no doubt, considering the unreasonableness of comprising such tools and mechanics, within an act intended for persons of higher designs: but this parliament kept the printers in their remembrance, as intending to consider them by themselves in another act, as they very soon after did; for the same parliament, in 13 and 14 Car. 2, made an act, which they stile, 'An Act for preventing abuses in printing seditious, treasonable, and unlicensed books and pamphlets, and for regulating printing and presses;' and therein, as they fix them their rules and bounds, so they allot them their punishment: which, for the first offence, is disability for three years; and for the second, perpetual disability, fine, imprisonment, or other corporal punishment, at discretion.

"Wherefore, the premises thoroughly weighed and considered, your petitioner humbly implores your lordships, that, in favour of life, in a new and extraordinary case, and that too, of high treason, your lordships would be pleased to extend so much mercy to your petitioner, as to suspend your judgment, and pronouncing sentence upon him, until your lordships shall have heard what can be further offered by counsel on his behalf. And your, &c."

This Petition speaks for itself: when the last day of the sessions came, and the prisoner was asked in course what he had to say, why sentence should not be passed upon him? He desired that his petition might be read; but the court not being willing to take notice of the knowledge of any such petition, thereby to elude his request, he foreseeing it, had provided one ready, and offered it to be read, but no man daring to take and read it, he took the freedom to read it himself, and then offered these things further in Arrest of Judgment.

His Plea in Arrest of Judgment.

My lord, in Arrest of Judgment, I have these things humbly to move:

1. Whether if a jury, not being competent judges of the matter of fact whereof they are to judge, and bring in their verdict against the defendant contrary to law; I say, whether judgment ought to pass upon the defendant because of that verdict?

2. Whether if a judge (who is counsel for the defendant, and therefore indispensably bound to take particular cognizance of what the defendant urgeth in his own behalf, as well as what is alleged against him), in summing up the evidence, doth omit (out of forgetfulness, or otherwise) the only material point upon which the whole indictment is founded, and which the defendant so much urged in his own behalf; and also which inevitably led the jury into this mistake of their verdict; whether, I say, this be not sufficient to stay judgment?

3. Whether any judge, &c. can construe printing to be a sufficient overt-act, till it be so declared by parliament?

4. Whether the Stat. of 13 Car. 2, does not plainly intimate the contrary? And likewise the 13 and 14 Car. 2, lately revived?

The prisoner did make it his humble and last request, That these things being matter of law he might be allowed counsel to plead them, or any other matter of law, in his case. And he backed his request with this modest reason, That being matter of law, he thought the satisfaction of the judge's conscience concerned in it, as well as his life; but if his counsel could be satisfied, or fairly over-ruled in it, he would acquiesce without more ado.

The matter now lay wholly before the city recorder, sir Salathiel Lovell, who after a flourish or two of empty rhetoric, proceeded to pronounce that dreadful sentence which the law allots to treason; to have the heart and bowels torn out, and burnt, and the body dismembered, and the quarters set up, or disposed as authority orders.

Whilst Mr. Anderton was preparing for his death, his friends were struggling for his life: He had many friends upon the account of his known ability, industry, and integrity; others were taken with his manly behaviour, and clear pleading upon his trial; and many more were forward to move in his case, in pity or indignation, at his usage.

The queen (as still upon occasion it was answered) could do nothing without the council, nor the council without the queen; if the council was met, the queen was not there, or if she was there, there wanted such and such of the council, without whom nothing could be done; and thus things at every turn were shuffled off; but where the danger is imminent, and time short, persons are willing to watch hard, and look out sharp. Taking this course, his disconsolate wife had at last so fairly set the council, that it was thought they could not avoid giving her a direct answer: for though they were resolved he should not live, yet (the matter being so warmly debated amongst all sorts of persons) they were not willing to say peremptorily he should die. To put her by now, this artifice served effectually; a number of waiters attending about the council-chamber, fell foul upon the poor woman in no very courtly language, reproaching and reviling her, that she did not bring her husband to confession : in short they so teased and plagued her, that they drove her away.

From the time of his commitment to the very moment of his death, he was of a very even and sweet behaviour, being modestly courageous; cheerful without lightness; and devout without ostentation. He made it his particular request, that some minister, or ministers, would be with him every morning and evening to read the prayers of the church, and perform such other offices as in such case as his did belong to that function, which, except one day in the week, was duly observed, and sometimes oftener; for when any clergy came accidentally to visit him, if they did neglect to offer, he commonly requested them to pray with him. He gave little or no entertainment to any hopes of life, as being sensible that it was rather malice, than matter against him; and that a crime may be pardoned, but malice is not to be satisfied without the destruction of its enemy, if he once come in its power. He often expressed a great satisfaction in the cause for which he suffered, saying, That it ministered to him both comfort and courage, and that he doubted not but that God would acquit whom the court had condemned. As to the ordinary (Mr. Smith,) he indeed, in point of conscience, refused to communicate with him, yet mildly and modestly telling him, that he was desirous to give him no trouble, and requested of him that he would not any ways concern himself with him, or about him; at which Mr. Smith fell into such an unseemly intemperate fit of rage, that he reviled the prisoner with bitter words, and very generously damned both him and all the ministers that came at him, to hell: but he took it patiently, and returned not the least word that might seem to sound harshly. As his wife once laid her hands on his fetters, and wept, he intreated her to forbear, saying, He was less than a man that could not bear that; but that her tears were more grievous to him than his fetters: another time, as he was hanging a link on the chair, thereby to ease himself somewhat from the weight of his fetters, and perceiving his wife to look very heavily at it, he said cheerfully to her, My dear, these are my arms, alluding to the arms of their family, being sable, two single shack-bolts, and one double, argent.

When Tucker told him that the dead warrant was come, and that he was in it, he gave him thanks for giving him notice of it, that he might be sure he had now nothing else to do, but to prepare to die; saying further, The Lord's will be done. He received the holy sacrament twice during his imprisonment; but whether it be customary, or that they had particular order, the keepers all (except Walker, who was all along not only civil, but even compassionate towards the prisoner,) the evening and morning before he suffered, became exceeding rugged and harsh, not only to him, but all that came to him; insomuch that his mother and brother coming that morning to receive the communion with him, could neither beg, nor buy admission; and the poor old woman was forced to depart, without joining in the last act of christian communion with him, or so much as taking her intended last farewell of him.

Other very unbecoming actions towards him I could mention, which I shall forbear, being unwilling to set forth that barbarity which some delight to act. When he was brought down to go to the place of execution, he entered into the sledge, and rode along in it with that calm behaviour, and decent courage, as struck the beholders with remorse and amazement, and made his enemies gnash their teeth with indignation, to see him triumph over their malice even in his death. In his passage all the way, the people rather seemed sorrowful, than inclinable to offer any abuse, except near St. Giles's church, where a rude fellow treated him with very spiteful language, to which he made no return, but lifting up his eyes to heaven, said, O sweet Jesus! How much more hast thou suffered for me, and for mankind? And shall not I learn of thee patiently to bear the undeserved reproaches of this inconsiderate man?

As he was coming to the place of execution, a clergyman got up into the cart to be ready to receive him; at which the ordinary seemed to be much incensed; for he gave him very ill words, bidding him get down, and saying, he ought not to be there, nor should he be suffered; the minister replied little, but stayed still; till (see how one ill nature helps another) major Richardson came up, and with threatenings, and his cane lifted up, forced him to come down, who immediately thereupon applied himself to the sheriffs, (for by this time they were come up) when some ill persons suggested that he was a Papist, to which the prisoner presently answered, Mr. Sheriff, upon the words of a dying man he is not, but a minister of the church of England.

The ordinary made all the opposition he could, but the sheriff granted the prisoner's request, bidding the ordinary hold his peace, and saying it was a thing never denied to a dying man. Being in the cart, and also the prisoner's brother, he used an office which seemed to be collected out of several offices in the common prayer book, with such small alterations as might serve to adapt them to the present occasion; being since asked the reason, he said that he did it both for the authority of the thing, and also to avoid any cavils that might be made at, or any snares that might be laid for, any of his own conceptions. But when he came to mention the creed, he put these particular questions to the prisoner: Do you believe these articles which you are now about to rehearse with me, to contain that faith which hath all along been received by the church of Christ, and particularly by the church of England? And is this the faith wherein you die, and wherein you hope for salvation? The prisoner making answer, I do so believe, and am now ready to die in that faith, and in that faith hope for salvation. Then said the minister, If so, say after me: Then they repeated the creed, raising their voices somewhat higher than ordinary; after that, the minister asked him several questions concerning his repentance, his charity, his endeavours of restitution for any wrongs by him done, his forgiving of others any wrongs done to him, and the like. And then, at the earnest request of the dying man, he denounced the absolution, then proceeding to divers other prayers, they concluded with that sentence in the office for the burial of the dead; O holy and merciful Saviour, thou most worthy Judge eternal, suffer me not at my last hour for any pains of death to fall from thee. This being over, the minister (whether that he could not endure to see the man die, or that he would not communicate with the ordinary, or for some other reason best known to himself), after he had particularly embraced Mr. Anderton, fervently recommended his soul to God, and taking his last farewell of him, went down out of the cart. The sheriffs civilly commanded a way to be made, and were readily obeyed, he passing through the crowd, not only with ease, but respect. During the time the prisoner was at his private devotions, an order came to remit the quartering of his body, which being by some thought a reprieve, it was handed to him, and having read it, and finding it no more, he returned it, saying, I thank you, Mr. Sheriff, the will of the Lord be done.

Having leave from the sheriffs to speak his mind, if he had any thing to say to the people, he began to speak; but being troublesomely interrupted by the ordinary, and also finding he could not be heard, he desired a speech he had prepared might be taken out of his pocket, and given to the sheriffs, to be by them printed, which is as followeth:

“To my Countrymen,

“Liberty and property hath for some years made an hideous cry in these kingdoms, and nothing more than the rights and privileges of the subject is the pretence of our present deliverers; and doubtless it was for the sake of these that so many of my infatuated and blind countrymen rebelled against their lawful and injured monarch, whilst religion (rebellion's umbrage) was made the covert of the hidden designs of those who have now demonstratively shewn, that they sought nothing less than our ruin: And that these were only pretences to gain their ends, the very blind, although they cannot see, yet must certainly feel it. Under the like pretences do our deliverers still continue to deliver us even from what they please, that they think will but in the least help to effect what they came for: Under the notion of the necessity of a war, they deliver us from our money, and from our traffic and commerce, by which so great a part of the kingdom is sustained: Under the notion of carrying it on, they kidnap our young men, the flower of our kingdom, and, directly contrary to law, transport them; and to save their own foreigners, put them in the first onsets of their battles, as the heathens did the christians of old, that their enemies swords might be blunted with killing them, before they came to encounter them: They exhaust all our stores both for sea and land, and carry away all our artillery; and if any man seem but to disapprove of these their proceedings, under the notion of law they murder him: Nay, if they do but so much as suppose him not to be on their side, he must be a traitor, and no matter what the law says, they say he shall die.

“Can any thing be more plain to demonstrate this, than my present case? My supposed crime was printing, and all the witnesses could personally say against me, was, That I was a man against the government, and had called the prince of Orange ‘Hook-nose,’ though I protest I never did: not one of them could say, nor did they offer to say, that I ever printed the books of which they accuse me, or procured them to be printed, or published any of them, or that the materials were mine, or that I hired the room where they were found; but I was an ill man, and that was sufficient: By which it is plain, that they were resolved, right or wrong, to have my life.

“That they designed not to try, but to convict me, is as plain; for they refused positively to allow me counsel to such matters of law, as was never refused to any before; and though I caused several statutes to be read, some to prove that there must be two witnesses at least to the fact; others, that though there had been two, as there was not one, yet positively declared that it was not treason: Nay, the very last session of parliament was it enacted, That the printer of seditious and treasonable books should for the first offence be punished no otherwise than not to follow his trade for three years; and for the second offence, never to follow it more, and such farther punishment as seemed fit to the court, not extending to life or limb. Now though mine (had it been proved) had but been the first, yet you see, contrary, and in direct opposition to the law, they make it high treason: And when the jury could not agree to find me guilty, and came down to ask the court, Whether the finding these things there, and supposing them to be mine, since it could not be proved that I printed these books, or had made any use of them, could affect my life? I say, when the jury asked this question, and the lord chief justice Treby told them positively, No, it did not; yet withal he told them, That that was not their business, their business was to find me guilty of printing: And while they staid, the court frowned upon them to that degree, that the foreman told them, he was not to be frightened; upon which they publicly reviled them, calling them, ill men, ill subjects, and a pack of knaves; and so terrified them into a compliance. That this is true, those who were near know too well, although the partial writer of the trials hath most perfidiously published not only an unfair, imperfect, and lame account, but hath also stuffed it with downright untruths and falsehoods, and left out whatsoever made for me; not so much as mentioning the contradictions of the witnesses in what they did swear, their swearing to some things that made for me, and when I took hold of them, they denied them; nor hath he, in the least, told the world of the judge's overruling whatsoever I offered, without giving any other answer than that it should be so, because they would have it so; with many other such things, which the conscientious auditors can testify.*

"And now I pray consider where is this liberty and property? Where the rights and privileges of the subject? Nay, where the very laws themselves? And consequently where is the security of any man? Why, even in the deliverers pockets, where your money is, and where also, without all doubt, if you look not well to yourselves, your estates, ere long, will be likewise. What are the proceedings but arbitrary in a superlative manner, and such as no reign ever produced before? These were they you were heretofore only afraid of, being jealous without just cause; but now you see them actually come upon you. I hope you yourselves will put a stop to them, by laying these proceedings before the parliament, for had it been sitting at this present, these proceedings durst not have been practised; and I pray God to put so speedy an end to them, that as I am the first, so I may be the last that may suffer by them.

"I have hitherto lived a member of the orthodox church of England, as by law established, and I declare I now die in the unity of the same: Therefore, according to its discipline, I hold myself obliged to ask pardon of the whole world, of every particular person whom I have any ways offended; and I do freely and sincerely forgive every one that has offended me, particularly my most false and perjured witnesses, and among them more particularly Robin Stephens; my most unjust and unrighteous judges, and my repenting jury:

* This Trial here spoken of, is the foregoing one, printed in the Sessions Paper of that time.

and I pray God may not lay this their sin of wilful murder to their charge at the general bar, where they shall appear as criminals, and not judges.

"May the Almighty bless, preserve, prosper and restore our sovereign lord king James, to the just possession of his indubitable lawful crowns; strengthen him that he may vanquish and overcome all his enemies here on earth, and crown him with eternal glory hereafter: And that he may never want heirs to inherit his crown, bless, I beseech thee, O God, his royal highness the prince of Wales, and give him such a numerable issue, that there may never want one of his loins to sway the scepters of these kingdoms so long as sun or moon endure. Amen. Amen! WILLIAM ANDERTON."

June 15, 1693.

During the time that the ordinary busied himself, he was observed not to mind him, but to employ himself in his private devotions, and after the delivery of his speech to the sheriffs, his cap pulled over his eyes ready for execution, he prayed thus: "Most great and most merciful Lord God! Do thou look down upon me thy poor unworthy servant in this hour of my great extremity, and have mercy upon me! Sweet Jesus, receive my soul into thine everlasting kingdom, for into thy hands do I commend my spirit, because thou hast redeemed it, O Lord God of truth! Come, Lord Jesus, and receive my precious soul; Father of Mercy, have mercy upon me; O God the Son, Redeemer of the world, have mercy upon me! Lord, comfort and support my soul in these my last minutes! Come, sweet Jesus, come quickly, and save me sweet Jesus; by thy most precious blood, by thy agony and bloody sweat, and by the coming of the Holy Ghost, O Lord, do thou deliver me!" Here the ordinary put in, saying, You must give a sign when you are ready; whereupon the sheriffs charged him not to interrupt him; and as he was proceeding, his sister desired to speak to him, which was granted; who kissing him, and weeping over him, said, Be of good comfort, though there is no pardon for you here, yet there is above. So when they had taken a Christian leave of each other, he returned to his devotions, when after a short pathetical prayer, constantly calling upon his Saviour, the cart drove away.

378. Proceedings before the Lords of the Council, and the Admiralty; in relation to the Trials of JOHN GOLDING, THOMAS JONES, JOHN RYAN, DARBY COLLINS, RICHARD SILVERS, PATRICK QUIDLEY, JOHN SLAUGHTER, and CONSTANTINE DE HARTLEY, as Pirates, though acting under King James the Second's Commission: 5 WILLIAM & MARY, A. D. 1693.

SINCE the commencement of king William's war, several privateers having been taken and detained in prison, acting by king James's commission, it was resolved, about July, 1692, by the Lords of the Privy Council, That they should be tried as pirates, having no commissions from kings or sovereign powers whatsoever; and accordingly, about November, 1692, the Lords of the Admiralty ordered Dr. Oldish to proceed against them as pirates; but he declined the doing thereof, and gave his opinion in writing under his hand, That they were no pirates, nor ought to be prosecuted as such: Upon which, September, 1693, Dr. Oldish was summoned before the cabinet council, with sir Thomas Pinfold, Dr. Newton, Dr. Walker, Dr. Littleton, and Dr. Tindall.

The Lords of the Council present, with the secretaries, the earl of Nottingham and sir John Trenchard, were the earls of Devonshire and Pembroke, and the Lords of the Admiralty.

Mr. Secretary Trenchard demanded the reason of his opinion.

Dr. Oldish. Pirates are common enemies to all mankind, having no legal authority for what they do; but they shew a commission signed J. R. dated at the court of St. Germaine's, together with articles and instructions annexed, in the same form as privateers have, giving caution and security to bring prizes, and judgment into the Court of Admiralty, before Thomas Shadford, at Brest, or elsewhere: this does no way agree with piracy, or the character of a pirate, who is a robber, and has thereby lost his right in the law of nations.

Sec. Trenchard. But king James has lost his sovereignty, in that he has parted with his crown, and consequently with the power of granting such commissions.

Dr. Oldish. A king may be deposed of his crown, but cannot lose his right. So says Grotius, 'Jus regis penes ipsius manet, ut cunque possessionem amiserit.' A king, therefore, in case he be deposed of his kingdom by the law, he has a right to war, and if so, he has all the ways and consequences of war, amongst the rest, pignurations and reprisals, which is a power of granting letters of mart and reprisal.

Sec. Trenchard. This may be law, in case where the king is deposed; but what if the king abdicates?

Dr. Oldish. If he did really abdicate, as did the emperor Charles the fifth, or the queen of Sweden, then he is no other than a private person, and cannot legally grant any commission. But whether a privateer, acting by commission granted him de facto by king James, not knowing that he had abdicated, whether such an error will excuse à pœna delicti? For that a reputable power is equivalent to a real one in such a case.

Sec. Trenchard. To clear this, doctor, we must examine the circumstances of the case, and see if they be such as may occasion and induce a common error, whereby many may be deceived, as well as privateers.

Dr. Oldish. It is notorious to us, and all the world, that king James was once a lawful king, and acknowledged by us, and all the world, to be so; that when his army deserted him, he fled to his ally in France for aid; then he went into Ireland to recover his kingdoms, as his declaration sets forth; there he grants commissions: those who fought under those commissions, and were taken, were not used as thieves and robbers, but as prisoners of war; whereby his claim seemed to be allowed by his very enemies; and those persons who acted under him in Ireland were treated as enemies, not rogues, though they acted under no king but king James, and by his command; that upon their return to France, they repaired to king James, their king, and thought him as well empowered to grant commissions by sea as land, and upon receipt of commissions from him, came out 'animo hostili,' as privateers, 'non animo furandi,' as pirates: That a colourable authority remaining in king James, will excuse those who acted under him from being pirates, since the abdication was never published, nor so much as heard of in France; and since in piracy, which deserves 'ultimum supplicium,' if proved, all favourable allowance ought to be made, and a general acknowledgment of a false authority in another country (where the commissions were taken) will free them from a felonious intent in taking them, and consequently from piracy; for so it is, that king James is owned and reputed a king in France; and therefore in this case it is undoubted law, 'Communis error facit jus.'

Lord Devon. What if Tourville should grant such commissions to any Englishman, were they not pirates who acted under him?

Dr. Oldish. No, even the power of granting such commissions being excepted in his patent, yet by common intendment, as admiral, he can grant such commissions; and as it is not to be presumed, that private men should look into his patent, so neither ought they to suffer for not having seen it; it is sufficient for them, that he is reputed to have such power.

Lord Devon. What if monsieur Pomponne, or any other minister of state, should grant such commissions?

Dr. Oldish. Why then it would not be good; for by common presumption, a secretary of state would not grant such commissions, that power being proper only to the admiral.

Sec. Trenchard, and Lord Faulkland, in great heat. I—pray, doctor, let us deal more closely with you, for your reasons are such as amount to high treason. Pray, what do you think of the Abdication?

Dr. Oldish. That is an odious, ensnaring question; however it may be, I think of the Abdication as you do; for since it is voted, it binds at least in England: but those gentlemen were in a foreign country, and knew nothing of it; and though king James be not king here, yet the colour of authority remaining, and common reputation of him as king there, excuses them, as I said before.

Sec. Trenchard. What say you of the pirates under Anthony, king of Portugal?

Dr. Oldish. As to the case of the Frenchmen, under Anthony, king of Portugal, the book says, 'Tractati sunt non quasi justis hostes, sed quasi pirati qui sub Antonio militant;' and the difference of this case appears in the reason of it: For there the Spaniards never owned Anthony as king; here it is quite otherwise; for king James was really and truly a king, owned by us, and all the world.*

* Dr. Tindall, in his Essay concerning the Law of Nations, pp. 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, and 30, says: "The occasion of sending for the Civilians, after some of them that were consulted had given their opinions in writing, was, as the Lords told sir Thomas Pinfold, and Dr. Oldish, (who had declared that they were not pirates, without offering to shew the least reason why they were of that mind) to hear what reason they had to offer for their opinion.

"Then sir Thomas Pinfold said, It was impossible they should be pirates, for a pirate was 'hostis humani generis,' but they were not enemies to all mankind, therefore they could not be pirates. Upon which all smiled, and one of the Lords asked him, Whether there ever was any such thing as a pirate, if none could be pirate but he that was actually in war with all mankind? To which he did not reply, but only repeated what he had said before. 'Hostis humani generis' is neither a definition, or as much as a description of a pirate, but a rhetorical invective to shew the odiousness of that crime. As a man, who, though he receives protection from a government, and has sworn to be true to it, yet acts against it as much as he dares, may be said to be an enemy

Sir Thomas Pinfold being asked what he had to say, declared himself of the same opinion.

Dr. Newton, and Dr. Walker, did not deto all governments, because he destroyeth, as far as in him lieth, all government, and all order, by breaking all those ties and bonds that unite people in a civil society under any government: So a man that breaks the common rules of honesty and justice, which are essential to the well-being of mankind, by robbing but one nation, may justly be termed 'hostis humani generis;' and that nation has the same right to punish him, as if he had actually robbed all nations.

"Doctor Oldish said, That the late king, being once a king, had, by the laws of nations, a right to grant commissions; and that though he had lost his kingdoms, he still retained a right to the privileges that belong to sovereign princes. It was asked him by one of the Lords, Whether he could produce an author of any credit, that did affirm, that he that had no kingdom, or right to any, could grant commissions, or had a right to any of those privileges, that belong to sovereign princes? And that no king would suffer those privileges to be paid to Christina, when she ceased to be queen of Swedeland; and that it was the judgment of all the lawyers that ever mentioned that point, that she had no right to them; and he did hope, that those that had sworn to their present majesties, did not believe the late king had still a right: and that that point was already determined, and would not be suffered to be debated there. To which he answered, That king James was allowed very lately the rights of a king, and that those that acted by his commission in Ireland were treated as enemies; and people that followed his fortune, might still suppose he had a right, which was enough to excuse them from being guilty of piracy.

"One of the Lords then demanded of him, If any of their majesties' subjects, by virtue of a commission from the late king, should by force seize the goods of their fellow-subjects by land, whether that would excuse them from being guilty at least of robbery? if it would not from robbery, why should it more excuse them from piracy? To which he made no reply. Then the Lords asked sir Thomas Pinfold and him, Whether it were not treason in their majesties' subjects, to accept a commission from the late king, to act in a hostile manner against their own nation? Which they both owned it was (and sir Thomas Pinfold has since, as I am informed, given it under his hand, that they are traitors). The Lords further asked them, If the seizing the ships and goods of their majesties' subjects were treason, why they would not allow it to be piracy? because piracy was nothing else but seizing the ships and goods by no commission; or what was all one, by a void or null one; and said, That there could be no commission to commit treason, but what must be so: To which they had nothing to reply. Only Dr. Oldish pre-clare their opinions, but desired time to consider of it. Dr. Newton said, It was against his conscience to have a hand in blood.

tended to quote a precedent, which he said came up to the present case, about Antonio, king of Portugal, who (as he said) after he had lost his kingdom, gave commissions to privateers to seize upon all Spanish vessels, whom, as the Spaniards met with, they hanged as pirates; (so far his precedent is against him :) but an author, without naming him, was of opinion, as he said, That if Antonio had ever been a rightful king, that then the Spaniards ought not to have treated those that acted by his commission as pirates. This was all that was said by the doctor in behalf of the late king's privateers; upon which I must beg leave to make a few reflections. As to those privileges which were allowed the late king in Ireland, they were not allowed him upon the account of any right, nor was it an owning that he had any right to that kingdom, but barely as he was in possession; for then he had 'republicam, curiam,' &c. and consequently a right to be treated as an enemy; and not only he, but whoever had been in possession, would have had a right to have been used after the same manner, and is no more than what is practised in all civil wars, where there are just forces on either side. These privileges being allowed him when he was a public person, and in possession of a kingdom, could be no just reason to induce any to imagine that they would be permitted him when he was reduced to a private condition: much less is it such a presumption as is sufficient to excuse them, who acted by his commission, from suffering as pirates. The very taking a commission from him, after he was reduced to a private condition, to act against their own nation, was a demonstration that the government was no longer in his, but other hands, who could not reasonably be presumed would allow that he had still any right, or that they that acted by his commission should be dealt with as if he still had a right; but that they should be used as if they acted by no commission, or what is all one, a null or invalid one. Their pretending to believe he has still a right, is no more an excuse in the case of piracy, than of treason, which every traitor may pretend to.

"As to the story of Antonio, the doctor is (to suppose no worse) abominably mistaken in the very foundation; for they that suffered by the Spaniards as pirates, were French, who had not their commissions from Antonio, but from their own king, as Albericus Gentilis, who mentions this story, lib. 1, cap. 4, saith, 'At ipsa historia vincat eas non fuisse piratas, per literas quas regis sui ostendebant, cui regi serviebant, non Antonio, et si maxime pro Antonio, quod illos non tangebant.' And Conestaggius, who is the historian he refers to, and who has given an excellent account of that war, saith, It was the royal navy of France (which is very improbable did act by any authority but that of

Dr. Littleton said, That king James now was as a private person; we had no war with him, nor he with us; or if he designed to have the French king's) set out, as he words it, 'regis sub auspiciis,' with which the Spanish fleet engaged, and had the good fortune, after a long and bloody fight, to rout it, and took above five hundred prisoners, of which almost the fifth part were persons of quality, whom the Spanish admiral was resolved to sacrifice as pirates, because the French king, without declaring war, had sent them to the assistance of Antonio: Against which proceedings the officers of the Spanish fleet murmured, and represented to their admiral, that they were not pirates, because they had the French king's commission; but that they chiefly insisted on, was the ill consequence it would be to themselves, who, if they fell into the hands of the French, must expect the same usage. As to the French king's assisting Antonio without declaring war, they supposed, that before the sea fight, the two crowns might be said to be in a state of war, by reason of frequent engagements they had in the Low Countries. This is the account Conestaggius gives of it, which, how little it is to the purpose the doctor quoted it for, is so visible, that there is no need of any words to shew it. But granting (as the doctor supposeth) that Antonio never had any right, or at least the Spaniards would never allow he had any; yet it is evident from the historian, that they allowed him, during possession, the same privileges as the late king had during the war in Ireland: and if the Spaniards, by the law of nations, after Antonio was driven from his kingdom, might treat those that acted by his commission as pirates, why may not the English deal after the same manner with those that act by the late king's commission, since they look on him to be in the same condition as the Spaniards did on Antonio, without a kingdom, or right to one? What difference can that make, that one had never a right, and the other, though he had once a right, has lost it?

"These two Civilians, I believe, are the only persons pretending to be lawyers, that are of opinion, That a king without a kingdom, or right to one, has, by the law of nations, a right to grant commissions to privateers, especially if they are subjects (as they have acknowledged it) to that king, against whom they, by their commissions, are to act. Upon what account can such a person claim these privileges? or for what reason should mankind pay them to him, more than to other private persons? are these privileges like the charms, or indelible characters, the Papists say, are inseparable from the persons of their priests? which, whatever it be in ecclesiasticals, is no small bigotry and fanaticism in civil affairs. And it is the height of folly, madness, and superstition, to believe that the people, who have entrusted some one amongst them with power for no other end but for protecting them, can, upon no account whatever, resume it."

any, Ærarium non habet, he is not in a capacity of making war, he can neither send nor receive ambassadors; and those who adhere to him, are not enemies, but rogues, and consequently those persons are not privateers, but pirates.

Dr. Tindall was of the same opinion with Dr. Littleton.

Dr. Oldish hereupon was removed from his place of king's advocate, and Dr. Littleton succeeded him, who tried the persons, and condemned them. After their condemnation, they presented the following petition to the House of Peers, viz.

To the Right Hon. the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled: The humble PETITION of John Golding, Thos. Jones, John Ryan, Darby Collins, Rich. Shivers, Patrick Quidley, John Slaughter, and Constantine De Hartley, now Prisoners in the Marshalsea, lately tried and condemned as Pirates and Traitors:

Sheweth; That whereas your petitioners have been lately tried and condemned as for piracy and treason, for acting under commissions from king James, and the king of France: whereas, as your petitioners humbly conceive, and are advised, they ought not, by the laws of nations, or the laws of this land, to have been condemned as for either; but to have been used as enemies and prisoners of war.

And whereas there is a reserve in the statute of 25 Ed. 3, of treason, That where any Cases in times to come, shall happen before any justice, which may be supposed treason, but are not therein specified, that such justice shall tarry, without going to judgment, till the cause be shewed and declared before the king and his parliament.

And whereas your petitioners, at their trials, did humbly insist, and often request the judges that tried them, that their cases might be specially found by the juries, and that they might have counsel assigned to argue them; and particularly proposed the aforesaid reservation in the said statute for treason, to their serious considerations; yet nothing of all this could be obtained from your petitioners judges, or prevail with them to suspend the condemning your petitioners, so much as for one hour: although no such, or such like cases as any of your petitioners are, (considered with all their circumstances) or have ever, as your petitioners are advised, been adjudged treason, as will sufficiently appear to your lordships, (as your petitioners believe) if your lordships will be pleased to take into your serious considerations your petitioners Case hereunto annexed, with the reasons added thereunto. Your petitioners therefore humbly appeal to your lordships justice in the premises, beseeching your lordships seriously to read and consider your petitioners said cases, and extend your justice and goodness to your petitioners, for their relief, as to your lordships great wisdoms shall seem meet, and to intercede for your petitioners.

And your petitioners shall ever pray, &c.

Our Cases, with some reasons and considerations, humbly offered to your lordships now assembled in parliament, why we John Golding, &c. lately condemned as pirates and traitors, ought not, according to the law of nations, so to have been.

Our Case is this: we say (as was also said at our trial,) that we are all natives of Ireland, and were in the actual service of king James, and all along acted under his commissions, from the time that the prince of Orange invaded England, to the time of the surrender of Limerick; and the articles made upon that capitulation, signed by lieutenant-general Ginkle, which were soon after published by authority: that we, with several thousands more, pursuant thereunto, were conveyed as enemies into France, with arms, horses, brass guns, mortar-pieces, and ammunition. That being thus conveyed into France, we were continued still to act and serve under king James's commissions, as our king; and he all along, both whilst we were in Ireland, and after we were thus conveyed into France, continued to command or commission us as his subjects. And we the said Richard Shivers, &c. who are condemned as pirates, say, (as we also said at our trial) that the ship and goods, for the taking of which we were charged as for piracy, we took as privateers, by virtue of a commission and instructions from king James, signed and dated from his court at St. Germain's in France; where he exercises a regal authority. And we the said John Golding and Thomas Jones say, that we accepted the king of France's commission, and acted under it, (for which we were condemned as traitors) by the permission and consent of king James. And we all say (as we likewise said at our trials) that we never owned or submitted to the authority of this government in any respect whatsoever, or ever received any protection from it, or from king William, but all along served as subjects to king James, and enemies to king William: and were taken as in actual hostility, acting under the aforesaid commission and instruction. We also say, that there are many thousands in Flanders, England, Scotland, and Ireland, who have all along, and still do act promiscuously under king James and the king of France's commissions; and in either case, as often as any of them have been taken prisoners, they have been treated as enemies, and prisoners of war.

And our case being thus, we humbly conceive, that neither by the law of nations, or by the law of this land, we ought to be treated otherwise than as enemies and prisoners of war.

And first, we humbly beg leave to offer, and say, that king James was at the time of the invasion of England, by the prince of Orange, actually and rightfully king of these realms; and that by the late invasion of England, king James and the prince of Orange became actual enemies to each other; and that the soldiers taken in arms by either party, ought, and were looked on as enemies and prisoners of war.

That as long as any war continue, the prisoners taken on either side are prisoners of war.

That king James withdrawing from England, did not put an end to this war between him and the prince of Orange; and that the war in Ireland was a continuation of that war.

That it is lawful for the subjects of these kingdoms, to stand by, and assist their lawful king, as long at least as they please, in any war or design raised against him, or his government; and are not compellable to quit their service to such lawful king, so long as he will continue to act as king, and command them as subjects.

That in case of any invasion, and dispossession ensuing thereupon, the subjects of these realms are not bound to abide within these realms, and submit and become subjects to the dispossessioner, at the peril of treason; but may lawfully still attend their king's fortune and service, if they chuse so to do.

That the possession of these kingdoms, obtained through any invasion, does not either alter the possession of, or right to the subjects allegiance; for that allegiance is a natural relation, and follows the natural person of the king, and is not incident, or appurtenant to a place, like a villein to a manour; for this, be pleased to see the great case of the union of Scotland, in Moor's Reports, p. 790, solemnly considered, and adjudged in parliament.

That any dispossessioner of any lawful king of these realms, cannot legally pretend to the allegiance of such subjects of such lawful king, as never were within his power, or subjection, or ever recognized, or submitted to him, or had any protection from him, because such can be no debtors to him, and allegiance is a debt, and therefore such cannot stand accountable to any such dispossessioner as for treason, till he is some way or other possessed of their allegiance.

That the allegiance of any subjects of this kingdom, cannot be transferred to the dispossessioner of a lawful king, by the act of others, without some consent, or act of their own.

That a king may continue to wage war after he is dispossessed of his kingdom, and be reputed still an enemy by the law of nations, and consequently all those of his subjects that continue still with him, without transferring their allegiance to the possessor, be reputed and treated as enemies; for it would be absurd to say, that the king may continue in war, where the subjects cannot.

That king James having no Ærarium, or treasury, (in case it be so) as has been alledged against the validity of his commission, is no more sense, than it would be to say, that no prince by the law of nations can continue war, but at his own charge.

That the war between king William and king James continued on, after king James and his forces left Ireland, and that the articles upon the surrender of Limerick, admit it so to do, if the permitting so many thousand men with arms, horses, guns, and ammunition to go into France to king James, to serve as soldiers, commissioned by him, may be any proof of such admission.

That the said article being signed by lieutenant-general Ginkle, Limerick and other places having been surrendered upon the faith of those articles, all concerned in them, ought by the law of nations to have the full benefit of them; and that, although they had never afterwards been confirmed.

That king James is still actually in war, and in confederacy with the king of France; that many thousand English, Scotch and Irish still act under commission from king James, in conjunction with the French forces: that they have hitherto been discharged and exchanged by the confederates, (as prisoners of war) though taken fighting against the English that act under king William's commission; and if so, why are king James's commissions annul, and nothing at sea?

That king James and the king of France being confederated together in war against England, it matters not in the judgment of the law of nations, under which of the confederates commission the subjects of either act; whether under king James or the king of France's; but the enemy without distinction, if either subject act under either commission, ought by the law of nations to treat them as enemies and prisoners of war.

That where two kings join in war against one another, after one of them has lost part of his dominions, (as king James had, when the king of France sent him forces into Ireland) and soon after he became wholly dispossessed, would it not be absurd, for any one to say upon this case, that it was absurd by the law of nations for the one king to assist or join with the other, after that he had lost part of his dominions? Or if he does, that yet notwithstanding the war is wholly at an end as to the loser, and he becomes a private person, though never so many of his subjects follow him in warlike manner by capitulation from the enemy, or that these subjects are disabled by the law of nations, to accept any commission from him, (or his confederate king by his consent) or serve him any more as their king: or, if they do, that this will not excuse them from being pirates and traitors to the dispossessioner.

That the law of nations, to the judgment of which our case only belongs, is the great and imperial law of right and equity that judges of the rights of kings and nations, with respect to each other, and of the rights of war, and of the rights of peace; and all nations with respect to this law are considered as one great corporation, and each kingdom or nation but as a single member or part of this corporation. And therefore this law, or any rule of right, or notion of it, cannot be altered, concluded or estopped by any votes, ordinances or statutes of any particular nation or kingdom.

That every lawful established king, in the notion of this law, has a right to hold his kingdom, during his life; and that in case it be any such king's misfortune to be dispossessed through any war or invasion, that he has 'Jus Belli' 'pro Regni Recuperatione,' and a right to the assistance of any other prince, who shall think fit to join with him for the recovery of his kingdom, as being as much his legal remedy, as for any private person for the disseizing his freehold by the particular laws of any particular kingdom.

That it is also a notion and rule of this law, that no lawful king can lose the name and title of king, unless he resign or abdicate his kingdom; and that every abdication or resignation ought to be the voluntary and intentional act of such king so to do, or else that it is no abdication or resignation. That every such abdication or resignation by this law must appear otherwise to the judges of this law, than only by a vote or statute, made only by the prince and persons in possession of the kingdom of such supposed abdicated king; or otherwise these judges cannot, by the law of nations, admit it to be in any case, wherein the writ or issues of the same case turns upon such abdication: especially, if such king continued to act as a king, and to grant commissions as such, &c. For if once such a vote or statute should be admitted as evidence in our law, (would these judges say) no prince, once out of possession, however he came so to be, could retain any right to his kingdom: or the very name of a prince, unless his enemy would please to let him? For it would be no more than for the enemy to vote that the prince has resigned or abdicated, and there would be an end of the prince and his right; as to be sure no prevailing enemy would omit to do, if such, or any such vote, or law made among themselves, would by the law of nations utterly conclude, and unking the dispossessed prince, and dissolve all relation between him and his subjects, as consequently it must do; and that therefore, however the party making such vote, and receiving protection from the prince in possession, may be estopped and bound by it by their own acts and consents, yet in the eye of the law of nations, (which alters not) he continues in all the circumstances and rights of a dispossessed prince, until he shall appear to have resigned or abdicated, according to the law of nations.

Lastly, We most humbly propose, and appeal to your lordships' considerations, whether the articles of Limerick, which were produced at our trial, and are ready to produce to your lordships, and the very reputed power (in case he had no other) king James has hitherto had, and used, of granting commissions, and all that have hitherto acted under his commission having been used and treated as soldiers and seamen acting under real and valid commissions, be not sufficient to excuse us (who have never been within this kingdom since the beginning of the war, until we were brought prisoners from the condemnation of pirates): and whether acting under the king of France's commission, being in amity and league with king James, and by his consent, can be in us treason against king William, who never, in any respect, received his protection, but adhered all along to king James, as to our king, and fought against king William, as king James's enemy.

These considerations are humbly submitted to your lordships, being, as we conceive, of the greatest consequence to all the subjects of England, as the case may sometimes happen.

However, some of them, if not all, were executed.

379. Proceedings in Parliament against THOMAS LORD CONINGSBY and Sir CHARLES PORTER, on an Impeachment of High Treason: 5 WILLIAM & MARY, A. D. 1693.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

December 16, 1693.

THE Earl of Bellamont* presented to the House Articles of Impeachment of High Treason, and other Crimes and Misdemeanors, against Thomas lord Coningsby, one of the late Lords Justices of Ireland; which were delivered in, and read at the clerk's table, as followeth: viz.

* An Irish peer, appointed, in 1695, governor of New York, being thought by the king a man of resolution, and integrity; and with these qualities, more likely than any other to put a stop to piracy, with which the American colonies, at that time, abounded.

1. "That he the said lord Coningsby hath traitorously abused the power and authority of his government, and exercised the same tyrannically, discouraging and terrifying the Militia, by framing and imposing on them a new, arbitrary, and illegal oath, notwithstanding that his majesty left instructions, when he came from Ireland, for arraying the militia; which instructions did, among other things, direct, That the oaths, established by act of parliament in England, should be administered to them; but the said lord Coningsby, in the oath he imposed, left out that part which requires them to renounce the jurisdiction of the Pope, and all other foreign powers, purposely to leave room for Papists to come into the militia; and further in his instructions, ordered all governors of counties to subject the militia to martial law, contrary to the known laws of that kingdom, and his majesty's said instructions; there being no militia established in that kingdom by law, but has been hitherto a voluntary service.

2. "That the said lord Coningsby intending to bring their majesties good Protestant subjects of Ireland into a dislike of their majesties government, did, traiterously, arbitrarily, and against the known laws of the said realm, exact and force free quarter for the army: and did also, by force of arms, levy money on the Protestant subjects; rejecting the several proposals made to them, by the most considerable gentry of some countries, for the more regular subsisting a greater number of soldiers than were free-quartered upon them; which discouraged other counties from making the same offers; so that the country thereby became entirely ruined.

3. "That the said lord Coningsby for his own private gain and advantage, did traitorously cause great scarcity of provisions in the army before Limerick, by obliging the sutlers to take licences from him at excessive rates, and by laying taxes on all such beer, and other provisions, as went to the camp; whereby, all or most of the sutlers being forced to forsake the service of the camp, provisions of all sorts became so very scarce and dear, that great numbers of the soldiers perished for want.

4. "That the said lord Coningsby assuming to himself an arbitrary and tyrannical power over the lives, as well as the properties, of their majesties subjects of Ireland, above and against all law, did, in council, traiterously, and by word of mouth, order one Gafney to be hanged without trial, the courts of justice being then open, and who was, at that time, an evidence against one Sweetman, for the barbarous murder of some of colonel Foulke's soldiers: but the said Sweetman giving all his real estate, to the value of 200*l.* per annum, to Mr. Culliford, besides the sum of 500*l.* to Mr. Fielding, his the said lord Coningsby's secretary, for being his bail, but never prosecuted for the said horrid murder: and the said Gafney was immediately executed, according to the said verbal order.

5. "That the said lord Coningsby during his government of Ireland, did, by himself, or his agent, traitorously settle and maintain a correspondence and carry on a trade, with the subjects of the French king, their majesties declared enemy.

6. "That the said lord Coningsby, betraying and abusing the great trust reposed in him; and the better to enrich himself, and to enable him to go through with his traiterous designs, did embezzle vast quantities of their majesties stores, and forfeited estates both real and personal; whereby the reduction of that kingdom became more difficult, and the war more burdensome upon England, and the army greatly discouraged for want of their pay; which by due application of the said embezzled stores and estates, might have been remedied.

VOL. XII.

7. "That the said lord Coningsby, further traiterously abusing his said great trust, and betraying their majesties honour and interest, did, during his whole government, openly favour and support the Papists in their robberies, and other outrages, committed upon the Protestants; refusing to allow them liberty of taking their legal remedies against the Papists.

"And that he, the said lord Coningsby, was one of the said lords justices, during the time that all and every the crimes and offences, before set forth, were done and committed."

The earl of Bellamont also presented to the House similar Articles of Impeachment against sir Charles Porter, knight, another of the late Lords Justices of Ireland.

Lord Coningsby. This is a great charge: 'traiterously and violently' are the best words that can be found in it. This matter was before the house last session, and the house seemed satisfied. When I found that my service was turned into faults, myself, with sir Charles Porter, desired a pardon; as those in my station have done before. The king granted it. I was in the country when this lord put in a caveat, because the matter was depending in parliament. But I desired no pardon, and would have had it stopped. Lord Bellamont gave no reason for the caveat, why the pardon should be stopped. The king has sent into Ireland to have an account of this charge, which was the same in effect at the council, as this here; and it is now come to a farther accusation. Most of these things called 'traiterous,' most Protestants will tell you, preserved Ireland. (And so he proceeded to several things for his defence, &c.) If any thing requires farther explanation from me, I desire a copy of the charge.

Earl of Bellamont. This is a business of consequence, and I cannot trace this lord in what he has said. But I have good evidence to prove the Articles. I am a stranger to methods, and I know not whether I am right in forms. I have a charge against sir Charles Porter,* all the same but to the charge of stores, when I have your order for certain gentlemen to come out of Ireland. And so went on in aggravating the charge in several particulars, and exhibited the same articles mutatis mutandis against sir Charles Porter.

Sir Charles Porter. This is a great attempt, to defame men, and bring their lives and reputations in question. I have done all for the honour of the king, and the good of Ireland. (And so went on to justify himself as to the Articles.)

Lord Bellamont replied upon him in several particulars, and desired time for his evidence to come over.

Mr. Palmes. I stand up to method. This is a heavy charge against these persons. The question is, 'Whether you will refer the matter to a committee, or call in the evidence?'

* Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and another of the Lords Justices.

Sir Edw. Seymour. I remember proceedings in things of this nature. You have heard the charge. The persons accused ought to have a copy of the charge, and time to bring in their answer; as formerly has been done. I speak experimentally. I have had a charge against me, and it was not proceeded in.* When they give in their answer, the next step is for your proceeding.

Sir John Lowther. This being an Impeachment against your members, you will do justice on all sides. They think themselves innocent, and, no doubt, will deny it. They may have a copy, and give their answer.

Sir Edw. Seymour. I have told you what related to myself. The prosecutors against me never pretended to prove the accusation; I hope that will not be drawn into precedent. This proceeding is different from other courts. (Replying upon sir Francis Winnington) He has a happy remembrance in some things, and forgets others. He said, 'Let the witnesses come, and then we may well judge what it amounts to.' A noble lord (Orrery) was once impeached here; he put in his answer; the house thought it frivolous, and put it off to be proceeded at law.† Then the evidence was concealed, but now it is at the door, and you have the answer of the party accused.

Mr. Finch. That this matter may come to issue, you are in a right method. You have had the information, and the answer; and if you are not satisfied, then you have another method to proceed.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I doubt you cannot deny copies of the articles to the persons accused, and reasonable time to make their defence. Lord Orrery did only answer in his place. I would gladly know, if such a misfortune should befall a man, whether you would debar him making use of his paper? But, as for calling witnesses, I would not admit that; for perhaps the answers of the persons may occasion no farther proceedings against them. I would order them a copy, and not straiten them in time.

Sir Tho. Littleton. I hope this high charge against these persons is not true; but it is for their honour to be publicly justified. It is impossible to be proved, without evidence, by general answer.

Resolved, "That this House will, on the 22nd instant, hear witnesses, at the bar of the house, to the said several Articles."

December 22.

The House proceeded according to order, to hear Witnesses to the Articles against lord Coningsby and sir Charles Porter. And the 1st, 2nd, and 5th Articles were severally read, and several witnesses called in and examined at the bar to each of those Articles. And several Letters and Copies of Letters and other Papers, delivered in by the earl of Bellamont and the witnesses, were also read, touching the matter of those Articles.

On the 20th of January, 1694, lord Coningsby and sir Charles Porter were severally heard in their places; and being withdrawn, the House resolved to proceed in the consideration of the said Articles, article by article. And on the 29th, the House Resolved, on the 1st Article, "That the imposing the oath mentioned in this Article was illegal: but that, considering the state of affairs in Ireland at that time, this House doth not think fit to ground an Impeachment upon it." In the 2nd and 3rd Articles no ground of Impeachment appeared. On the 4th, Resolved, "That the Order for the execution of Gafney, without trial, was arbitrary and illegal; but, for the same reason as before, they declined to impeach lord Coningsby upon it." On the 5th, 6th, and 7th, no ground of Impeachment appeared. And lord Coningsby and sir Charles Porter were ordered to take their places in the House.

In this same year, 1694, occurred the Trials for the LANCASHIRE PLOT. I have not been able to obtain any full report of them, but have been favoured by Mr. Dealtry with the following minutes respecting the proceedings.

"Oct. 7. 6 W & M. A session of Oyer and Terminer was holden at Manchester, before sir Giles Eyre, knt. a justice of the court of King and Queen's Bench; sir John Turton, knt., and sir John Powell, knt. barons of the exchequer; and sir Samuel Eyre, knt. another justice of the king and queen's bench, under a special commission to inquire of treasons, &c.

"At which Session, an indictment was found against sir Rowland Stanley, bart.; sir Thomas Clifton, bart; William Dicconson, esq.; Philip Langton, esq.; and William Blundell, gent. for High Treason.

"Oct. 17. They were tried before the same justices, and John Hunt [qu. Lunt] was produced as a witness for the crown.

"Hilary Term, 6 W. 3. Sir Edward Ward, knt. his majesty's attorney general, filed an information against the said John Hunt, for perjury, charged to have been committed upon that trial.

"Like information against John Wombell.

"Like information against George Wilson.

"Michaelmas, 7 W. 3. Def'ts having been convicted at the assizes, obtained rules for new trials. And amended, by stating that the defendants came and pleaded in their proper persons, instead of stating that they appeared by attorney."

The following is Tindal's Account of these transactions :

"The Popish Lancashire gentlemen, instead of acknowledging the lenity of the present government, endeavoured to represent the legal prosecution of some of their party as a state-trick, and the contrivance of some courtiers to enrich themselves by the ruin of others; and submitted the whole matter to the examination of the House of Commons. It will be proper therefore to premise a brief account of their design to subvert the government, and of the proceedings against them, in order that a right notion may be formed of the grounds of the clamour against those proceedings.

"On the 15th of June, 1694, Lunt, an Irishman, made his discovery, and deposed before sir John Trenchard, secretary of state: 'That he had followed the late king James into France, and thence into Ireland: that from Ireland he was sent into England, with commissions from that king to certain gentlemen in Lancashire, Cheshire, &c. to raise war against king William and queen Mary: that he and George Wilson, his guide, delivered those commissions to whom they were directed; whose names he mentioned in his narrative. That, at the instance and proper costs of those gentlemen, to whom he had delivered commissions, he bought arms, and listed and subsisted many for the service of the late king James, in order to an invasion and insurrection in that county. That he was twice sent by those gentlemen into France to the late king, to signify their readiness, and receive his further commands; and that, when he was at London, besides his employment of buying arms, and listing soldiers, he helped some Jacobites over into France, and secured others, who came from thence, who, all of them, told him, that generally sir John Friend furnished money for those expeditions, and paid subsistence money to them as soldiers.' This evidence was confirmed by the testimony of George Wilson, who guided and assisted Lunt in the delivery of king James's commissions, and by the depositions and affidavits of several persons, (some at a great distance from, and utter strangers to one another) all agreeing in the most material circumstances of the Lancashire conspiracy.

"The government being fully informed of the plot, warrants were issued out to seize the conspirators; and though, for the greater secrecy, the names of the offenders were not put into the warrant at the secretary's office by those who drew the warrants, but were afterwards put in by the secretaries themselves, yet, by some treacherous correspondence, the Lancashire gentlemen had notice given them of all proceedings at London. Upon this they burnt their commissions, buried their arms and other warlike equipage, under ground, and most of them fled from their habitations. However, through the extraordinary care and diligence of captain Baker, and others employed in that service, some of the plotters were apprehended, and arms enough found to convince the world, that there was a treasonable design on foot against the government. There was likewise found in Mr. Standish's closet, at the search made at Standish Hall, on the 16th of July, 1694, the draught of a Remonstrance or Declaration, to be printed and published at king James's landing; which, according to Mr. Crosby's papers, and Mr. Robinson's depositions, was to be attempted very speedily.

"As many of the persons accused, as could be apprehended, being brought up to London, and examined, were, some of them, committed to the Tower, and others to Newgate, where they continued about a month. During this time, their friends and solicitors exerted all their skill and diligence to take off the king's evidence, both by offering them large sums of money, as was attested by Mr. Baker, Mrs. Hearst, Mr. Clayton, Mr. Brown, and Mrs. Elliot; and that failing, by finding out persons, who would represent the king's witnesses under heinous characters, that the jury might give no credit to their depositions. Many persons were practised upon, some of whom refused so base an action; but others, through great importunities and promises of large rewards, were prevailed with to defame the king's evidences, both at Manchester, and in the Parliament House. But that which raised the great clamour against the discovery of the plot, was the gaining one Taffe, alias Thomas O'Mullen, an Irishman, to the other side; which happened in this manner.

"In Dec. 1693, Lunt came from France, and being, as he afterwards pretended, troubled in conscience, for having engaged in the barbarous design of assassinating the king, resolved to atone for that crime, by discovering all he knew, that had been acted, or was then plotting against his majesty. His coming over was made known to Mr. Taffe, a familiar acquaintance of Lunt's wife, and who was represented to Lunt as a person, that had done some considerable service to the public.* To "* Taffe was an Irish priest, who had not only changed his religion, but had married in king James's time. He came into the service of the present government, and had a small pension. He was long in pursuit of a discovery of the imposture in the birth of the prince of Wales, and was engaged with more success in discovering the concealed estates of the priests and the religious orders, in which some progress was made. These seemed to be sure evidences of the man's sincerity, at least in his opposition to those, whom he had forsaken, and whom he was provoking in so sensible a manner. This is mentioned chiefly to shew, how little that sort of men are to be depended him Lunt's wife had told, that her husband was lately come out of France; which made Taffe, who pretended to be zealous for the government, enquire how matters stood at St. Germain's? adding, that, if Lunt could discover any thing, that might be serviceable to their majesties, he would introduce him to a person, that would receive his information. Lunt gives credit to Taffe, shews his willingness to make a discovery, and thereupon Taffe brings him to the earl of Bellamont, and vouches for his honesty. After his lordship had heard Lunt's relation, he commanded him to wait on him again in two or three days; which Lunt obeying, and his lordship being somewhat indisposed, he sent Lunt with a letter to sir John Trenchard. Taffe accompanied him thither, and the secretary, hearing what Lunt had to discover, first sent him into Kent, and afterwards commanded him to put his depositions into writing, and bring them to him. Lunt performed it: Taffe heard all the information read, aggravated the crimes, and appeared the most forward of any to have the persons accused brought to justice; and, pretending to be serviceable in knowing the country and people there, he went down into Lancashire with Mr. Aaron Smith and Mr. Baker, and assisted the king's messengers in searching at Standish-hall, and other places.

"Taffe shewed an extraordinary zeal in his majesty's service, but might have been much more useful than he was in finding concealed arms and persons, if he had made more use of his head and less of his fingers. The managers of that affair, and the king's messengers, quickly perceiving his pilfering practices to be very injurious to the inhabitants, and no less scandalous to themselves, were forced to have as watchful an eye upon him, as upon the business they were employed in; though, notwithstanding all their care, he committed some gross felonies. Soon after he came to London, he waited on the lord Bellamont, gave his lordship an account of what persons and arms had been seized, that several gentlemen had made their escapes, and that others absconded to secure themselves: whereupon the lord Bellamont asked Taffe, if this was the business, which Lunt had discovered? Taffe answered, It was, and that Lunt was the main evidence of the conspiracy; was very well known at the respective places, which he had mentioned in his depositions; and had done greater service at his being there, if the Lancashire gentlemen had not received notice from London of their coming ten days before they came to Standish-hall. This account being given to the lord Bellamont, Taffe addressed himself to Mr. Aaron Smith and captain Baker, for the reward of his service; but, finding himself on. He possessed those, to whom his other discoveries gave him access, of the importance of this Lunt, and was very zealous in supporting Lunt's credit, and in assisting him in his discoveries." 2 Burnet, 142.

slighted and reprimanded for his scandalous behaviour, he grew angry, and resolved to revenge himself upon the government, even to the spoiling of the plot. The friends, relations, and solicitors of the prisoners were no sooner acquainted with his design, but the bargain was struck, and his terms agreed to: 20*l.* were paid him in hand, with assurance (as was afterwards sworn in the House of Lords) of a good annuity for life, to be settled in Lancashire; and, lest he should cool, he was immediately sent into the country to be their counter-evidence, when the trials should commence at Manchester.

"Having thus gained Taffe, and got from unwary Lunt the names of the king's witnesses, and the whole matter of the evidence, the next attempt for defeating the whole plot was engaging Ferguson to write in defence of the Lancashire gentlemen, and to asperse their accusers; and this stratagem had such a notable effect, that the popish mob at Manchester, animated by reading Ferguson's paper (which was almost in every hand in that county) had resolved to prevent the trials of the prisoners, by stoning the king's evidences to death. But those, who knew they would be acquitted, prevailed with the mob to forbear the execution of that inhuman resolution till the trials were ended. And indeed, no sooner were the trials over, and the witnesses leaving the town, but the mob endeavoured to stone them to death, and in such a violent and tumultuous manner, that not only the witnesses, but a gentleman of counsel for the king, the king's prosecutor, and king's clerk in the crown-office, very narrowly escaped with their lives.

"The trials began at Manchester the 16th of October, 1694, where the king's evidence proved, 'That the prisoners at the bar had received commissions from the late king James, to raise war against the present government: and to that end had bought arms, listed and subsisted soldiers at their own charge, &c.' It is affirmed that sir William Williams, though then one of the counsel for the king, endeavoured to baffle and confound the king's witnesses, by asking them several frivolous questions; but, failing in that, he required Lunt to point at the several prisoners by name. In doing this, Lunt happened to point at a wrong man, which mistake might be occasioned by the crowd. However, this gratified the popish mob, and raised a loud laugh. But their mirth continued not long; for, another of the judges commanding Lunt to touch and name all the accused gentlemen with the cryer's staff, he named them all right.

"Witnesses were afterwards produced for the prisoners, but nothing was alledged by them, that could invalidate the king's evidence, except Taffe's testimony, who boldly declared, 'That there was no truth in the pretended plot, the whole being a villainous contrivance between himself and Lunt;' which single declaration, without any oath, out-weighed the testimonies of the ten positive witnesses for the king; and thereupon sir William Williams, the chief manager of the trial, sat down in the court, and would examine no more witnesses against the prisoners. And so, without calling for the rest of the evidence, the matter was let fall; and, when, the judges gave the charge to the jury, it was in favour of the prisoners; so that they were acquitted, and those that were ordered to be tried after them, were all discharged without trial.

"The whole party triumphed upon this as a victory, and complained both of the ministers of state and of the judges: and sir William Williams, being returned to London, represented the plot as a wicked and horrible contrivance; upon which the government, in abhorrence of such a design, immediately ordered the witnesses to be prosecuted for a conspiracy against the lives and estates of the Lancashire and Cheshire gentlemen. This strange turn being given to the affair, many of the wiser sort of those, who were friends to the accused gentlemen, and dreaded the consequence of a further inquiry, advised them to sit down quietly, and leave it to the government to punish their accusers, if they saw fit; but some lawyers over-ruled this advice, and so the Lancashire and Cheshire gentlemen, on the 24th of November, 1694, brought the affair into the house of commons.

"While this affair was depending, several witnesses were procured against the king's evidences in parliament, by downright bribery, and by telling them they were not to be put to their oaths; and therefore, not being in danger of perjury, might safely and confidently tell all the stories, that were dictated to them.* Indirect means were also used to asperse the earl of Macclesfield, at that time lord-lieutenant of the county of Lancaster, who being a professed friend to the government, was of consequence thought by the jacobites their mortal enemy.

"The house of commons, after several hearings, strict examinations, and long debates,

* "By the late trial, it had manifestly appeared, how little the crown gained by one thing, which yet was thought an advantage; that the witnesses for the prisoners were not upon oath: many things were upon this occasion witnessed in favour of the prisoners, which were afterwards found to be notoriously false; and it is certain, that the terror of an oath is a great restraint, and many, whom an oath might over-awe, would more freely allow themselves the liberty of lying, in behalf of a prisoner, to save his life."

which continued at these several appointed times, the space of eleven weeks, on the 6th of February, 'proceeded farther in reading the information and papers delivered into the house by Mr. Aaron Smith, touching the late proceedings and trials in Lancashire and Cheshire. Mr. Lunt's information was read; as also Mr. Wilson's and Mr. Womball's; and other papers delivered into the house by Mr. Aaron Smith were likewise read; among which were several printed papers. Whereupon the house came to the following resolutions; first, That there did appear to the house, that there was sufficient grounds for the prosecution and trials of the gentlemen at Manchester. And, secondly, That upon the informations and examinations before this house, it doth appear, that there was a dangerous plot carried on against the king and government.' At the same time the commons ordered an act of the pretended parliament of Ireland, held in the year 1689, recognizing the late king James, and two proclamations of that abdicated prince, to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman. Besides this, the house, after having given an order for the taking Mr. Standish of Standish-hall in Lancashire into custody, and their messenger reporting, that he was not to be found, addressed the king to issue out a proclamation to apprehend him.

"This disappointment in the house of commons was no small mortification to the jacobites; yet, in hopes of better success, they laid their complaints also before the house of peers, where, after examining some witnesses, and many debates, the question being put, 'Whether the government had sufficient cause to prosecute the Lancashire and Cheshire gentlemen?' It was carried in the affirmative; though the earls of Rochester and Nottingham appeared with great zeal on the other side, and in conclusion protested against the vote, by which the lords justified the proceedings against those gentlemen.

"The accused gentlemen, notwithstanding these disappointments, at the next Lancaster assizes, in August 1695, brought on trials upon an information of perjury against Lunt, Womball, and Wilson, three of the king's witnesses, who were all found guilty; and afterwards indicted for a conspiracy against the lives and estates of those gentlemen. But, the gentlemen refusing to furnish the king's attorney and solicitor-general with witnesses to prove the pretended perjuries, the prosecution was let fall, and Lunt, Womball, and Wilson discharged."

380. Trial of — CROSBY, in the King's Bench, for High Treason :
7 WILLIAM III. A. D. 1695. [1 Lord Raymond's Reports, 39.]

REX v. CROSBY, alias PHILIPS. B. R.*

CROSBY was indicted for high-treason ; and at the trial at bar he excepted against the evidence of Mr. Aaron Smith, because he had been set in the pillory upon a judgment given against him in this court, upon an information, 34 Car. 2. the record of which he produced. Mr. Solicitor General Trevor and Mr. Cowper, on behalf of Aaron Smith, agreed, That the infamy was always a consequence of the guilt, and not of the punishment ; and therefore (by them) if an innocent man hath an infamous judgment given against him for a crime that does not deserve such judgment, this will not render the party infamous. Then for application, they said, That the crime of which Mr. Aaron Smith was accused, did not deserve such a judgment ; and therefore shall not take away his testimony. And,

Sir Samuel Eyre, justice, seemed to be of that opinion.

But Holt, Chief Justice, gave no opinion as to this point, saying, that he could not impeach the record ; but he was of opinion, that the general act of pardon, 2 Wil. and Mar. gave Mr. Smith a new credit, but did not work by way of restoration, to restore him to his old credit : as, if a person be attainted of felony, he is now incapable of making a purchase to hold, or to give evidence ; but if the king pardons him, he is now become a new creature, and may do both ; but he is not restored to inherit to those persons, to whom he was inheritable before : and the difference is, between a civil disability, which the pardon cannot cure, (Co. Lit. 234. Sir A. Ingram's case) and a criminal disability, which the pardon may take away. And for these reasons the testimony of Mr. Aaron Smith was admitted.

* " It is great pity this Trial (if taken at large) could not be procured, for the arguments of the court and counsel must have been curious ; so have inserted this short account from lord Raymond's Reports, vol. 1, p. 39. See also Salkeld, 689." Former Edition. See Skinner, 578, 5 Mod. 15 S. 6.

But the principal point of treason charged upon Mr. Crosby being the writing of certain treasonable papers, which the king's counsel endeavoured to prove by comparison of hands, having no other evidence ; the prisoner, Crosby, produced the copy of the act of parliament, for the reversal of the attainder of Algernon Sidney, esq.* in which it is declared, That the comparison of hands is not legal evidence. Upon which the jury found the prisoner not guilty.

Mr. Justice Foster, in his Reports of Crown Cases, p. 198, says, ' In Mr. Sidney's case, it was said, ' Scribere est agere.' This is undoubtedly true under proper limitations, but it was not applicable to his case. Writing being a deliberate act and capable of satisfactory proof, certainly may, under some circumstances with publication, be an overt-act of treason. And I freely admit, that had the papers found in Mr. Sidney's closet been plainly relative to the other treasonable practices charged in the indictment, they might have been read in evidence against him, though not published.— But papers not capable of such connection, whilst they remain in the hands of the author unpublished, as Mr. Sidney's did, will not make a man a traitor."

not a [have] been granted now, and which he might have more properly desired, when he was deraigned.

It was to this effect: That he had conspired with others, and had treaties about betraying several forts, garrisons, and castles of this kingdom to the French king; about raising of troops and forces within this kingdom, in order to favour the French king in making a descent to raise rebellion among us; that he had writ several notes, letters and memorandums to that purpose; giving an account of their majesties' forces by sea and land; how the same were quartered and posted, and in what station the fleet was divided; when ready to sail, &c.; and all this to procure an invasion from the French, &c. That in his said papers, he gave an account of persons disaffected to their majesties in the several counties in England and Wales, as well of the nobility, spirituality, and gentry; that he named several cities and places where the French might land at, particularly Newcastle, Carlisle, and Falmouth; that he used other ways and means in order to assist the said French king, in invading this kingdom, contrary to the duty of his allegiance, and form of the statute in that case made and provided.

The indictment having been opened by one Mr. Nap first, and then by Mr. Attorney General (Mr. Edward Ward), who said the treason laid in it, consisted of three parts:

1. Designs to compass the death and destruction of their majesties. 2. To invite the French king to invade this kingdom. 3. The actions and ways whereby the prisoner aided and assisted therein. That as in all treasons there must be overt acts, so here are several instances of that kind: 1. Here are letters and instructions of the prisoner's own handwriting, whereby he does invite and encourage the French to make a descent upon us, in order to levy war, and destroy their majesties; and then he points out the ways and instruments of doing it: 2. By enumerating such of the nobility, clergy and gentry, as he thought would be assisting in that pernicious design: 3. By pointing out and naming the several havens and places where this descent and invasion might be made, viz. at Newcastle, Carlisle and Falmouth, which he undertakes would be soon delivered up to the French king, upon their first appearance. That he frequented the house of one Buckson, where lodged one Mrs. Eliot, and one Mrs. Jones, with others that were chief actors and managers in this conspiracy. The prisoner, who went by the name of col. Phillips, was dogged out of this house by Legatt and Hopkins (two of the messengers) into Lincoln's-inn-fields, and there when they would have seized him, he made his escape into Little Lincoln's inn-fields, where he was seized, and several papers were found about him of his own handwriting: 2. Buckson's house being searched next morning, several other papers were found in Mrs. Jones's chamber: and 3. The messenger finding a rent in the feather-bed, and several feathers dropped about the floor, and tracing the same to the house of office, found thrown therein a bundle of papers, some sealed and some unsealed; all which are found of the same handwriting with those found in the prisoner's pocket; and to this we will call our witnesses. 1. Legatt and Hopkins, the messengers, who gave an account how they had discovered and dogged him for two days to several places, and to a lord's house between two braziers in Pall Mall, and had at last seized him at Mr. Harcourt's door in Lincoln's-inn-fields; how they searched him, and found the papers, both in his pocket in Mally Jones's room, and in the house of office, some of them sealed, and some of them unsealed; how they had delivered them at secretary Trenchard's, to Aaron Smith, after they had marked them.

Crosby asked them, How they could swear they were the same papers as they found about him, since they had delivered them to Aaron Smith, and that they had been out of their sight and custody ever since the 9th of May last; especially since Hopkins swears he took them from me, and delivered them to Legatt before he had signed them. Hopkins owned he had not delivered them to Legatt, till the next morning before he had signed them (as was objected), and Legatt owned he had delivered them to Smith, but that it was where they were all three present at the secretary's office; and the court over-ruled the objection, that the identity of the papers were sufficiently proved by them, in regard they had marked them before they had parted with them, and that Hopkins had kept them over night in his own custody, locked up, though he did not part with them till next morning.

Buckson. That the prisoner frequented his house for two or three months, but never lodged there; that he did not much mind what company came or went, that he saw the faces of some, and heard the names of others, that one Mrs. Eliot and one Mrs. Jones lodged at his house for a year or two, that he conversed little with them; that one going by the name of Mr. James, lodged there likewise for some time; that one Mr. Harecourt and one called Dr. Broomfield, used to come and go likewise; being asked by Mr. Attorney what he remembered of their discourses about the winds, and the prisoner's being to go to sea, and about the prisoner's design of going out of town; and saying he cannot be positive that he heard any such discourse, or by whom, Mr. Attorney asked him, if he could remember what he swore before the secretary; to which Chief Justice replied, that it mattered not to the court or jury what he swore there, unless he gave it also in evidence here viva voce.

Crosby. That it was hard he should be charged with papers found in a house of office, which is in a common place, and stands in a common yard, where many resort who do not live or lodge in the house; where the very messengers own they were the night before; and where one Mr. James (whom they supposed to be sir James Montgomery, against whom they had a warrant and a proclamation), did also lodge, with divers others.

Mrs. Buckson—That she saw the prisoner frequently at her house who went by the name of col. Phillips, and also one lady Phillips, and sir Andrew Foster, and Mr. Harcourt, and that there lodged there one called Mrs. Elliot, and whom the prisoner used to call coz. Mally, that she remembered nothing of their discourses, was seldom in company with any of them, but sometimes saw them go in and go out.

Aaron Smith being called to prove the identity of the papers; Crosby objected against him, as an illegal witness, for that he had been pilloryed, and the record being read, the judgment was found to have been so, upon an information exhibited, by the then attorney general, wherein was laid out; 1. His character, as a homo perniciosus et prave mentis. 2. His crime for putting instructions (or rather a libel) into Colledge the Joiner's hand, at his trial in Oxford,* wherein he deraigned the government and justice of it. 3. His punishment, which was to be pilloryed, and fined 200*l*.

The King's Counsel—That though he was pilloryed by a rule and judgment of this court, yet the case was judged then and since very hard, since those instructions were never made use of; yet that it does not take away his testimony, for it is not the punishment but the offence that makes one infamous.—That there might be some things in those papers which those times could not well bear; but no use was made of them.

Court. Let the judgment be never so erroneous, or the proceeding ever so hard; yet we find it upon record, and that judgment nor record any way quashed.

Crosby does desire he might have counsel to argue it, and named Pemberton, Winnington, and Parot, whom the court allowed him.

Aaron Smith desired that, for the clearing of his credit to the court and jury, he might have leave to acquaint them with some of the circumstances of the proceedings against him; how that the record was altered, though in a criminal matter, after he had pleaded to it; how that it should have been tried by a nisi prius, but that they surprised him with an Oxford jury, and tried him in this court, and that Pemberton the ch. justice had—

Ch. Justice stopped him, and said they were upon another business, and that the unravelling of the proceedings, in his case, was no evidence against the prisoner at the bar.

Winnington, (no other appearing), for the prisoner; that here was a judgment and an execution upon it; and that it did not appear, it had been any way reversed, though the law prescribed methods of doing of it by writ of error, &c. and that though there was a general pardon since, (as the court observed) yet that pardon had no clauses in it that took away the disability which was incurred by the execution of punishments upon the offences therein mentioned; it only pardoned those offences and the punishments due for the same pro futuro, but do not take away the disability already past, and incurred; and where one's credit is once taken away by an offence, and where there is no restitution of it, it remains still lost; and the pardon bars only further proceedings against the offence; here was no writ of error obtained to reverse, and to restore the person as he was before the judgment, and though the offence were taken away by a pardon, yet the credit of the party must be diminished thereby, and no pardon nor oblivion can so far take away the consequences of a crime (though it may pardon the punishment,) as to make a man a new creature; as long as the old lump and the presumption of the old malicious spirit, still remains [He might have said that the House of Lords had refused to grant Smith to reverse his judgment by writ of error.]

Ch. Justice—That he was of another opinion, that a general pardon pardoned all consequences and disability of the persons in all criminal matters, though not in civil; for it could not give away damages for forfeitures, &c. &c.: so in the case of perjury, a pardon frees the offender, and takes away all exceptions against him*: so in all felonies, a pardon sets the felon right; so that it was his opinion, that Smith's testimony was good from the time of the pardon, as much as an alien is a legalis homo from the time of his denization.

Just. Eyres was of the same opinion.

Smith being called to speak to the paper, No. 57; he said Crosby owned it to be his hand-writing, before Secretary Trenchard, and the paper was not since out of his custody, or Mr. Bates's (who was likewise sworn) only he had shewed it to the king's counsel.

Brown (Clericus) notum habuit manum, in king Charles the second's time, at the college of Dublin, where he saw Crosby write 12 or 20 times.

Crosby asked him, how long ago was that? is it 30 years ago? if he knew his Greek characters, or had seen him write any?

Brown said, no.

Crosby—That there was Greek in this paper, and therefore he could not swear it was his hand.

The paper was read, which, as the chief justice said, was all gibrish; for that a letter or a syllable stood for a word: English was writ in Greek characters, and no coherence in the whole paper; being but a sort of memorandums.

Crosby asked Brown, what countryman he was?

Brown. The same with yourself, an Irishman [he might have said his cousin german], and that he was sent over by the lords justices of Ireland, and was not promised any reward for being evidence, (nor any preferment as the prisoner objected to him) by Mr. Steers.

* See Mr. Hargrave's very copious and learned investigation of this subject. Juridical Arguments and Collections, vol. 2, p. 221, as referred to in vol. 7, p. 1052-1090. See also vol. 7, p. 296.

Brown and Shirley (Clerici, though the last not in his habit) called to prove his hand as to the paper, No. 58, 59.—Shirley. That 'tis twelve or thirteen years since he saw him write; but though it was like the hand he writ then, yet he called God to witness, that (as a man that did eat and did not believe might be damned) so he could not but say it was like it; and yet could not say it was his hand: but saw him write often, though long ago, and had his contraction book which he writ at the college of Dublin.

Crosby desired counsel* as to the matter of comparison of hand†, whether that (were it ever so fully proved) was sufficient evidence to convict of high treason.

Attorney, Solicitor, Serj. Gould, Conyers, Cooper, Hawkes†. That here is a paper (No. 57, 58) he owned to be his hand; here is another torn paper found in his pocket, part of which paper is the same with the paper (No. 58) found in the house of office; 'tis probable, ergo, 'tis possible§, nay, 'tis a strong presumption, that the paper (No. 58) is the hand of Crosby; here are two witnesses that swear qd. notam habent manum, and they saw him write frequently; and that 'tis to be observed in what manner the papers were found: 1st, it was in hot pursuit, he was dogged and seized, and the papers taken from his pocket; and at the same time the others thrown into the house of office: 2nd, his hand is owned by himself in one paper, and is proved by two witnesses.

Ch. Justice. (1) There are not two witnesses to his hand; neither do they say they saw him write within twelve or thirteen years; one says it is like it: (2nd) and then 'tis a strange inference, that because a paper in his pocket has a g, the same with that in the house of office, that both must be his hand, which neither is proved; besides that there are many differences in the expression of one and the other paper. (3) It is not proved how these papers came to the house of office; 'tis clear the prisoner did not throw them, for he was then in hold; and though they presume they were thrown about the same time, yet presumption is not evidence in high treason; (4) and though two proved his hand, yet a comparison of hands is no evidence in treason; (5) and though the paper has been read as a paper found in the house of office, and has very odd things in it, yet I can but observe that it mentions many persons of honour and quality, noblemen, clergy, and others, as disaffected to the government, whom we all know to be otherwise; and names sir William Portman, who, to my knowledge, has been dead five years; and so the paper itself comes within the act of indemnity now read to you.

Crosby offered an attested copy of reversal of col. Sidney's attainder*, as the judgment of the parliament, in evidence, that a comparison of hands is not a good sufficient proof for high treason (which was read); and as the proof against him was a comparison of hands, so all convictions, judgments and attainders thereupon were reversed as erroneous.

The Attorney and Solicitor offered, that the case was not the same, for that there was no proof found, but a single comparison; here is a comparison proved by two witnesses, and 'tis owned by himself.

Ch. Justice. The case is the same; for what he owned is not evidence alone; that is not sufficient, and therefore must be supplied by the comparison: that since you have no better proof, I'll direct the jury.—Gentlemen, the prisoner is indicted of high treason, for which, by the statute of Edw. 3rd, there must be two witnesses; here are several papers produced, and some of them have been read to you; and the matter contained in them is of a very odd nature, and shews the prisoner (if he be the author) to be very busy-headed, and wise in his own conceit, but is no treason in itself, and the evidence does not come up to prove it so; for hands may be like one to another; and supposing it be his hand, it is not proved upon him by two witnesses, beyond exception, as the law requires.

1st. Were these papers ever so treasonable, they are addressed to none, though the French king be mentioned in them, and that the indictment supposes them to be contrived for to invite him over. (2) Those papers in Jones's room, the prisoner is not chargeable with, here is no manner of evidence to affect him with them, for (3) it is not so much as proved that he ever lodged there in that room, or at Buckson's house; (4) and for those thrown into, and found in the house of office, there is but presumption likewise, that they are of his hand-writing, though it be to be presumed likewise, that they were thrown there after he was in custody; and so not by him, but by somebody else. You have heard how one Mr. James (supposed to be sir James Montgomery) lodged at Buckson's house, and other men and women; so that if you are not satisfied these papers are of the prisoner's hand-writing, you must acquit him.

The Jury withdrew a quarter of an hour, and brought him in Not Guilty: and the Chief Justice dismissed him with a civil admonition that he should take care not to meddle with such matters for the future; and though on his papers he arraigned the justice of the kingdom and the proceedings at the trial of others; yet he had no reason to say but that he had had as fair a one as any Englishman could wish.

382. Proceedings between the KING and THOMAS KENDALL and RICHARD ROE, in the King's-Bench, on an Habeas Corpus upon a Commitment for High Treason: 7 WILLIAM III. A. D. 1695.

[Of the Conspiracy for the Assassination of king William and for the Invasion of England, out of which arose the Proceedings against Kendall and Roe, and the Trials which immediately follow them, "A True and Impartial History"* was published by the well known sir Richard Blackmore† in 1723, shortly after the discovery of Atterbury's Plot.

To this History, Blackmore prefixed a copious Preface, in which he gives the following account of his work:‡

"History is to men of contemplation, of the same use, as books of precedents are to men of business, especially legislators, judges and advocates: whenever any things happen extraordinary they have recourse to the like events, that have occurred in former ages, and by duly considering and comparing times and circumstances, they are enabled to make a more solid judgment concerning them. This has induced me to publish at this time,

* "This I have never seen, but suppose it at least compiled with integrity." Johnson.

† He was physician to king William, who knighted him.

‡ The stile of Blackmore certainly is not unexceptionable. Johnson has noticed the commercial hue with which it was dyed by his residence among trades-people. He expresses himself in "language," says Johnson, "such as Cheapside easily furnished: he had lived in the city till he had learned its note."

In the Preface to his History of the Conspiracy, his language is tinged by his medical profession. "It is certain," he informs his readers, "that the late men in power left the public affairs to the present ministers encumbered with many heavy burdens, and involved in almost inextricable difficulties; and to heal all the breaches, and cure all the grievous distempers of the nation, when the administration was committed to their care, without any complaints and dissatisfactions of the people, was a task unequal to the most consummate wisdom, and the greatest capacity and application. Is it a just objection against them, that they were not state-surgeons, skilful enough to attempt, carry on, and complete the cure of a nation deeply wounded by other hands, without giving some pain by their remedies and operations?"

the following Narrative to the world, after it has lain by me many years neglected, and almost forgotten.

"The occasion of writing it was, that soon after the Plot against king William's life was detected and disappointed, his majesty having thought fit that a true and impartial account of it should be made public, and having left it to the lord keeper Sommers, and the duke of Shrewsbury, to appoint the person that should draw it up, I was sent for by the lord keeper, and was by that great man engaged in this undertaking. The better to enable me to go through with it, I was admitted to several conferences with the noble lords above-named, and with the earl of Portland, who having the first notices of the conspiracy, was acquainted with the steps taken in it, before it was made known to the other two: and I was also furnished from the secretary of state's office, with authentic copies of the several depositions and other papers, that I have thrown together and printed at the end of this Narrative, as vouchers of the facts recited in it, referring the reader to them for his further satisfaction, that the thread of the discourse might not be interrupted.

"This short History having been perused and amended by the Lord Keeper, and the duke of Shrewsbury, and having undergone a second correction by his grace, was in a few weeks completed and ready for the press. But upon what views and reasons of state I cannot pretend to determine, the duke thought fit to delay the publication of it so long, that the negotiations for a treaty of peace with France intervening, it was then judged improper to let it go abroad.

"But I am now prevailed upon to make this narrative public, not only because it is in itself a curious piece of history, at least, as to a great part of it, and backed with the authority of sufficient vouchers: but because it is of weight and importance to all, who wish well to the liberties of Great Britain, and the reformed religion; and may be of great use to many discontented men at this time, to make them beware of diminishing the honour of the king, and speaking reproachfully of his person, or his administration; lest they encourage Popish bigots, and Protestant Jacobites, to attempt the subversion of the present government, the overthrow of our constitution, and even the life of his majesty, by the same steps and motives that encouraged some of the conspirators to solicit and assist a foreign invasion, and others to assassinate king William of glorious memory, that by these execrable means they might re-establish a Popish prince upon the throne."

And he thus concludes the Preface

"What particulars in this Narrative of inferior moment are not confined to the vouchers annexed, I received from the ministers of king William whom I have above-named."

His History is also accompanied with the original Informations and Depositions respecting the Conspiracy, which being authentic documents, illustrative of the proceedings against such of the Conspirators as were brought to trial, and of the designs and conduct of them and their associates, are here inserted.]

INFORMATIONS AND DEPOSITIONS, TOUCHING THE CONSPIRACY AGAINST THE PERSON AND GOVERNMENT OF KING WIL- LIAM THE THIRD.

PAPER THE FIRST.

DEPOSITION OF RICHARD FISHER.

Captain Richard Fisher of Dartmouth street, Westminster, maketh oath, that he met with sir George Barclay or Bartlet about the third of this instant February, at the Cock in Bow street, where was also present a monk called Johnson, alias Harrison, who told him, the said Richard Fisher, in case he knew the said sir George Bartlet, not to take any notice of him; whereupon he the said Johnson, alias Harrison said to sir George Barclay, This is the gentleman I was to bring to you, you may trust him, and speak freely to him: Upon which the said sir George Barclay asked this deponent, whether he would be engaged to be one of those that should seize the prince of Orange: This deponent answered him, that he would. Then replied sir George Barclay to him, let us see which way you will propose. This deponent said, when he was a hunting. Sir George Barclay answered, that is very well, but added, What if it should be done as he comes to chapel to St. James's? The deponent answered, I think it would do very well. Sir George answered, what strength would do? The deponent replied, thirty or two and thirty, I think would be enough, because the usual guards were but five and twenty, and those not half loaded. Upon which sir George Barclay replied, then we will have about six footmen, who should be in the little house at Hyde Park Gate, and come out ready to shut the gate to make a stop, and then we will fall upon the guards with sword in hand. And therefore let us be ready and meet very often, in order to the carrying on this matter. Hereupon, after several other meetings between the deponent, the said sir George Barclay, and the said Johnson, alias Harrison, and one other person, whom this deponent knoweth not, it was at last concluded, on or about the thirteenth instant of February, to execute the said design of seizing the prince of Orange; and in case of opposition from the guards, to kill him; and in order to this, spies were sent to Kensington, who waited there all night; but the prince of Orange not going abroad as he used to do, on the day following being the fifteenth instant, the design aforesaid was put off for some days. And on the Monday following, they met again at the sign of the Cock in Bow street to discourse of the said design; but that meeting soon ended, and they appointed to meet next day at the sign of the King's Head in Holborn, where the deponent only meeting the said Johnson, alias Harrison, they two went to the sign of the Old Griffin not far off, to which place the said Johnson, alias Harrison, brought the said sir George Barclay, who coming in, said, captain Fisher, what must we do now? The deponent answering, what you will: Then sir George Barclay said, what do you think of seizing the prince of Orange between Brentford and Turnham Green, as he shall come next from hunting in the evening; or perhaps we may have an opportunity of seizing him at Mr. Lattin's house in Richmond, when he would be very weakly guarded, for we resolve to fall on with sword in hand, and for that purpose strong pushing swords will be better than cutting swords; and if we fail these ways, we resolve to do it on Sunday next, as he the said prince of Orange shall be coming to St. James's, by shooting one of the leading horses, so as to stop the coach in Hyde Park Gate; whereupon the said Johnson, alias Harrison, said, and shoot also one of the wheel horses, and then they are both stopt; and then the said sir George Barclay, alias Bartlet, said, this would be no rebellion or assassination, for he was no king. This deponent further saith, that the said sir George Barclay, alias Bartlet, sent him on Sunday the 9th instant to view the Tower, and see how strong the guards were there, in order to seize the Tower for the late king James; which this deponent did, and afterwards having made a report to him and the said Johnson, alias Harrison, it was thought convenient to desist from that enterprize, and to pursue the former design, which said design of seizing the person of the prince of Orange, was to be followed with a general insurrection in England and Scotland, and by an invasion from France, the ships being ready, and the men to embark with the late king James at the head of them, as the said sir George Barclay, alias Bartlet, and the said Johnson, alias Harrison, informed this deponent: And the said Johnson, alias Harrison, told him, this deponent, that king James had sent orders for executing the design aforesaid, and that the said sir George Barclay, alias Bartlet, had brought over the said orders from king James, with him, he being then lately come from France: And this deponent further saith, that he has been credibly informed, that one major Lowick, alias Jackson, George Porter, captain Chernock,* captain Stow, captain Walbank, captain James Courtney, Thomas Bartrom and Sherburn, and several others, whom this deponent knoweth not, to the number of forty or more, were engaged in the said design of seizing and assassinating his majesty, whom they called the prince of Orange, in the manner aforesaid, together with the said sir George Barclay, alias Bartlet, and the said Johnson alias Harrison, whom this deponent knoweth to be guilty of this conspiracy in the manner before declared. And this deponent further saith, that in case his majesty had gone out a hunting either on Saturday the 15th instant, or on Saturday last, the 22d instant, the said design of seizing and assassinating his royal person, had been attempted, and, as he believes, put in execution. And this deponent further saith, that in order to the carrying on of the said design, he was to provide five horses and arms to be in readiness for himself and four others, whereof Henry Fitz Patrick was to be one; and then to meet the said sir George Barclay, alias Bartlet, major Lowick, and two others, whose names this deponent knoweth not. The deponent further says, That the first horsemen, who should be ready to execute this design, were to be lodged at the King of Bohemia near Turnham Green, and the rest as they came, to be in other inns thereabouts, the greatest number in one inn not to be above seven or eight; and there to be ready till the king should be returning in the evening. The deponent says, that in the beginning of the said consultations on or about the fifth instant it was discoursed between him this deponent, the said sir George Barclay, alias Bartlet, and the said Johnson, alias Harrison, about seizing on the king in Kensington House, in the night to have secured the garden with about forty men, by ladders to be provided for that purpose; and in case they could not find the king, to have set the said

Kensington house on fire, and at the same time to have seized on the field pieces, and the guards about Whitehall. This deponent further says, he met with major Lowick about the 7th or 8th instant at the Cock in Bow street, where he the said major Lowick said he would do his best to carry on the said design, and would be ready on all occasions, but that he would speak with but one person at a time, by reason of the late act of parliament, which makes one witness of no effect.

25th February 1695-6. RICHARD FISHER.

Dictus Richardus Fisher, jurat coram me, GULIELMO TRUMBULL.

The INFORMATION of captain GEORGE PORTER, taken before a Committee of the Lords of the Council, on Saturday the 14th of March, 1695.

PAPER THE SECOND.

(Copy.) This informant saith, That about the latter end of May, or beginning of June last, there was a meeting at the Old King's-head tavern in beyond the Royal Exchange, where were present, the e— of A—, the lord M—, sir John Friend, sir William Perkins, sir John Fenwick, Mr. Chernock, Mr. Cooke, and this informant.

The above mentioned persons dined there, and Mr. Goodman came into their company after dinner.

Several things were talked of before dinner concerning the best ways of bringing back king James; and after dinner, several proposals having been made, it was agreed on by the whole company, to send captain Chernock to king James, which he accepted of; and he was to desire king James in all their names that he would borrow 10,000 men of the king of France, viz. 8,000 foot, 1,000 horse, and 1,000 dragoons; and it was said in the company, that if the king of France meant well to king James, he could not refuse him so small a number of men: That there were very few forces then left in England, and there were a great many people dissatisfied, and therefore they could not choose a fitter time. Chernock said, he did not care to go upon a foolish message, and desired to know what he might assure king James of from them: Whereupon the above-mentioned persons answered, they could make at least 2,000 horse among them; and they all rose up and desired Chernock to assure king James, that upon notice from him where he intended to land, they would be sure to meet him with that number of horse.

About a week after, all the above-mentioned persons (except the lord M—) met at Mrs. Mountjoy's, a tavern, next door, or very near sir John Fenwick's house. Mr. Chernock had desired that meeting to be satisfied before he went, whether they kept to the former resolution of meeting king James with 2,000 horse; and they all agreed to it, and desired to beg of the king to make what haste he could.

Chernock told this informant, he would go away for France in two or three days after this meeting.

This informant did not see Chernock again, till he was committed for the riot; and about four or five days after his commitment, Chernock came to see him, and told this informant, he had been in France and had seen the king, and that the king's answer to their proposal was, That he took it very kindly, but could not do any thing that year; and Chernock told this informant, that he had brought several from the king to my lord A——, sir John Fenwick, and several other persons of quality that he did not name.

GEORGE PORTER.

Jurat, 14 March, 1695.

Coram me JA. VERNON.

INFORMATION of Captain GEORGE PORTER, given upon oath before a Committee of the Lords of Council at Whitehall, the 3d of March, 1696.

PAPER THE THIRD.

(Copy.) This informant saith, That he knows sir George Barclay; that the first time he saw him since his last coming into England, was about a month ago at this informant's lodgings, at Mrs. Conant's house in Norfolk-street, and that Chernock, who lodged in the same house, brought him to him; and sir George Barclay told this informant, that he came from France about three or four months before.

That this informant has heard sir George Barclay say, that he came over to put in execution a design upon the king's person.

That Chernock told this informant, that the said sir George Barclay had 800*l.* given him by Mr. Caryll, secretary to king James, for providing men and horses for an attempt upon the king's person; and this informant has heard sir George Barclay complain of the smallness of the sum for such a design.

That sir George Barclay told this informant, he intended to buy forty horses; but finding they had provided some, he would buy but twenty.

That Chernock told this informant, that sir George Barclay had a commission from king James for an attempt upon the king's person, and that sir William Perkins had read it, and that the commission was all of king James's hand-writing, that it run for raising and levying war upon the person of the king.

Sir William Perkins owned to this informant, that he had seen the commission, and sir George Barclay told this informant, that he had such a commission.

This informant saith, further, That besides the twenty horses provided by sir George Barclay for this design as is above mentioned, Chernock undertook to provide eight horses, sir William Perkins five.

This informant undertook for seven, and major Loick was to find three horses for himself and two persons more, whereof Bertram was one, as he heard Chernock say.

That three of sir William Perkins's horses were to be mounted by Chambers, Lee, and another person, who was a servant of the said sir William, but this informant doth not know his name; and sir William Perkins's other two horses were to be mounted by two persons, that this informant was to provide.

This informant heard sir George Barclay say, that about twenty or twenty two persons were come from France, who had been officers and were to be concerned in this design; and that some of them came over before him, some with him, and the rest after him.

This informant saith further, That several consultations had been held as to the manner of attacking and assassinating the king.

That these consultations were held, some at this informant's lodgings in Norfolk-street, others at the Globe tavern in Hatton-garden, at the Sun-tavern in the Strand, and at the Nag's-head in James-street Covent Garden.

That at the consultation at this informant's lodgings, were present sir George Barclay, Homes, Chernock, and this informant.

That at the consultations, besides the persons above mentioned, were present sir William Perkins, Rookwood, King and Knightly, and that these several consultations had been held within these three weeks, or a month, or thereabouts.

This informant saith further, That there had been two ways proposed for assassinating the king; the one by an ambuscade of foot, to be laid in a wood not far from Mr. Lattin's lodge, near Richmond.

The other way was by a number of men on horseback, who should attack the guards and the coaches, as the king came from Richmond some Saturday, and it, was resolved to wait for him upon Turnham-green; this latter way was best approved of and agreed to.

Some days before Saturday the 15th of February last, this informant, King and Knightly, went to view the ground at Turnham-Green, and about Richmond, and gave an account thereof the same night to sir George Barclay, and others at the Nag's-head: a day or two after that Durant went to Turnham-Green and Brentford, and took a list of the inns and stables upon and near to Turnham-green, and that this informant was to be with the rest of the men at Brentford; that Rookwood was to be with sir George Barclay, and Chernock was to be with this informant.

This informant says, That sir George Barclay told him, that there were two orderly men appointed to wait at Kensington, to give notice when the king went a hunting.

That Chambers was one of them, as he told this informant, and to that end he took a lodging near the guards at Kensington, and he was to give notice when the king went out.

The other person was Durant, a Walloon, who was to give notice when the guards went.

This informant saith further, That the persons employed in this design were to be divided into three parties. It was intended that two of them should attack the guards with their swords only, and the third party at the same time were to set upon the coach, where the king should be.

Rookwood was to command one of the parties to attack the guards and this informant the other.

That sir George Barclay was to be at the head of eight or ten men, who should set upon the coach where the king was; and it was said and agreed among them, that they would cut off the king and all that were with him in the coach.

That this informant hath a musketoon, which carries above six bullets, and he told Pendergrass, who was to be of sir George Barclay's party, that he should have it with him.

Sir George Barclay told this informant, that when the king should be at Richmond, he had ordered a man to wait at Kew-Ferry, who should give notice when the guards came back thither, to stay for the king, to the end that every body might get ready.

It was agreed among them, that when notice should be brought them of the king's going to Richmond, that all concerned should then slip out of town by three or four in a company, and set up their horses in the inns marked out at Turnham-green and Brentford, until they had notice of his coming back.

This informant remembers that it was an expression used, but he cannot recollect by whom, that assaulting the king in this manner was no more than attacking him in his winter quarters, or than killing him as he was passing from one town to another in Flanders.

This informant further saith, That Knightly, King, Homes, and Durant, were to be of sir George Barclay's party.

Chernock told this informant, that Counter, who was lately come from France, was to be another of sir George Barclay's party; and also Bertram, whom Chernock told this informant he hoped to have, but Lowick had carried him to sir George Barclay.

Chernock further told this informant, he had sent for Thomas and Bevill Higgons out of the country, and had proposed the business to them, but they refused to be concerned in an attempt upon the king's person.

This informant saith further, That Cranburn, Keyes, Pendergrass, and Kendrick, knew of the intended assassination, and that he told them of it, and they promised to go along with him.

This informant saith further, that the day before he went to view the ground at Turnham-Green and Richmond, he dined at the Nag's-head in James-street, with sir George Barclay, sir William Perkins, sir John Friend, Ferguson, and Homes; that Chernock either dined there or came in after dinner; that Harrison, alias Johnson, a priest, came to them after dinner; that they discoursed there privately one among another, of the design upon the king's person, and enquired what men and horses each could provide, and it was talked publicly among them all of the preparations that were making in France all along the sea coast: those who talked about the design in private, were sir George Barclay, sir William Perkins, Chernock, and this informant. Sir John Friend observing their whispers said, he desired to be fairly dealt with, that he was as ready to serve the king as any man, and that he fancied something was behind the curtain that was concealed from him.

It was then sir George Barclay whispered to this informant, that the duke of Berwick had been here, and said he would not have told him of it, but that he was gone over again.

This informant saith further, that on Friday the 14th instant, this informant, to the best of his remembrance, dined at the Blue Posts in Spring-Garden, but he positively says, he sent for Kendrick to come to him where he dined; and this informant told Kendrick to be in a readiness to go out with him next day, and he would provide him a horse, and bid him bring Sherburne with him: that accordingly Kendrick brought Sherburne the next morning, and this informant then told Kendrick of the design to assassinate the king, and Kendrick agreed to go with him: but word being brought that the king did not go out that day, this informant bid Kendrick be in a readiness against the Saturday following; and he promised he would.

This informant saith further, that Keyes hath lived with him a year and a half; that this informant acquainted him with the design of assassinating the king, and employed to hire horses for that purpose: that the said Keyes had hired him two horses for Saturday the 15th of February, when the execution was to be done; and had likewise enquired for horses for Saturday the 22d of February: that the said Keyes was to have been mounted by this informant, and to have gone out with him, and to have the same arms the others had, viz. a sword and pistols.

This informant saith further, he sent for Pendergrass out of Hampshire some days before the 15th of February, and acquainted him with the assassination of the king, and he agreed to be one concerned.

This informant saith further, That he sent for Plowden out of Hampshire, who came up some days before the 15th of February; that this informant acquainted the said Plowden with this design against the king, and he agreed to go with him on Saturday the 15th of February. Plowden brought up a horse of his own, and this informant lent him a saddle, and pistols. The said Plowden came to this informant, to the Blue Posts in Spring Garden on Saturday the 15th of February, in order to go out with him that day; but the business being disappointed by the king's not going a-hunting, Plowden told this informant, he would go out of town, and be back again the Thursday or Friday following; but he did not come as he had promised.

On Friday the 21st of February last, this informant was at the Sun Tavern in the Strand with sir George Barclay, sir William Perkins, and Chernock, and they had a great deal of discourse about the disappointment of the Saturday before; some were afraid the design had been discovered, others said, if it were so, they should not be together as they were; and it was again resolved among them, that if the king went a-hunting the next day, he should be assassinated; and it was agreed it should be done in the same manner as had before been resolved on. Sir George Barclay told this informant, that notice would be brought to him, if the king went out, and this informant should be acquainted with it.

While this informant was at the said tavern, Kendrick, Keys, and Cranburne came to him thither, and this informant was with them in another room. This informant then acquainted them, that the design of assassinating the king would be put in execution the next day, if he went a-hunting. Kendrick came thither with his arm tied up, and said, he had got a fall into a cellar, or some building, which had disabled him; and he was sorry he could not go with him. This informant asking Kendrick for Sherburne, he said, he asked so many questions that he did not like him, and so he let him alone. Sir William Perkins sent word to this informant, on Saturday the 22d of February, in the morning, that if he wanted three horses, Mr. Lewis, gentleman of the horse to my lord Feversham, would help him to them, and that there were three lusty geldings in Somerset-house-yard, and one of them had all furniture ready.

The said informant saith further, That sir William Perkins formerly told him, that the said Lewis had provided him 30 or 40 saddles, which he did under colour of buying them for the marquis of Miermont, as sir William Perkins believed.

While this informant was at the Blue Posts in Spring Garden on Saturday the 22d, La Rue and Brierly brought him each of them a man, that were to go along with him that day; and notice being brought again, that the king did not go out, the said persons said, they hoped they should go some other time. Keyes bringing this informant word, that the guards were come back all in a foam, he concluded the business was discovered, and went out of town within half an hour after, and then went and concealed himself at a house he had been told of by Carter and Davis, two persons he had known in Newgate, who were committed for counterfeiting the Bank-notes.

This informant saith further, That sir William Perkins hath a commission from king James for a regiment of horse, as sir Wm. Perkins told him. Sir Wm. Perkins and Chernock told this informant, that sir John Friend had a commission from king James for a regiment of horse, and that Blaire, who is his lieutenant-colonel, had procured it for him; and this informant has heard sir John Friend own he had a commission, and would be in a readiness.

This informant saith, that Chernock is colonel Parker's chief correspondent, and that he told him 300*l*. was paid for Parker's escape, but he doth not know to whom.

Chernock told this informant, that sir John Friend had paid 100*l*. towards Parker's escape; and this informant says, that sir John Friend owned the same to him when they dined together at the Nag's-head, as also, that king James had sent him back the money by a messenger, but he durst not ask him for it, therefore he had only received 20*l*. of it.

Chernock further told this informant, that Mr. Tempest of Durham had a commission from king James for a regiment of dragoons, and that he had every thing in a readiness.

This informant saith further, that he was to have the first troop in the king's regiment of horse, whereof Parker is colonel, and that Parker brought him over the commission, as also commissions for his lieutenant and cornet, and that he had told Mr. William Howard he should be his lieutenant, and Mr. Luke Norton, that he should be his cornet, and that he had commissions for them, but never delivered them out.

This informant saith further, that Goodman had a commission from king James for a troop in Parker's regiment, and that he was provided with arms and saddles, and that this informant gave Goodman the commission sealed up.

This informant saith further, that he and Goodman had had discourses two years ago, about a design to seize, or carry off the king, and that they had acquainted sir George Barclay with it, who was then going for France, that he might propose it to king James.

This informant saith further, that on Saturday the 15th of February, Durant came to him all in dirt, having rid from Kensington to acquaint him the guards were gone out; and on the 22d of February, this informant sent a list of the men he had ready to Chernock, by Cranburne, who brought him back the same list, with the names of Chernock's men inserted, which this informant afterwards tore, when he found the business was disappointed.

This informant saith further, that sir George Barclay proposed to them, that when the assassination should be over, they should keep together till they came to Hammersmith, and then disperse, and get into the town by several ways, in small companies, and they should not need to lie long concealed, there being a sudden invasion expected.

SOME DEPOSITIONS of FRANCIS DE LA RUE, against several of the Conspirators, who intended to murder his Majesty.

PAPER THE FOURTH.

(Copy.)—In the year 1694-5, in the months of January, February, March, and to within very few days of the king's going to Flanders, there were several meetings between sir William Perkins, Porter, Chernock, Goodman, and Stow, to contrive how to carry the king's person alive to king James in France, which Porter told the deponent, that they had offered that king to do, if he would send them a commission for it, which was expected a long time; and that their design was, if they could not carry him away alive, to kill him, and pretend it was done by a random shot, in firing at the guards; but the commission not coming, Porter told this deponent, they would do it without, being provided with horses and men; but they could not get a vessel ready time enough before the king departed for Flanders, to carry them off after the execution of their barbarous design; which put an end to their project that year. Most of this design was imparted to the deponent, by Porter; he was also in the company of Chernock, sir William Perkins, Porter, and Stow, three or four times, when it was talked on, though Chernock often told him, that he believed the design would come to nothing.

This deponent further declares another wicked design against his majesty's sacred person, which was to have been put in execution on Saturday evening, being the 15th of February, 1695, at the king's return from hunting, by 45 or 46 persons, most of them having been officers under king James; but they were prevented that day by some impediments and oppositions in their cabals, &c. besides, the king did not go a hunting that day, and therefore it was deferred till next Saturday, being the 22d of February. The chief of these conspirators, as the deponent was informed by captain Porter, and lieutenant King, were, sir George Barclay, Chernock, and Porter, which procured their several numbers. Sir George Barclay was the commander in chief, having brought over from France a commission from king James, which, as they told this deponent, was to attack the prince of Orange his person, in winter quarters, which commission was interpreted by a council of war, held at St. Germans, to take off the king by what means they could; to which end he came into England with a brigadier of king James's guard, named Rookwood, and a sub-brigadier, with 16 chosen men out of the two troops, and was recommended to Porter and Chernock, as fit persons to consult and advise with, having laid a scheme, and contrived the matter last year, and who was also to assist sir George with their friends to make up a party strong enough: and they went to view the roads several times, and to pitch upon the fittest place to attack the king's person and guards: as also Durance, King, and Knightly went several times towards Brentford, Richmond, and Turnham Green, to the same purpose, as King and Porter told this deponent, and he was asked to go with them several times, but he neglected it, where they would have shewed him the several ways and places they proposed for the execution of this wicked design, viz. by an ambuscade near the king's house at Richmond, with a party of horse at a distance to come up and attack the guards upon notice from the ambuscader's fire, or all to attack his majesty by day all on horseback, &c. But at last it was agreed to do it at Porter's old place, as he told the deponent, which was at the end of the lane in the night, coming into Turnham Green, which was to be done, viz. sir George, with eight (of which number was Pendergrass) was to attack the king's coach, and assassinate every body that was within it, and in the other coach, and the officer of guards with the two troopers on the van-guard, whilst in the rear Rookwood with his party of one side of the lane, and Porter and Chernock with their party that they procured here, of the other side of the lane, was to attack the body of guards. This deponent does further testify, that Porter sent to him on the Friday night, being the 21st of February, to meet him and others to consult and prepare every thing, in order for marching to the places where they were to quarter in Brentford, and about Turnham Green. The next day they having billeted every man's quarters, and that Porter had engaged the deponent about the middle of the week, to lie with him that night in some private place; but the deponent had business, and was from home on Friday night, but was sent for the next morning at 8 o'clock, by Porter, to desire him to come to his lodgings; where he the deponent went, and Porter told him all parties were ready to march in the afternoon, if the king went abroad, which they should know soon from their orderly men at Kensington, for that sir George had Durance for his orderly man there, and he and Chernock had Chambers for their orderly man, who had been there all the week. Soon after came into Porter's lodgings others of the party, as Cranburn, Pendergrass, Keys, and King, the latter of which just came from sir George with a message to Porter, and then Porter took a piece of paper, and wrote a list of his men, which was sent by Cranburn (who he called his quarter master) to Mr. Chernock, to send to order so many horses and arms to be ready for them; and when Cranburn came back, he told Porter, that Chambers, the orderly man, had sent word to Chernock, that the king was to go out a hunting between 10 and 11 o'clock, which Porter told us all, with a great deal of joy. Then Porter told the deponent, that Pendergrass was to be of the party of the eight that attacked the king's coach, and said aloud to Pendergrass, that he had a special piece for him that would carry eight balls; and King said, he hoped he would not fear breaking the windows; no, I'll have a finger in him, said Pendergrass. This deponent further declares, That Cranbourn brought the list back to porter and at the foot of Porter's list he saw the list of Chernock's men, both which made about 18; and this deponent told Porter, he thought he had more; to which he answered, that they had been disappointed of five or six; but that they should make up 40 with sir George his party, which King said was enough of all conscience to do the business. But Porter asked this deponent, if he could not supply him with some trusty men; to which he answered it was too late, there was not time to get any; but because he should not mistrust his inclinations for the affair in hand, this deponent went out, and brought him one to the place where they dined, which was at the Blue Posts in Spring Garden, where about 11 or 12 o'clock they had notice that their orderly man Chambers was come back, and that the king did not go: And Keys, Porter's trumpet, came up soon after, and told the company that the party of guards was returned, and passed by foaming, and the king's coaches were returned, and that the people wondered that the king had missed going a hunting for two Saturdays together; which put a consternation in Porter and the rest of the company, who said there must be some treachery in it; therefore Porter resolved to go to Epsom or thereabouts, and asked the deponent if he would go with him; but he told him he had a suit in the commons, which was to be heard on Tuesday, therefore he took Pendergrass and his trumpet, to come up again the next day to give Chernock an account where to send to him in case there should be an occasion. The deponent further declares, that several disloyal and treasonable healths were drunk, as confusion to the king, &c. But one more particular was drunk, since they were frustrated of their design that day; Porter squeezed half an orange in this deponent's hand, and drank a bumper to the squeezing of the Rotten Orange, which went round. This deponent further deposes, that Porter tore the list of his names of his party and Chernock's, before he went out of town, and said they should find no names about him, and that he had got a great horseman's sword and a buff coat in a room ready to put on, when the orders arrived to mount; but when he went towards Epsom, his black carried them home. This deponent further declares that Porter told him, that there was about five regiments of horse and dragoons about England, and that sir William Perkins had acquainted him within this fortnight, that he had a commission for a regiment of horse which he was raising, and that he had bought thirty horses already, and that he was to assist the party that was to assassinate the king with some of his horses. This deponent asked Porter, if the three brothers Higgins's was of the party? he said no, but Tom Higgins liked the thing very well, till his brother Bevil dissuaded him from it, declaring it was an assassination; therefore neither of them would be concerned in it: but George, the elder, promised to buy two horses, and the others one a-piece. This deponent also asked Porter, whether Goodman was concerned in this business of murdering the king? because he was in the last year's design: he answered him, no, because he would not be contented without being made acquainted with the whole scheme and design thereof, therefore they did not communicate it to him, not thinking him easy to comply with their method, but would be troublesome in opposing their project, to make them comply with his manner. This deponent also declares, that Porter told him, that king James was at the head of a good party of men upon the coast in France, ready to embark for England, and that the duke of Berwick had been here, but was gone back again. King also told this deponent, that the duke of Berwick was here, and he does believe he had the news from sir George Barclay; and when this deponent talked with Chernock about the 18th or 19th of this month, he asked him, how went on the affair in hand? But he found him very close, and answered, that he believed they had left off the thoughts of it, for some that were very sanguine and hot, were changed and grown very cold, but he found by Porter the same day, that they were as resolute as ever; but Chernock told this deponent, that the great affair, (meaning that of king James's making a descent in England) he might rely on would be very soon: he also remembers that Chernock told him that the other business, meaning that of murdering the king, he was apprehensive had taken air, and that the king was acquainted with it; his majesty not having been abroad a good while, and that an affair of such consequence had been communicated to too many, and that they had delayed the execution of it too long, both which was dangerous, and therefore he seemed to be off the design; which is all at present that occurs to the deponent's memory, save that the list which George Porter wrote of his men, which was sent by Cranburn to Chernock, and the list which Chernock wrote at the foot of the said Porter's list, which was mentioned before by this deponent, he, the deponent, took into his hand, and read the names, and several of the said persons in the said list, are as follows: Porter, Pendergrass, Brierly, Tucker, Keyes, Vicar, Toby, De la Rue, this dep., Lee, Bertrun, Salisbury, Chambers, Chernock, Douglas, the late lord Dundee's* chaplain. and says, that the said Porter told this deponent, on Saturday, the 22nd instant February, that he was disappointed of some of his men, for that one of them had broke his arm, and so his comrade would not come without him, and that two men that were recommended by major Lowick, and one of them, which he believes to be Bertrum, had told his wife, that Lowick was to mount him with horse and arms for the king's service, (meaning king James,) and that his wife followed him, crying and roaring to the coffee-house; whereupon one at the coffee-house went to a justice of peace and made affidavit of it, upon which warrants were granted, and so we are disappointed of four or five, or words to that effect.

LA RUE's Paper, March 17, 1695.

PAPER THE FIFTH.

In the year 1693, in the month of June or July, col. Parker, captain Porter and myself went in the dusk of the evening to Mr. Goodman's house, where we supped, and Chernock was in the company: after supper they consulted how to make an insurrection with the troops they had ready; which was to be by joining their several little parties of horse, that were in readiness at several places in the country, and then to march to their general place of rendezvous, to join their Northern friends: and in order to do this, they that had their parties in London, as I understood Porter and Goodman had, Parker advised that they should take a house or two a little way out of town, about Barnet, where there should be stabling or a barn large enough to hold fifty or sixty horses, where some of their parties in London were to repair to quarter at, the night before they were to march forward to join the other parties above-mentioned; and Parker told me, he would form me a troop of what supernumerary men he should find, that were above the complement of any of the troops that they were to join, and Parker desired Porter and Chernock to forward the Higgens's; for I understood by them, that George Higgens, the elder brother, was to raise a troop himself, or with his brothers assistance, and they were to be his subaltern officers; and Porter was to raise a troop, and Goodman another, and Mr. Porter did take a house near Barnet, which is called the Blue-house; but I was at no more of their consultations concerning that affair, being obliged soon afterwards by my recognizance to appear at the assizes in Essex, in the month of July; where I was convicted of coming from France without leave, though I came to England with the lord Duresley's pass, his majesty's public minister at the Hague: notwithstanding which I suffered a whole year's imprisonment in Chelmsford gaol; and before the year was expired, colonel Parker was taken up, and sent to the Tower, from whence he escaped; therefore I have not seen him since July, 1693, nor been in any of their consultations about any insurrection; all which is truth to the best of my knowledge. In witness whereof, I subscribe my name this day, being the 17th of March, 1695-6.

FRANCIS DE LA RUE.

EXAMINATION of BERTRAM, the 3rd and 5th of March, 1695-6.

PAPER THE SIXTH.

Thomas Bertram being examined before a Committee of Lords on the 3d of Mar. 1695-6, saith, That about the 8th or 9th of February last, Charnock invited this examinant to drink a glass of wine with him at his lodging, at Mrs. Conant's house in Norfolk-street; and when he came thither, Chernock took this examinant with him into his closet; and being there alone, Chernock asked this examinant if he would undertake a business that would answer his expectation. This examinant enquiring what it was, Chernock told him, it was to go out with some company he knew, to see if they could kill the king, or words to that effect.

This examinant saith, That he neither consented to the proposal, nor did he refuse it; but Chernock told him to be in the way, or if he went out, that he would leave word when he might be found.

They went then into another room, where was a good deal of company drinking wine; he remembers sir William Perkins and Chambers were there, and there were three other persons he did not know, and one Trevors he saw there, but he believes he knew nothing of the business.

This informant observed, That Chernock was often called out, and that many came to him, whom he discoursed with in private.

This informant met Chernock on Saturday the 22d of February at Lincoln's-inn-back-gate, at that time he was alarmed with warrants being out against this informant and some others; Chernock told this informant to come to him, within half an hour, for they had as good do the business for something, as to be chased about for nothing; and this informant understood by his discourse, he meant killing the king.

This informant saith further, That he was with major Loick on the 4th or 5th of February, and Loick asked him if he would go with him upon a business, without asking any questions, and this informant told him, he would.

This informant saith further, That he went to Loick's chamber on Friday the 14th of February, and Loick told him he must be ready against the next morning, and provide himself with boots and other necessaries, and gave him a guinea, and bid him meet him at the Purl-House in Hart-street, by six o'clock the next morning; and Loick told this informant, he believed they should attack the king, and that a horse should be provided for this informant.

This informant says, he did not meet Loick according to his appointment, it not being his intention to be concerned in the business; that he met Loick on Sunday the 16th of February, who checked him for his not coming to him the day before, and said, so it would have been if the king had been in the field; he thought he meant king James; this informant excused himself, upon his being watched by his wife that he could not stir out; and this informant had been told by Spencely a coffee-woman, that there were warrants against himself and some others.

This informant saith, he did ask Grymes whether he had a mind to a country journey, in company with 30 or 40 more; and that Grymes answered, he would go as far as this informant, and that he believed it was on account of the little man; but this informant told him he must ask no questions.

This informant says he knows Leigh.

This informant says he knows Durand, and that he was a very busy stirring man.

This informant says he knows Blaire, that he told him he was to be lieutenant-colonel to sir John Friend's regiment of horse, and that this informant should be lieutenant to his troop; he has told him so any time these two years; the last time Blair spoke to him about it, was six weeks ago.

A further INFORMATION of BERTRAM, on the 5th of March, 1695-6.

This informant saith further, That at the time of the La Hogue business, he was acquainted with Blaire, and he told this informant he was concerned with Mr. Holman, who lives in Lincoln's-inn-fields, about raising a regiment of horse for king James, and that Blaire had money from Holman, to defray charges.

This informant saith further, he hath known Chernock these seven years; that he knew him a lieutenant in Parker's regiment in Ireland, where this informant was a trooper: that he had not seen Chernock for five or six months before he invited him to his house on the 8th or 9th of February last, or thereabout: he then sent for him by Trevors, but that this informant had seen Chernock several times before, meeting him accidentally; and they always talked about king James, and what hopes there was of his coming. That this informant always found that Loick and Chernock had a confidence in him, and made no scruple of telling him any thing they knew.

THOMAS BERTRAM.

Jurat, March 5, 1695. Coram me,

JA. VERNON.

The EXAMINATION of BRICE BLAIR, of the Age of 54, taken the 9th of March, 1695.

PAPER THE SEVENTH.

This examinant saith, He was born in Scotland, and bred a Presbyterian; that at the age of 28 he went into Holland, and was there corporal of the gentlemen in captain Riddle's company; that he changed his religion while he was in Holland, and turned Roman Catholic; and after that he served in my lord Dubarton's regiment in France. He hath lived in England 21 years: his last commission was captain lieutenant in sir Edward Hales's regiment.

This informant says, he has known father Harrison, alias Johnson, these five years; that he was recommended to his acquaintance by sir Edward Hales,* that this examinant hath been frequently with the said father Harrison in several places, particularly at Harrison's lodgings, at my lady Alibone's in Brownlow-street in Gray's-inn, and at father James's lodgings, in Somerset-house.

This examinant saith, That as long as he was acquainted with the said Harrison, he found that he was always a manager of king James's affairs here, and that he kept a correspondence with Milfort, while he was in favour, and since that with secretary Caryll: and this examinant hath seen several letters that the said Harrison had from both of them, part in cypher, and part at large. The said Harrison was the first man that employed this examinant to get all the men ready that he could against the la Hogue business; and at that time brought this examinant acquainted with colonel Parker: They met at Mr. Thornbury's house in Bedford-street, where Parker and Harrison then lodged together.

That some time after the beginning of February last, this examinant met father Harrison in Somerset-house, being appointed to meet him at six o'clock in the evening, but he don't remember the precise day. He asked this examinant, Whether he knew any soldiers or men of courage, for there might be something done within a little while, that might be an introduction to king James's restoration, or words to that effect. This examinant said, he knew a few such men; and this examinant asked, in what manner that business could be effected: after some pause, the said Harrison told this examinant, that if the French fleet could not come out time enough, the going out of the English fleet might be retarded by king James's friends burning the Victualling-office. This examinant replied, that was impracticable, or if it were to be done, there were few to be found that would run the risk: whereupon the said Harrison said to this examinant, That he would have him as forward in the king's service as any man, and that he was told by a gentleman, and a very good officer, that if he were sure of but a hundred good horse, he would end the war in a fortnight's time: To which this examinant replied, that the gentleman might know more than he, but that could not be done by a regular war, nor according to the rules of true honour or arms, but by some other means, which he was afraid to harbour in his thoughts. Father Harrison said no more, but shrunk up his shoulders, and he did not see him for some days after.

This examinant saith, he knows sir George Barclay very well, but hath not seen him since the Revolution. The first that told this examinant of his being in England, was sir John Friend, who told it him at Jonathan's coffee-house about a month ago, or more. Sir John Friend told this examinant, he had been to see sir George Barclay, and was going to him again that day.

Sir John Friend told this examinant, that sir George Barclay had not been long come over.

This examinant saith further, that he went to father Harrison at Somerset-house, about the 20th of February in the evening: father Harrison then told this examinant of some warrants that were out against Bertram, Grymes, Lee, and another, whose name he don't remember; and the said Harrison added, that if that business miscarried, it would hinder king James from coming: he did not name what business he meant; but this examinant understood it, that it was either seizing or assassinating the king, he having heard from Fisher, that such a thing was in agitation, and being confirmed in it by what Harrison had said to him of the hundred, and burning the Victualling-office. This examinant thereupon told the said Harrison, they had brought their hogs to a fine market, for now they were all ruined. Hereupon the examinant blaming such a design, as having neither authority from God nor man, the said Harrison replied, There was an authority or warrant, and that he had seen it; and asked this examinant if he thought it fit that every body should see it, but he had seen the authority, and to the best of his remembrance, he said, it was from king James. This examinant says, his answer was, he did not think it was in his nature, meaning king James, and immediately after this examinant took his leave and came away.

This examinant says, he knows Chernock, but hath not seen him these two months; he always thought him a rash, hot and violent man, and did not care for him. Chernock owned to this examinant last summer, that he was newly come from France. This examinant saith, he hath known sir William Perkins above a year; that sir John Friend brought him into his acquaintance, and that they sometimes dined together; he found both Friend and Perkins great Melfordians.

This examinant saith, he told sir John Friend what Fisher had told him concerning the assassination; he said he had heard it, and was sorry for it; for he was afraid it would ruin king James's affairs, and all his friends. This discourse passed at Jonathan's Coffee-house, when this examinant called sir John Friend aside to another room.

At the same time of the la Hogue business, colonel Parker sent this examinant to Mr. Holman, to see what he would do for king James's service: the said Holman told this examinant, he had heard a good character of him from sir Edward Hales, and he would send captain Hastings to him; and Hastings came to this examinant, and brought him to Holman, who told him he would raise a regiment of horse if he could, and that he would act by his former commission; and he sent this examinant, Cole, Mitten, and Hastings, about for men, and gave this examinant 130*l.* towards his charges; and this examinant believes he had at that time engaged near 200 men; and this examinant was to command the men he brought in; he promised Bertram to be his lieutenant, who likewise engaged some men.

This examinant saith, That one Edmonds a weaver in Bridgewater-Square, first brought this examinant into sir John Friend's acquaintance, about four years ago: that this examinant hath been very intimate with sir John Friend since that time. Father Harrison asking this examinant if he knew any rich citizens, that would be hearty in king James's service, this examinant named sir John Friend; and thereupon the said Harrison writ to Melford in sir John's favour, and he had a very favourable answer, and that king James was well satisfied that sir John Friend continued stedfast to him.

That this examinant could not induce sir John Friend to write into France; but he afterwards told him he had writ, and he supposes it was upon colonel Fountain's persuasion, with whom Ferguson brought him acquainted about three years ago. Sir John Friend told this examinant, that he had writ to king James, and had received a kind letter from him.

This examinant saith further, That sir John Friend told him, he had been often in company with the E— of A—, E— of L—, E— of Y—, and lord M—; and this examinant believes that colonel Fountain brought him into their acquaintance, for he verily believes he was not known to these persons till he knew Fountain.

This examinant says further, That about two years ago sir John Friend received a commission from king James for a regiment of horse; that the same commission was brought him by one Nicholas Pigott, a great acquaintance of Mr. Noseworthy's, who was used to go and come from France. This examinant saw the commission in sir John Friend's hands, it was upon paper printed, with a little seal in the margin, signed James R. and countersigned Melfort. That sir John Friend seemed to be well pleased with it, and told this examinant he should be his lieutenant colonel, and employed him to see if he could get men ready to mount against the time the king should land; and he hath given this examinant about 100*l.* to drink with the men and treat them.

Sir John Friend left it in a great measure to this examinant to find out men, who could bring in troopers ready mounted, either by their money or by their interest, or by both; and this examinant proposed Fisher to him, and Vernatti,* who undertook to raise each of them a troop. Sir John Friend chose Richardson, who is a merchant in the city, and sir John told this examinant he would raise a troop.

This examinant recommended Hall to be a captain, who is a merchant at Deal, at the desire of his brother in-law one Robinson, who lives likewise at Deal, and is concerned in weighing of wrecks. This Hall owned to this examinant, he had forty men ready that would mount themselves.

This examinant had engaged in words fifty or sixty men, for his troop, and Bertram was to be his lieutenant: some of the men said they had as much money as would buy a horse; some said they would borrow a horse; and some said they would go into the first stable and take a horse.

Some of the men this examinant had engaged were, John Reyner, a stocking-weaver in Pettycoat-lane. Knight, a hatter in Shoreditch. Cook, a watchmaker in Hackney. Buckle, a bit-maker at Charing-Cross. Wilson, a taylor of Shoreditch. Harris, clerk of the Stocks-market.

About six weeks ago, when the discourse began to be hot about setting out the Toulon fleet, sir John Friend told this examinant, he would not meddle with raising his regiment until he heard king James was landed.

Sir John Friend told this examinant formerly, that there were abundance of pretty brisk men would follow him from the City, and particularly from the Temple.

That this examinant proposed to Mr. Barnesly, who had been a lieutenant of horse in king James's time, in sir John Fenwick's regiment, to be major to sir John Friend: he now keeps a coffee-house over against Turn-Style in Holborn; he sometimes refused, and sometimes accepted.

Sir John Friend told this examinant some time since that sir John Fenwick had four troops in a readiness.

This examinant saith, That the design of the invasion was concealed from him as well as the assassination. That he did not expect there would be any rising in England, until the Toulon Fleet came about; and then he supposes all the Jacobites in England would have prepared themselves, and their general discourses were to that effect. BRYCE BLAIR.

BRYCE BLAIR'S INFORMATION, the 9th of March, 1695. Concerning the Assassination, or Seizing his Majesty's Person.

PAPER THE EIGHTH.

I went to see Mr. Harrison a little after sir George Barclay came from France, who told me, that there might be something done in a little time, which I forgot in my former deposition, and which might be an introduction to king James's restoration. I asked after what manner that business could be effected; and after some pause he told me, that if king James could not come time enough, his friends might burn the Navy Victualling-Office, wherein the provisions for the mouth lay, which might retard the English fleet from getting to sea for a considerable time. I told him, being amazed to hear such words proceed from a priest's mouth, that it was not practicable, and if it were, there would be few found that would run the risque. He told me, that he would have me as forward in the king's service as any man, and that he was told by a gentleman, and a very good officer, that if he was but sure of a hundred horse, he would end the war in a fortnight's time. I answered, That the gentleman might know a great deal more than I, but that behoved to be done not by a regular war, nor according to the true laws of honour or arms, but by some other means, which I was afraid even to harbour in my thoughts. I saw Mr. Bertram once in the city, and if I am not mistaken, Mr. Fisher was in the house at the same time, and in the same room; he called me into the next room, and I asked him, before he could speak to me, if I am not mistaken, Why I did not see him of a long while, and that I was afraid he was upon some desperate design; he made me little or no answer, but wished he had seen me sooner, or words to that effect; and I begged of him for God's sake, if he were dipped, to fly and never be concerned further. This is what occurs to my memory concerning the assassination and invasion.

As to the seizing the Tower, I shall only add, that I have heard sir John Friend say, That upon an invasion, if ever the standing troops went out of the Tower, and the Hamlet militia were entrusted with the same, the veteran troops should hardly ever re-enter; and that he was as well assured of my lord Lucas's lieutenant colonel, as he was of any man in England.

I forgot to acquaint my lord chancellor and the secretary of state with one particular passage, and it was this: in a discourse betwixt Mr. Fisher and I, he was talking of sir Ralph Dutton, how discontented a man he was, and that he was a man of great following and interest in his country; and after a great deal of talk of this nature, I asked him if he thought he would accept of king James's commission? Mr. Fisher answered me readily, he did not doubt but he would. Whereupon I went to Mr. Harrison and acquainted him with the thing, who at first told me he doubted not but to obtain it, and thereupon wrote over to secretary Carroll, and had a promise of one, but never received any; but whether this was a real design in the knight and Fisher, or whether it was a trap for me, I leave it to the judgment of the king and his council.

As to colonel Holman, I cannot think of any thing at present, more than that major Mitten and captain Hastings, were concerned with the colonel as well as I.

As to what my lord chancellor did hint to me concerning my countrymen, and that I had not made any mention of them, I have ruminated upon it, and it just now comes fresh into my memory, that it can be no other than sir Andrew Forster, who did me the favour to give me a meeting a few days before this damned, hellish business broke out; he has been in town above this half year. I do not know the secrets of his heart, but on my conscience I believe the gentleman is here on no ill design, but only thrust from St. Germain's, either by a prevalent party, or his own pressing affairs, and slighted here by king James, and his greatest friends.

The INFORMATION of GEORGE HARRIS. March 28th, 1696.

PAPER THE NINTH.

(Copy.) This informant saith, That he was an ensign of foot under the late king James in Ireland; that he has served since in the second troop of his guards in France; that about the 14th of January last, N. S. King James sent for this informant and Hare his comrade; that king James spoke with him in the late queen's bed-chamber, and told this informant, that he had an opportunity of doing something for him, being very sensible he had served him well; that he would send him into England, where he should be subsisted, and that he was to follow sir George Barclay's orders, and in so doing, that he would take care of him: that he had ordered them money for their journey, which they should receive from Mr. Carroll (who is secretary to the late queen.) King James told this informant further, That he should find sir George Barclay every Monday and Thursday, between six and seven at night, in Covent-Garden-Square, and that they might know him by a white handkerchief hanging out of his coat pocket: king James pulling a list out of his pocket, told this informant, when he was in England he must go by the name of Jenkins, and Hare by the name of Guinney. Colonel Parker was by, all the time when king James spoke to this informant; and by the king's order colonel Parker went with this informant and his comrade to Mr. Carroll's; and Mr. Carroll told them, that the king had ordered them ten Louis d'Ors a-piece, which would be enough to carry them over; and if they should chance to be wind-bound, he had writ to the president Tosse at Calais, to furnish them with money for their subsistence; and accordingly they went to Calais, and staying there some time for a wind, their landlady was paid by the said president, who also sent captain Gill to them (who is master of a chaloupe, that is used to go to and fro for intelligence.) The wind coming fair, they embarked on board the said chaloupe, about nine in the morning, and sailed along the French coast down as low as Bologne, and about two in the afternoon, they stood directly for England, and about one o'clock next morning they landed in Kent, near the house of one Hunt. Captain Gill, with about fifteen of his men, went a-shore with them (leaving only two boys in the vessel;) they armed themselves like soldiers, each having his fire-lock and collar of bandileers; they were carried to Mr. Hunt's house, who provided them with horses: there was a person there in the same house, who was going over for France; they did not see him, but Hunt carried some messages between them, about exchanging guineas for Louis d'Ors. They continued at Hunt's house until three in the morning; and as soon as the horses came, they mounted, and rid away to Teuker's house at Sandway-Lane, where they arrived about eight o'clock, and from thence they went, as they were directed, to Charles Cross's at Rochester: Berkenhead came to them at Teuker's house, and came to Rochester, where they arrived about seven next morning; and they came from thence together in the Gravesend-coach, and so took boat for London.

This informant says further, That the next night after they came to London, he and his comrade Hare went to look for sir George Barclay in Covent-Garden-Square, as they were directed, but missed of him, which they were surprised at. They lodged at the sign of the Unicorn in Brownlow-street near Drury-lane. This informant was only known there by the name by Jenkins, but his comrade being a man known to the landlord, went by his own name of Hare; and he going out the next day, lighted accidentally upon Berkenhead, who told him he had seen sir George Barclay, who desired they would meet him that night in Covent-Garden; and they went thither accordingly that night. It rained very hard, and one Handford came to them from sir George Barclay, to bring them to him under the Piazza, where they found sir George Barclay, major Holms, and Berkenhead: then sir George Barclay taking his leave of the others, took this informant and his comrade into the little Piazza, and after some enquiry after the king, queen, prince, and princess, he told them, they should take great care to keep within doors; that he had no money for them at present, but would send them some in two or three days; and sir George Barclay told this informant, that when there was any occasion, he would send for them by major Holms, and that they need not give themselves the trouble of meeting there any more, because it was suspicious.

Major Holms came to this informant, as sir George Barclay had said, and brought him two guineas for the subsistence of Mr. Hare and himself; and two or three days after, he came to their lodgings again, and gave them four guineas a-piece, which he told them, with the guinea they had already received, made up a month's pay, at five shillings a day, guineas then going at thirty shillings a-piece.

This informant says, That he and his comrade met one evening near the dial in Covent-Garden, with Mr. Holms, Mr. Cassel, Mr. Richardson, and Mr. Handford, alias Brown; that their discourse was of keeping themselves in their lodgings, and not stir out in the day-time.

The persons that this informant remembers have come out of France within three months are,

Sir George Barclay, who went from St. Germains in December last; it was then given out, that he was gone to Paris to be cured of a clap.

Major Holms, who this informant supposes came along with sir George Barclay, for he did not see him after sir George Barclay was said to be gone to Paris.

Cassels and Richardson went off next, the former giving out, that he would go for the Scotch College; and try something else, since the profession of a soldier was not more favourable to him; and richardson likewise declared, that he was now weary of the service: Cassels belonged to the first troop of guards commanded by the duke of Berwick, and Richardson to the second troop of guards commanded by the earl of Clancarty.

And when this informant and his comrade came away, (who were both of the second troop of guards commanded by the earl of Clancarty,) they also gave out they were weary of the service.

Captain Counter, who was lately made brigadier of the guards, came over after this informant.

Mr. Maxwell and Mr. Byerly came about the same time that Counter did. Mr. John Maxwell was in no post, but lived at St. Germain, and was nephew to brigadier Maxwell, who was killed at the battle of Marseille. Byerly came over to be major to a regiment that the king had given to Mr. Curwin; whereof Mr. Oldfield was to be lieutenant-colonel.

After these came over brigadier Rookwood, and Bernardi, which last was upon the list for lieutenant colonel's pay at 25 sols a day.

Mr. Hungate lived at Paris, and had an allowance; he was nephew to colonel Hungate, who was talked of to have a regiment of dragoons whenever the king should land.

Mr. Blackburne, a Lancashire gentleman, who came out of England last spring, and had 10*d.* a day allowed him at St. Germain.

There came over likewise Mr. Handford of the second troop of guards, who came over with Mr. Hungate.

There came over likewise Mr. Baily, and Mr. Thorold, but those two came over as men of service to be employed in colonel Curwin's regiment of horse, and to put it upon a good foot; Baily quitted the post of a lieutenant in the Grand Prior's regiment.

The rest were to be under sir George Barclay's command, and had false names given them to go by.

This informant says further, That on Saturday the assassination was designed (as he understood afterwards), he went to brigadier Rookwood's lodgings, and he had not been there long, before Bernardi came in; he found them in a hurry, and asked what it was they were going about; Mr. Rookwood told him, if he would go to Mr. Counter's, he would tell him; whereupon this informant went to Mr. Counter's lodgings, at a confectioner's over-against the Three-Tun-Tavern in Holborn, where he lay by the name of Rumsey: he found him at home, and he told him he had orders for him from sir George Barclay; and that he and Mr. Hare must be ready instantly, and go to Turnham-Green at the sign of the Woolpack (as near as he can remember). There were then present major Holms, Mr. Knightly, and Mr. King. Major Holms told this informant, that his horse and Mr. Hare's stood at Somerset-House, and he told Knightly, that Mr. Hungate's horse stood there likewise; and Mr. Knightly spoke to this informant, to take care of Hungate's horse, since they stood all together, which he promised to do. Mr. Knightly said further, that he left his comrade at home, for fear of any orders coming to the lodging, that they might not be both out of the way together.

This informant says further, That sir George Barclay came in to them, and declared, that these were his janisaries, and that he hoped they would bring him the garter; and talked something of attacking; upon which this informant was very much startled, not knowing the thing: soon after, Durant came in, and told them the prince of Orange did not go out that day: however sir George Barclay bid major Holms deliver us our horses; and Mr. Knightly answered, It would be the best way, for if any accident happened that the horses should not come up, it would be imputed as a fault to the rider; and therefore it would be much better, that they should ride them out, and give them some exercise; and they might do it without suspicion, if they went one or two, and ride out at several parts of the town; and if they should chance to meet, they should take no notice one of another. Brigadier Rookwood, and major Lowick came at the same time, but they all dispersed soon after, and sir George Barclay, Counter, Rookwood and Holms went and dined together at the Black-Lion in Holborn.

This informant says further, That he, his comrade, Cassels, Richardson, Handford, Meldrum, and Maxwell, were at an ale-house in St. James's-street, in Covent-garden the night before, being the 14th of February, where Mr. Counter came to them, and delivered to each of them a case of pistols, the said Counter telling them they were not to stir out of their lodgings, but to be ready next morning.

This informant says further, That he and Mr. Hare met major Holms by his appointment the first Saturday at two o'clock in the afternoon, at the stables in Somerset-House, where they had each his horse delivered to them by the said Holms, and they carried them to a stable in Soho.

This informant says further, That either on Saturday night or the next morning, he saw captain Rookwood, and asked him whether they were to be the murderers of the prince of Orange, and that they had served to a fair purpose, to be sent over on such an account. Rookwood replied, That he was afraid they were engaged in it, but if he had known he had been sent over for that purpose, he would have begged his majesty's pardon for not coming.

This informant says further, That another time walking in Red-Lion-Fields with major Lowick, major Bernardi, and captain Rookwood, they considering what a barbarous thing it was, Lowick said, he would obey orders and sure sir George Barclay would not undertake it without orders; captain Rookwood often repeated, that the king sent him to obey sir George Barclay's orders: Bernardi said the same, as also did the informant, and Lowick again said, he would obey.

This informant says further, That all the persons before-mentioned, except Byerly, Bailly, and Thorold, had horses and arms delivered them by sir George Barclay's order.

This informant says further, That he and Hare had several meetings with Richardson, Cassells, and others, but did not talk about the business till the Friday following; at which time this informant was at the Two Black-posts in Maiden-lane, where were likewise King, Richardson, Cassells, Maxwell, and Handford; captain Counter came to them thither, and told them, they must be in readiness the next morning, and not stir out; whereupon Cassells, swore, God damn him, he would have the plunder of the field, crying out, to-morrow is the day, boys! King said, if it did not do to-morrow, he would think of it no more. Handford asked, how they should make their escapes after it was done? Cassells replied, he must stay with that party he was ordered with. This informant then went to his lodgings to acquaint his comrade with the orders given them, and the next day, being Saturday, the 22d of February, about nine in the morning, major Holms came to them, and told them, they must be ready presently; and he bid this informant go to captain Counter for orders; and major Holms gave each of them a guinea, to pay for their horses. This informant then went to captain Counter, and found captain Rookwood with him. Counter told this informant, he was to be one of Rookwood's party; and Rookwood gave this informant a list of names, and said to him, laughing, he would make him his aid-de-camp: In that note were the names of this informant, Hare, Handford, and Blackburne, with captain Rookwood's name at the top; and captain Rookwood desired this informant to go and get those gentlemen ready; which he did accordingly; and then this informant coming again to captain Rookwood in Red-Lion-Square, to know what orders he had received from sir George Barclay, Rookwood told him, that sir George Barclay said the prince of Orange did not go out that day; and then he engaged this informant to dine with him, and Lowick and Bernardi, which he did at the Castle, a cook's-shop in Red-Lion-Square; where Mr. Lowick asked this informant, how he came to be in such a sweat? And this informant answering, That he had been to get some of captain Rookwood's party ready; Lowick replied, he had got two, which were at a house hard by, and they could not go till he went to discharge them. Major Lowick said further, Gentlemen, you have 6s. a day allowed you, but I have not a farthing, and yet I bring three men upon my own charge. This informant saying, that was hard, and wondering that he did not speak to sir George Barclay about it; Lowick answered since sir George Barclay did not do it of himself, he would not trouble him. Major Lowick likewise told them that he had notice given him two or three days before, by one Harrison, not to go to his lodging, because there was an information given against him to the council-board about this business.

This informant says further, That he changed his lodgings that night, and went and lay with Mr. Rookwood and Bernardi, for two or three nights at their lodgings at Mr. Warne's, in Red-Lion-square; and after that Rookwood and Bernardi went to the other end of the town, near the Tower, where they were taken and put into the Compter; and this informant shifted from place to place till he found his name in a proclamation, and then he surrendered himself.

This informant says further, That the said Saturday night the plot was discovered, he was at the Bear-tavern with Rookwood, Knightly, King, Durant, and Boise, where they talked briefly of the assassination. Knightly went out, pretending he had business, and returned in half an hour, bringing Hungate with him; they whispered to Mr. King in his ear, whereupon King cried out, sure God Almighty is on our side. This informant asking what was the matter? they both answered, we must take care of ourselves; and that was the only time this informant saw Boise, since his coming into England.

This informant says further, That about the beginning of February, he met Maxwell and Cassells as he was passing over Covent-garden, that he embraced them, and they adjourned to Mr. Cassells' lodgings, where they found Richardson, and went to a tavern together, Mr. Hare being with them. Mr. Maxwell then told this informant, that captain Byerly was come, and desired to see him: Mr. Maxwell likewise acquainted the company, that notice being taken at St. Germain's, that so many of them were gone over, and it being wondered at what they were gone about, king James came to hear of it, and thereupon declared at his levee, that whoever should be found to make mention of any of those gentlemen, that were gone for England, or be inquisitive about them, that he should be severely punished, and never received into favour again.

This informant says further, That he went the next morning to Mr. Byerly's lodgings, at Mr. Ashwell's, in Drury-lane, and found him abed; and after he had saluted him, Mr. Byerly told this informant he was sorry he was provided for. This informant asked him, how? Mr. Byerly replied, that Mr. Parry had told him, at St. Germain's, that the king had put him, this informant, with sir George Barclay, going on, that he had known this informant a long time, and it now lay in his power to serve him; that he designed to make him an aid-major, and lieutenant, and had certainly made it his business to speak to the king about it; but that Mr. Parry told him, the king would be very angry at it, since he, this informant, was already disposed of: major Byerly farther told this informant, that the king had given Mr. Curwin a regiment of twelve troops, and had made Mr. Oldfield lieutenant-colonel, and had given him a troop besides, and that his brother was likewise to be a captain there; and that he, the said Mr. Byerly, went by the sham name, Taylor, on this expedition, and that he was going into the North: his landlord, Mr. Ashwell, the coming into the room, he asked him whether he knew of any stables, for he was going out of town, and should return within three weeks and bring up some horses with him. Mr. Ashwell said, he would see about it. There was one Baily that came out of France, and was to have this informant's post of lieutenant, and aid-major in the regiment; and there was one Thorold likewise came over, who was to be lieutenant to major Byerly's own troop, and had undertaken to bring him eight men. Major Byerly further told this informant, that Mr. Oldfield, the lieutenant-colonel, and one captain Bell, were going with him into the North, and that Mr. Oldfield would bring up 3,000*l.* along with him to town.

Jurat 31 Mar. 16, 1696 GEORGE HARRIS.
Coram me Ja. Vernon.

EXAMINATION of KNIGHTLY, March 21, 1695.

PAPER THE TENTH.

(Copy.) About 9 weeks ago he saw sir George Barclay, first in Covent-garden-square in the dark by appointment; he said, he had done the business his master sent him about, but that he had something put into his head, by which he could do the king farther service, and asked him if he could get him half a dozen of honest fellows, and explained himself that he meant gentlemen.

This examinant undertook for himself and two more; viz. King and Durant: King sent Boyce to him on Thursday or Friday before the first Saturday.

He went to sir George at his lodgings over-against Gray's-Inn, near the sign of the Unicorn, a confectioner's, and told him of Boyce; and sir George liked him very well, and desired him to engage him, and present his service to him.

He met sir George Barclay several times, about three or four times at the Black-posts in Cockpit-alley. Major Holms was there, and Durant once.

By degrees sir George told what it was; the first was a general proposal, after that he said, that to facilitate the king's landing, it was to attack the prince of Orange at the head of his guards; he was not determined whether to do it on foot or horseback; he was of opinion for two days to do it on foot.

VOL. XII.

Porter sent him a message over-night to go out with him to Knight's-bridge; they met at the Rose-tavern, King, Porter, and he; to the best of his remembrance, it was on Wednesday or Thursday; King shewed them the place at Turnham-green that would be proper for the attack, then they went to Brentford, and King carried them by Sion to a ferry over against Richmond.

Captain King led them to a house between Richmond and Mortlack, where they said the king used to go, and shewed them a little wood within pales, and asked Knightly if it were not fit for an ambuscade: he said it was the fittest he ever saw; they took a slight view of it as they rode along, and then dined at Mortlack: they came that night to the Nag's-head; several others came to them there, viz. Sir George Barclay and Chernock, sir William Perkins came in there too. Sir George did not stay long, but then he said he resolved it should be on horseback. He has known sir William Perkins many years, but he don't know he was engaged in the business.

He saw sir George Barclay afterwards at his lodging, and he told him he was resolved to do it on Saturday; but upon a message brought by Durant, that the king did not go abroad, nothing was done that day; the same thing was carried on to the next Saturday. They used to go to see sir George Barclay once in two or three days. He saw there, Rookwood, Bernardi, Lowick, Hare, Harris and Counter, these three were of the guard in France; Hungate was there too, he was a gentleman who had lived at Paris.

Lowick told him he had engaged Bertram.

Bernardi was called major, he had seen him in Ireland; he supposes he was born in Holland or Flanders.

He was at sir George's the next Saturday. His horse was in Southwark; Durant took care of both their horses. His pistols were sent him by major Holms, or his relation; he lay then at Mrs. Wroth's, in Brownlow-street.

Major Lowick, Mr. Bauger, Mr. Holms, he, Durant, and two others, met at the Bull-head-tavern in Fleet-street; one of them was a young man related to Ernely; they talked of the Toulon-Fleet.

Langhorn served in the guards in France.

He met sir George on the 2d Sunday-night in Bloomsbury-square; also he said, he hoped we should see our master shortly.

He saw Counter on Monday, who told him, he would not see sir George that night, for he was taking measures to secure himself.

Sir George had another lodging in Southampton-buildings, over against the arch; he lay there by the name of Brown.

When they met in Southampton-buildings, he was to have met him at the Griffin-tavern.

Counter and Hungate were with him.

Counter went away with sir George; he went by the name of Romney or Rumsey.

Hungate went by the name of Rogers,

Sir George Barclay lodged at first near the Red-lion in Drury-lane.

It is ten months since he came from St. Germain; the king told them, he could subsist there no longer.

He knew sir George abroad; and that king James had a great esteem for him.

Sir George told him he came over about ten days before he first saw him.

All he knew of the duke of Berwick's being in town, was by King, who had it from Porter.

He knew Chernock in Ireland, and had some general discourses with him.

Sir George said, that those who mounted his horses were to go and meet the king when he landed, and in the mean time they must shift for themselves, adding, that people were pretty well inclined; and at soon as that should be done, he hoped they would be of his opinion.

Sir George Barclay succeeded Sutherland.

He made himself very public towards the latter end; there were seven at a time at his lodgings on the last Saturday.

He saw Chernock in France when he past by, before the La Hogue business.

He told him of his being last in France; that he went on a message to king James, and that he came back in a month.

He was brought into it, before he was acquainted with the business, and being engaged he went on upon a punctilio of honour, not liking that no care was taken for a retreat.

Sir George told him they were to be forty six men; he relied upon sir George, that he had considered all things.

He understood by sir George, that the king would land soon.

Mr. GOODMAN'S INFORMATION, April 24, 1696.

PAPER THE ELEVENTH.

(Copy.)—About some two years since or better, I understood that colonel Parker was resident here, in order to engage several people for the service of king James; and captain Porter told me, he had a mind to see me, which he accordingly did, where he told me that there would be an invasion, and that king James would be restored; and that in order to it, he had a commission to levy men, and grant out subordinate commissions for a regiment of horse, and did ask if I would accept of one, which I accordingly did; he likewise said he would see me as often as he could, and that captain Porter and I should receive directions from time to time. Upon several meetings, and having received my commission, I understood what captains were to be in the regiment, which were, captain Porter, sir William Perkins, Mr. Chernock, sir Hugh Smithson, Mr. Higgins and myself, and one Mr. Widdrington, lieutenant colonel: The commissions were blank when they were delivered, and to be filled up by the captain, &c. I then came acquainted with Mr. Chernock and sir William Perkins, and by them and Parker, captain Porter and I was informed that there was a great body of horse to be ready in the north, but though I asked, yet they never named any persons to me, but said it was sufficient; I should receive orders, and a route to march to a rendezvous upon occasion; and indeed I did not much press it, because I did gather there was a great many concerned; and at this time captain Porter and I took a house in the Chase, with stables and barns fit for holding horses, and as a fit place to meet upon orders given us to march, which we then daily expected.

Some time after this colonel Parker was taken, and being committed to the Tower, he made his escape; and after that I saw him, and then he told me he would be sure to correspond with me and Porter, and I should receive his letters of Mr. Chernock or Mr. Johnson; and he accordingly did; and in his letters he still gave us hopes, and said he would certainly send us notice to be in readiness, time enough for us to be serviceable to the design of the invasion.

The last letters I received from Parker gave me advice that he doubted not but the cause would come to a hearing at the Easter term, and he thought he should write no more, but bring the orders himself; upon which I went to Chernock, and he told me he did expect him here in a short time, but always or most commonly in his letters he told me for a sign, when the Toulon fleet should join the Brest fleet, I might certainly depend that we should be invaded here.

During these transactions, captain Porter complained that something he was sending to Lancashire had miscarried; he desired me to set by two boxes, which I looked not into, but supposed them to be arms, and I did set them by for him. I had not bought any arms, but had bespoke some of one Pesy, a gunsmith, who said I should have them ready at a week's warning.

After Parker's having made his escape, and getting into France, Mr. Chernock came to me, some time before the king's going to Flanders, and said, he had something to propose to me, and desired me to go along with him, which I did; and he brought me to one Mr. Waw, who said, he expected a commission from king James to seize king William; accordingly we went to the Chocolate-house in St. James's-street, and after some discourse about the commission he said he expected, we appointed another meeting at that place, and adjourned from thence to my house in Brownlow-street, where were present Mr. Chernock, Mr. Porter, Mr. Waw, major Mathews, and Mr. Donelagh; the subject of the discourse was about the surprising and seizing the king as he came from Richmond; and after several ways proposed for that purpose, I particularly asked, suppose that the king were in our power, what then? For we ought to have regard to some end or other in such an undertaking, for I was not willing to offer any thing to his person. Mr. Waw said, we might have a coach and carry him away; and he said, he was assured of a fort to be delivered to him and put into his hands, (to the best of my remembrance it was Deal) which might give us shelter while we might find opportunity to carry him into France by shipping. I must confess I did see very little probability in what he said; neither did I believe that he would receive any such commission as he said he expected; (for about two years since, I remember I saw sir George Barclay with colonel Fountaine, and Mr. Porter; sir George was then going over to France, and it was the only time that ever I saw him; and then captain Porter and I did desire, that if king James desired any such thing as seizing of king William, he would send over a commission and a pardon withal, in case of an accident: Which message sir George carried over, and king James refused to send it.) However we had another meeting after that, at my house, by which time he said he would shew us the commission, and facilitate the design: It was at a house behind the Temple, where the aforesaid company met, and Mr. Waw brought with him one Mr. Hayes, who, he said, could furnish us with a ship which should be ready to transport us after we had seized the king; but upon discourse with Mr. Hayes, we found that the demands were so exorbitant, and not in possibility to be complied withal, and besides no order or commission being produced, we did desist then; for captain Porter, major Mathews, and I, did declare, we would not meddle without sight of the commission.

After this, captain Porter and I talked of hiring a vessel, and thought of sending La Rue and Chernock about it; we met at the Fountain by the Temple Gate, and sir William Perkins was there; and during the time of our being there, one called sir William out, and sir William called out Porter, who came in and said, there was a gentleman who could help us in this affair; who he was I know not, I believe captain Porter may, for I saw him not. But all this proved ineffectual, for the king went away suddenly, and no commission ever came; and by letters from Fountain from France, I understood king James was angry that they had used his name to what he had not promised; and Porter and I wrote over, by his order, the truth of the whole matter.

Some time after this, captain Porter, the e— of A—, and sir John Friend, sir William Perkins, and sir John Fenwick, and others, met about sending over some proposals to king James, to expedite an invasion; and likewise captain Porter said, it was proper I should be there, for he had engaged for me: I told him, I would come; and at the King's-head in Leadenhall-street, I found the persons above-named, together with my lord M—, and one Mr. Cook; the effect of their consultation was the sending Mr. Chernock with a message to this purpose, that if the king of France could spare such a number of foot, and so many dragoons, amounting to about 12 or 15,000, or thereabouts in all; that then upon notice given, that every particular man there was to furnish such a number of horse, some more, some less, and be ready to succour the forces from France when landed; Mr. Chernock went and returned with a refusal, that forces could not be spared. Sir John Friend and my lord A— were of opinion, that if king James would venture hither only with some small retinue, he had friends enough to appear for him without any foreign forces; but that was held in doubt.

I used afterwards to see my lord A— I always asked what news he heard; he said when he received any orders I should know, for he having been in France (as he did not deny) I supposed him not to be ignorant of what was intended.

And to the better facilitating an invasion, sir John Fenwick used to send over a list of the forces, and how they were quartered, what were in garrison, and what otherways disposed of: He having made a mistake in the account, colonel Parker did by letter desire me to try if I could procure such an account, which I accordingly did of one Gisbon a clerk in the office, and sent it over frequently.

As to the escape of Parker out of the Tower, sir John Fenwick when I asked him how he got away, and how much money was given, he said 200*l.* promised, and 300*l.* given; for when a person came in, and told Parker he had brought him liberty, and was to have 200*l.* he replied you shall have 300*l.* and it was made good to him afterwards.

Much about the same time, I used now and then with captain Porter to be with sir John Fenwick, and it was agreed, that if colonel Parker should not bring us timely orders, that what forces we could bring, viz. Porter and I, we were to take orders from sir John Fenwick; this we offered him, and he kindly accepted; and he then said, that he believed that most of my lord Oxford's regiment would go to king James: when I told Mr. Paradise had promised to bring seven or eight to me, and that Mr. Aynsworth was to bring me twenty, and Parker had said, if I made thirty it was sufficient for me. As to keeping of horses sir John said it was dangerous, and they would be certainly seized, but the best way was to have a list of what horses were in and about London stables, and seize them upon occasion.

Captain Porter and I accordingly sent to view the stables; I sent Mr. Keylway, and captain Porter sent Cranburn, and they took an account.

Mr. SWEET's DEPOSITION, 18th March, 1695.

PAPER THE TWELFTH.

(Copy.) I have been conversant with sir William Perkins these three years, and have often been told by him, that king James would land in England, and that there was a party ready to appear for him as soon as he did so, but never received so much assurance of it, as

I have since Christmas last; for at, or since that time, he told me he had it from the king's own hand, that he would come, and therefore made preparations to meet him, for great things were expected of him by king James; he also told me he had bought thirty saddles, and other furniture; and that his own troop, as he called it, was composed of all old soldiers, and that he had several gentlemen that were good horse officers which ride volunteers with him.

About the beginning of January I was at his house, and he came from London with one captain Scudamore, and told me, he must be in Warwickshire the next day, and the day following at Leicester, to meet some of the king's friends: Some of them were to ride almost as many miles as he did. I met him at his return, when he told me, he had met the gentlemen, and all things went well, and that the West was as well inclined to king James's interest as the North. I told him, I knew most of the West country gentry, and asked him how they would meet, and if I could be serviceable in that, I would beg leave of the commissioners to see my friends, and then to talk with them, or carry any message to them; but he told me the correspondence was settled, and the place appointed, and that they were men of estates, and one of them a lord's brother.

About the 11th of February last, I received a letter from sir William Perkins, to come the next day to London, which I did, and met him in Norfolk street, desiring his commands, for I must home that night; He deferred telling me till he came back from meeting sir John in the city; when he did come, he told me, there was something he had designed I should have done, but on second thoughts, I was not a fit person, by reason of my family, but desired to call upon his lady, and order three of his strongest horses to be sent him the next day, by James, his groom. At my taking leave, he desired me to come up again the next Friday night, if he did not send me a line to the contrary. I received none, and did go to the same place, sir William not being within, there was Mr. Lea and Mr. Chambers to receive me: When he came in, he called me into his chamber, and asked me, if I had left my family in a good condition; I told him I could not get in my money, and they had but little; then he told me (in passion) I might have staid at home; I told him, I would be there to-morrow morning, but would call for his commands in the country, which I did; but he being gone out, left orders for me to stay till eleven of the clock. I then again met Mr. Chambers, and went to the Covent Garden Tavern, and drank a pint of sack together: he told me he had been at Kensington, and that king William did not hunt that day, saying, he kept as close as a fox in his hole, shewing me his wounds, and saying, I want to revenge these on the person that was the cause of giving them to me, telling me, when he received them, and how; we dined with sir William and Mr. Chernock; and then I went home, and do not remember that I saw sir William from that time till the 20th, at Watford, and not since. Attested by JAMES HUNT's Information, 5th April, 1695.

PAPER THE THIRTEENTH.

(Copy.) This informant saith, he hath lived four years or upwards in the house where he now dwells in Rumney Marsh, which is about half a mile from the sea. That he hath been engaged in French correspondencies about three years. That at first it was only in the way of private trade. The first man that proposed it to him was captain William Berkenhead, who was brought to this informant by Thomas Gibbs of Smeed, who is since dead. What the said Berkenhead then proposed to this informant, was to send now and then a letter, and to receive some goods on shore, as also persons that came from France, as there should be occasion in the way of trade, which this informant consented to.

This informant saith, That either before that time, or soon after, sir Adam Blair and Berkenhead came to this informant's house as they landed coming from France, and he furnished them with horses to carry them towards London.

About that time there was one Simson Jones, who went by the name of Roberts, he brought over a great deal of goods from France, there were near eight horse loads of silks and laces; there has been at other times twenty or thirty horse loads of goods brought over.

Row of Dover was the factor for some of those goods, as also was Ricasse, and la Croix, the one of Sandwich, and the other of Dover. This informant has heard, that the goods were belonging to Moisy, Midy, Goudet, and other French merchants in London. He believes he has letters at home from Pigaut of Calais that are directed to some merchants to give them account of their goods; and this informant has delivered himself some goods to Midy, and received money of him for the carriage. Deharee, another French merchant, had five packets of silk in this informant's custody, which Berkenhead or his nephew carried up.

About half a year after that this informant was acquainted with Berkenhead, the said Berkenhead proposed to this informant the bringing or sending to London from time to time some packets of letters which he would pay for; and this informant did once or twice come up with packets directed to Berkenhead. This informant being unwilling to come up any more upon that account, after that, Berkenhead either came himself for the letters, or sent somebody. There was a young gentleman, a knight's son, as Berkenhead told this informant, who used to come frequently with the letters from London, and brought up those that came from France: He generally walked it backward and forward. That person has been dead about two years, and Berkenhead has since employed his nephew for carrying letters, persons, and goods.

The letters that were brought to this informant, he buried till a boat came from France to fetch them; and he did the same with the letters that were brought over. This informant saith, That the letters came oftener from London, and in greater packets than those that came from France: The letters that went for France were at first made up like little packets of lace; the outside covers were generally directed to Pigaut, and the President at Calais; and the letters for England were under cover, to Berkenhead, and one Jackson, who, Berkenhead told this informant, was a priest.

One Thomas, a servant of Mr. Gumbleton of Sellinge, was employed by Berkenhead in carrying these letters.

The letters were brought from France, and sent thither by captain Gill, master of a French privateer, who sailed with about 20 men and boys, and had been concerned in this business as long as this informant; and the said Gill likewise brought and carried the passengers backwards and forwards. The said Gill came over very frequently of late, and brought several people.

The persons that this informant remembers to have gone backward and forward, since his being concerned, are as follows:

The e— of A—, who went over to France about three years ago. Berkenhead brought the said e— to this informant's house, where he staid near a week, waiting for a passage. Mr. Berkenhead, this informant thinks, staid all the time; and this informant and his wife eat sometimes with the said lord.

The e— of A— did not then own to this informant who he was; but when the boat came, and he went off, he told this informant he would be back again in 12 days, or thereabout; and he came over accordingly: he was a little indisposed when he came over, and staid five or six hours at this informant's house to refresh himself, and both this informant and his wife spoke with the said e— who told this informant, that he had been at St. Germain's, and had seen king James, and the queen, that he came immediately from Boulogne, where he was with the duke d'Aumont. Berkenhead told this informant afterward, that it was the e— of A—; whereupon this informant has been twice with the said e—, at his house in Leicester-fields, and he waited upon the said e— at Tunbridge the last summer, meeting him there accidentally. The said e— bid this informant come to him to his lodgings at Southborough, where he gave this informant a letter which he said was for the queen, and desired this informant to inclose it to Pigaut at Calais, and to desire him that he would direct to the queen; and this informant had a letter from Pigaut, acknowledging the receipt of the said letter, which he received from the said e— after St. James's tide.

This informant saith further, That the said e— came down into Rumney-Marsh about June or July last, that Berkenhead was with him. They came to this informant's house, and enquired when he expected Gill over. They went that night to Harrison at Dimechurch, where the e— lay two or three nights. This informant was to see him there, and his wife saw him while the e— was at their house; but Gill not coming over in that time, the said e— returned again to London, and Berkenhead with him.

The lord G— went over about two years ago; Berkenhead brought him to this informant, and told him who he was; the said lord lay at this informant's two or three nights, and then went over with Gill.

One Mr. Viner went over near the same time; he was brought by Berkenhead, he staid some time in France, and came back the same way by the name of Maggot.

Sir James Montgomery, and sir Theophilus Oglethorpe went over together; they lay at Mr. Gumbleton's, at Sellinge; they sent for this informant to come to them, in the name of Roberts, alias Simson Jones, and acquainting him with their business to go over.

This informant sent them word by his boy, when the boat was ready; and they went over accordingly, about a month or six weeks after sir Theophilus Oglethorpe returned from France; and this informant furnished him with a horse, to carry him part of his way to London.

The two soldiers went over some time after, that were assisting in sir James Montgomery's escape, as Berkenhead told this informant, who brought them down at several times, and lodged them at Harrison's at Dimechurch.

Goff and Belmere went over about a year and half ago. Berkenhead told this informant, that Goff was a priest. When they came back, they brought goods over, as this informant remembers, and Goff has had several parcels of goods come over since.

Sir Andrew Forrester, and his son, went over about a year ago, and they lay at Harrison's: sir Andrew returned about half a year since.

One Pigott, a squint-eyed man, came over about a year and half ago.

One Dr. Taylor, a doctor of divinity, went over about a year and half ago. This informant believes he is still in France; another gentleman went over with him, which this informant does not know.

Crossby went over for France since his trial, and Berkenhead brought him to this informant.

Sir George Barclay, and captain Williamson went over together about two years ago; they lay at Harrison's house.

This informant has not seen sir George Barclay till of late, that he came over some time in January last; then came over with him major Holms, who had passed several times before, when my lord Melford was secretary.

There came over several persons at that time, some before, and some after sir George Barclay: There was about sixteen or eighteen of them to the best of this informant's remembrance; but this informant doth not know the names of any of them, except colonel Parker, the lord Castlemain, and Mr. Brown.

This informant says, That about the beginning of February, there came over a tall young gentleman alone, who was particularly recommended to this informant by Pigaut. This informant furnished the said person with a horse, and young Berkenhead conducted him till he met with his uncle. The said person returned again within a week from London, and captain Berkenhead with him. They came into Tucker's at Sandway, while this informant and colonel Parker was there, who was newly come from France, and was going to London; but meeting with this person, he returned with him to the sea-side, and they both went over the same night, the boat having orders to attend every night till that gentleman came. And this informant, by what he has heard since, does believe the said person might be the duke of Berwick.

The earl of Clencarty and major-general Dorrington went over likewise with capt. Gill, when they escaped from the Tower, as did also colonel Parker, who were all brought down by Berkenhead.

Col. Fielding came over about a year ago.

Col. Fountain has gone over backward and forward several times, and hath brought goods.

Berkenhead has gone over himself several times.

Moysy and Bradshaw went away together after the riot at the Savoy.

An ancient gentlewoman went over about a year and half ago, she lay at Harrison's.

There was one Mrs. Elliot too that went over, who lay at Harrison's.

Colonel Parker's wife, and one Mrs. Mary, who was concerned in Crosby's business, went over; they also lay at Harrison's.

Mr. Noseworthy went for France about two months ago, he came from France some considerable time before.

JAMES HUNT'S INFORMATION, concerning Captain Berkenhead.

PAPER THE FOURTEENTH.

(Copy.) This informant saith, That it is about three years he hath been concerned with captain William Berkenhead; that the first time he came to his house, it was with sir Adam Blaire, and he told him he came from France.

Some little time after that, he came to this informant with Thomas Gibbs; and then Berkenhead proposed to this informant to be concerned in sending letters and goods to France, and in receiving them from thence; which this informant consented to, and hath carried on that business ever since, by order of the said Berkenhead. This informant hath received letters from France, that were directed to Berkenhead, under the names of West, East, South, Fish, and some other names; and the letters were either delivered to him, or sent to him by his order, till February last.

This informant hath likewise received letters from the said Berkenhead, or by his order, which were sent to France: some of these letters were directed by the name of North, which Berkenhead told this informant were for the lord Melfort: some of the letters were directed to Mr. Scot, a merchant, and those were for the president at Calais; some for Abra. Stock, merchant; and those were for Pigaut of Calais, as Berkenhead told this informant. These letters were sent backward and forward; sometimes once a week, sometimes every fortnight, and sometimes longer, as it might happen.

This informant saith further, That he hath received several parcels of goods from France, that were on Berkenhead's account, and he either received them from this informant or sent for them, in order to their being carried to London.

This informant saith further, That the persons he remembers Berkenhead brought to him in order for their going for France, were first the e— of A—, who went over about three years ago, and Berkenhead brought him, who brought the said e— likewise a second time the last summer, but he did not then go for France.

Berkenhead brought to this informant the lord G—, who went for France, as also Mr. Viner. The said Berkenhead brought one of sir James Montgomery's centinels, and sent the other.

He brought sir Andrew Forrester, and his son, about a year ago; and one Dr. Taylor was brought or sent by Berkenhead, as also Crossby.

He either brought or sent sir George Barclay, and captain Williamson, who went for France about two years ago.

Berkenhead brought or sent major Holms several times, about two years ago.

When colonel Parker, lord Clencarty, and major Dorrington escaped from the Tower, Berkenhead brought them down when they went for France.

Berkenhead conducted colonel Feilding when he went to France, and either brought or sent Moysy and Bradshaw.

Berkenhead brought Mrs. Elliot, and the old lady that was with her was brought by his order.

Berkenhead brought Mrs. Parker, and Mrs. Mary that went for France; he likewise brought or sent Mr. Noseworthy, who went lately over.

Berkenhead brought the tall young gentleman from London, in February last, when they met colonel Parker at Tucker's, and went away together for France; and several others have been brought down to go for France; and others coming over from France, having been carried up to London by Berkenhead, or his order, whose names the informant doth not know, or not remember.

This informant saith further, That Berkenhead went for France immediately after the queen's death, and carried over the news of it; he was absent about a month, and this informant saw him at his return; he went and came in Gill's boat. He told this informant, that he had been at St. Germain's, that he had seen the king, the queen, and the prince; and that he had been ill upon the road.

This informant saith further, That Berkenhead went for France about December last, and this informant saw him when he came back again. To the best of this informant's remembrance, some persons came over with Berkenhead, and he believes sir George Barclay and major Holms were the persons that came with him.

This informant saith further, That Berkenhead went another time into France, besides what has been already mentioned, but he don't remember when it was.

This informant saith further, That a little after the discovery of the Plot, Berkenhead went to Deal, to take an account of the ships that were there, which he sent for France, there being a boat then come over; and he likewise sent at the same time a printed list of the names that were afterwards in the proclamation, which list he had from this informant, who received it from London.

The DEPOSITION of JAMES EWBANKS.

PAPER THE FIFTEENTH.

(Copy.) This deponent says, he has served sir William Perkins as a groom about a year; he was never with sir William Perkins upon any country journey but once, and that was in January last; they set out from sir William's house at Bushy on a Thursday, and lay that night at Stony-Stratford, and the next day they came to Leicester, and staid there till Sunday morning; there were two persons that met him there, one, as he remembers, was called captain Yarborough, son of sir Thomas Yarborough; the other was a parson, but he don't remember to have heard his name. One captain Scudamore went with his master to Leicester.

This deponent saith, that captain Yarborough's boy told him that the parson and his master were come from as far as York: the next day being Saturday, his master, captain Scudamore, and captain Yarborough, and the parson, were above stairs together, and several persons came in and out to them, but he does not know who they were.

Sir William came from Leicester on Sunday morning with captain Scudamore; and the other two went away about the same time, and his master was at home again at Bushy on Monday night.

That on St. Valentine's day last, the 14th of February, this deponent came from Bushy to London, by his master's orders, and brought three horses, which he set up at the George Inn in Holborn; his master had been in London some time before.

As soon as this deponent had set up his horses, he went to his master's lodgings at Mrs. Carrant's in Norfolk-street; he once talked of going out of town that day, but afterwards he told him he would not go till next morning, and that he should get the horses ready.

This deponent came to his master about seven on Saturday morning, and he bid him saddle the horses, for he intended to go home that day. This deponent came to his master again about eleven the same morning, and he gave him leave to go see a friend, and bid him be back at four o'clock, for that he would go home; but he did not go till Monday, and then Mr. Holms went with him. His master came up again from Bushy the Friday following, the 21st of February, and came up then with four horses; Abraham, another of sir William's servants, riding up one: when they came to the George inn, his master bid him get his own pad, and another horse which was as easy as that, ready by the next morning five o'clock, for two gentlemen would then come to ride out: and the horses were accordingly provided, one being his master's pad, and the other he hired of the ostler. His master sent this deponent a note that night to direct him to go very early next morning to Kensington, and enquire for Mr. Brown, belonging to the king's confectionary or kitchen, as well as he can remember, who lodged within a door or two of the way that turns up to the king's house; and he was to tell the said Brown, that he was sir William Perkins's servant, and came from the gentleman that lodged at the confectioner's over against Grays-Inn.

This deponent was accordingly at Kensington about eight in the morning, and spoke with the said Brown, who bid him put his horse up at the Red-Lion, and he would come to him; and the said Brown followed him immediately to the inn, and bid him tell the gentleman, he had nothing to send: but he took this deponent's almanack, and writ down in it, that he would be in town himself within two hours. This Brown was a thin man, between thirty and forty years old.

This deponent went immediately from Kensington to the confectioner's, and spoke with the gentleman who lodged there, he thinks his name was Rogers, he spoke broad Scotch, was an elderly man, with a reddish face, big nose, and wide mouth: this deponent shewed the gentleman what was writ in his almanack, and he tore it out. From thence this deponent went to his master at his lodgings in Norfolk-street: he told his master what message he had brought from Kensington, and that he had carried it to the confectioner's. His master asked what the gentleman said; and this deponent told him, he presented his service to him, and if he wanted him, he would be at home.

Upon which his master said, it was very well, and bid him go to the inn, and stay there till he sent for him.

When this deponent came back to the inn, he found that the two gentlemen who were to ride out the horses, were come to the inn, who accordingly rid out, and returned again in two or three hours time.

This deponent says, his master sent for him about three or four o'clock in the afternoon, and sent him back to Bushy with his fellow-servant and three of the horses: but his master's pad was to be left in town; and he gave no directions when this deponent should come to him again; and he has not seen his master since.

This deponent says, that to each of the horses they brought up, there was a case of pistols.

There were three other horses at the George inn, which sir William Perkins told this deponent were belonging to some friends of his, and bid him when he was there take care they had their meat.

When sir William Perkins came to town at St. Valentine-Tide, he gave this deponent from his lodgings two saddles to carry up to the inn for two of those horses, which he bid this deponent take care of.

This deponent says, that sir William Perkins came to the George-inn on Saturday the 22nd of February about twelve o'clock, and Mr. Lewis came with him. Sir William Perkins asked this deponent whether he had any more than a couple of saddles, and he saying he had not: then sir William told Mr. Lewis, he had had but twenty-two saddles; upon which Mr. Lewis answered, there must be a mistake then, and he would see how it was, and go to the places where he had bought them.

On Monday the 24th of February this deponent received a letter from his master, directing him to carry a letter to Richard Evans his coachman in Warwickshire, by which he was ordered to dispose of the goods he knew of, to lett the grounds, and sell the two mares. This deponent delivered the said letter to Richard, who thereupon fetched the boxes from Mr. Hayward's, which this deponent and the said Richard carried thither about Michaelmas last; and when the said boxes were brought from Mr. Hayward's this deponent and the said Richard buried them in sir William Perkins's orchard. This deponent has heard since, that those boxes were filled with arms, but he did not know it before, for his master had bid Richard take care of them, as Richard's goods. And further this deponent says not.

The INFORMATION of JONAS CHAMBERLIN, taken upon oath the 27th March, 1696.

PAPER THE SIXTEENTH.

(Copy.) The examinant saith, he is coachman to my lord Feversham: that Mr. Lewis, his gentleman of the horse, came to this informant some days before the Plot was discovered, and asked if he knew where any horses were to be hired for some gentlemen to go fifteen or sixteen miles out of town; and the informant directed him to Mascall, who lived in the same yard, where Mr. Lewis hired two horses the next morning; but an hour after, or some short time, he sent the postilion to let Mascall know that he should not use them; and afterwards Mr. Lewis sent the informant to pay Mascall, as he did, and to take back the half guinea.

The examinant saith, That about the same time six horses were brought into my lady Arlington's stables, with a note to the informant to take care of them, together with the postilion and helper. The same evening, or the next morning, Mr. Lewis came himself, and desired the informant and postilion to take care of the said horses, and that they should have something for their pains. The informant asked Mr. Lewis whose horses they were, and he answered, a friend of his, and they would not stay above a night or two.

The examinant saith, that two gentlemen whom he did not know, came twice to see the said horses, and there was a little man with them, who, as he supposes, was a servant: that two or three days after, the same little man came to the postilion and helper, and took out two of the horses, and brought them in again the same evening; the said little man gave six-pence to a boy to ride one of the horses, being unwilling to lead him.

The horses went out with holsters, saddles, but he does not remember he saw any pistols.

The said horses were there about ten days, except two or three, which were, within three days of their being brought in, carried to a stable Mr. Lewis had at St. James's, as the postilion told him, and where my lord Feversham's horses stand: that afterwards three of the horses were seized in my lady Arlington's stables by the king's officers.

This examinant saith, my lord Feversham keeps but two or three horses for his own use, and two or three horses for servants.

The INFORMATION of JOHN ALLEN, taken upon Oath the 27th March, 1695.

PAPER THE SEVENTEENTH.

(Copy.) The informant is postilion to my lord Feversham: that about seven or eight days before the discovery of the Plot, Mr. Lewis hired two horses of Mascall, the informant being present, and Lewis gave Mascall half a guinea in earnest.

Mr. Lewis saw another horse in the farrier's stable in the same yard, but did not hire him.

The informant saith, That the same day Mr. Lewis hired the two horses of Mascall, he sent the informant about eleven o'clock to tell him he should not use them.

The informant saith, That about eight or nine days before the Plot was discovered, six horses were brought to my lady Arlington's stables, and delivered to the informant, for the use of Mr. Lewis, who came himself the next morning to the stables, and bid the informant take care of them, and that he should have something for his pains. That the same evening these horses first came in, the informant and the helper went with two of the said horses to my lord Feversham's stable at St. James's, where he left them, and brought another back again; which he did by the order of Mr. Lewis, as it was delivered to him by one of the men that came in with the said horses. The same man brought in a seventh horse, and afterwards carried away three, so there remained only three in my lady Arlington's stables. Mr. Fosset an officer came to see them, and owned them to be his; but before this, there came two gentlemen to the stables to see the horses: they had a little black man with them who afterwards came and rid out two of the horses for several hours, and brought them again; he had the horses out by Mr. Lewis's order.

My lord Feversham keeps two grooms and four or five saddle-horses, and Mr. Lewis as many; he has known eight or nine saddle-horses in the stable at a time, some being my lord Feversham's horses, and the rest for the account of Mr. Lewis.

The examinant saith, that the three horses in my lady Arlington's stable were, after the Plot broke out, seized and carried away by the king's officers. Mark of JOHN + ALLEN.

INFORMATION of STEP. MASCALL, of whom Mr. Lewis hired two Horses, taken upon Oath, the 27th March, 1696.

PAPER THE EIGHTEENTH.

(Copy.) This informant saith, that he lived at the time of the discovery of the late horrid conspiracy in Somerset-House-Yard, kept a victualling-house, and likewise letts horses, and is since removed to the Strand.

That about nine or ten days before the said discovery, one Jonas, coachman to my lord Feversham, came to the examinant and told him my lord Feversham's gentleman Mr. Lewis, would hire two or three horses of him, if he had any; the examinant said he had; and the next morning, Mr. Lewis came to the examinant and hired two horses of him at eight shillings a-day for the two, during the time they were out, which, as near as the examinant can remember, was on Saturday morning. Mr. Lewis asked the examinant, what furniture he had for the said horses; and not liking it, and saying particularly he must have curb-bridles, undertook to provide furniture himself; and accordingly the examinant saw two or three saddles with holsters and bridles, brought by a young lad into my lord Feversham's stables. Lewis, when he went away, left half a guinea in earnest with the examinant, and said he would presently send for the horses; but about two hours after, sent word that he should have no occasion for them; but this examinant said, he would be paid for the day; and Lewis sent him six shillings in silver, the half guinea being returned to him. The examinant asked Lewis when he hired the horses, whither they were to go? Lewis answered, they were for gentlemen to ride out. This examinant asked him how long his horses would be out; Lewis answered, he could not tell, it might be one day, two, or three.

The horses Lewis hired were about fourteen hands high. The examinant had a third horse, but Lewis did not like him, being too little.

The examinant heard that Mr. Lewis spake to John Chip, my lord Feversham's farrier, to hire more horses; and he saw Lewis look upon another horse that stood in Chip's stable.

The examinant saith, that a day or two before he saw six horses in my lord Feversham's stable, which he heard were newly bought in Smithfield; and my lord Feversham's coachman told the examinant these horses were to go out with his horses, but knew not whither: they imagined they might be for some muster.

The examinant saith, About a week after, Lewis, or some body from him, came to his daughter, and would have hired the two horses again; but when the examinant came home, he would not let him have them, having baffled him the time before. The examinant heard no more of him.

PAPER THE NINETEENTH.

(Copy.) That he was sent into France about the time of the siege of Mons, and by sir John Cockram, to acquaint king James he could do him some service by his interest among the Presbyterians. That he had acquaintance with two leading men in the south of Scotland, in each of the fifteen counties and bailywicks, and could bring two leading ministers and two country-gentlemen in each, who would be active, at least passive: that he wanted money to go through the work. He told him he had received 15 or 1800*l.* at London, and that he had distributed it faithfully for the king's service: he thinks he said the money was sent for Buchan or Canon, who were then in the Highlands; but he had been persuaded to give 500*l.* to sir James Montgomery or his brother; he desired now 3,000*l.* for the king's service.

Ferguson told him two years ago, that he helped sir John Cockram to the above-mentioned 1,500*l.* or 1,800*l.*

When he came into France upon this message, he applied himself to sir Edward Hales, and he delivered his message to king James, who bid him thank sir John Cockram for his fidelity, but the money could not be had: and king James gave him 20 Lewis d' ors for his journey, sir John Cockram told him, if he had bills for the money, he should put them into a tooth-pick-case, and thrust them up his fundament, in case of his being in danger to be taken.

Sir John Friend brought him acquainted with Ferguson, who was very great with him.

He heard Ferguson say, he thanked God he had grace and time to repent of the villanies he had committed against king Charles and king James: when the king heard it, the water stood in his eyes for joy. This was at Symond's tavern.

Vernatti gave him a couple of Ferguson's books, but he burnt them.

He heard Ferguson say, that he was engaged with sir John Friend, and was to go along with him; and sir John told him he would bring in a great many men.

He has been in company with sir John Friend, Ferguson, sir William Perkins, captain Ridley, who was formerly a sea-captain, Richardson, and Edmonds. BRICE BLAIR.

PAPER THE TWENTIETH.

Worthy Sir;

(Copy.) I expected more accommodation to write, or else I had begun sooner this day; for yesterday I was detained till ten o'clock at night in a crowd, before I could get to my lodgings, in a cold hole, without fire, table, or so much as a chair. I will begin where I left off at my last examination, and I have little more to speak of, but the arguments used by sir John Cockram, to induce king James to give him money to go through with the work; that if he did not give the Presbyterian party in Scotland full liberty of conscience, he would wade through a sea of blood to get thither; and desired king James to remember, that it was that party that cast the balance in the civil wars, when king Charles the first's forces had even quite beat the parliament's armies out of the field, and had drove most of them into their garrisons. King James told me, that he was always for liberty of conscience, and desired me to acquaint sir John, that he would let him have the same on the word of a king. This I thought fit to acquaint the council with, that such a leading man as sir John, who owes the late king James his life and estate, might be narrowly looked after upon any apprehensions of danger in that country. There and then began my misfortunes; for I have never had a comfortable or happy hour since, the late king giving me at that time a verbal order to head what men I could get in and about London, to mount upon any occasion for his service.

The winter after I came from France, as I remember, I came to be acquainted with sir John Friend, and after some considerable time and intimate acquaintance, I told him the whole business, and finding myself unable in the purse, I offered him the command, who by degrees accepted of the same, and was assisting to me in money, but sparingly. I can say but little more of him, having made an ample confession already; but that king James was very well pleased with my proceeding in the business, as I was informed by Mr. Harrison, who shewed me several letters both from my lord Melford, and afterwards from secretary Carroll, to that effect: and that sir John Friend did believe that sir John Fenwick would command the faction he engaged with, and that sir John Friend told me, which as I hope for mercy I had forgot till this morning, that my lord M——, and colonel Fountain were to be of the same party, if not regiment, which Fountain himself confessed to me afterward. As for sir John Fenwick, I never saw him but twice or three times in company with sir John Friend, and that was in Jonathan's coffee-house; the last time he did not come into the public room, but sent for sir John Friend out into another, where they staid together about half an hour, or thereabouts, and that was a few days before this horrid and bloody villany broke out.

Though I accumulate guilt upon guilt on myself, yet I shall be loth even for my own safety, that any man should speak more than myself, in what I know. I shall relate one passage, which has hitherto escaped my memory: I think it was about three years ago, I was walking up High Holborn, where one Mr. Gray, a non-sweater, was drinking with one, a new convert, a little man, who had been a fellow in one of the Universities, I think Oxford, but his name I cannot light on for my heart's blood. Mr. Gray called me in, desired me to sit down, and told me, that this honest gentleman, meaning the little man, would be glad to be acquainted with me, and that he had been a great sufferer for the good cause, as he termed it: to be short, our acquaintance is contracted, I met him several times afterwards, and at last he told me, that that unhappy man Mr. Chernock, desired to meet me where and when I would please to appoint him, where would be only major Lowick, Mr. Chernock himself, and Mr. Pendergrass, a very honest gentleman, though I did not know him. We met, and after some discourse they fell on that of seizing the king's person, and of carrying him to Deal, where Mr. Pendergrass told me, he had a friend, an officer of one of the forts there, if I am not mistaken, where there should be a boat ready to carry him over to France; that he would undertake it with twelve men well mounted and well armed; and that 2,000*l.* would be requisite to carry on the work: to which the little man answered, I know of one. I was struck with horror and amazement to think of the extravagancy of the thing, if there had been nothing else; and finding Lowick to be of the same sentiments I was, I freely and briskly told the company, that if I had known the design they had, I would not have met them: that though it was but seizing the king's person, it was equally criminal as an assassination, for his person behoved to be in great danger as well as his liberty; and that I would never act any thing of that nature, but dissuade all mankind from all such desperate criminal attempts. Well then, says he, let there be no more of it, I have done, and in a little time after went away: whether it was this Mr. Pendergrass, or another, I cannot tell: but if it was he, he is a pretty tall black man, if I am not mistaken, and formerly belonged to the Temple. I was uneasy and came away with Lowick, where we walked by Middle-Row in Holbourn, for a considerable time, in the broad street, it being fair moonlight: I begged of him for God's sake, that he would never attempt any such thing, which would undoubtedly be his ruin, and that I might never hear any more of any thing of that nature; for it was misprision of treason even to hear and not reveal it, which I would not do, as I told him, because I did not doubt but that we had already crushed it to death, being but an embryo: he told me, he was clearly of my opinion, and would take my advice. But what infernal fury has inspired him since, I cannot tell; for Mr. Bertram told me, when I asked him whether Lowick was concerned or not, that he was very forward. This, I hope, will excuse me, though a criminal, in not revealing it, because I nipped it in the bud; for if I had not, the villainy at that time might have been attempted, if not perpetrated.

I never heard any more of that horrid concern till last year, Mr. Bertram came to give me a visit at my lodgings; and after we had set there a-while, when he was going away, I told him, I would go out and walk with him a little; and so we went and walked a-while in the Charter-house-yard; and after we had walked a-while, we sat down, and amongst some other discourse, he told me, that Mr. Chernock had engaged him with others to assassinate the king, and that the thing was to have been done last spring on the road, as he went to Flanders; and that it had been certainly attempted had they not received contrary orders from St. Germaines, the very day before the king was to go. I told him, that I thanked God that it had miscarried, and he more especially had reason so to do, in regard he was more nearly concerned, and that it had prevented a great deal of innocent blood to be shed on both sides; and begged of him for Christ his sake, never to think of any thing of that nature for the future, and that the blessing of God could not go along with such undertakings, or words to that effect. This he knows to be a truth, and this I believe he neither can, or will deny.

I promised to my lord keeper to give a more particular account of that which should have been my own troop, which I will not only do, but likewise an account of the whole regiment, as near as I can: and first as to sir John Friend's own troop, one Eyans, who had formerly been a lieutenant, was to have been his captain-lieutenant, who was to have brought him in some men ready mounted from about Greenwich and other parts; but I believe he was to seek for his other officers, unless it was colonel Slaughter, who had been commissary-general of the musters to king James in Ireland, before his defeat of the Boyne, afterwards lieutenant-colonel to my lord Maccarty's regiment of foot. Sir John Friend told me, after he was acquainted with this gentleman, of whom he was very fond, that he would bring him ten horses unmounted, and that sir John had a good mind to make two lieutenant-colonels, whereof he was to be one, which I grumbled at; and when he found that, he told me, that colonel Slaughter should command the non-swearing parsons, whereof he believed he had a whole troop. I heard captain Ridly likewise say, that he could bring him in a troop; but I never heard it from sir John.

I am interrupted here by the master of the prison, desiring me to finish my confession by six o'clock at furthest; which is impossible for me to do, sir, in regard I began this day after twelve o'clock, being kept in a crowd yesterday all day, not having liberty to go to my sorry lodging until ten o'clock, at what time I wrote a letter to Mr. Gibbons, at a cold broken window, having neither seat to sit on, nor table to write on; so that I thought the best way was to send you what I have done at present, and to beg time and some better accommodation for the rest; for I have a great deal more to say, which I bring down to this present conspiracy, as far as I know, and no further. This, I hope, dear sir, will excuse me to the most honourable board: and so I am, worthy sir, your most affectionate and most faithful servant,

B. BLAIR.

PAPER THE TWENTY-FIRST.

Honoured Sir;

(Copy.) I left off, as I remember, near to where I spoke of colonel Slaughter, that he was to command the non-swearing clergy, because he was a minister's son himself; I shall now come to my own troop, that fool's paradise of mine, and tell you, that I omitted one Wrae, who keeps a tobacco and brandy-shop in Moorfields, and was to be my quarter-master, who promised to bring me in a considerable number, whereof a great many could mount themselves; for I did not trust myself to every individual person, but to those who I found to be men of the greatest acquaintance and influence amongst the Jacks: but all this was on king James's landing; and I write this more upon the account to let the king and government know his friends from his active enemies, than for any other reason, I being but one witness against them. As to captain Fisher's troop, I leave that to his own relation, for he was to have been our eldest captain; and if his memory fail him, I will endeavour to refresh it, if required; only by the by, I have made both him and Bertram so sick of the villainy, that they were at that time ready to vomit it up, if they have not actually done it, for I hear they are both in custody. This I speak without reflection, for I have very great hopes that both those men wish me well; but if they have spoke more than the truth of me, God forgive them, for I heartily do. I must go back a little to my own troop. There is one Kelly at the Red-Lion in Smithfield, promised me 35 Irish men, all ready mounted, upon a descent; and there was one captain Kelly to have commanded them. There was one captain Hopkins and one Stringer promised to bring in a troop: I was promised by one Ricsone to bring in all or most of the jacobite bailiffs and their followers about town: I was promised likewise by one Jenines at the Three Crickets in Crooked-lane, 20 men ready mounted, and he was to be a lieutenant, having been a life-guard-man formerly, with several others, whom time will not permit me to mention at present, and which I shall do with all candour and truth, if commanded by the most honourable board.

Mr. Hall, alias Cole, told me, that one Mr. lieutenant Linn was to be his lieutenant; one Robin Ainsworth in Southwark his cornet, and Gillibrand his quarter master: But this puts me in mind of something of consequence; as Mr. Fisher and I were discoursing of going to France, for he pressed me very much last summer so to do, and that he could do king James considerable service by going thither, in which he knows I was very cool, for I had been there too much already. I enquired of this gentleman, Mr. Hall, which was the best, safest, and readiest way of going thither; and he told me, that after king James's own boat was discovered, or like to be discovered, if I remember aright, there was a French boat went and came frequently from Calais to Deal, in the dead time of the dark nights, with as much safety as to go from London to Gravesend.

There is one Mr. Pits a non-swearing parson, who since this revolution used sometimes to live at Norwich, and sometimes at London, with whom I contracted an intimate acquaintance ever since; soon after the business of La Hogue, he told me, That the city of Norwich was very loyal to king James, as he termed it: He is now gone to Long Melford, and practices physic there, by the name of Dr. Thompson; whilst in town here amongst other discourse he told me, That if he had his charges born and credentials from some persons of quality here, who were king James's friends, he could do him considerable service: and did give me the list of several considerable gentlemen, as well in the county of Suffolk, as Norfolk, who would, as he said, prove very zealous for king James's service, either in their persons or purses, or both; and they are these,

* * * * *

a great knot of Jacobite gentry near to Lin, * * * * * a knot in or near Long Melford, a knot of Jacobite gentry near Bury. I should have forgot almost all their names, if I had not luckily taken their names in an old Almanack I had about me, and which I have kept still. A while after, this Wrae went into those parts with one Mr. Sincho, a hosier near to Aldgate, about business of trade, and I desired them to make particular enquiry of the truth of Mr. Pit's relation, as near as their own safeness would permit them. They met accidentally with one Dr. Buck of Ipswich, if I am not mistaken, who went with them to Norwich, where he made them acquainted with several of the Jacobites, particularly with my lord of Yarmouth's chaplain; who not only affirmed the truth of Mr. Pit's relation, but named forty gentlemen more, as they told me, not only in Norfolk and Suffolk, but likewise in Lincolnshire and the Isle of Ely; and Mr. Wrae told me upon his return, that he found a great many Jacobites wherever he travelled, and was informed by some of them, not only of the meaner but better sort of gentry. Upon which I went to Mr. Harrison, and told him the whole business, and that if he thought fit, I would undertake the business, having credentials for Mr. Pit and myself. I proposed the late bishop of Norwich, and he told me he would discourse him about him. The next time I saw him, he told me he had been with the bishop, and with my lord M—— but that the late bishop told him, That the E— of Y——, was the fittest man to treat with in that affair. Mr. Harrison told me, there would be no great matter done in that business, in regard that he thought there were men of quality in most counties to do for king James's interest; and that to his certain knowledge as to Suffolk, there was one there already, who was a soldier and had a commission from king James to raise a regiment of horse, as occasion should serve: So I laid aside all thoughts of the business more, till the last time he sent for me, and which was the last time I saw him, and then he told me, he had shewn the list to my lord Y——, that my lord Y—— knew all those honest gentlemen very well, and would be glad to see me sometime about Piget Ally in the evening, and named a house, but I protest before God I forgot: I told him, being glad to be gone, that I could not meet him at that place to morrow, being to bring captain Fisher the next day, which was on a Friday the week preceding the proclamation, to sir John Friend at his brew-house in the Minories; so that I could not conveniently wait on my lord till the Monday following, and that day I saw my name in the paper that came out. We missed of sir John Friend on the Friday, as Mr. Fisher well knows, whether he would have revealed any thing to us, I cannot tell.

As for that Mr. Picquet, I have seen him here at London about half a year after the revolution, in company of Mr. Noseworthy and sir Eneas M'Fearson, I saw him accidentally in the coach I was to go in from Paris to St. Germain. He asked me, If I would enquire for any person? To be short, he provided a lodging for me, and brought me to the sight of sir Edward Hales: He provided lodging for me at Paris after I left St. Germain; and if I be not mistaken, he told me it was by the king's orders; for he told me who sent me, and what my business was; he has been three times there and back again since. He is a man of very good sense, language and learning, and I believe he knows as much of king James's affairs, as any man of his quality and age in England; for he knows and is intimate with most of king James's friends here of any consideration, from the highest to the lowest; only sir John Friend has hated him of late, and for this reason; At the time of colonel Parker's escape out of the Tower, Mr. Harrison came to sir John, and importuned him to lend him 100*l.* to facilitate Parker's escape, for otherwise he told him it could not be effected, and promised him upon his honour, to see him repaid, but that qua. [sic in orig.] Priest, he could not give bond; but Mr. Picquet being to go over about that time, told him, that he would see him paid, and that when he returned, sir John's money should be returned to him. The money he received at St. Germain, but never paid sir John at his return; which if my memory fail me not, was about last Christmas was a year, except what I got of it. For I expending money on his account, was very needy, and begged sir John to help me to some, who absolutely refused me, unless I could get 20*l.* from Mr. Picquet, and he would allow it; which I got with a great deal of difficulty, and afterwards 20*l.* more, both which I had paid at seven or eight payments, by the means of Mr. Harrison and my importunity, occasioned by my wants.

Dear Sir, I am almost spent with grief, cold and want, for though I had money, yet I can get nothing to me, I have contracted a great cold, with a pain in my head and eyes, so that I write in a great deal of misery, when I am forced to keep down my head to my broken stool; it now begins to grow dark, especially in my apartment, and near the time I promised to finish my confession; if possible, I shall to-morrow, or when commanded, if God permit me life and health; and consider, Sir, that I am forced sometimes, to think an hour before I can write a line; so that I hope the most honourable board will pardon me. In the mean while, I am, Worthy Sir, your most faithful, and most humble servant,

PAPER THE TWENTY SECOND.

Honoured Sir;

(Copy.) After I had left Somerset-house, for I was glad to be gone, as I wrote to you before, having some apprehensions of danger to my own person, in those narrow and dark apartments of father James's; as I was going to my own lodgings, I begun to consider with amazement, what Mr. Harrison had told concerning king James's order, and what to do in the business, how to reveal it, and not be known, and that I might not come to be an evidence; at last I thought to do it by a letter, without a name, remembering the gun-powder-plot, how it came to be discovered, and for my own preservation in case of afterclaps, to have taken an exact copy of the letter, and to have preserved it carefully; would to God I had continued in that resolution, I might then have been happy, whereas now I am miserable, without God's mercy, and the king's. As to the order I desired Mr. Fisher, when I met him the next day, to make particular enquiry after it, which I thought might prove to my advantage, upon any future danger, which I then plainly did foresee; and told him, now, dear Fisher, says I, if you should come to be examined upon this account, you will not deny, but I have had an abhorrence of this damned business all along: ay, that I will, says he again, readily, for I can do it with a good conscience, or words to that effect. This is truth. So help me God.

I came to be acquainted with captain Wallbank, by the means of Mr. Clark, the apothecary in Watling-street. I had seen him formerly at Mr. Barnesley's coffee-house, and at the Hole in the Wall in Baldwin's-gardens but never had any particular discourse with him, till such time as Mr. Clark told me, that the same Wallbank and captain Courteney desired to see me. I was not fond of their company, because Wallbank had the repute of an atheist, especially when in drink: I thought it but common civility to give him a meeting, which I did; I found him all in the air, Wallbank I mean, for the other spoke never a word that I could lay hold on, and I take him to be a close-thinking man; as for the other, he was all in the clouds, telling, that there were a great many gentlemen, in the countries where he had been, would take arms for king James upon occasion. Then they begun to hard drinking. I was uneasy, pretended earnest business to be gone, and so left them; but there was not one word of either assassinating, or seizing the king, as I hope for salvation and mercy; only I answered to one, who asked me, but I cannot remember for my life who it was that asked me, if I thought Courteney and Wallbank were in that conspiracy; I told them, I knew not, but was afraid they were, in regard I had heard a whispering, that they were embarked with captain Stow.

This is, worthy sir, all I can say of the truth, and no more, nor no less. If my memory has failed me in any material point, I shall candidly confess it if a truth, or constantly deny any thing laid to my charge that is false to my last breath : and whereas the honourable Mr. Secretary Trumball was pleased to say, that I could remember times and places of several years ago, but could not that of fresher date, and that therefore my confession was not candid ; but, sir, I could not forget the siege of Mons, so famous over all Christendom, and that a man might more easily remember that, than something done but last week, if I had not kept a constant journal, which I never thought on.

As phlebotomy is absolutely necessary in the politic, as the natural body, yet it is every honest man's policy, as well as goodness, to mix justice with mercy, and to pull out the lesser offenders from the greater criminals ; for which reason I humbly implore his majesty's mercy, and earnestly beg of the most honourable board to intercede for me ; and if I be so happy as to owe the king a life, I will most willingly spend the rest of my days in his service, and spend my best blood to preserve his sacred person in any eminent danger. It is my interest as well as duty and gratitude so to do, for I could never expect either mercy or favour from king James, if ever he should return ; and truly, sir, though I may not be credited, this bloody villainy has very much staggered me both in my former loyalty, that I thought once that in duty I owed him, as in my affection ; and I believe, that this bloody and barbarous villainy will gain thousands of jacobites to be the king's friends, who were formerly his mortal enemies. Whereof, by all that's good, I shall make one, and not only that, but gain him as many friends as possible I can, if it please God and the king, to pardon me, and I am sure I can do it with a great many, and even with those who dare defend his person and government with their swords in their hands.

Men, sir, who know my temper, will hardly be induced to believe, that I can be guilty of such a bloody and hellish crime ; men, I mean, sir, of all persuasions, as well Protestants as Papists, Williamites, and Jacobites, as in some measure will appear by a gentleman's discourse, who came to the hatch of the gate, to give me a visit ; for he was not permitted to enter, but stood at the hatch before the two turnkeys. That as to the assassination only, he believed me to have as great abhorrence as any man in the nation ; this was out of the mouth of not only a Protestant, but of a steady and zealous friend to the government, and one with whom I have had a great many debates, even to heat formerly.

And now, sir, I am not only innocent of the assassination, by what I have already declared, but likewise, I am also ignorant of this sudden invasion, king James's being at Calais, or Dunkirk ; but what was talked on a good while ago of Dubart's going to the Northwards with fourscore transport ships, as also the duke of Berwick's being in town, till such time as I did read it in the first paper ; I am ignorant, I say, sir, or else let my soul never inherit the kingdom of heaven ; and this I write without any manner of equivocation, or mental reservation, for these are but lies, and God is the God of truth. It were a folly for me, even to madness, to devour an ox, and choak myself with the rump ; after I had thrown myself at the king's mercy, and had comfortable hopes given me to obtain his pardon, by a full, candid, and genuine confession : for I have declared but too much to take away my life besides, without his majesty's most gracious pardon, a great part of which, could never in human probability, have been proved against me : but when the most honourable board considers, which I humbly beg of them to do, for Christ's sake, how industriously the business was concealed from me, there will be no mystery in the thing.

And that it was carefully concealed from me, may evidently appear by captain Fisher's telling me, that sir George Barclay told him, that though I was a man of honour, as he termed it, and brave enough, yet I was timorous, and was positively enjoined, not to acquaint me with any thing that passed among them. This timorousness of mine was nothing else, but that they knew I abhorred their villainies, and were afraid I might have revealed them. This I'll take the blessed Sacrament on ; and if I should on that which is false, I should certainly be damned. This I hope Mr. Fisher will not deny, and if he does, he is the most perfidious wretch that ever God and nature framed.

I shall now come to close, sir, for God knows I am very ill and faint, and scarce able to write any more, and only acquaint you, that my information was true to the gentleman, who took me up, my lord Cuts's adjutant, for the same notice was given to Mr. Gibbons thereof, and to a third person also ; and though he was not taken, yet it was an evident demonstration of the sincerity of my intentions.—Worthy Sir, your most affectionate and most obedient servant,
BR. BLAIRE.

Mr. BLAIR'S INFORMATION of the 16th of March, 1695.

PAPER THE TWENTY-THIRD.

(Copy.) He saith, That towards the latter end of January last, as near as he can remember, he dined with sir John Friend, at the Castle Victualling-house, in the alley, on the west end of the Old Exchange in London, and captain Ridly was there. Captain Ridly told this examinant, That about ten days before, a Roman Catholic gentleman, whom he did not name, was sent over to king James, and that he believed he would bring over the last orders. Sir John Friend said, he knew of it, and that was all he heard him say. Ridly said, It was a gentleman of 60 years of age that went over, and that he was a very sensible man.

About a week after that meeting, this examinant met sir John Friend at Jonathan's coffee-house; and sir John Friend having an occasion of going to Holborn, took this examinant with him in his coach, as far as St. Martins-le-Grand; and while they were in the coach, sir John Friend talked to this examinant about the Toulon fleet's coming about, as also about his regiment; and he told this examinant, that it behoved them to be good husbands, for if the invasion, that was expected at the coming about of that fleet, should miscarry, he should not have money enough to carry on his trade; That he, sir John Friend, would only mount some poor officers, who could not mount themselves: That when the Toulon fleet should come about, he and a great many others would be taken up, if found, therefore he designed to abscond; but he, this examinant, might skulk about, and get men prepared as well as he could. This examinant answered, it would be impossible, for nobody then durst buy a pair of pistols; and sir John Friend added, that till the Brest and Toulon fleet were joined, he would not put his foot in the stirrup. He told this examinant further, That he had a great many back friends about him, but he believed it was through emulation, or envy; and that if he, this examinant, carried himself warily, he (sir John Friend) would be as good as his word to him, by which he understood he should not be put by being lieutenant-colonel to his regiment.

Bertram brought this examinant acquainted with Mr. Fisher three years ago, or more; he was very shy of him at first, and it was half a year before he disclosed himself to him; and it was half a year more before he brought him to sir John Friend: He don't know that Fisher has seen sir John Friend for near these two years past, but he came several times of late to this examinant, to bring him to sir John Friend, and a meeting was appointed on the Friday before the Proclamation came out, but they missed of one another.

This examinant saith further, That Bertram told him, that Chernock and Porter made themselves sure of a great many of the earl of Oxford's regiment. This examinant came accidentally into the company of one of them, whose name is Bale, an Irish man, and that was about the beginning of this winter. This examinant told him, by way of jest, that he heard there were a great many jacobites in that regiment: whose answer was, he believed a great many of the old men were jacobites in their hearts; but Bale by his discourse did not give him the least cause to suspect he was one. This examinant believes this Bale is of sir Francis Compton's troop.

This examinant saith, That about Christmas last was twelvemonth, Pigot came over from France, and he was then to have paid the 100*l.* that sir John Friend laid down for Parker's escape; either sir John Friend or Harrison, told this examinant, that Pigot had received at St. Germain's 80*l.* in money, and 20*l.* by a bill, which made up the 100*l.* that was to be paid to sir John Friend about the spring following. Sir John Friend told this examinant, that he believed he was cheated by that rascal Pigot, and he knew not how to help himself, for he durst not ask him for the money.

This examinant saith further, that sir John Friend had furnished him with several small sums of money, at several times, to drink with those he had engaged into the regiment; and this examinant having spent more money on that account than ever he had received from sir John Friend, this examinant spoke to him, to the best of his remembrance, about May or June last, and told him, that he had beggared himself to do king James and him service. Sir John Friend's answer was, he would give him no more money out of his pocket, but if he could make interest with Mr. Harrison, who was obliged in honour to pay him the 100*l.* he would assign this examinant 20*l.* of it. Thereupon this examinant went the next day to Mr. Harrison, insisting to have an order for the payment of the money, either under sir John Friend's hand, or by word of mouth; but sir John Friend said, they should have nothing under his hand. This examinant brought them together, and in his hearing sir John Friend told Mr. Harrison, he was obliged in honour to see him paid his money; and if Mr. Harrison would advance 20*l.* to this examinant, he, sir John Friend, would allow it out of the money to be paid him by Pigot. Harrison answered, he was not worth the money, but he would use his utmost endeavours to procure it; and accordingly the said Harrison paid this examinant thirteen guineas and ten shillings in silver, which made up the 20*l.* and Harrison told this examinant he received the sum from Pigot.

A little after Michaelmas last, this examinant being ill, desired sir John Friend to come to him, who accordingly came, and a few days after he writ to him for some more money; sir John Friend appointed him to come the next day to Jonathan's Coffee-house; and after some huffs and checks, he told this examinant, if by Mr. Harrison's means he could get another 20*l.* from Pigot, on account of the 100*l.* he would grant it. This examinant acquainted Mr. Harrison therewith, who said he would speak to sir John Friend; and the next time this examinant saw Mr. Harrison, he told him sir John Friend had granted the order, and accordingly this examinant received 15*l.* of the said 20*l.* by the hands of Mr. Harrison, at several payments, and 5*l.* part of the said 20*l.* was paid to this examinant by Mr. Pigot at Jonathan's Coffee-house, sir John Friend being present.

This examinant saith, that Richardson, a merchant upon Tower-hill, was the most intimate with sir John Friend. This examinant has dined at the Old King's-head about three months ago with sir John Friend, sir William Perkins, Richardson and Chernock, but then there were only general discourses.

Jurat, Mar. 17, 1695. Coram me, J. VERNON.

Worthy Sir ;

(Copy.)—I received your's very ill, being a-bed ever since I saw you ; I asked captain Kelly, meeting him accidentally in the Minories, about three months ago, as I remember ; we went in and drank two pots of drink, and I proposed to him the command of his countrymen, and he said he would command them willingly. I had spoke several times of him to the other Kelly, but never to himself before that time. As for Stringer I spoke to him myself, and proposed Hopkins to be his captain, with whom he was intimate ; but when I spoke to Hopkins myself, when he thought it time he would endeavour to do it, but he thought things were not ripe enough to that purpose : this was last summer, about the siege of Namur. As for Aynsworth, I spoke to him three years ago, but finding him engaged to Mr. Cole as cornet, I never spoke any thing to him since ; and this was about the time I brought Mr. Cole to sir John Friend. I am ready to faint. I am, your's till death,

BR. BLAIR.

Proceedings between the KING and THOMAS KENDALL and RICHARD ROE, in the King's Bench, on an Habeas Corpus upon a Commitment for High Treason.*

ON Thursday, October the 31st, 1695, the prisoners being brought up into court on the Habeas Corpus, the keeper of Newgate, to whom the writ was directed, returned the cause of their detainer to be a warrant under the hand and seal of sir William Trumball, knight, one of his majesty's most honourable privy council, and principal secretary of state, directed to the keeper of Newgate, or his deputy, prout sequitur. 'These are in his majesty's name to authorize and require you, to receive into your custody the bodies of Thomas Kendall and Richard Roe, herewith sent you, they being charged with high treason, in being privy to, and assisting the escape of sir James Montgomery, out of the custody of William Sutton, one of his majesty's messengers in ordinary, and charged with high treason. You are to keep them in safe and close custody, until they shall be delivered by due course of law : And for so doing this shall be your warrant. Given at the court at Whitehall, the 24th day of October, 1695.'

Sir Bartholomew Shower moved that the return might be read, and then that it might be filed. And Mr. Attorney owning that he had been attended with a copy of it, and having nothing to say against it, the same was accordingly filed.

Then sir Bartholomew Shower took exceptions to the return.

Sir Bart. Shower. My lord, I am of counsel for these two prisoners ; and what we desire at present is only that they may be bailed, though perhaps we might press to have them discharged, and that upon good reason.

To induce your lordship to bail them, I must beg your lordship's pardon, and I hope Mr. Attorney will hold me excused, if I make a question whether the person committing hath any authority for such a purpose ; it is for my clients, who think themselves aggrieved by this imprisonment ; and in truth they say, that they are somewhat hardly dealt withal in this case ; for the information against them is only for being privy to and assisting the escape of the centinels, who were privy to sir James Montgomery's escape : But this is fact, of which the court will not take notice, and therefore I shall confine myself to the return, as it appears before your lordship.

With submission I must insist upon it, that a secretary of state, quatenus secretary, cannot commit for treason or felony ; he is not an officer for such a purpose in common parlance. The word secretary, imports only a writer of letters or other escripts for a superior ; and as Spelman explains the word, this is the sense of it, with the addition of secrecy, of privacy ; and so is his glossary upon that word. He is not a privy counsellor quatenus a secretary, nor is he a justice ; and though perhaps in fact he may be in the commission, yet unless he hath taken the oath of that office upon a dedimus, he cannot act as such : And I have seen five or six privy counsellors at a time appearing at a sessions of the peace for this county, in the case of the duke of Bedford's power as custos rotulorum, to remove the clerk of the peace ; and when intimation was made to them of the justices oath, which they had not taken, they refused to vote, and did thereupon withdraw. Here sir William Trumball cannot be presumed or intended to be a justice of the peace, because the commitment by him is as secretary, and not as justice ; and so is the return : And upon the return, the authority by which he commits ought to appear, otherwise the return is vicious ; and here doth appear none but that of secretary. Now if the office of secretary doth not imply and carry in it a power of committing, then this commitment is erroneous.

Our constitution hath distributed the administration of justice, both in criminal and civil causes, into several courts, and hath appointed several officers for several purposes, some for criminal matters ; and in criminals some are to examine and commit, others to obey and carry, others to receive and keep; some to try and sentence, others to execute; each hath his proper province; And of those your lordship will take notice, as also of their several duties and powers, and so do our law books. But a secretary is a court officer of state, not relating to the administration of justice.

You take notice, as do our books, of headboroughs, constables, sheriffs, coroners, escheators, and the like: But neither Coke, Crompton, Fitzherbert, Smith, or any book which treats of the jurisdiction of courts, the pleas of the crown, or the officers of justice, do ever mention a secretary of state; his office rather relates to foreign negotiations than domestic; and if any home affairs fall under his cognizance, it is rather as an intelligencer, than with any relation to criminals, prisons, or gaolers, &c. In all the debates about the liberty of the subjects, and wrongful commitments, which were in parliament in 4 Car. 1, or 1628, and amongst all the precedents mentioned there upon each side, which are multitudes, there is none by a secretary: It is true, there are divers 'per mandatum dom' regis,' by warrant from the lords of the council. I have perused Dr. Franklin's Annals of king James the 1st, fol. 261, and Rushworth, vol. 1, 458, and can find none by a warrant from a secretary. I have read Coke's, Selden's, and Littleton's Arguments upon that subject, but see nothing of a secretary's commitment. And it seems very strange, if such a power were lodged in this state officer, that there should be no precedents for it in those times, when extrajudicial and general warrants were so frequent, that they became a grievance to the people, and such a one as laid the foundation for the Petition of Rights.

I shall not controvert the power of the council at present, because it doth not concern the present question: all that I can observe in the case is, that it first began to be practised in sir Lionel Jenkyns's time; and yet even in 1678, when the Popish plot had increased the number of prisoners to a wonderful degree, it is notoriously known, that the chief justice Scroggs was frequently and often sent for to Whitehall to examine, and commit, and grant warrants. And some time since, the secretaries of state have thrown that burden off from themselves upon their secretaries under them, who have been sworn justices of the peace; and Mr. Bridgeman hath accordingly executed the office of a justice of peace at Whitehall, and that frequently. It hath been a question, whether a chancellor or keeper of the great seal can commit? And the better opinion hath been, that he cannot: and it seems to be agreed by Glanvill's and other cases in Moore's Reports, 839, &c. that his commitment is illegal, unless for a cause within his jurisdiction, as a court of equity; and the matters must so appear. I must agree, that any man may apprehend another for felony or treason; but there is a vast difference between an arresting of a traitor or felon upon suspicion or knowledge, and a formal commitment to prison, with a charge of treason. And I am sure Mr. Attorney-General will not insist upon this reason; for then the consequence will be, that any man may commit as well as a secretary: and I suppose that doctrine will scarce be allowed, though I think that any man may as well as he. The reason of an apprehension upon suspicion, or hue and cry, or the like, is not to detain, but to carry to a constable or justice, as in 3 Inst. 52. Then here the gaoler doth not return that he detains him because he is guilty or suspected, but because by virtue of a warrant he is committed to his custody.

Besides, the reason of our law is against it; for a secretary cannot administer an oath. Now the law requires, that no man should be committed by an extrajudicial warrant, unless upon oath. If there be but a suspicion, there ought to be oath of the cause of that suspicion; for the person committing cannot commit upon another's suspicion, unless there be oath of some reasonable cause for it. He cannot take bail for any person accused, he cannot take a recognizance to prosecute: and I may very well challenge any man living to shew me any one recognizance ever returned into any court, that was taken by a secretary, either for appearance of a criminal, or for the prosecution of one: and the practice is always otherwise; for they have often taken bonds to the king, with condition to appear here. And your lordship and the court hath often had much trouble in that matter; for though they were bound to appear here, the court hath refused to record their appearance, because no recognizance returned or taken, whereupon to found such an appearance.

Now it seems strange, nay absurd, that our constitution, which we admire for its wisdom, should appoint an officer who should commit, and yet cannot give an oath whercon to found a commitment, that cannot bail, that cannot take any recognizance to prosecute: this is to make the liberty of the subject very precarious, notwithstanding the many laws and sayings of judges in favour of it.

A secretary is not obliged within the statutes that require justices to return the informations and examinations of the persons accused, and witnesses; which is a method prescribed by the wisdom of our ancestors, both for the service of our king and the subject; and may upon several occasions prove useful to each.

This I may say, that Mr. Secretary Coventry did scruple it; and upon good advice, even from sir William Jones, he took the oath of a justice of peace. Now, my lord, I think that those exceptions to this power of a secretary may very well be thought to render it so far a doubtful question, as to induce Mr. Attorney not to oppose our being bailed, to avoid any further mention of this or any other question.

But supposing that a secretary can commit, yet in this case the parties ought to be bailed according to the Habeas Corpus act [31 Car.

2, cap. 2, § 7.] ; for the act commands, that they shall be forthwith bailed, unless they be committed for treason or felony, specially mentioned and expressed in the warrant ; and if it be specially expressed, then upon prayer, if not indicted, they are to be bailed the last day, &c. Now here the commitment of a person charged with treason, if it goes no further, then unquestionably the parties ought to be admitted to bail, because that the high-treason is not specially expressed ; so a commitment for felony generally would bring a man within the benefit of the act to be bailed, because the species of the felony is not expressed. This is plain, and cannot be denied. Then I must further argue, that if the facts mentioned after the word high-treason be not, or cannot be treason, it must be allowed to me, that it is the same as if it had been for high-treason generally, and without more words : for if there be not a species of treason expressed, then we are still admissible to bail ; this must be acknowledged.

Now that the subsequent matter expressed after the word Treason is not any species of treason, I shall endeavour to make out thus : a being privy to, and assisting the escape of sir James Montgomery out of the custody of a messenger, and charged with high-treason, is not any species of treason, it is not treason.

First, I may with a great deal of colour make a question, Whether the rescuing or helping the escape of one in custody for treason, be treason, or only felony ? If the latter, then the commitment is erroneous.

At the common law, the helping any prisoner to escape was felony, and so is, 2 Inst. 589. Now the law in this respect is not altered otherwise than by 1 Edw. 2, de frangentibus prisonam, and that statute was rather to make it less penal than more ; and if to promote the escape of one imprisoned for treason, was at the common law but felony, then this statute seems not to make it a greater offence ; for it is in the negative, that none shall undergo judgment of life or member for the breaking of prison, unless the cause for which the imprisonment was, did require such a judgment, if the party were convicted.

The lord Hale, in his Pleas of the Crown, saith, that breach of prison turns into felony only, though the party were committed for treason ; though in another place he seems to be of another opinion. Now my argument to make this a doubt is this : by 2 Hen. 6, cap. ult. to break prison when committed for treason, is declared to be treason ; which would be needless, if it had been treason before. By 25 Edw. 3, nothing is to be treason, but what is there declared to be such ; and by 1 Mar. all treasons and declarations of treasons made by any act of parliament since 25 Edw. 3, are repealed. So that by this way of arguing, such escape was only felony.

There is one case, viz. Beusted's, 16 Car. 1, Jones Rep. 415, upon an insurrection in Surrey, where it is held, that if a man be committed for treason, and another breaks the prison, and by that means the traitor escapes, this was treason in the rescuer, and there was one accordingly indicted and arraigned ; but I find that he was acquitted ; and though the books say it was for want of full evidence, yet it is more than probable, that it was the best ingredient in his case, that the judges doubted what offence it was, whether treason or felony. Now that case is founded upon Stamford's Pleas of the Crown, 32, and all that is in Stamford is a quotation of a case in the year book, viz. in 1 Hen. 6, 5. That the escape of a traitor imprisoned was held treason : but there it is put with a quod nota, as a strange thing, and some call it petit treason : but however, it was a strange thing, since we find in 2 Hen. 6, an act of parliament made to declare it treason ; which is improbable that such a law should be made, if the judges had the year before justly condemned the poor rescuer. So that either they doubted the law of that case, or that case had some other ingredient in it than the book informs us of.

This is not for receiving, aiding, and comforting a traitor, knowing him to be such, as was the case of Abingdon, who aided Henry Garnet, the superior of the Jesuits, in 3 Inst. 138, but this is only for assisting the escape : but supposing that such an assistance to escape, or rescue of one committed for treason, were treason, and not felony, yet in this case, as this warrant is, it is neither felony nor treason ; for,

Secondly, Here is no legal commitment of sir James Montgomery ; and consequently the helping him to escape is not treason. My lord Coke 3 Inst. 70, on 1 Edw. 2, says, That a voluntary escape of a prisoner can be no felony, unless the prisoner be under lawful custody by a lawful warrant expressing the offence. Now there can be no pretence, but that the same rule must hold in case of a traitor's escape, as to the warrant of commitment, and lawfulness of custody, as doth in case of felony. Now if the party commanded to receive, or the party to whose custody he is committed, were no lawful officer, then such custody cannot make the rescuer guilty of any capital offence. Co. 2 Inst. 550, saith, That false imprisonment is not within the law in this case ; now there can be no lawful warrant in this case, because the officer was not a lawful one. This is not the case of one carrying to prison, for then it would have been so expressed ; but here it is under the custody of a messenger, and charged with treason, which supposes it a custody with a charge by way of commitment. Then my lord Coke explains what is a lawful warrant, and that is two-fold ; either when the offence appeareth by matter of record, as a Capias upon an indictment, inquisition, or presentment ; or when it doth not appear so, but only upon oath, that a felony is committed, and the party is committed for the same to gaol. And he tells us, That there is a great diversity between them ; for in the first, the breaking of prison is felony, though there were none committed: but in the other case, where there is no record of an accusation to found a commitment on, if there be no felony committed by him who is committed to prison for a supposed felony, the breach of prison is no felony. Now this makes another good exception to the return, that here doth not appear, that there was either an indictment or appeal, or that there was a felony or treason committed; and one of them is necessary.

There must be a felony done at the time of the commitment; for a relation, which is a fiction in law, shall never make a third person a felon; as Plowd. 401. If there be a stroke or wound one day, and death ensues upon another day, this is murder in the party from the first stroke; but the rescuing of such a criminal before the death is no felony; which further shews, that a felony done is necessary to make the escape a capital offence.

In 2 Inst. 591. Coke saith two or three times in four pages, That the weight of the business depends upon the lawfulness of the warrant, or Mittimus; and he saith, that it must be in writing, in the name, and under the seal of him that makes the same, expressing his place, office, and authority, by force whereof he makes the Mittimus as is to be directed to the gaoler; and it must contain the cause more especially, and with more certainty, than a writ of Capias need to do, because the latter is founded upon a record, unto which a resort may be had. Then he saith, That if a warrant be not lawful it is no felony in the gaoler to suffer him to escape. Now here, we say, it doth not appear what the warrant was, upon which sir James was in custody; and a messenger is not a lawful gaoler; he is merely a conveyancer of a message, notice, or summons; and the practice of making their several houses prisons is but of late date; our law-books do take no notice of him as any legal officer.

Gaolers have fees, are subject to prosecutions for extortion; a messenger is not within the laws concerning it; for he cannot take fees Colore Officii, who hath no office; he is, at most, but a gentleman porter. I have often heard this method of commitments to the custody of messengers severely censured; and though any man may be ordered to carry another to a prison, yet he cannot therefore become a gaoler to detain him, as some messengers have done, for nine or eleven months, or more. How long sir James was in custody, I cannot tell; but surely the law which requires commitments to the county gaols, is sufficient evidence of the insufficiency of a messenger's power to detain; and if he could not legally detain, the consequence must be, that the escape or rescue is no treason.

Besides, here it doth not appear, that sir James was in custody for treason; it is said, that he was in custody, and charged with treason: the last might be upon accusation by oath, or by an indictment, and yet not charged in custody with treason.

Then it is not said with what treason sir

James was charged; it might be for such a treason, wherein the receiving or helping to escape was not treason; and it might be for treason generally, and then sir James was bailable; and it will be hard to exclude the rescuer from bail, when the person rescued might challenge it.

Then further, though the warrant be lawful, and in particular for felony, and the gaoler do willingly suffer him to escape, yet till the prisoner is attainted, the gaoler shall not answer to the escape, though the prisoner be indicted; and there is a very good reason assigned for it, because the felony of the prisoner shall not be tried between the king and the gaoler, for that he is a stranger to it. Now a rescuer or assistant of an escape is the same with a gaoler in this case, and shall not be in a worse condition. It is true, the party himself, if he breaks prison, may be indicted for the escape before he be tried for the felony: now the reason of this holds for our being bailed, for that it is impossible that we can be tried in this case, because sir James Montgomery is dead, and was never attainted, or so much as indicted. Lord Hale agrees with this too, that if the prisoner break prison, he may be arraigned of it before he be convict of the first felony; but the gaoler permitting a voluntary escape, shall not be arraigned till the prisoner be first attainted; for if the prisoner be acquit, the gaoler is dispunishable as to any capital offence, or if the prisoner die before attainder, the rescuer shall only be fined and imprisoned.

Now supposing the assisting the escape of one committed for treason, as some books seem to say, shall make the rescuer partake of the same crime, for which the party rescued was committed; yet if a secretary cannot commit, or if a messenger's house be not a lawful prison,* or if sir James Montgomery's offence be not specially enough expressed, or if by reason of his death the escape be only finable, then these prisoners ought to be bailed.

Mr. Att. General, (Sir Tho. Trevor) à contra, said, that they ought not to be bailed, because committed for treason specially expressed; that harbouring a traitor, knowing him to be such, was treason; that there were no accessories, but all principals in treason; that rescuing him was a comforting of him; that to rescue a felon, was felony; to rescue a traitor, was treason; that a messenger was a lawful officer, and that any man might imprison a traitor; that sir James Montgomery's death was matter of evidence upon the trial; that they need not set forth a treason committed, or an attainder, though perhaps it would be necessary to prove it when the prisoners came to be tried; that the power of a secretary to commit had been settled (but he could not say when); that there were many precedents, which he doubted not to produce, and therefore prayed time to look into it.

* See Proceedings against bishop Atterbury, A. D. 1723.

Mr. Solicitor (Sir J. Hawles,) spoke much to the same effect, with this further, that the prisoner's counsel admitted, that the privy council might commit, and a secretary of state was much more antient; that as to the messenger, a gaoler de facto was within the law; that those persons were wrong doers, and that they could not take advantage of their own wrong; and therefore the insufficiency of sir James Montgomery's commitment was not material; and that this warrant need not be so certain and special as an indictment, which must have time and place; and that if commitments be good in substance, the same was enough; and therefore prayed that they might be remanded.

Sir Bartholomew Shower replied, That the commitment of a secretary was never yet allowed; that the same was always complained of; that though it were treason to rescue one committed for treason, yet here it did not appear to be so; that though in trespasses a man cannot take advantage of his own wrong, yet that was not the question; because if sir James was not legally in custody, then this fact was not treason; that the insufficiency of his commitment was an advantage allowable, especially in favorem vite; that though sir James's death did not appear upon the return, yet it was a reason to induce the court to bail, since they might bail in cases of high treason specially expressed; and if the court were informed that they could not be tried, it would be hard to detain them in custody.

Lord Chief Justice Holt. How were the commitments at common law before justices of peace were instituted? It is true, my lord Coke saith, that none could be imprisoned till indictment; but that deserves consideration. If you were to enquire, and search in the Tower, undoubtedly you will find commitments there by secretaries of state; look into the Resolutions in Anderson.

Mr. Justice Rokeby. I can see no reason upon the whole matter, why they should not be bailed; but since Mr. Attorney is not prepared, and has had so little notice, it is fit he should have time. [Accordingly Wednesday next was appointed.]

Then sir Bartholomew Shower moved, that they might have their wives and friends, and a solicitor come to them, for that hitherto they had been kept close prisoners. [Which was granted accordingly.]

Upon Wednesday the 6th of November the prisoners were brought up by rule of court; and sir Bartholomew Shower moved again, that they might be bailed, and that if Mr. Attorney thought fit to oppose it, he prayed to be further heard, for that he had more matter to alledge to justify the former exceptions to the return.

Then Mr. Attorney, and Mr. Solicitor, and sir William Williams came into court.

Lord Chief Justice. Mr. Attorney, here are

Kendall and Roe brought up by rule, and their counsel desire to know whether you oppose their being bailed; for if you do, they desire to be further heard to the return; you had best consider of it.

Attorney General. I should not have so much opposed it, but that several questions have been made and argued here at the bar; as, that a secretary hath not power to commit, that this escape is not treason, that a messenger is not a legal officer; and since these things have been started, I must insist upon it that this is a good return, and that they ought to be remanded.

L. C. J. Then we must hear them again.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, we do with submission insist upon it, as I did the other day, that a secretary is not such an officer, as hath a power of committing for felony or treason: I have further looked into it, and do find somewhat in the books concerning it, more than the king's counsel did last time urge, but not enough to warrant such a power in the office of a secretary, and a great deal more against it. What I find I shall offer to your lordship's consideration, as it appears upon the words of the books; and submit it to your judgment.

My lord, I have perused the resolutions of the judges in 34 Eliz. 1, Anderson 297, 298, and I must own that it is there said, that one or more of the lords of the council may commit; how far that is law, I shall endeavour to examine presently: But now I have named it, I would beg your lordship to observe another of those resolves: though it would be more proper anon, yet I will just mention it here, and that is, that there is a resolution which condemns this return, it destroys a power of a messenger's office, and, if it be law, my clients ought to be bailed; it complains that divers persons were against law committed to prison in private places, and not to any common or ordinary prisons, or lawful officers, as the sheriff, or other person lawfully authorized to have or keep a gaol; so that upon complaint made, the queen's courts could not learn to whom to direct her majesty's writs, and by this means justice could not be done. Now this seems directly calculated for the 42 domestic prisoners, at the pleasure of the messengers; and if Mr. Attorney will allow these resolutions to be of any authority in one part, he must agree it to be the same in the others.

But I shall not need it in respect of the messengers franchises, and therefore shall offer some things to your consideration against those Resolutions.

In the first place, they are extrajudicial, and not the opinion of judges upon their oaths in any matter before them; and I am sure my lord Coke did refuse to subscribe his opinion upon such occasions. They are such opinions, as the judges may and often have varied from, when the point hath come judicially in question before them. Several of the judges did so in the case of the ship money; and if they were not binding to the judges who gave the opinions, much less can they be binding to their successors, as legal resolutions; and if they be law, yet they do not relate to the office of secretary, but only to that of a privy counsellor. Now we do, without any disrespect to authority, for our clients, insist upon it, that that resolution is not law, that one single privy counsellor may commit for treason.

In the first place, what is there said, can never be reconciled to the rules of law, that persons committed by them ought not to be delivered; for those general commitments were illegal at common law; and so it is affirmed in the Petition of Right; and very great opinions have been, that there is nothing in the Habeas Corpus act, but the penalties and times, that was not common law, and that it is affirmative in substance of the antient law of this realm, which makes that resolution to be suspicious; for if what is affirmed by it in express terms (viz. 'That such persons as they shall commit, ought not to be delivered') be not law, then what is implied, that one privy counsellor may commit, is more doubtful still.

I shall not inquire into the occasion of those Resolutions, nor meddle with what our histories tell us of that time, and the then jealousies between some great men; but as I said before, those are not judicial opinions, but only a written certificate delivered to the then chancellor and treasurer: Besides, there is not one objection, which can be made against the power of a secretary in this matter, but stands as firm and forcible against that of one lord of the council; we find no authority for him to administer an oath or take a recognizance, and there is no precedent of either. And, as I said the other day, it looks absurd, that a single person should be an officer to commit, and yet cannot do that which is necessary in order to it, he ought to have a power to examine, and that upon oath: and if upon examination of witnesses it appears that the party deserves not to be committed, he ought to have power to take bail, as also a recognizance to prosecute. A justice of peace is finable by the justices of Oyer and Terminer, and gaol delivery, if he misbehave himself, or be guilty of a wilful irregularity therein; but it will scarce be said, that a lord of the council is in those circumstances. My lord Coke saith, that a lord of the council is made by summons and taking the oath, and that continues during the king's life: It is true he may be discharged, and generally it is by forbearing to summon him; suppose then it be omitted, and afterward he is summoned again, doth he take a new oath? When doth this authority begin? How doth it continue or end? Our law books take no notice of it.

Then, further, the king himself cannot arrest a man for treason or felony, nor can he command one in his presence to be arrested for felony or treason; so said sir John Markham to

Edw. 4, and 2 Inst. 186. per mandat del Roy is by writ, or by order or rule of some court of justice; now what judge is a lord of the council? He is to advise the king, and is sworn to it, and to withstand all traitors, and to discover all traitorous conspiracies, and so is every subject by his oath of allegiance, but the oath of a privy counsellor contains nothing relating to commitments.

At common law, extrajudicial commitments were rarities; the usual practice was to indict, and then to take them upon a writ of capias; the ancient law was tender of a man's liberty, and then were the writs framed in the register 'de odio et atia et de tradendo in ballium,' and the writ of Habeas Corpus.

By Magna Charta 19 Hen. 3. cap. 29. which hath been confirmed forty times by subsequent acts of parliament, it is enacted, that 'nullus liber homo imprisonetur nisi per legem terræ,' which I shall explain anon. This was made upon a grievance then complained of, viz. illegal commitments: what could those be in that age, but taking men's persons without a record to found a charge or accusation? And that it was so appears by Coke in his comment upon those antient statutes: he says, that there is no invasion upon this law till Edward 3d's time, and then the people quickly resented it; for in 5 Edw. 3. cap. 9. the great charter is confirmed; but then in 25 Edw. 3. cap. 2. it is fully and more at large expressed, and recited, that whereas it is contained in the great charter of the franchises of England, that none shall be imprisoned, unless it shall be by the law of the land; it is awarded, asserted, and established, that from thenceforth none shall be taken by petition, or suggestion made to our lord the king, or to the lords of his counsel, unless it be by indictment or presentment of his good and lawful people of the neighbourhood, though Magna Charta, and the rest of the seven statutes mentioned in the Petition of Right usually quoted upon these occasions, be in the general and have ambiguous words in them, or words made ambiguous by the king's counsel in most ages, yet this is plain and express, and needs no strain on our side. And I cannot find it ever pretended to on the other side to be a strain, they are so plain that the inference is easy, and hard to be avoided. I will not, I must not adduce authorities, against the commitment by a privy council, but methinks they are strong against an extrajudicial commitment by a single lord of the council, unless Mr. Attorney will argue, that the council cannot commit by reason of this law, but a single privy counsellor is out of the words of the act; and when I hear that, he may expect another answer.

Now for the words 'per legem terræ:' in Magna Charta, in 2 Inst. 51. my lord Coke doth indeed say, that in some cases a man may be taken and arrested before indictment or presentment; and one case which he mentions is, by lawful warrant, where there is a witness against an offender: upon suspicion there may be an apprehension, but there cannot be a commitment, with a charge of an offence, unless there be an indictment or presentment, or a witness against the offender; now there can be no witness, but there must be an oath: so it is by all laws, a man cannot be a witness, though he may be an informer, unless he be sworn; and by our law, even peers, if they are witnesses, must be sworn. Now that a single privy counsellor can give an oath, I can find no law or precedent for it; it is true the privy council may administer an oath, and have done so for a long time, but that every single member can do so, doth not follow, it is no more a consequence, than that because the house of peers can give an oath, therefore every peer may at home do the same. He is one of his majesty's most honourable privy council, and that is all; and that is only (as I may with respect say) when they are 'capitulariter congregati.'

Further, my lord Coke saith, That to make a commitment lawful, the first requisite is, that he, or they, who do commit, have lawful authority; now whether a particular lord of the council hath such a lawful authority, I must submit to your judgment.

In ancient times the practice was for the privy council not to send for men in custody, but to issue citations and summons, and that by their messengers, as doth the court christian by their pursuivants, who cannot arrest or imprison, as in 12 Co. Rep. 49. In all the records cited by Coke, in his Jurisdiction of Courts, cap. Privy Council, or Pryn's Animadversions upon that book, 46. there is no precedent mentioned of imprisoning, or bringing men into custody, but only summons and citations to appear; and there are many of them.

I shall not meddle with their power of committing for a contempt, or refusal to answer, or question the authority of the countess of Shrewsbury's case,* 12 Co. Rep. 93. but I urge this only to shew the improbability, that our law should vest such an authority in each member of the privy council.

In Pryn's Animadversions on 4 Inst. it is in his comment upon Coke's Epilogue, page 422. is a very notable record. Rot. parl. anno 21 Hen. 6. num. 56. where there is an impeachment of Talbois, for a notable riot upon several lords of the council met within the palace at Westminster; and it is prayed, that he may be sent to the Tower of London, to be kept without bail or mainprize for twelve months, to answer all indictments for that and other riots, before the king and his justices in his bench within that time; and if the constable of the Tower should suffer him to escape, or go at large, he should forfeit 1,000*l.*; to which article of the Commons petition and bill the king assenteth, so that here was an act of parliament (for such it is, though in form of a petition granted, as was the ancient form,) to enforce a commitment to the Tower for any affront to the lords of the council: now I would beg leave to observe, that it was not by way of punishment for the offence, but to secure the parties to be forth-coming to answer an indictment, the punishment must be fine and imprisonment: now it seems strange, that an act of parliament should be made to secure a man, in order to answer an indictment for an assault and riot upon the lords of the council when any one lord of the council might have committed him, and he might have been indicted next term; for the fact was done at Westminster in Middlesex.

I find a case in 1 Leon. 70, 71, it is Newell's Case; he was committed 'per Mandatum Francisci Walsingham, Militis, principalis Secretarii, et unius de privato concilio Dominae Reginae,' and the return was held insufficient. I must agree, that the book says it was, because the cause for which he was committed was not alledged, and they amended the return, and then they made it 'ex mandato totius concilii privati, ita quod corpus ejus paratum habere non possimus;' it is true, that at last the court took exceptions to it, because the body was not brought, and there was a very wise distinction made by the court, that where one is committed by one of the privy council, there the cause ought to be returned; but where the whole council do commit, there need no cause to be alledged. Now it is plain, that this was a distinction without a difference; for by the Petition of Right, and the seven old statutes, and all the records and law of old time, no Englishman ought to be deprived of his liberty by an extrajudicial commitment or warrant, unless the cause be shewn; and I would infer, that the then king's or queen's council thought a commitment by one lord of the council was not legal, and therefore they added 'ex sententia et mandato totius privati concilii,' as it seems to me, that the court did slide over that question, by insisting upon the other exception: however, at the most, though it make against the novelty of the commitments, yet it can never make for the legality of them, when the whole is considered.

Upon these considerations, I hope it will appear to your lordship and the court to be a doubtful point, whether a secretary of state may commit; and the consequence of that is, that the prisoner ought to be bailed, according to Bushel's case, Vaughan 157. That the king's-bench may bail in any case of treason, if they think fit, but the common bench must remand, if the cause of the imprisonment returned be just, and well returned: but then there is this distinction: if it shall appear to the court, that the party was imprisoned against the law of the land, they ought, by force of Magna Charta, to deliver him; but if it be doubtful, and under consideration, then he ought to be bailed: and this hath been the practice upon convictions by justices of the peace; and the excuse of the judges in 4 Car. for their Remittitur, &c. that it was quousque, &c. i. e. till further consideration, was never allowed as a wise or legal one. Now I hope I have said enough to make it doubtful.

* See Vol. 2, p. 769 of this Collection.

Then for messengers, I have further matter to urge; the reason why commitments are required to be to the county gaol, by 5 Hen. 4, cap. 10, is mentioned in 2 Inst. 43, and 9 Co. Rep. 119, that they may have their trial at the next gaol delivery, or sessions of peace: and my lord Coke saith, that at common law the committing to prison is only to this end, that the party may be forthcoming to be duly tried according to the law and custom of the realm: and the abbots of St. Alban and Crowland lost their franchises of having gaols, because they detained men in prison, for a long time, without making a deliverance; and all this doth in reason argue against messengers power to make their houses prisons.

My lord Coke saith, in 2 Inst. 43, that the statute 5 Hen. 4, extendeth to all judges and justices for two reasons: 1st, Because this act is declarative of the common law; and 2dly, 'Ubi lex est specialis, et ratio ejus generalis, generaliter accipienda est;' and if so, this was a false imprisonment of sir James Montgomery, and then the consequence is what I urged the other day.*

I find further, in 2 Inst. 705, that by the parliament roll, 51 Edw. 3, numb. 68, it appears, that gaols were anciently to be repaired at the king's charge; and by lord Coke upon 23 Hen. 8, cap. 2, concerning the new erecting of gaols, his opinion is that the same cannot be done without act of parliament: and I cannot find any act of parliament for making the forty-two houses of the messengers to be lawful prisons; if there be any such, I suppose the king's counsel will shew them to your lordship; nay, I cannot find any grant of such a franchise to them.

Besides, the reason of the law is with us. Out of the county gaols you have at every sessions of gaol delivery calendars of the prisoners that are in custody there, but of the prisoners in custody of messengers you can have no notice; and this is no small mischief in respect of the subjects liberty; for at a gaol delivery the calendar is to be called over, and by the calendars in former times were the executions made without any special warrant from the judge or recorder, which is but a late practice.

Besides, according to 3 Inst. 209, a man regularly before the Habeas Corpus act, if committed for treason or felony by a person having authority to commit, was not to be discharged until he was inquired of, and either indicted or acquitted, or an Ignoramus found, and delivered by proclamation; now how this could be practised of a messenger's ward, is to me unaccountable.

I will in this case offer to your lordship what I find in this matter, with sincerity, and submit it to your judgment. There is in 12 Co. Rep. 129, a case cited out of the year books, viz. 22 Assize, pl. 49. One was beheaded for killing Adam Walton, 'nuncii domini regis,

'missi ad mandatum ejus exequend', which is there taken for petit treason: This is all that I can find of ancient authority, which mentions such a creature as a messenger; but nothing can be inferred from hence to prove the messengers in ordinary to be keepers of gaols for the receipt of felons and traitors.

Nay, I find further a case, which seems to overthrow the commitment to any other prison than the county gaol: I will but name it, and submit its consideration to your lordship's judgment; it is in St. John's Argument at a conference concerning the attainder of the earl of Strafford (it is fol. 46, of the 4to print of that Argument) the case of sir John Mortimer,* who was drawn, hanged, and quartered for breaking the prison of the Tower, having been committed thither upon suspicion of treason: but this was in 2 Hen. 6, and upon an attainder by bill in parliament, and so it is in Cotton's Abridgment of the Records, p. 368, and there it is mentioned as a strange thing to be done in times of peace, and when the realm was in quiet, for a man to be condemned without trial or arraignment. Now, I might infer from hence, that if the law had been undoubtedly plain concerning an escape out of the Tower, as a legal prison, there had been no need of an act of parliament to attain him; but however, it may argue thus much, that if a bill were necessary for such an escape, that an act of parliament is certainly necessary to make a rescuer of one suspected of treason out of the custody of a messenger to be guilty of treason; but all these I submit to your lordship's consideration. All that I contend for is, to make it a doubtful question to the court, whether upon this return, taking it for true, it is possible to indict and convict these prisoners for treason? for if not, they ought to be bailed.

Then there is another exception, which I just mentioned the last time, and that is, that it is not mentioned in this warrant, what the species of treason was, for which sir James Montgomery was committed. I shall, as I have already, avoid the repetition of any thing which I then offered; there are several treasons at this day, where the receiving, comforting, and relieving of them afterwards, knowing them to be such, may not be treason; and then in such case the helping him to escape will not be so, and consequently it ought to have been alledged in the warrant, what the treason was for which sir James Montgomery was committed. Now it is no treason to receive and comfort a counterfeiter of the great seal, it is only misprision, for there are no accessaries in treason, and principal he is not, because he did not know of it at the time; to this effect are the words of the book, 12 Co. Rep. 81, so it is of the receiving and comforting a Jesuit, or other Englishman taking orders abroad, and returning into England; for by 26 Eliz. that is made felony; which statute would never have been made, if it had been treason, Dyer 296, 297. Corrier's Case. If I know that one hath made false money, and receive, comfort, and abet him, this is only misprision: How far these are law I am not to argue, but I suggest the words or effect of the authority, and submit them. Sure I am of this, that if your lordship and the court be satisfied that they cannot be attainted of treason, if the fact be as this return is, then you will not remand them.

Mr. Solicitor was pleased to argue, That these are niceties too subtle for a return upon a Habeas Corpus; but according to Vaughan, 136, the writ of a Habeas Corpus is now the most usual remedy by which a man may be restored to his liberty, if he have been against law deprived of it; and therefore it is, that the writ doth command to know, whether it be according to law, or against law; and therefore the cause of the imprisonment ought by the return to appear, as specially and certainly to be judged by the court, where the return is made, as it did appear to the court or person authorised to commit, else the return is insufficient. Now, the reason of adjudging that return in Bushell's Case to be insufficient, was because it was only said, that their verdict was against full and manifest evidence, and did not say what; by the same reason, sir James Montgomery's treason ought to have been set forth in this case; and as to credence, no more ought to be given to a person committing, when a Habeas Corpus is brought, than there is to a court giving a judgment, when a writ of error is brought to examine it, in order to affirmance or reversal; for an Habeas Corpus is brought in like manner to examine the cause of the party's imprisonment, either to bail or discharge, or else to remand him, which is to affirm the commitment to be legal, and upon good cause.

I have modern authority to justify much nicer exceptions to commitments, than those I have mentioned; such authority as Mr. Solicitor will not deny to be good. Complaint hath been of a warrant of commitment, that it did not appear in whose reign the treason was committed, whether in the late king's, or the former king's; it is observed in the Remarks upon Cornish's Trial,* and I am sure Mr. Solicitor must own that to be much nicer than what I have offered upon this; I do not justify that, but my exceptions to the return.

Mr. Serjeant Levinz argued on the same side, that the return was ill, because the commitment was to a messenger; it ought to have been to a county gaol, that the custody upon an apprehension ought to be but 24 hours, Britton 19. Customer of Normandy 456. Hil. 22 Edw. 4, pl. 4, those messengers exacted fees, viz. 6s. 8d. or 10s. per diem. It is in effect to fine the party before he is convicted. Then he said, that all those questions might have been spared, if Mr. Attorney would consent to their being bailed.

* See vol. 11, p. 455, of this Collection.

Lord Chief Justice. In truth most of them might have been spared, for they have been argued more for pleasure than necessity.

Then Mr. Attorney General, and Mr. Solicitor insisted, that the rescue of one in custody upon suspicion of treason, was treason; that the setting forth the overt act was more for the advantage of the prisoner, than barely alledging the species of treason: that as to the Secretary's commitment, it was owned now not to be such a novelty as was pretended the last time: that it was very ancient; that the case in 11 Leon. is very flat to that purpose; that in the Tower they found a commitment in 1660, by secretary Morris, and that many more had been since, but that sir Joseph Williamson, who had the papers, was now in Ireland; that it was not needful, that he who commits should be able to give an oath; that the House of Commons could not give an oath, and yet could commit; and more to the like effect.

Sir Bart. Shower replied, That he was glad to hear there were so few precedents for a Secretary's power; that if there had been more, Mr. Attorney would have shewn them; that the House of Commons' power was an instance not fit for him to answer; that he did desire no more of Mr. Attorney, than that a Secretary could not give an oath, and then he hoped the consequence would be plain; and so submitted it to the court.

L. C. J. I did always give credit to the Resolutions of the Judges in Anderson, and it is part of a privy counsellor's oath to take care of the king's person against all traitors, &c. Was there not a gaol delivery at common law? and are not the commissioners by their commission to inquire of the prisoners in that gaol, and a grand jury to be impannelled? and consequently, doth not the law suppose some to have been committed thither before? and then, by whom they were committed? though a messenger be not a proper officer, yet any person may be ordered to be received for convenient time for examination,† &c. [Brit. 19. 92.] Commitments regularly ought to be to the county gaols, and I wish the justices of the peace, who commit to New Prison, and the Gatehouse, were here to hear this. But, Mr. Attorney, the question is, whether you ought not to have specified these two things in your warrants, for what treason sir James was committed? and my reason is, because the escape will be same species of treason with that for which the party rescued was committed; and secondly, that he had done a treason, that sir James was guilty. But, Mr. Attorney, will

* Justices of the peace are not by common law, but appointed by statutes, the first of which was 1 Edw. 3, cap. 16. By common law there were only conservators of the peace, whose power was very short of a justice's now-a-days. See Crompton's and Dalton's Justice.—Note to former Edition.

you further consider of it, though I think we must bail them in the mean time, an Habeas Corpus being festinum remedium; but I would hear my brothers' opinion.

Justice Rokeby. Sir Barth. Shower, I am glad to see that you have rectified a mistake you were in about a Secretary's commitment: It was long before sir Lionel Jenkins's time: Walsingham committed near 200 years ago; and there is another precedent in 2 Leon. 175. Hilleyard's case, I think, that a Conservator Pacis at the common law may commit, and so may a constable; it is incident to his power of committing, that he may give an oath, and take a recognizance, and (quod mirum) one of the counsel may commit. I would not have the students go away with the notion of the novelty of it: I take Secretaries of State to be great officers; they are centinels to watch for the preservation of the king, and the common peace of the realm: and for messengers, for any thing appears, he might be only carrying to gaol; but yet I think they ought to be bailed, because it is not expressed in the warrant, what the species of treason was for which sir James Montgomery was committed.

Justice Eyre. There may be a difference between carrying to prison, and a commitment with a charge upon them; and there may be a difference between specifying and not specifying sir James's treason. Upon the whole, I think they ought to be bailed.

Justice Gregory was absent.

Accordingly they were bailed to appear the last day of term, to answer such matters as should then be objected against them.*

Upon this affair, Burnet says, (vol. 2, p. 171) as follows:

"After most of the conspirators were taken, and all examinations were over, some of them were brought to their trials. Charnock, King, and Keys, were begun with: The design was fully proved against them. Charnock shewed great presence of mind, with temper and good judgment, and made as good a defence as the matter could bear: but the proof was so full, that they were all found guilty. Endeavours were used to persuade Charnock to confess all he knew; for he had been in all their plots from the beginning: his brother was employed to deal with him, and he seemed to be once in suspense: but the next time that his brother came to him, he told him, he could not save his own life without doing that, which would take away the lives of so many, that he did not think his own life worth it. This shewed a greatness of mind, that had been very valuable, if it had been better directed. Thus this matter was understood at the time. But many years after this, the lord Somers gave me a different account of it. Charnock, as he told night, upon a special commission of Oyer and Terminer, for high-treason, in compassing the death of the king by a barbarous assassination, in order to further and assist an invasion into this me, sent an offer to the king, of a full discovery of all their consultations and designs; and desired no pardon, but only that he might live in some easy prison; and if he was found to prevaricate, in any part of his discovery, he would look for the execution of the sentence: but the king apprehended, that so many persons would be found concerned, and thereby be rendered desperate, that he was afraid to have such a scene opened, and would not accept of this offer. At his death, Charnock delivered a paper, in which he confessed, he was engaged in a design to attack the prince of Orange's guards; but he thought himself bound to clear king James, from having given any commission to assassinate him. King's paper, who suffered with him, was to the same purpose; and they both took pains to clear all those of their religion, from any accession to it. King expressed a sense of the unlawfulness of the undertaking; but Charnock seemed fully satisfied with the lawfulness of it. Keys was a poor ignorant trumpeter, who had his dependance on Porter, and now suffered chiefly upon his evidence, for which he was much reflected on: It was said, that servants had often been witnesses against their masters, but that a master's witnessing against his servant, was somewhat new and extraordinary.

"The way that Charnock and King took to vindicate king James, did rather fasten the imputation more upon him; they did not deny, kingdom from France, and subversion of the government, were proceeded upon in manner following.

After opening the court, at which were present a great many of the nobility, members of parliament, and other persons of quality, the petty jury returned by the sheriff of Middlesex to try the prisoners were all called over, being in number above eight-score, and consisting of baronets, knights, esquires, and gentlemen, and the appearances of those who answered to the call were recorded; and six of the judges, viz. The Lord Chief Justice Holt, the Lord Chief Justice Treby, the Lord Chief Baron Ward, Mr. Justice Nevil, Mr. Justice Powell, and Mr. Justice Rokeby, being upon the bench, the prisoners were called for to the bar, and there arraigned upon the said indictments.

Clerk of the Arraignments. Robert Charnock, hold up thy hand (which he did): Edward King, hold up thy hand (which he did): Thomas Keyes, hold up thy hand (which he did). You stand indicted in the county of Middlesex by the names of Robert Charnock, late of the parish of St. Clement Danes in the county of Middlesex, gent. Edward King of the said parish and county, gent. and Thomas Keyes of the same parish and county, yeoman, for that you the fear of God in your hearts not having, nor the duty of your allegiance weighing, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, as false traitors against the most serene, most illustrious, most clement, and most excellent prince, our sovereign lord William 3, by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, king, defender of the Faith, &c. your supreme, true, lawful, and undoubted sovereign lord, the cordial love and that he had sent over a commission to attack the prince of Orange, which, as Porter deposed, Charnock told him he had seen; if this had been denied by a dying man, his last words would have been of some weight: but instead of denying that which was sworn, he only denied, that king James had given a commission for assassination: and it seems great weight was laid on this word; for all the conspirators agreed in it, and denied that king James had given a commission to assassinate the prince of Orange. This was an odious word, and perhaps no person was ever so wicked, as to order such a thing, in so crude a manner: but the sending a commission, to attack the king's person, was the same thing upon the matter; and was all that the witnesses had deposed. Therefore their not denying this, in the terms in which the witnesses swore it, did plainly imply a confession that it was true. But some, who had a mind to deceive themselves or others, laid hold on this, and made great use of it, that dying men had acquitted king James of the assassination. Such slight colours will serve, when people are engaged before-hand to believe, as their affections lead them."

true and due obedience, fidelity, and allegiance, which every subject of our lord the king that now is, towards him our said lord the king should bear, and of right ought to bear, withdrawing, and utterly to extinguish, intending and contriving, and with all your strength purposing, designing and conspiring the government of this kingdom of England under him our said sovereign lord the king that now is of right happily and duly established, altogether to subvert, change and alter; as also our said sovereign lord the king to death and final destruction to put and bring, his faithful subjects and the freemen of this kingdom of England into intolerable and miserable slavery to Lewis the French king to subdue and subject, the 10th day of February in the seventh year of the reign of our said sovereign lord the king that now is, and divers other days and times, as well before as after, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, falsely, maliciously, devilishly, and traiterously, did compass, imagine, contrive, purpose, design and intend our sovereign lord the king that now is, to slay, kill and murder, and a miserable slaughter amongst the faithful subjects of our lord the king throughout this whole kingdom of England to make and cause. And the same most abominable, wicked and devilish treasons and traiterous contrivances, intentions and purposes of yours aforesaid to fulfil, perfect, and bring to effect, you the said Robert Charnock, Edward King and Thomas Keyes, and very many others false traitors to the jurors unknown, afterwards, to wit, the said 10th day of February, in the year abovesaid, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, and divers other days and times, as well before as after, there and elsewhere in the same county, falsely, maliciously, advisedly, clandestinely, traiterously, and with force of arms, &c. did meet, propose, treat, consult, consent and agree our said sovereign lord the king by lying in wait, to assassinate, kill, and murder: And that execrable, horrid, and detestable assassination and killing the sooner to execute and perpetrate, afterwards, to wit, the same day, year and place last mentioned, traiterously did treat, propose, and consult of the ways, manner and means, and the time and place where, when, how, and in what manner our said sovereign lord the king, by lying in wait the more easily you should kill; and did consent, agree and assent, that forty horsemen or thereabouts, of you the said Robert Charnock, Edward King, and Thomas Keyes, and the said other traitors unknown, and others by them to be hired, procured and paid, with guns, carbines and pistols with gunpowder, and leaden bullets charged, and with swords and other arms armed, should lie in wait, and be in ambush, our said sovereign lord the king in his coach being when he should go abroad, to set upon, and that a certain and competent number of those men so armed upon the guards of our said sovereign lord the king then and there attending upon him, and being with him, should attack, and should overcome and subdue them, whilst others of the said men so armed our said sovereign lord the king should assassinate, kill, slay and murder: And also that you the said Robert Charnock, Edward King, and Thomas Keyes, your treasons and traitorous intentions, designs and contrivances aforesaid, to execute, perpetrate, fulfil, and fully to bring to effect afterwards, to wit, the day and year last abovesaid at the parish aforesaid, divers horses, and very many arms, guns, pistols, swords, and other weapons, ammunition, warlike matters, and military instruments, falsely, maliciously, secretly and traitorously did obtain and buy, collect and procure, and cause to be brought, obtained, collected and procured with that intention, the same in and about the detestable, horrid and execrable assassination, killing and murdering of our said sovereign lord the king as aforesaid, to be used, employed and bestowed, against the duty of your allegiance, and against the peace of our sovereign lord the king that now is, his crown and dignity, as also against the form of the statutes in such cases made and provided.

How say you, Robert Charnock, are you guilty of the high-treason whereof you stand indicted, or not guilty?

Charnock. My lord, I desire I may have a copy of this indictment, that I may advise with counsel upon it before I plead.

L. C. J. (Sir John Holt.) Pray, Mr. Charnock, will you speak out, that we may hear what you say.

Char. My lord, I find here is a very bad crime that is laid to my charge; I desire that I may have a copy of the indictment, to advise with counsel upon, and that I may have counsel to assist me in my trial, and to direct me, who am an ignorant man in these matters, how to manage myself according to the new act made this sessions of parliament, for regulating trials in cases of high-treason.

L. C. J. Have you not had counsel already to advise and direct you, Mr. Charnock?

Char. My lord, I had notice on Wednesday, that I should be tried this day, and it was Saturday last before I could get my counsel to come to me.

L. C. J. And what did your counsel advise you? Did they tell you, you were to have a copy of your indictment, by virtue of the late act of parliament?

Char. My lord, though the act does not take force as to some things till the 25th of this month, yet the equity of that act, it being now reduced into a law, is conceived to reach to cases of the like nature before the 25th, and I desire the act may be read.

L. C. J. You shall have it read, if you will, but of what avail or benefit it will be to you, I cannot tell; for you yourself take notice, that it is an act of parliament made this session, and is not to take effect until the 25th of this month. You now here stand indicted before the 25th, and for a treason committed before, and therefore you can't claim, nor have any benefit or advantage by this act; but you are to be proceeded against according to the law before, and the practice used in all proceedings against other persons in your circumstances. And it is the known practice, and received for law, in all times before this new act was made, That no copy of an indictment for high-treason should be granted, nor counsel assigned, or permitted to assist the prisoner in making his defence: true it is, a copy of the indictment has been often desired, but as true, that it has as often been denied.

Char. My lord, the equity of this act (it being now an act of parliament) is now in force, as much before the 25th of this month as after.

L. C. J. Equity is nothing in these cases: you are here tried by the law, and we are bound to go in all such cases according to the rules of law, and are not to be guided by any equitable consideration, further than the law itself does allow us.

Char. But, my lord, the ground of that act, which is the reasonableness and equity that all prisoners should be made capable of fairly defending themselves, is now in force, I say: and I hope your lordship and the court will look upon it to be reasonable, that I should have the benefit of that equity.

L. C. J. I tell you, we are not here in a court of equity, but must proceed according to the rules of law; and the law you now speak of, does not yet commence.

Char. My lord, I am informed, for I am very ignorant in these matters myself, that there is nothing that I now desire, which is contained in this act, but what was law before the making of this act, though the practice may have been otherwise.

L. C. J. Then I must tell you, Mr. Charnock, you have been very much misinformed; for if all that is contained in this act of parliament that you mention, was common law before, there would have been no occasion for the making a new act of parliament.

Char. My lord, I do not say that all things in this act of parliament were law before, because there are several things in it that have not been law before. But, my lord, there are several things besides; and particularly those two things which I now desire, a copy of the indictment and counsel to assist me, were things that were agreeable to law before; and I must take the liberty to appeal to a judge that I see upon the bench, my lord chief justice Treby, as to his own opinion, and desire he would please to declare, whether formerly, in a conference between the lords and the commons, he did not deliver his opinion, That it was the common law, that a prisoner should have a copy of his indictment, and counsel to assist him.

L. C. J. Here is my lord chief justice Treby, you had best to apply yourself to him for his opinion.

L. C. J. Treby. Pray, sir, what is your question you would ask me?

Char. My lord, I am here for my life, and must take all the advantages that I can; I am here arraigned for a very grievous offence ; I desire I may have a copy of the indictment, and counsel to assist me in my defence. Here is an act of parliament, out of the equity of which, I apprehend I ought to have some advantage ; for I am informed, that what I desire was common law before the making of the act ; and particularly, that your lordship's opinion, in a conference between the two houses, was, that the prisoner ought to have those advantages by the common law.

L. C. J. Treby. Then, sir, I take your question to be this : You would have my opinion to be declared, That this act, which was lately passed, for regulating Trials in Cases of High-treason, and all the particulars in the act were common law before.

Char. No, my lord ; I do not say that all the particulars in the act were common law before.

L. C. J. Treby. Then, pray, sir, name your particulars, and I will endeavour to give you an answer.

Char. My lord, the particulars that I do ask are these : first, That I may have a copy of the indictment, and counsel to advise me, because it is a grievous crime I stand here accused of, and that I may have them to assist me at my trial in court : This I do insist upon from the equity of the act of parliament, and your lordship's opinion at the conference that it was common law before.

L. C. J. Treby. As to my opinion about the having a copy or counsel, I do not think or believe, that I ever said that it was common law.

Char. My lord, I beg your pardon ; I was informed your lordship had delivered such an opinion, at a conference between the lords and the commons : But I desire the assistance of counsel, because I myself am ignorant of the law : and particularly as to this point, whether I am not entitled to the equity of this act of parliament ; for it now having passed both Houses of Parliament, and had the royal assent, it is a good law ; and though it be to take its commencement on the 25th of this month, yet that which is the law of all laws, the reason and equity of it, is, and always will be, the same.

L. C. J. No, Mr. Charnock, that does not follow, that because the wisdom of the law makers has thought it to be equitable de futuro, therefore it should be law now ; which, as I told you before, is the rule that we are to go by ; it is equity and justice, that the proceedings be according to this act of parliament, from and after the 25th of this month ; but it is not justice that such proceedings should be till then, because not according to law.

Char. My lord, the ground of all laws is equity ; and certainly it cannot be equity, that a prisoner should make his defence against an accusation in writing, without having a copy of it.

L. C. J. The time of the court must not be spent in this manner, you have been already told, that by law you are not to have a copy of the indictment ; but you are to plead without having any copy ; for there is no law now in being that allows the giving of such a copy, and it is but a short question that you are asked in order to your trial, viz. Are you guilty ; or not guilty ?

Char. My lord, it is impossible for me to go to trial presently, and without the assistance of my counsel.

L. C. J. Why, had you not notice of your trial ?

Char. My lord, I confess I had notice upon Wednesday last.

L. C. J. Had you not your counsel with you since that ?

Char. Yes, my lord, I had on Saturday last, but from that time I have not been able to prepare myself as I think I ought ; and I cannot conceive but that I should have the assistance of some counsel to direct me in my trial ; for here is a very great crime and heinous charge laid against me in this indictment, and I am very ignorant in all law proceedings.

L. C. J. It is very reasonable that there should be convenient notice given to all persons in your circumstances ; and truly this day seven night is a very convenient notice ; especially you having had, by your own confession and acknowledgement, counsel with you in the mean time.

Char. But, my lord, what is the advantage of having notice, if one have not privilege of pen, ink and paper, and one's counsel and friends coming to them, and privacy, without the presence of the jailor ?

L. C. J. What say you that are of the king's counsel ? Was there counsel allowed to come to them ?

Att. Gen. (Sir Thomas Trevor) My lord, there was order given, that their own counsel that they desired should come to them.

Mr. Baker. My lord, as soon as ever they desired counsel there was an order for it, and left with the jailor, that he should permit the counsel to come to them, and be with them in private.

L. C. J. Then though you had not your counsel come to you till Saturday, it was your own fault, for you had an order for counsel as soon as you desired it : and even from Saturday is a reasonable time enough to prepare for answering the question, Whether guilty or not guilty ?

Char. I suppose Mr. Bale is in court, who gave notice on Wednesday, and I acknowledge he came upon the Thursday, and asked if I would have any body come to me ; and he took then the names of the counsel that I desired might come to me ; and told me he would carry them to Mr. Attorney General, and see what his opinion was of them ; I suppose he did so : for upon Friday he came again, and brought me an order for it ; but when that order was brought, the counsel that was desired was not to be had, or at least with very great difficulty, because it was the time of the assizes, or very near it, and counsel were gone or going out of town; so that we could not have the advantage of the order for counsel.

L. C. J. Look you, Sir, we think you have had convenient notice, with liberty of consulting whom you had a mind to; if you have neglected your opportunity of consulting them, you must blame yourself, and nobody else; we must go on according to law.

Att. Gen. My lord, they had the liberty of naming their own counsel, and the names were brought to me: and as soon as ever they were so brought, those that were named had leave to go to the prison to them; and they had a further order than the first, which was, that their friends should be permitted to come to them? but that was not, as it was not convenient to be, in private; but the other order was, that the counsel should speak with them in private, and not in the presence of the jailor.

L. C. J. Pray hear what Mr. Attorney says, that your counsel was ordered to be with you in private.

Char. But there was no order, my lord, for my solicitor to be with me in the absence of the gaoler, who is the only proper person for the consulting with, and for going about to summon the witnesses.

L. C. J. We think you have had convenient notice, and all the allowances that can be in such a case. Ask him to plead.

Cl. of Ar. Robert Charnock, Are you guilty of the high treason whereof you stand indicted, or not guilty?

Char. My lord, I hope you will give me some more time to get my witnesses, that are now absent; several of them are ten miles out of town; and therefore I would beg your lordship to give me some time.

L. C. J. Why, is ten miles such a distance, that you could not have your witnesses between this day seven-night and this day? But besides, Mr. Charnock, what you now urge is out of time; you speak too soon to put off the trial, for there can be no trial till issue joined; and that cannot be till plea pleaded.

Char. My lord, I was never instructed in quereks of law, nor bred up to the law; and I hope your lordships will take care that I be not hurt for want of knowledge in the forms of law.

L. C. J. You may assure yourself, Mr. Charnock, you shall not be hurt by your ignorance in the law. All the harm you will receive will be for having done contrary to the law, and there is none of your counsel, if they have been faithful to you, but must tell you the same things we tell you now.

Char. My lord, if I am to have no counsel, I must desire that the court would be pleased to take the greater care of me: for, as I have been informed, that was the reason of the practice of denying counsel, that the court should be of counsel for the prisoner.

L. C. J. Mr. Hardesty, ask him whether he be guilty, or not guilty.

Cl. of Ar. Robert Charnock, are you guilty, or not guilty?—Char. Not guilty.

Cl. of Ar. Culprit, how wilt thou be tried?

Char. By God and my country.

Cl. of Ar. God send you a good deliverance.—Edward King, How say you, Are you guilty of the high-treason whereof you stand indicted, or not guilty?

King. My lord, I beg the same favour that Mr. Charnock has done, that I may have some more time to prepare for my trial, and a copy of the Indictment, and counsel assigned.

L. C. J. But you hear what has been said to Mr. Charnock upon those points, and the same rule that was given in his case, you must expect will be in your case.

Cl. of Ar. What say you, are you guilty, or not guilty?—King. Not guilty.

Cl. of Ar. Culprit, how wilt thou be tried?

King. By God and my country.

Cl. of Ar. God send thee a good deliverance.—Thomas Keyes, are you guilty of the same high-treason, or not guilty?

Keyes. My lord, I have had no counsel at all.

L. C. J. But you might have had, if you would; you had an order for it as well as the others.

Keyes. My lord, I was a servant to captain Porter; I was not able to fee any counsel.

L. C. J. But you can tell whether you are guilty, or not guilty.

Cl. of Ar. Art thou guilty, or not guilty?

Keyes. Not guilty.

Cl. of Ar. Culprit, how wilt thou be tried?

Keyes. By God and my country.

Cl. of Ar. God send thee a good deliverance.

Char. My lord, I desire I may have the favour of pen, ink, and paper, upon my trial.

L. C. J. Yes, yes, you shall have it; and if you have a mind to it, you shall have the Indictment read to you in Latin.

Char. My lord, my ignorance in forms of law made me not ask that before, because I did not know whether I should properly ask it or not: And I do not know whether I should ask it properly now.

L. C. J. Yes, it is a very proper time to ask it, and you shall have it, if you have a mind to it.

Char. My lord, I do really desire it, if it be a proper time for me to have it.

L. C. J. Read the Indictment in Latin.

Char. And now, my lord, I hope your lordship will please that I shall have pen, ink, and paper, that I may make the best observations I can, since I cannot have a copy.

Char. What word was that last, Sir?

Clerk of Ar. Murdrare.

Char. That is an odd word, I cannot understand what it means.

L. C. J. It is a term of art, the signification of it is to murder:—Go on, Mr. Hardesty.

Cl. of Ar. Ac stragem miserabilem inter fideles subditos ipsius Domini Regis per totum hoc Regni Angliæ facere et causare et easdem nefandissimas, nequissimas et diaboliças proditoris et proditorias machinationes, intentiones et proposita sua prædicta perimplend' perficiend' et ad effectum redigendum ipsi iidem Robertus Charnock, Edwardus King, et Thomas Keyes, et quam plurimi alii falsi proditores juratoribus prædictis ignoti, postea, scilicet, eodem decimo die Februarii, anno supra dicto, apud parochiam prædictam, in com' prædicto, ac diversis aliis diebus et vicibus tam antea quam postea, ibidem et alibi in eodem com' falso, malitiose, advisate, clandestine, frauditorie ac vi et armis, &c. conveniebant, proposuerunt, tractaverunt, consultaverunt, consensaverunt et agreeaverunt ad ipsum Dominum Regem ex insidiis et dolo percutiend', Anglice to assassinate, interficiend' et murdrand'; et ad execrabilem, horrendam et detestabilem assassinationem, Anglice assassination, et interfectionem illas citius exequend' et perpetrand' postea scilicet eisdem die, anno, et loco ultimo mentionatis, proditorie tractaverunt, proposuerunt, et consultaverunt de viis, modis et mediis ac tempore et loco ubi, quando, qualiter, et quomodo dictum Dominum Regem sic ex insidiis facilius inter-

Char. My lord, I desire the indictment may be read again, for there is so great a noise in the court, and that gentleman hath not the most perfect delivery; he is more used to law-Latin than to any other. But I beg I may have it read again, that I may as perfectly as I can understand it.

The Indictment was read again in Latin.

L. C. J. Look ye, you that are the prisoners, every one of you has the liberty to challenge 35 of those that are returned to serve upon the jury that is to try you, without shewing any cause; now, if you will all join in the same challenge, then we can try you all together, as ye are all together jointly in the indictment; and save the time and trouble that will otherwise be unavoidable. But if you will not join in the same challenge, but every man challenge for himself, as by law he has liberty to do, we must be forced to try you single, and therefore we would know of you, whether you design to join in your challenge, or not?

Char. My lord, I hope the court will give me leave to have my solicitor by me during my trial, that I may be instructed in some measure how to manage myself, and when it is proper for me to speak, and what.

L. C. J. No, we can order no such thing, you must speak for yourself.

Char. My lord, I am ignorant of the methods of law, and may make a great many mistakes and slips, and omit what may be material to be observed for my defence, and therefore shall the more need a friend or solicitor to be by me, to mind me of it.

L. C. J. No, we cannot direct any such thing by law. What say you as to your challenges?

Char. As to the jury, I had not a copy of the pannel till yesterday, and I have been informed, that it is usual to have a copy of the pannel ten days before the trial; they are gentlemen that I have no knowledge of, nor can come at any account of their qualifications, so as to make proper challenges.

L. C. J. You have the same privilege that is ordinarily given to persons in your condition.

Att. Gen. There was order given for a copy of the pannel to be delivered.

L. C. J. That was not of right, but of favour; and it is a practice that has of late obtained; but for what you talk of ten days, that never was in any case, nor is it practicable; you have the same favour shewn you, that all other prisoners have, and you can expect no more: but you do not answer the question, whether you will join in your challenges or not?

Char. It is an indifferent thing to me, my lord.

L. C. J. Do you agree to it, Mr. King?

King. My lord, I do not well understand it, I am ready to do any thing I should.

L. C. J. What say you, Keyes?

Keyes. My lord, I have had no counsel at all, to advise me about any thing.

L. C. J. I tell you what the law is in such cases: you may, every man of you, challenge 35 peremptorily without cause; but if you do not all agree in the same challenges, ye cannot be tried together by the same jury: but the court must separate you, and try you every one singly.

Char. My lord, I have got a copy of the pannel, if these gentlemen that are by me, do agree to join in the challenge, I am very well content; it is indifferent to me.

L. C. J. Do you understand what is said to you, Mr. King, and Mr. Keyes? Every one of you may, without shewing any cause, except against 35 of those that are returned of the jury which are to try you, if you have no mind that those should be sworn; but then if each of you do severally challenge 35, ye cannot be tried by the same jury.

Char. I hope, my lord, if I do challenge, as I do not know how I shall be enabled without knowing their qualifications, the court will put me in mind when I come near the number, that my challenging may not injure me; because I am ignorant in the law, and perhaps may slip in point of number; and therefore I would beg that your lordships would allow me a solicitor to assist me, and put me in mind, that I may not run into errors.

L. C. J. You have been told over and over, that we cannot do that; the court will take care that you be informed in time, that you do not exceed in challenging a greater number than you ought: what say you, Mr. King? Do you agree that one shall make challenges for you all?

King. I do agree, that whatsoever exception Mr. Charnock makes, I will abide by.

Char. My lord, I cannot but think it hard, that I have not either counsel or solicitor; my counsel that I had are out of town.

L. C. J. Why, was there no counsel but those that are gone the circuit?

Att. Gen. My lord, he had order first for one counsel, and then for another, and whomsoever he named he had order for.

L. C. J. If you will chuse none but those you cannot have, that is your own fault; you, Mr. Keyes, will you join in the challenge?

Keyes. Yes, with all my heart.

Cl. of Ar. Then you the prisoners at the bar, those men that you shall hear called and personally appear, are to pass between our sovereign lord the king, and you, upon trial of your several lives and deaths: if therefore you, or any of you, will challenge them, or any of them, your time is to speak unto them as they come to the book to be sworn, and before they be sworn.

Then those of the pannel that had appeared were called, and the prisoners challenged 33. And the names of those that were sworn are as follow; Samuel Harwer, Jonas Morley, Anthony Nurse, Jasper Hodgden, William Farnborough, William Bird, Simon Smith, Thomas Dunck, Richard Heath, John Mills, James Ketwich, and Christopher Redknap.

Then Proclamation for Information, and the witnesses appearing, was made in usual form.

Cl. of Ar. Robert Charnock, Hold up thy hand, (Which he did): Edward King, Hold up thy hand, (Which he did): Thomas Keyes, Hold up thy hand, (Which he did): you gentlemen of the jury, look upon the prisoners, and hearken to their cause; they stand indicted by the names of, &c. (prout in the Indictment, mutatis mutandis)—And against the form of the statutes in that case made and provided. Upon this indictment they have been arraigned, and thereunto have severally pleaded, Not Guilty, and for their trial have put themselves upon God and their country, which country you are: your charge is to enquire of them, and every of them, whether they be guilty of the high-treason whereof they stand indicted, in manner and form as they stand indicted, or Not Guilty; if you find them, or any of them, Guilty, you are to enquire what goods or chattels, lands or tenements they had, at the time of the high-treason committed, or at any time since. If you find them, or any of them, Not Guilty, you are to inquire whether they fled for it; if you find that they, or any of them, fled for it, you are to inquire of their goods and chattels, as if you had found them Guilty; if you find them Not Guilty, nor that they did fly for it, you are to say so, and no more; and hear your evidence.

Mr. Montague. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of this jury; the record that has been now read unto you, is an indictment of high-treason, which charges the three prisoners at the bar, Robert Charnock, Edward King, and Thomas Keyes, with a traitorous conspiracy and design to subvert the government of this kingdom, and to murder the king, and to bring the subjects and freemen of this kingdom into slavery and subjection to the French king; and to this end the indictment sets forth; That upon the 10th of February last, and divers other times, as well before as after, at the parish of St. Clements Danes, in the county of Middlesex, these three prisoners at the bar, with divers other traitors, unknown, did consult and agree to assassinate the person of our sovereign lord the king, as he was riding in his coach; and did likewise agree, that forty horsemen, of which they themselves were to be part of the number, should lie in ambush, and set upon the king, so being in his coach, and upon the guards that were to attend him: And it likewise charges them with buying horses and arms, for the execution of this wicked and villainous intention: to this they have pleaded Not Guilty. We shall call our witnesses, and prove this matter upon them; and then we doubt not, but you, gentlemen, will do justice, according to your evidence.

Att. Gen. My Lord, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, these gentlemen at the bar stand indicted for a most horrid and barbarous conspiracy, to assassinate and murder his majesty's royal person: gentlemen, this assassination was to be seconded with an invasion from France, where troops lay ready at Calais, as soon as the dismal stroke was given, to have landed upon our coasts; which if it had taken effect, we had not only suffered that most unspeakable loss of the king, but it would have made an end of all our liberties and laws at once.

Gentlemen; this offence in its nature is so horrid and barbarous, that as it needs no aggravation, so it is incapable of having any, by any words that can be used; for the very naming of an assassination of a king, carries such horror and detestation in itself, to all honest people, that it is impossible to aggravate it by any expressions that can be used about it; but there is this peculiar consideration to be had, by all Englishmen, who love their country, that this designed assassination upon the person of his present majesty, was to take away the life of a king, who every body knows first ventured his own life to restore our religion, laws and liberties, when they were just expiring under the oppression of popery and tyranny. And as he ventured his life first to restore them, so he has since, upon all occasions, with the utmost hazard exposed his royal person to the most imminent dangers, for the preserving and maintaining our religion, laws and liberties against the power and violence of the common enemy: this consideration to all true Englishmen must have a very great weight, and create the greatest horror and detestation, both of the barbarous design, and of all those who had any concern or hand in it, to attempt upon the life, not only of a king, but of such a king.

Gentlemen, when you hear the evidence that we shall offer to you, to prove this bloody conspiracy against these prisoners, I doubt not but that there will be enough, and more than enough, to satisfy all true-hearted English subjects, and all people that have a desire to preserve our constitution and government, in what danger we and our posterity were of being utterly ruined, and involved in a common destruction. I shall not detain you longer with any discourse about the heinousness of this offence, because every man's own thoughts cannot but suggest to him, how dismal the consequences must have been, if so fatal a stroke had been given.

But, Gentlemen, I must crave leave to take up so much of your time, as to open how this bloody, execrable conspiracy was first framed, and afterwards carried on by the prisoners at the bar, together with others, till it was very near putting in execution, had not the infinite mercy of God prevented it, by a timely discovery.

Gentlemen, this conspiracy was first framed and consulted upon the last year; there were several consultations and meetings, at several places about the town, for this purpose; then, and at those consultations and meetings, there were present captain Porter, the prisoners, and others of whom you will have an account from the witnesses; and at that time they had an expectation of commissions from the late king to authorize the design; that not coming, they yet resolved to put it in execution before the king went away. But because the French troops were then not in readiness to come over hither, to protect them after the execution of the bloody design, it was necessary for them to fly thither for shelter: and therefore they endeavoured to procure a vessel to be ready to carry them over to France. But they could not get a vessel time enough; and then the king's going over into Flanders quickly after, prevented the execution of the design for that time, and so matters rested till the king's return.

About two or three months ago, sir George Barclay, who is an officer in the late king James's guards in France; and some other officers, with sixteen or eighteen troopers in those guards, privately came over from France to put this design in execution; and he did acquaint Mr. Porter and Mr. Charnock with the design, knowing that they had been engaged in the matter before, and so could not but expect that they would readily assist. This design was treated and consulted of between them at several times, and in several places, at captain Porter's, and Mr. Charnock's lodgings in Norfolk-street, at the Globe-tavern in Hatton Garden, the Nag's-head-tavern at St. James's, and several other places; several consultations and meetings were had between the prisoners at the bar, and others, whom you will hear named at these meetings; several ways and methods were proposed how it should be best effected: it was proposed by some, that it should be done by ambuscade, that should be laid near the king's house at Richmond, such a number on foot were to lie in the wood, there ready to attack the king as he came by, and the rest of the conspirators at the same time to fall on the guards. But this method was not so well approved of, as that which was afterwards proposed and agreed to: that is, there were to be three parties of them, and the place was the lane, lying between Brentford and Turnham-green, at the end next Turnham-green, which the king used to pass through, upon his return from Richmond: The order and method of the design was this; sir George Barclay, with eight or ten more, was to attack the coach, and by firing into it, to have killed the king, and all in it, and the rest were to attack the guards, in two parties, on each side of the lane, whereof Mr. Charnock and Porter were to command one, and brigadier Rookwood the other. In order to see how feasible this design might be, the prisoner King, captain Porter, and Knightly, were to go and survey the place; and the next day after that consultation, they went to view the ground, and did very carefully do it, both on this side the water, and on the other side the water; and they came back and met the rest of the company at the Nag's-head-tavern late at night, to give an account what they had done in order to this enterprize. It was agreed the number should be about forty; sir George Barclay was to make up about twenty, Mr. Charnock was to furnish eight, captain Porter seven, and so in other proportions, in all to make up the number of forty; which they thought were enough to effect and accomplish the design.

In order to make this matter the more sure, they did appoint two to lodge and wait at Kensington near the guards; who were to give notice when the king went abroad: and they had their several persons assigned to whom they should give notice, who thereupon were to send orders to the several parties; one of which was Chambers, who was to give notice to the prisoner at the bar, Mr. Charnock; and there was one Durance, who was to give notice to sir George Barclay; and when such notice was given, then they were to send orders to the several persons, who were to be concerned in this bloody business, to come at the time appointed, to be disposed of into their several posts.

Gentlemen, in order to the furthering of this design they did likewise send Durance to go and view, and give them an account of the most convenient inns at Brentford, and Turnham-Green, and the places adjacent, which were least liable to observation, where the men might be the most conveniently disposed of, to lie ready against the time, when they were to execute this barbarous assassination; accordingly, he went, and took an account of the several inns within that compass, and they were to be billeted by two or three in an inn, so as not to be observed; sir George Barclay and his party at Turnham-Green, and the rest at Brentford.

Gentlemen, after they had thus laid the design, Saturday the 15th of February was the first time pitched upon for the putting it in execution, if the king went abroad, as he used to do, upon Saturdays, to Richmond to hunt; and if they had notice from Durance and Chambers, that he was so to do, which notice they had; and every thing was prepared in order to have perpetrated this villainous design; but it happened that the king went not abroad that day, of which they had notice about noon from Chambers to Charnock, and Charnock sent word so to Porter's lodgings, and then the order for their getting together was countermanded, and the note, by which Charnock sent word, was subscribed with the name of Robinson; which you will hear is a name he goes by, as well as by that of Charnock.

Thus they were disappointed at that time; but they were not discouraged from pursuing this inhuman enterprize, but resolved to go on the next opportunity that should be given. And to omit several things that intervened, which the witnesses will give you an account of, on the Friday following they met again, to have every thing ready against the next day, which was Saturday the 22nd of February; when they expected the king would go abroad, as he usually did on that day of the week; and that meeting was at the Sun Tavern in the Strand, and there were present captain Porter, sir William Perkins, sir George Barclay, and Mr. Charnock; and at that time there was a discourse amongst them about the disappointment, which they had had the week before, and some of them had a jealousy that a discovery had been made of their design: but then, upon further consideration, they concluded, if it had been so, they should not have met there, but should have been taken up: and therefore they concluded the king's staying at home that day was but accidental, and so resolved to put their conspiracy in execution the next day.

While they were there, several persons from whom captain Porter had undertaken, that is, one Cranborne, Kenrick, and Keyes the prisoner at the bar, came to Porter; these were carried into another room, and commanded all to be ready the next day, when it was resolved to put the assassination in execution: and then captain Porter asked Kenrick for Sherborne, who it seems had been undertaken for; but it was answered, that he asked so many questions about the matter, that he did not think fit to trust him.

The next morning they met again at captain Porter's lodgings; and there met, as the witnesses will tell you, amongst others, Mr. Pendergrass, Mr. Keyes, and Mr. King; King brought a message to captain Porter from sir George Barclay, to know the names of those that were concerned, and upon that message captain Porter writ down the names of his men, who were for his quota, and sent the list by Cranborne to Mr. Charnock, to add his list to it of the men he was to have under him; Cranborne afterwards came back, and brought the list that captain Porter sent, with the additional list sent by Mr. Charnock, written with his own hand, and subscribed R. C. and Cranborne told them that Chambers had sent word, that the king would go out that morning: at the hearing of which there was much joy amongst them; for they hoped then their wicked design would be put in execution that day. There was a discourse then likewise, that Porter had a piece which carried six bullets; and this, it was ordered, should be put into the hands of Pendergrass, who was to be one of sir George Barclay's men, to attack and fire into the king's coach.

This was upon Saturday the 22nd of February, when they had news that the king was to go abroad, and every thing was to be put in execution at his return from Richmond. From captain Porter's lodgings they went to the Blue Posts in Spring Garden; but about 12 o'clock there came news from Chambers, one of the orderly men at Kensington, that the king did not go abroad that day: This put them into a very great confusion; they then thought some discovery must needs be made because of the disappointment two Saturdays together; and Keyes, the prisoner at the bar, came up and told them, that the guards were all come back in a foam, and the king's coaches were brought back to the Meuse: And this confirmed them in their former jealousy that the matter was discovered; upon which captain Porter, Mr. Pendergrass and Mr. Keyes went together to lie hid some time; but they said they would send Keyes to Mr. Charnock, to let him know where they might be heard of; and if the matter was not discovered, they would still go on to put it in execution: But they could not part without drinking some traitorous healths, which the witnesses will tell you of, to the restoring of the late king and his queen, and the prince of Wales; and after all, one of the company taking an orange in his hand, began a health to the squeezing of the Rotten Orange; and in this manner it was drunk by all of them before they parted, though they were under the apprehension at that time of being discovered already.

This is the beginning and progress of the several consultations that were had for the carrying on this execrable, traitorous conspiracy. I have opened it shortly to you, but you will hear it much fuller in its several parts by the witnesses. By what I have opened, you cannot but observe, that it was very near coming to be executed, if there had not been a discovery of it time enough, through the providence of Almighty God, to prevent it. They had agreed, after the intended assassination, to keep together, till they came near the town, and then they were to lie hid till the French troops landed, which they were assured of were ready upon the least intimation of the success of this conspiracy.

Gentlemen, every body may guess at the dismal consequences that would have followed, had this bloody design taken effect; and I am sure, as we and our posterity could not have expected any thing less than the perpetual yoke and burden of slavery and Popery, if it had pleased God to permit this conspiracy to take effect; so I hope we shall always remember the merciful hand of Providence, that has detected and disappointed it.

Gentlemen, I shall not detain you any longer; I have opened unto you part of that which will more fully be made out by the witnesses; only I would observe, that the providence of God has not only made a discovery to prevent the execution of this abominable villainy, but hath brought this conspiracy so far to light, by such unquestionable testimony, that no man can doubt of the reality of it, which I hope will raise in every honest man's mind an abhorrence and detestation of those principles, upon which so villainous and barbarous a design was founded; and I think I may say, that after the evidence you will hear this day, no one will pretend any doubt of the truth thereof, but either such as are sorry for the discovery, or such as knew too much of the conspiracy before. I shall trouble you no further, but call our witnesses, who will give you a clear and full account of this conspiracy. Swear captain Porter. (Which was done.)

Sol. Gen. (Sir John Hawles.) Captain Porter, I would not lead you with any question, but pray will you give the court and the jury an account what you know concerning any conspiracy about assassinating the king, and when it was to be done, and where, and how, and by whom; and particularly what relates as to that matter to the prisoners at the bar.

Char. My lord, there are two things that I must beg of the court, in relation to the witnesses that are to be produced, and the evidence that is to be given against me at this time: and the first is, that before any of the witnesses give any evidence against me, the rest that are to be sworn and produced, may be kept out of court, till they that are called have severally given their evidence, that one may not hear what the other says. That I suppose is but reasonable in a case of this nature, and what was never denied, but always allowed, as I have been informed.

L. C. J. There is but one witness sworn, and I believe, that there are none of the rest here.

Char. Yes, my lord, here is one gentleman in court whom I suppose to be an evidence, and that is Mr. De la Rue.

L. C. J. If there be any others of the witnesses, let them withdraw till they be called for; let there be somebody to look after them, and attend them. (Which was accordingly done.)

L. C. J. Mr. Charnock, you have your desire as to this matter, all the rest of the witnesses are withdrawn.

Char. My lord, there is another thing that I have to beg of the court, and that is, in relation to the evidence in general, That if there be any thing proved to be spoken in company, and talked of by way of common discourse, or only in jollity in ordinary conversation, that may not be interpreted as a proof of any settled design or practice.

L. C. J. Look you, Mr. Charnock, who can tell what the evidence will be until it be given? you will hear what is deposed by the witnesses, and you have pen and ink, and may make such observations as you think fit: when the witnesses are heard, you will have all the advantage that can be allowed you, and you may then propose your objections to the matter of their evidence; which, no doubt, will have their just weight with the court: in the mean time, have you any exception to this man's being a witness? If you have no exception against him, then he must give his evidence; and after he has delivered himself, and the king's counsel have done with him, you are at liberty to ask him what questions you think fit.

Sol. Gen. Captain Porter, I desire you will acquaint the court and the jury what you know of any conspiracy to take away the life of his majesty, when it began, in what manner it was carried on, how far it proceeded, how it came to be disappointed, who were concerned in it, and what relates to the prisoners at the bar, as to their share therein.

Capt. Porter. My lord, I am unfortunately engaged in this matter, and have made a frank discovery, to make the king all the atonement I can, for having been concerned in such a design. Some weeks before this conspiracy for assassinating the king was in hand, there came to my lodging—

Att. Gen. Captain Porter, I would not interrupt you, but to put it into a method, and order of time, will you please to recollect yourself, and give the court and the jury an account of your knowledge about the first beginning of this conspiracy the last year; I would not lead you, and therefore I ask you the general, and no particular question.

Char. My lord, I suppose that any question about what was done the last year is not at all to the purpose in this case, for there is nothing mentioned in the indictment of the last year.

L. C. J. It is in the indictment divers days and times, as well before as after.

Char. The crime for which we are accused is laid to be the 10th day of February, 1695.

L. C. J. The day is not material, but only a circumstance, but in form, some day before the indictment preferred, must be laid*; and though the day mentioned in the indictment is the 10th of February, yet it is also said, that the things contained in the indictment, of which you are accused, were done likewise at divers days and times, as well before as after, and so the indictment comprehends even what might be done the last year as well as this.

Char. I beg the favour of the court in this matter, for sure the 10th of February last can no way be supposed to be in the last year.

L. C. J. I told you before, the day is not material, nor are the witnesses nor the king's counsel tied up either to the particular time or place mentioned in the indictment, so it be within the county, and before the indictment preferred. All that is to be regarded, is, that no evidence be given or admitted of any other species of treason, but what is contained in the indictment; for a man may certainly be indicted for a treason committed this year, and upon his trial, evidence may be given of the same treason committed the year before.

Char. But then how can a man prepare for his defence?

Att. Gen. The time is but a circumstance, it may certainly be proved at another day than what is laid in the indictment, and yet very good proof; and so it is in all other cases, as well civil as criminal.

Char. Mr. Attorney General has said enough, I think, to confute himself; for if one year may be put in the indictment, and another year brought in in the evidence, how shall any man be able to apply himself to his defence, whose thoughts run only upon the time laid in the indictment? I hope neither the court nor the king's counsel will come so hard upon us, as to put our thoughts quite out of all order, that when we apprehend we are only to defend ourselves against what is said to be done this year, we must afresh prepare ourselves to answer what was done the last year.

L. C. J. It is always so; for form sake, there is a particular time laid in the indictment, but the proof is not to be tied up to that time; but if it be proved at any time before or after, so it be before the indictment preferred, it is well enough: and not without great reason, for the treason consisting in imagining and compassing the king's death, which may be manifested by divers overt-acts, some before, some on, and others since, the 10th of February, yet they are evidences of one treason, which is the compassing the king's death.

Char. Then we may be under an obligation to give an account of all the transactions of our lives, if that be the rule.

L. C. J. No, not so neither, for that very treason assigned in the indictment must be proved, and therefore you are only to give an answer to that, and nothing else.

* As to this, since the operation of the Stat. of W. 3, see the Case of Lowick in this same year.

Char. But, my lord, it may give a very great loose, and much hinder our defence; for as it is now desired that proof may be given, of what was done last year, at the same rate, they [as well before and after] may signify seven years ago.

L. C. J. And so it may if your conspiracy reached so far, or did then begin, and was afterwards pursued; this is not any thing that is unusual, but the common law is plain in it. Well, what say you, Mr. Porter?

Capt. Porter. My lord, I will give you an account, if your lordship pleaseth, of what was done this year; and if any questions afterwards be thought fit by the king's counsel to be now asked me, about what passed before, I will answer them very readily.

Att. Gen. Well then, go on your own way, we will reserve ourselves till afterwards.

Capt. Porter. Some weeks before this design was on foot, for assassinating the king, sir William Perkins, when he was in town, was at the same place where Mr. Charnock and I did lodge; it was about the latter end of January: he asked Mr. Charnock where he would be at night; and I told them, if they were not about private business, I would meet them. He told me, there were some friends come from France, and that something was a doing that would be for the service of the king: I told them, if any thing of that nature was a doing, I would readily engage in it; and they told me I should know it very soon. A little after I fell sick of the gout, and could not stir from my chamber: but then Mr. Charnock did acquaint me, that sir George Barclay, and those that came from France, had brought a commission to raise and levy war upon the person of king William, and he asked me how many I could bring to join with them, if the king landed; I desired to consider of it, and he told me sir George Barclay would come to him about it. Accordingly, he and Holmes came to the house where we lodged, in Norfolk-street, and there they were in private with Mr. Charnock; and afterwards, because I was lame, and could not stir, they came into my room, and sir George Barclay told me, he was glad to see me in good health, but sorry to find me lame, but he hoped to see me abroad in a little time; and I told him, I hoped so too. They said, they were going then to some company, and they hoped to see me afterwards. After that there were several meetings that we had, particularly at the Globe Tavern in Hatton-Garden, the Nags-Head at St. James-street, and the Sun-Tavern in the Strand, and in all these places we did consult together, which was the best way, and where was the best place to assassinate the king, when he came from hunting. Sir G. Barclay told us he had some money to buy horses, but not much, he had as much as would furnish about forty. Capt. Charnock said, he would bring six or seven men, that should come out of the country. Sir William Perkins said he would lend five horses, three to be mounted by men of his own, the other two by such as should be provided, I promised to bring seven men with horses, and sir George Barclay said that Lowick and others that came over with him from France, would engage in the design, and make up the number. I desired very much to see the commission that came from the late king, and asked Mr. Charnock about it; he said he never saw it, but sir William Perkins told me, he had seen it, and that it was all writ with king James his own hand, and signed by himself. All this was agreed to, and then there were consultations in what method it was to be done. Several proposals there were; one was to set upon him as he came from Richmond by the road, others when he was on horse back at Kew. Sir Geo. Barclay was for having it done by ambuscade in the park by Richmond, and therefore desired me to go with Mr. Knightly, and view the several places and ground thereabouts, to find out which was the most convenient place. The day before we were to go captain King came to me, and would know if we were to go about such a matter, and proffered to go with us. I told him I had never a horse, but he said, he would get one. We went that night to the Swan at Knights-bridge, and there we lay, and went the next day to view the ground, and came the next evening to the company, to give an account what we had done; and upon the account that we gave, sir George Barclay's mind was altered, and it was agreed to do it in the lane coming from Brentford to Turnham-Green, and the particular manner was agreed on too. There was one Rookwood that was to command one party of sir George Barclay's men, to attack the guard; he told us, he had bought twenty horses which were to be employed in this expedition; they were to be divided in three parties, and sir George Barclay was to have four out of each of the other parties, and to seize upon the king's coach, and to shoot into it, and kill the king, and all those that were with him: and this was to be done on the 15th of February, which was a Saturday, and the king usually went to Richmond on Saturdays. We had two orderly men (as they were called) who were to lie at Kensington, to give intelligence when the king and the guards went out, the one was Chambers, and the other one Durant, a Flemming, I think, or I do not well know what countryman he was; and Durant was to bring an account when the guard went out, and Chambers when the king went out, and when we had notice that the king was gone, we were to go by three or four in a party to prevent suspicion, and we were to be dispersed in the several inns about Brentford and Turnham Green. Sir Geo. Barclay was to be at the King of Bohemia's head; and we ordered a man to give notice to him when the king landed, and then he was to give notice to us, and so we were to form ourselves into our several bodies, to take our several posts as were agreed upon. I asked him, what he thought to do when the matter was over, how we should dispose of ourselves? He told me, we need not fear any thing, but might go to town and lie still, and that there would come a sufficient number from abroad ready to assist us. That 4 or 5,000 French were to divert in Scotland, and the king would be near the French shore with a sufficient army. On Friday before the 22d, when it was to have been executed again, we met at the Sun-tavern in the Strand, and there discoursed, for a matter of half an hour, about the former disappointment, and several in the company were afraid the design was discovered: but then I told them, if it had been so, sure we should have been taken up before now; upon which it was agreed, then let us resolve upon it again to-morrow, and so it was resolved upon. Capt. Charnock said, he could not stay, because he should want some men that were come up out of the country on purpose. I said, I was afraid my horses were sick, and could not be used in the service, and sir William Perkins thereupon undertook to furnish me, and told Mr. Charnock and me he had sent to Mr. Lewis, that belongs to the earl of Feversham, to procure some, having, as he said, promised so to do. I sent the next morning to have a note for two, by Mr. Cranburne, and he sent me a note back again by Cranburne, that he had sent to Mr. Lewis, and Mr. Lewis said, he would help him to three horses, with saddles, holsters and pistols, and desired the list of my men, which I sent him, and he sent it me back again with the list of his own, and then I shewed it to Mr. De la Rue, and we were preparing all things for the execution of design, and presently after news came, that the king did not go out that day neither: upon which I said I would go out of town, and I asked capt. Pendergrass to go with me, and we sent Keyes to bring linnen unto us, but he did not come until the Wednesday, and upon the Thursday we were taken.

Att. Gen. Captain Porter, you mention several consultations, at several times and places; who were present at any, and which of them? Were any of the prisoners at the bar there, and which?

Capt. Porter. There was Mr. Charnock, and Mr. King, at all of them.

Att. Gen. What do you say about Keyes? What was he?

Capt. Porter. He was my servant a year and a half.

Att. Gen. Was he acquainted with the assassination?

Capt. Porter. Yes, he was, and was present at most of the consultations. He hired horses for me to be employed in the business. On the first Saturday, he hired two, I gave him money for them, and he did know upon what account they were hired.

Att. Gen. Was he present when news was brought of the disappointment?

Capt. Porter. Yes, he was both times.

Att. Gen. You are sure he was present then?

Capt. Porter. Yes, the second time he said, that he met the king's guards that were come back all in a foam, and that he had spoke to one of my lord of Oxford's regiment, and that something was muttered, upon which he feared a discovery.

Att. Gen. Did Keyes agree to be one of the men, that should be concerned and act in this business?—Capt. Porter. Yes, he did.

Att. Gen. What quality is he of? What is his profession?

Capt. Porter. He used formerly to help to dress me, and he was to look after my linnen and equipage.

Sol. Gen. Had he not been a trumpeter? Was not that his profession?

Capt. Porter. He was a trumpeter, and used sometimes to entertain us with his trumpet.

Mr. Conyers. You speak of a meeting at the Sun-tavern in the Strand upon Friday the 21st of February, where it was resolved to execute this attempt upon the next day.

Porter. Yes, there was such a meeting.

Mr. Conyers. Was Keyes there at that time?

Porter. He was not in the room where we were, but he was in another room in the same house, where I went out to him, and there was he, Cranburne and Kenrick.

Mr. Conyers. Pray what did you go to them for?

Porter. I went to acquaint them what was resolved upon; and I told them they were resolved to do it the next day, to which they agreed, but that I thought my horses would not be ready, but I hoped I should get some other.

Mr. Conyers. Pray what other discourse had you in that company: with whom, and about what?

Porter. Mr. Kenrick came to me with his arm in a string; either he had broke his arm, or pretended so to have done. I then asked him for Mr. Sherbourn, whom he had mentioned before to me, as one that was likely to be concerned: he told me Mr. Sherbourn asked a great many questions about the design, which he did not think fit to answer; I thanked him for telling me so, and said I would not send to him.

Mr. Cooper. Pray, captain Porter, give me leave to ask you one question, Can you remember what number of men Charnock was to provide for this enterprize?

Porter. He promised seven or eight men, some of which should bring their horses out of the country, others he would borrow or hire for them.

Att. Gen. Pray, Sir, was there any body sent to take an account of the inns about the place where this assassination was to have been executed?

Porter. Yes, Mr. Durant was, and he did bring us an account of the several inns about Brentford and Turnham-green.

Att. Gen. As to the list of men, which you say you sent to Charnock, and he sent you back with a list of his men, pray can you tell whose hand that list of his men was in?

Porter. I know captain Charnock's hand very well, and, to the best of my knowledge, it was his own hand, and subscribed R. C.

Att. Gen. Sir, you have given an account of the meeting the 22d at your lodging.

Charnock. I was not there, he says.

Att. Gen. First let me ask you, how came it that it was not put in execution the 15th; for that you did not tell us before?

Porter. I tell you, Sir, it was because the king did not go out that day, according as we had notice, that he intended to do: Durant wrote first word that the guards were gone before, upon which I went for my men, and about noon I received a note from Mr. Charnock that the king did not go out that day.

Att. Gen. Pray what name was subscribed to that note?

Porter. R. Robinson, which was a name he used to go by sometimes.

Att. Gen. And pray in whose hand was that note?

Porter. To the best of my knowledge it was captain Charnock's, I know his hand very well.

Att. Gen. My lord, if the prisoners will ask him any questions, they may.

L. C. J. Will you ask him any questions?

Char. My lord, in the first place I desire the judgment of the court, whether he be a legal evidence or no. I conceive he is not, and I hope your lordships will think so too: for he makes himself a criminal by his own confession, and that of a very heinous crime, and it is equal in my judgment (and as I have been advised, who I must still say am ignorant in these matters) as if he had confessed it upon an indictment, and then the law can take no notice of him as a good witness. And if he were no legal witness then, I take it by the same reason he is no legal witness now: For the crime is the same, and it is an acknowledgment in open court.

L. C. J. Look you, Mr. Charnock, if it had been a confession upon an indictment, it would have been a conviction, which would have had quite another operation: but it not being upon an indictment, it is no conviction, and therefore he is a legal witness, though he does acknowledge himself to be guilty of the crime.

Char. Then my lord he is looked upon as no good evidence, in my judgment, because he is a criminal.

L. C. J. He is a legal evidence, though he does confess himself guilty of the crime.

Char. He owns himself a partner in a bloody design, and to convict me, he swears to take away my life, to save his own. I cannot imagine why he should be accounted a legal witness, that is a party by his own confession in such a matter.

L. C. J. Pray, who can tell better what was intended and done in such a conspiracy than he that was a party in it?

Char. My lord, he has forfeited his life by his own confession, and now he would, by swearing against me, take away my life to save his own.

L. C. J. Whatsoever objections you have against the credit of his testimony, you may make what use of them you can in the proper time; but for any thing that yet appears, he is a legal witness.

Char. My lord, I know not how far he is a legal witness, therein I must be governed by the judgment of the court; but sure it will take away from the credibility of his testimony, his own acknowledgment of his being guilty of such a crime. Though he may be a legal witness, he cannot be a good one. And I hope the gentlemen of the jury will consider of it, when a man comes to take away other men's lives to save his own, by accusing them of crimes which he acknowledgeth himself to be guilty of.

L. C. J. Look you, Mr. Charnock, for that matter, it is so in all cases of this nature, not only in cases of high-treason, but of robberies and burglaries, and the like, where the parties concerned are, and always have been allowed to be good witnesses against their accomplices in those crimes. Will you ask him any questions, Mr. Charnock?

Char. My lord, here is another thing, which I apprehend, I have reason to object against the testimony of this witness; he does not only swear to save his own life, and take away another's to deserve the saving of his own, but there is in this case swearing to get a reward, for there is a reward of 1,000*l.* a piece promised by proclamation, for the apprehension of this man and others. And not only a pardon, but the 1,000*l.* to any of those in the proclamation who shall discover and take any of the proscribed persons. Now, where a man stands accused by proclamation, and his own life is thereby concerned, and a reward is proposed for any of the conspirators discovering and apprehending the others, it is a hard matter to admit any one that acknowledgeth himself guilty of such a crime, to prove a prisoner guilty of that crime under those circumstances. Besides, my lord, I have known this gentleman, and though he may have had an estate, yet since I have reason to suspect, and perhaps it may be very well known, that the fortune he had is lavished away; to make up that damage, he may be tempted to undertake this way of swearing. So I think he cannot be a good evidence, and I hope your lordship will think so too, and that he is to receive no credit or countenance before an honest jury, as I doubt not these gentlemen are, that are to try us.

L. C. J. Mr. Charnock, do not mistake yourself; he is to have no reward by the proclamation unless he had come in voluntarily, and apprehended one of the others; for only those that apprehend any of the persons named in the proclamation, are to receive any part of the reward, not any of the witnesses against any of them; the reward is for the apprehension, whether they be found guilty or not guilty.

Char. But still, my lord, he cannot be a good witness, for it looks as if he was a man that was willing to have become an evidence, because we, whom he has accused, particularly myself, were permitted to be taken, and then in the mean while he seems to withdraw, only that he might be taken as a colour. For my part, I know not but that it may be a contrivance of his own, to be colourably taken up, because he is so willingly an evidence, as the jury may perceive he is.

L. C. J. It is certainly a very hard matter, if not impossible, to discover crimes of this nature, if the accomplices in those crimes shall not be allowed to be good witnesses against their fellow conspirators.

Char. My lord, I must submit to the judgment of the court that he is a legal witness. But though I shall not press upon the legality, yet I must say he is not a good witness for all the reasons that I have urged.

L. C. J. Nay, he is a very good witness, if he be a legal witness; but the credit of what he says, as in all other cases, must be left to the jury, who are judges of the matter of fact and the credibility of the witnesses.

Char. My lord, when persons will own themselves guilty of joining in so barbarous a crime as we stand indicted for, and accused of, sure there will be little credit due to their testimony.

L. C. J. His credit must be left to the jury, who are the judges of it; now if you will ask no questions, I must speak to the rest. Mr. King, will you ask him any questions?

Char. I speak this only in general; but I have some remarks that I have made upon the evidence that has been given, out of which, when I have told you of them, questions may arise, which it may be fit for me to propose, and I shall desire your lordship's leave accordingly.

L. C. J. Look you, Mr. Charnock, you shall be heard all that you have to say, when your time comes for your defence, and to make what observations upon the evidence you please. But the matter is now, whether you will think fit to cross-examine the witnesses that are produced for the king, or to ask them any questions?

Char. My lord, I have taken some notes of what has been said, and I desire I may make the best use of them that I can.

L. C. J. You may make what use you will of your notes, and make what observation you will make any question you ask intelligible.

Char. My lord, captain Porter in his evidence has said that this conspiracy was in the latter end of February. Now I apprehend his oath is not valuable upon this Indictment, because the offence is laid the tenth of February, and so his conspiracy that he talks of, was after the time laid in the Indictment.

L. C. J. I believe you mistake him, Sir.

Att. Gen. If he pleases to ask him, I suppose he will find himself mistaken.

Capt. Porter. My lord, I say the latter end of January; if I said February I mistook.

L. C. J. And so it must be; for the two and twentieth of February was to have been the second time for the execution of the design, and several of the conspirators were taken the next day.

Char. My lord, I desire capt. Porter may be asked, where it was, and when, that I brought sir George Barclay and Mr. Holmes into his company?

Capt. Porter. It was the beginning of February, at my chamber, in the same house where Mr. Charnock lodged, and I was then sick of the gout.

Char. My Lord, I declare it, I know nothing of it. Then he says, we had several meetings, particularly at three several taverns; by what I can observe, there is no time at all, nor at any of those three places that there was any sort of conspiracy for the assassinating of the king.

L. C. J. Yes, he says, that you met at those places, where you did consult about assassinating of the king, and the ways and methods how it should be carried on, and that you was at those consults; for Mr. Attorney asked him particularly, Whether you that are the prisoners were there? and he says, Ay.

Char. He says, that we met at the Nag's-head tavern in St. James's-street, where it was agreed that he and Knightly should go and view the ground, to see which would be the most convenient place; and that they came the next night to give an account according to our desire. Now, my lord, I was there at dinner, and capt. Porter did come in at night; and if you do remember, captain, you could not pull off your boots well, and complained of the gout, and was very peevish; and said you had been at Mortlack, and had met with a friend there; That is all that I know. There was capt. King and Mr. Knightly indeed; who sent for some other cloaths, but it cannot be pretended that there was any crime transacted at that time; for you cannot imagine, that I would have to do in any such matter amongst porters and messengers that were to go on common errands.

L. C. J. I will only put you in a right method; You may ask what questions you will now; but you are not to make your observations upon the witnesses to the jury till the king's evidence be given, for then your time will come for your defence.

Char. My lord, it may be I may forget then what may be proper for me to insist upon. If your lordship will please to allow me a solicitor to put me in mind, I should be the better able to manage myself.

L. C. J. You may be helped by your notes; but you have been told over and over, we can allow no solicitor.

Char. My lord, capt. Porter says, I told him there was such a commission brought by sir George Barclay from king James; he says indeed, I told him I never saw it; and I do not know how I could, because I do not believe there ever was any such, and it is improbable there should be any such.

L. C. J. Mr. Charnock, I would not hinder you from saying any thing that would be proper for your defence, nor will interrupt you when your proper time comes.

Char. My lord, what I say is as to what capt. Porter has evidenced, and I will make observations upon one part of the evidence after another, as it is given.

L. C. J. But that is not regular, according to the course of evidence, and will introduce a confusion. You may ask any questions of the particular witnesses, as they are in order, if you will; but your observations, as to your own defence, you must defer, till the witnesses are heard, that so the evidence may be entire, and your defence entire; therefore if you will ask him any questions, say so.

Char. No, my lord.

L. C. J. Then Mr. King, will you ask him any questions?

King. Capt. Porter, Did I mention any thing, or was there any discourse when you and I, and Mr. Knightly, as you say, went out to view the ground, about killing the king?

Porter. The day before we went, we dined together, and it was at the Nag's-head, and he asked if I was to meet Knightly, and go and view the ground, in order to settling the design, which was then talked of, and consulted about; and captain King desired to go with us, and we lay at Knightsbridge; and when we were about it, we discoursed several times of the nature of the place; and captain King did not approve of the place on this side the water, but liked the ambuscade better, which was to have been on the other side the water.

L. C. J. Will you ask him any more questions?—King. No, my lord.

L. C. J. Well then, What says the other man, Keyes? Will he ask him any questions?

Keyes. My lord, I have had no body to advise me, no counsel; I was only a servant to captain Porter.

Att. Gen. If then they have done with him, before he goes, I desire to ask him one question. What discourse, or treaty, or consultation about this, or such like a matter, there was the last winter, and between whom?

Capt. Porter. There were several meetings and consultations the last winter between capt. Charnock, sir William Perkins, and myself, about such a thing; and we thought that the quickest way to bring in the king, and restore him to his crown, was by knocking king William on the head; and there were several meetings about the ways of doing it.

Att. Gen. Who else were there at those meetings?

Capt. Porter. There were several others in company.

Att. Gen. But the meaning of my question is, who of the prisoners?

Capt. Porter. I cannot remember any but capt. Charnock.

Att. Gen. Pray will you acquaint us with the reason why it was not done at that time?

Capt. Porter. We wanted a commission from France, which we thought was a necessary authority for us to act by.

Att. Gen. You speak of a list that was brought you again from Charnock, with the addition of those names that were his men; pray at that time was there no discourse about a particular gun that was somebody's, and that one in the company was to have, to be employed in this service?

Capt. Porter. My lord, I said, I had a musketoon that carried 6 or 8 bullets, that captain Pendergrass, who was one of the four out of my quota, that was to go with sir George Barclay, should have if he pleased.

Att. Gen. Captain Porter, I would not lead you, but were there any particular directions given, and what, touching the particular employment of that gun?

Capt. Porter. I remember I told capt. Pendergrass, if the coach made any great haste to get away, he might easily hinder that, by killing or laming one of the horses with that gun.

Att. Gen. Pray recollect yourself, sir, was King, the prisoner at the bar, present at that discourse?

Capt. Porter. Capt. King was then in my room in Maiden-lane, where I then lay, being removed from my lodging at Norfolk-street.

King. Do you say that I heard any such discourse?

Capt. Porter. I cannot say you heard it, but you was present then.

Att. Gen. Was there not some discourse about a defect of the numbers that were appointed, and expected to join in this thing?

Capt. Porter. My lord, I told you I wanted a man, and that was Kenrick, who had his arm in a string; and Mr. De la Rue brought one that I knew not, and some of the company went to the Blue-Posts to tarry there whilst I came to them, and capt. King was present when the news was brought us of the disappointment, and then I resolved to go out of town.

Att. Gen. The next witness, my lord, that we call, is Mr. De la Rue, and we desire he may be sworn. (Which was done.)

Sol. Gen. Mr. De la Rue, we would desire you to acquaint the court and the jury, what you know of any design or conspiracy to assassinate the king, when it began, how it was carried on, and by whom, and by what methods?

De la Rue. My lord, this conspiracy hath been carrying on a great while, for some years: and it originally came from col. Parker, especially as to my knowledge of it; and that was five or six years ago, at St. Germain, when I was there: he proposed it to me, and said he would propose it to my lord Melfort, who was king James's secretary in France. Two years after, he came over into England, it was a little before the business of La Hogue, and he would have had me come over into England with him; upon which I applied myself to my lord Melfort to know whether I should come over hither, yea or no; my lord Melfort advised me to stay there awhile; for, said he, you will find there is something a doing which will please you. But nothing being done, after that I came to England, and suffered a very tedious confinement here. I became acquainted with Mr. Charnock and capt. King abroad, I have been with Mr. Charnock, Mr. King, Mr. Porter, Mr. Goodman, and col. Parker, here in town several times, and at several places. And now I come to what was a doing the last year. In the months of January, February, and March, till the king's going to Flanders, there were several conferences and consultations about this matter, between sir William Perkins, capt. Porter, and others; I cannot say that ever I was in company with Goodman at that time, when we talked of any thing of this nature. But capt. Charnock carried me to sir William Perkins, whom I had never seen before, to the Mitre-tavern in St. James's market, and there I was asked if I would be concerned in the easing us from the yoke that then lay upon us. I asked which way it was to be done, for I could not understand what was meant, but the taking off the king, and therefore I asked which way it was to be done. Then they asked me, whether I knew where capt. Stow lived; and they employed me to go to his lodgings, and appointed me to meet them at the Star tavern in White-Friars. They were there before me, when I had met with the captain, and brought him thither; but that they thought not a fit place to consult in, and therefore they went to Bromfield's coffee-house, and there they did talk something of it; but they took one another aside, and talked privately amongst themselves, which I took some observation and notice of; and upon enquiry I was told it was because there was an old gentleman in the company, whom they did not care to acquaint with any thing of the matter, because he was too old to have any hand in it, and they would acquaint none with their resolutions, but those that were to be actors in the design. My lord, I was not often in their company after that, but I heard from time to time, how matters went on, and I heard from captain Porter particularly, that they had been at Turnham-Green and liked the place very well, and that the design was to take the king off, or else to hurry him away to Rumney-Marsh alive, and carry him into France.

Charnock. Surely this is not any evidence, because captain Porter only spoke of it, and it is by hear-say, and we are not concerned what other people talk of.

Att. Gen. Pray who was in the room, when the proposals were made?

De la Rue. What proposals do you mean, Sir?

Att. Gen. At the tavern in St. James's-street.

De la Rue. At the coffee-house there was a little talk of it between themselves; but they would not talk much, they said, because there was an old gentleman there who was too old to engage, and they would have none but actors; that I understood to be the reason why they talked one with another so: but I taking notice of their privacy, whenever I asked Charnock of it, he referred me to captain Porter. But withal he told me several times, that he believed it would come to nothing. The design was to carry the king alive into France, if they could; if they could not take him alive, then to assassinate him, and pretend it was done by a random shot. He told me also, that they had sent to king James for a commission to execute this matter, and to authorize them to carry the king into France, if they could take him; and then if they could not, they agreed to excuse themselves, as I said, by pretending that he was killed by a random shot. It should seem (as I understood) the commission was delayed a long time, and then they resolved to execute the design without a commission; and within a few days before the king was to go to Flanders, I was told all was ready. But then they wanted a ship to carry him off when they had taken him; and there met at the Rose tavern, as I remember, captain Porter and sir William Perkins; but I cannot tell whether Mr. Charnock was there or not. I asked them if they had concluded upon the matter; they told me it was concluded upon, and, as I remember, they told me captain Charnock, or Robinson (for he went by both names) was to have a recommendation to somebody at Deal; and so they were to hire a vessel, and I was asked whether I would go with him: I told them I would. But then the king went a little after for Flanders; and they had no time to complete the whole affair, and so the business was put off till the king's return this last winter.

Sol. Gen. Well, what say you to any thing since?

De la Rue. This year, in the months of November and December, Mr. King, the prisoner at the bar, told me, that there would be a major general come over from France, and that there was a man of quality about the town, that offered to disburse two or three thousand pounds, if king James would give order for it: and this was, as I suppose, to buy horses to be engaged in this matter, and he would tell me more a while after. A month or two after, he told me he was out of money about it, which could not be had: I was brought in by capt. Porter, and they communicated this to me about the latter end of January, or the beginning of the month of February; they told me there was a major general come over from France, and there were a great many people come over besides; and there would be something speedily put in execution, which would be for the king's service.

L. C. J. Who told you this?

De la Rue. Captain King. The next time I saw him, he told me he wanted a saddle with holsters, it was the 7th of February, on Friday night, for he was to go out of town with some friends, about something in order to this affair; he desired me to lend him one; but I had none, I told him, but I would write to capt. Porter, to procure one for him; and he told me he was to go with Knightly, Durant, and others, to see whether the king went to Richmond or to Hounslow, because they were told the king had altered his journey from Richmond to Hounslow. He afterwards told me, he went with his friends, and the Sunday morning he comes to me, and told me, there was the rarest place for the execution of the design against the king, that was possible to be thought of; if they should have studied never so long, and desired a convenient place, they could not have had such another. It was within a quarter of a mile of the king's house at Richmond, in a lane that leads to the house, and so narrow, that the officers and the guard could go but very few a-breast, hardly broad enough for a-breast; and there was to be an ambuscade behind the park pales, and the other side was the river; and, says he, we will have all the pales sawed so far that when the king's coach comes into the place, the pales shall be broke down, and we will have a parcel of horse ready, that shall be sure to do the work with the guards; and when we fire, they shall take notice to make their attack. Durant desires to command this party; and they were to be dressed in country-men's habits, that they might be the less taken notice of: and he said 10 or 12 men on the other side would beat 100 of the guards in that consternation, especially we having the park pales before us to defend us. He asked me if I would be one of the ambuscade. I told him I had rather be one of those on horseback to secure the retreat, and I would rather attack the guards. It was late, and so King and I went home; and the next day I went to see captain Porter, when he was ill of the gout. This was Sunday, the 9th of February; we did go to Porter, and he was in his chamber, and two or three more, and they were talking of indifferent things: he asked for captain Charnock, and they said he was gone out; but he takes out capt. Porter into the yard to talk with him by himself; and what he said to him, I suppose was to tell him what he had told me before: says captain Porter to him, I have taken care of a horse for you; we will ride out on Tuesday next to see the place. Mr. Porter, and Mr. King, and, as I was told, Mr. Knightly went to Knightsbridge, and lay there all night: and the next day they went out of town to view the place. I was at Porter's lodging on the Monday, but I was told there by Keyes and his landlady, that he lay that night at the Swan at Knightsbridge, and was to go out the next day. On the Tuesday morning I was coming back from Kensington, which was the 11th of February, and when I was coming along the street I met with Keyes, and asked him where he was going? Says he, I am going to sir William Perkins with a lerrying trumpet; for it seems he was raising a troop of horse, as Porter told me afterwards; and within a little time afterwards, I saw captain Porter at the end of Norfolk-street, and he told me they would all be together at the Nag's-head about 7 or 8 o'clock. I went, and expected to be admitted, and asked if captain Porter was there; they told me he was above, but there were several other persons with him; and there was a coach at the door which had brought two Scotch gentlemen, of which I thought sir George Barclay was one, whom I heard to be in town. I desired to speak with captain Porter; they told me he was busy above in company, and could not be spoke with; by which I saw they were not willing that I should come there amongst them, which I took very ill. Captain King came out to me, and was talking with me at the door, and captain Charnock comes with another to the door in a coach: I saw him, but when, I suppose, he perceived me, he pulls himself back into the coach, as if he had no mind to be seen; but finding he could not avoid it, he comes out, and asks me if I would not go up stairs into the company? I told him, No, I hear they are busy, and because I was not invited up at first, I would not trouble them. I was then thinking of going to my lord Shrewsbury's office immediately, to get some messengers immediately to apprehend them; but then I thought I had not enough to discover their intentions, and make it out against them, but I should have one time or another. I did not see captain King till Saturday afterwards at 12 o'clock, and I was then at Charnock's lodging, to see whether he was gone out, that I might be able to give the king the better account; they told me he was at the Blue Posts in Spring-Garden: I would not go and dine there, but went home, and afterwards went thither; and King told me, the king did not go out that day; I told him that I heard so, and would come and see them after dinner. At this meeting at Spring Garden I saw Keyes was one, and Kenrick, and Sherbourn, and Bryerly, and two that I did not know. This was Saturday the 15th. On Sunday the 16th, I met Mr. King at St. James's-street, and we went thence to the Dog tavern, and there we supped together, and he told me sir George Barclay had brought over sixteen of the guards and two officers, and a brigadier, and a sub-brigadier; and he told me the day before, that he knew some of them, and was going to meet them; for they were en Cachet, as he called it in French, and did not stir abroad without leave, and were subsisted at the rate of 4s. a day, as the guards were here. He told me, he had a been lately with them a drinking. I asked him whither they went; he told me, to the Bear tavern in the Strand; and he told me Mr. Charnock and captain Porter had several conferences with them to contrive how to take off his majesty, to murder and to assassinate him. And he told me—

Char. My lord, I desire he may be asked whether he was at the Bear tavern with these men.

L. C. J. What he says about this matter, is what King told him.

Char. That is not evidence, my lord.

L. C. J. That is true, not to affect you, but only Mr. King.

De la Rue. Captain King told me besides, that Mr. Charnock did not argue like a soldier, and reflected upon him for it; for he said, he seemed to desire to have his post in as little danger as was possible. And for Mr. Porter, he did not approve of him; for he told me he had as much fat in his brains, as he had in his body. I remember those words he said; and that what he and Durant had proposed, was rejected, that was about the ambuscade: For it was said, that after all their consideration, sir George Barclay was not sure of horse enough to carry them off afterwards; wherefore they resolved to assassinate his majesty in the lane coming from Brentford to Turnham Green; and sir George Barclay was to command eight persons to assault the king, and those that were in the coach; and Mr. Charnock was to attack the guards in the rear; and one Rookwood, with a party that came from France, and captain Porter, in two wings, were to attack the two sides of the guards. I remember on Sunday night I asked him if he had a good sword, for I wanted one; and I said to him, where is your sword cutler? He told me, on the other side of the way; and he was sent for to bring a good sword, and I chose one that was but a little blade, which he thought would do best, and was ridiculing captain Charnock's sword, as being too broad, and of three or four fingers breadth. I liked his sword, and spake to the man to get me one like his; and he said a Tuesday, that he had sent him to my lodging, but I had not seen him. On Tuesday, the 18th of February, I went to him, and asked him, whether I should see him in the afternoon? He told me, no; for he was to go out with Knightly to buy arms. Shall I see you then at night? said I. I cannot tell whether you can or no, said he. I cannot remember any thing more that passed upon the 18th. But I spoke to Mr. Charnock, whom I met near his lodging in Norfolk-street, and desired to have a word with him towards the water-side: I asked him, how the matter in hand went; says he, I find people that were sanguine, and hot, and forward, are now grown cold: I believe the king has notice of it, and the thing has taken air; for he has not been abroad a good while. He was not abroad on Saturday, as he usually does go: and I hear that upon Friday night it was agreed in council, to take up several people. Said I, does the business go on? No, says he, I believe it is off, because we apprehend the thing has taken air; besides things of such a nature are not to be communicated to so many, nor delayed, both which are very dangerous; not above three people should know of it. Said I, how then would they get enough for the execution? if they be not acquainted with the design, they will never engage. Well, said he, I believe they are quite off of the thoughts of it; but you may depend upon the main business, that will be very speedily, which was the landing of king James. While I was talking, comes Bryerly from captain Porter; and after him, came captain King in a coach, and asked me, if I would go home with him? I told him, no, I was not going home, but was going into White Friars, and I took my leave of them; and nothing passed more, that I remember, at that time. On Wednesday morning I went to captain Charnock's, thinking to learn something how matters went on; but he was closer, and more reserved than before. I asked him to lend me a good sword. He said he had none, but Mr. Porter had a good broad flaming sword, which I thought to be the sword that captain King mentioned to be his: And we had little talk that day; for I had business to do, and I left him pretty soon on the Wednesday. Next day after, I went to captain Porter's lodging, who was removed from Norfolk-street into Maidenhead-lane, to one Brown a surgeon's, and very few people knew where he was, but those that were of the party in this business; and I went into another room, into the dining-room, because his room had not a fire, and he came in to us, and I told him what I had heard from Mr. Charnock, that the thing was quite off. He told me, he heard nothing of it, but found all people that were concerned, as resolute for the execution of it, as ever they were.

Char. My lord, he speaks of what captain Porter told him; that is nothing to me.

L. C. J. No, it is not, nor will it ever be urged against you; it is but hear-say from another. Go on, Sir.

De la Rue. I stayed there but a short time: But, captain Charnock, since you speak of this matter, I only say, I told captain Porter what you told me, that you thought they were off of the business, and that it had taken air; and I asked him what he thought: says he, I know nothing of any alteration; I believe they are as resolute as ever they were: for they fully purpose, that if the king goes abroad on Saturday morning, we will have all ready. And he told me how it was to be done. He desired me to lie with him on Friday night, that we might prepare every thing against the next day: but I could not do that; and therefore he bid me send at nine, or thereabouts. I told him I would be at my lodging about that time, if he would send to me, to be sure about seven or eight o'clock in the morning. About that time in the morning captain Porter sends to me again; a servant-maid came to me, for the black that used to attend him, used only to go abroad at nights, and was not seen to go in and out a-days, for fear of being taken notice of; because, as I said, none but those that were of the party knew that he lodged there. I dressed myself, and went to captain Porter's lodging. He was in bed, but presently he rises, and told me in French, 'Toutes parties sont prests;' all things are ready: And when he was up, he put on his boots; and by and bye, in comes Mr. Kenrick; and after him in comes Mr. Keyes; and after him, Mr. King and Mr. Pendergrass: and captain King takes Mr. Porter into another room, and there they were whispering a while, but I did not hear what they said; but King told me afterwards, he did not observe that I was in the other room. The question then was asked of Cranbourne, when he saw sir George Barclay? He said, he just came from him: And then captain Porter takes a pen and ink, writes down a list of the persons that he was sure of, and puts me down first. What, says Mr. Pendergrass, are you the captain? I told him, I believed I was in before the rest of the company that were there. Then captain Porter sends Mr. Cranbourne with the list to captain Charnock's lodgings; and in the mean time, when Mr. Cranbourne was gone, captain Porter told me, that Mr. Pendergrass was to be one of the eight under sir George Barclay, that were to assassinate the king; and now, says he, I am going to lend him a gun that will carry six or eight bullets. Says captain King thereupon to him, I hope you will not fear to break the glass windows. No, says he, I will have a hand or a finger in the business. By and bye came in news, that Chambers, one of the orderly men, as they called them that lay at Kensington to give intelligence, had sent word that the king was to go abroad, and the guards were gone out. Durant was to stay last, to see when the king went out. Chambers had been there all the week. Mr. Cranbourne came back, and told captain Porter, that Chambers had sent to captain Charnock, that the king would go out that day. At which all the company seemed joyful. Captain Porter told me likewise of several disappointments that they had, both as to time, and as to men; particularly that one major Lowick had engaged to bring two men, and that one of them had told his wife, that he was to mount for king James's service; and she went and cried after him when he went to the coffee-house; and so he was forced to abscond, and so we lost three: and also told me, that Kenrick said he had broke his arm; and when captain Porter asked for Sherbourne whom Kenrick had talked of, he said he asked so many questions that he durst not trust him: so that they had lost five or six in the whole: and there was one Plowden that they were disappointed of besides, whom they had very much reckoned upon. When Mr. Cranbourne brought back the list that captain Porter sent to captain Charnock, there were added to it several names, which captain Porter said were the names of the men that were to be under captain Charnock, and that it was his hand; and at the bottom there were the letters R. C. which I thought stood for Robert Charnock. The names made up about seventeen or eighteen: I told him, I thought there had been more. He told me, there would have been more, but that they were under some disappointments, as I told you before. He asked me to get him some men to supply the defect, and I proposed some names, to make him believe I was hearty in the business: We agreed to go to the Blue Posts in Spring Garden, and I went under pretence to get the men, and came and told them, I had got them, and I found Mr. Pendergrass there, and I took Mr. Keyes thither, and Mr. Porter sent Mr. Cranbourne to captain Charnock several times; by and bye word was brought that Chambers had sent word, the king would not go abroad that day; upon which they all looked very blank: and Keyes came two or three times in, and went out again; he was several times up and down, at last he came and told us, the guards were returned from Richmond foaming; and he went down again to learn further intelligence, and within a little time came and told us, the king's coach was returned to the Mews Gate, and the people very much wondered what should be the reason that the king did not go a hunting for two Saturdays together as he used to do. They seemed to be in a very great consternation at this news, and captain Porter said he resolved to go out of town, and asked me if I would go: I told him, no; I had a suit in Doctors Commons, and I would go to my proctor and lawyers to consult about it. Then he asked Mr. Pendergrass to go with him, which he agreed to do; and captain Porter sent Keyes up to give the rest of the company an account, that there was no occasion for them then, and so they dispersed.

Char. Did I go out of town, can you tell?

De la Rue. Now you put me in mind, Mr. Cranbourne brought a message from you about that time to captain Porter, that sir George Barclay desired to speak with him at his lodgings. Captain Porter was then apprehensive of bailiffs meeting with him; and, says he, he knew this, I wonder he would not come to me. But he did not go to him, but resolved speedily to go out of town; and Keyes was to give an account where he was in the country, that, if occasion was, he might be sent for. This is all I can at present recollect, only I beg your pardon, I remember, there were several disloyal healths drunk in the company, at several times, as the restoring the late king, the health of the prince of Wales, the late queen, and the French king; and particularly, I remember, when the news of the disappointment was, Mr. Porter took an orange in his hand, and squeezed it, and gave it into the hand of the next person to him, whom he drank to, and began a health to the squeezing the rotten orange; and said, Though we are disappointed one day, I hope to have another: and Keyes was at dinner with them all the time, and every body drank it, I did not see any body refuse it, but it went from one to another quite round.

Att. Gen. Pray, who were there at that time?

De la Rue. All the company pledged the health, and Mr. Keyes was there.

Charnock. Pray was I there?

De la Rue. No.

King. Was I there?

De la Rue. No, there was none of the prisoners, but Mr. Keyes, who belonged to Mr. Porter's party: Mr. King for his part belonged to sir George Barclay's party.

Att. Gen. My lord, before we go to another witness, I desire to know whether the prisoners will ask this witness any questions.

Charnock. You say, there was a note of names sent by me to captain Porter; Pray, do you know my hand-writing?

De la Rue. I cannot say I have seen you write, or that I saw you write that: but I have seen your writing several times, and I believe it to be your hand.

Charnock. Why so, have you any of my writing?

De la Rue. I have received several notes from you, which I believe are your writing.

Charnock. But you do not swear, that they were my writing, or that this was my writing.

De la Rue. I tell you, you have sent several notes to me at several times, and you have owned the messages came from you, and I do believe it was your hand-writing, because it was like the rest: and captain Porter told me, it was your hand-writing.

Att. Gen. Pray did Mr. Keyes use to sit down at table with Mr. Porter?

De la Rue. Yes, in all companies he was treated as familiarly as a companion, and no ways as a servant; and dined and supped at the same table with the rest.

Att. Gen. What was done after that the news was brought of the king's not going abroad, and captain Porter resolving to go into the country?

De la Rue. When captain Porter was gone, the company broke up; and away goes I to captain Charnock, to see him, about four o'clock in the afternoon. When I came there, his landlady told me there was a great deal of company: but I desired her to go in, and tell him that I was there. She did so; and he sent and desired me to come in. I did so, and I saw several persons there. There was one Douglas, and one Trevor, and four troopers of my lord of Oxford's regiment, and a trumpeter that was his servant in Ireland, when he was a captain in Parker's regiment; I know captain Charnock was a great croney of Parker's, and he sent letters by me to him: I have seen some of the letters that Parker sent; and they were drinking the same healths as were drank before at the Blue-posts, to the restoring king James, the queen, the prince of Wales, and the grand monarch (as they called him) the French king.

L. C. J. Who was in company then?

De la Rue. Mr. Douglas, Mr. Trevor, four troopers of my lord Oxford's regiment, one White, one Lowthorp, and one Mason, whom I know when I see very well; Mr. Charnock, one day in the summer, asked me to go and drink a bowl of punch, which I was unwilling to do; but he must needs press me, and he carries me where Mason and Lowthorp were, at the George Inn in Piccadilly; whence we went to the Prince of Orange's Head, and captain Charnock spent in wine and other liquors upon them a great deal of money. This was half a year ago in the summer time, but I do not remember that I saw those two, Lowthorp and Mason, afterwards, till the 22d of February.

Att. Gen. Is this all that you can say as to the prisoners?

De la Rue. This is all at present that I can recollect.

Att. Gen. Then for the satisfaction of the court and jury, give us an account when you first made a discovery of this conspiracy, and in what manner, and to whom.

De la Rue. The last year I had discovered it if it had come to a head, and been ripe enough to have been put in execution; I did then design to acquaint the king with it; but it coming to no head then, I deferred troubling the king with it: and now this year I designed (had the king gone out the 15th of February) to have prevented any mischief, but they had notice that he was not to go: but my way was, to have put them all into the king's hands, by getting two or three general officers to be acquainted with it; and dividing some of the guards into several parties in the lanes between Brentford and Turnham Green, and so have surprized them and their horses in their several inns that they were quartered in. But upon Monday the 17th of February, lest they should alter their resolution, and I should happen not to be acquainted how it was to be done, I went to a general officer of my acquaintance, that is, brigadier Lewson, to acquaint him with the matter; but he was gone out of town with colonel Fitz-Patrick and another: I went then to Durant's lodgings for a colour, and it was told me, he had been out all night. I went again to brigadier Lewson's, but he was not in town, and I left word for him, that the next day I would wait upon him, and desired he would not go out till I came to him, I went, he was not then at home, but I afterwards met with him, and acquaints him with this business, and begs of him to acquaint the king with it that day, which he told me he would. He asked me which way I purposed to put them into the king's hands. I told him the best way and safest for me, was for his majesty to go out on the 22nd, for the party that was to execute this design, were not to go out of town till the afternoon, to be at Brentford, when the king came back from hunting, and that they should have two or three troops of horse by parties to have seized them and their horses in the several inns and public-houses, where they were dispersed. He said, it was not safe to run that hazard, but he would offer it to the king, and let me know his mind. He sent to me the next day, and told me, he had acquainted the king with it, who desired to know who they were that were concerned in it; then I gave him the names of those that I knew, and where they lived. I dined with him on Thursday, and told him what had passed on the Wednesday morning between captain Charnock and I, and what Porter said about it on Wednesday night; and after dinner he said he would go again to the king and acquaint him with it; and that I should come to him on Friday night, which was the reason I was not there with captain Porter, where sir George Barclay and they were together; for I went to the play to pass away the time. When I came home to my lodging, I found there were a couple of letters from the brigadier, to whom I went, and he told me, the king was desirous to see me: I told him I would wait on him to the king with all my heart. I went with him to Kensington, and was introduced to the king by my lord Portland, where I think I told the king what I have told the court now.

Att. Gen. What day do you say it was you discovered it to the king?

De la Rue. Brigadier Lewson acquainted the king upon the Tuesday night before, and that had been done the day before, if I could have met with him; but it was Friday night that I was with the king.

Att. Gen. Will they ask him any questions?

Char. No, my lord, I do not think that any thing he says against me is material at all.

De la Rue. My lord, I remember one thing more; that upon Tuesday night Mr. King told me he had my blue coat on.

Att. Gen. Have you any thing more to say as to Keyes?

De la Rue. Keyes was the only man that told me of the meetings.

Char. Where was it that you say I pulled myself back in the coach?

De la Rue. It was at the Nag's-head in St. James's-street, and he came out of the coach and asked me to go up; but I took it ill to be refused before, and because I was not invited up at first, I refused, and said, I had business elsewhere, and went away.

L. C. J. Will you ask him any more questions?

Char. No; yet I think I would ask him one question more. You say, Sir, I carried you once to the George Inn in Piccadilly, where there were Lowthorpe and Mason: are you sure it was at the George Inn?

De la Rue. Yes, sure.

Char. Are you positive it was the George Inn?

De la Rue. I believe so, I took it to be that inn.

Char. You did swear it positively, that it was the George Inn before.

De la Rue. I saw those two men since, which was on Sunday the 23rd, at Kensington, and they said they did quarter at the inn in Piccadilly, where you carried me to them.

Char. Pray, whereabouts is the George Inn in Piccadilly?

De la Rue. The inn that I speak of is about the middle of Piccadilly, upon the left-hand.

Char. There is but one George Inn in all Piccadilly that ever I heard of, and that is at the further end, there is no such sign in the middle.

L. C. J. He is not positive as to the sign, but as to the place.

Char. I appeal to every body, if he did not swear before positively, that it was the George Inn in Piccadilly.

De la Rue. I do say, it was to an inn in Piccadilly; and Lowthorpe told me on Sunday the 23rd at Kensington, they were quartered at an inn in Piccadilly, I take it to be the George Inn, if it be not the George, I know not what sign it is; but I think it is not very material what the sign was.

Char. Yes, it is all material to us; and I think it is very material for every man to take care how he forswears himself.

L. C. J. No, it is not forswearing himself, when he is not positive as to the sign.

Char. But I hope every body considers, that he did swear it was the George Inn, and there is no such inn there.

De la Rue. This I did not think of, to take so much notice of it then, as to mind what the sign was; it was you carried me thither.

Char. It was your interest to mind every particular; for, according to your own words, you have been a trepanner half a year before.

De la Rue. I have told you already, I intended never to have been an evidence; but to put you into the king's hands, and prevent the execution of the design, and I begged of the counsel to be excused from giving any evidence, but I could not by any means get myself excused.

L. C. J. Will Mr. King ask any questions?

King. No.

L. C. J. Well, what say you, Keyes, will you ask him any questions?

Keyes. My lord, he says I drank the health to the squeezing of the Orange, and the other healths: I was not in the room while any such healths were drunk, nor did I sit down while I was there, nor do I know any thing of the horses, upon my word, that he speaks of.

Att. Gen. Then if they have done with him, there is a noble lord, whom he has mentioned, as being present when he discovered this to the king, who we desire may be examined touching that matter: we must humbly pray my lord Portland, that he will please to be sworn.

L. C. J. Hold my lord the book, and swear him. (Which was done.)

Att. Gen. My lord, I humbly ask your lordship this one question, whether Mr. De la Rue did make any discovery of this matter in your presence to his majesty, on Friday the 21st of February.

E. of Portland. Yes, he did.

Att. Gen. Your lordship has heard what he said now: was it to the same purpose?

E. of Portl. Yes, to the very same purpose, and he did it before he went in to the king to me, being brought to me by his own desire: it was all the same in substance as he has told you now; and afterwards he was brought to the king on Friday night, and there he said the same things.

Sol. Gen. This gentleman did it not to save his own life, but the king's. Our next witness, my lord, is Mr. Pendergrass. (Who was sworn.)

Att. Gen. But before we go on to another evidence, I would ask Mr. Porter one question, and that is, what is become of the list which you spoke of?

Capt. Porter. I burnt that list.

Att. Gen. Why did you so?

Capt. Porter. Because I thought the thing was discovered, and it was not fit to have such a paper remain.

Sol. Gen. Mr. Pendergrass, pray will you tell my lord and the jury what you know about this matter, how you came to be acquainted with it, who were concerned in it, and when and how it was to be done?

Capt. Pendergrass. My lord, about the 11th of February last, I was sent to by captain Porter where I was in the country, to come to town; the 13th of February I met him at the Blue Posts in Spring Garden; we dined there, and he told me of a design that was on foot to take sway the king's life, and that sir George Barclay, and other officers, were come on purpose out of France, in order to execute the same. I was very uneasy when he told me of the thing, but I said nothing till I had an opportunity of waiting upon my lord Portland, which I did as soon as I could, and acquainted him with the whole matter of the design, and desired him to acquaint the king: This was upon the Friday night, which was the 14th, and he told me the king had a mind to speak with me, and afterwards my lord Portland carried me into the king's closet, where the king asked me some questions. I told him what I knew of the design, but desired to be excused from naming any persons, because my intention was only to prevent such a barbarous action, and I was resolved not to be a witness. The king promised me I should be safe, and pressed me to name them, and assured me I should not be forced to come in as an evidence; upon which I did tell all that I knew, and went out of town with Mr. Porter as resolving not to be an evidence; but being satisfied, after we were taken, that Mr. Porter, who had engaged me in it, had himself discovered, and accused me, I thought myself discharged from any obligation of honour in concealing it, and am willing to give an account of any thing that I know.*

* "Mr. Pendergrass hearing that Mr. Porter, who engaged him in the plot, had, by an allowable stratagem, been frightened into a discovery, and accused him, he thought himself discharged from any obligation of honour in concealing it; and therefore afterwards came in as an evidence at Charnock's trial." Kennett.

The following strange story concerning this person is related by Boswell in his Life of Johnson:

"General Oglethorpe told us, that Pendergrass, an officer in the duke of Marlborough's army, had mentioned to many of his friends that he should die on a particular day. That

Att. Gen. We know you do it voluntarily, as you did it at first honourably, and therefore, Sir, we desire you would please to give an account of your knowledge in the matter.

Pendergrass. My lord, as I told you before, the 11th of February I was sent to by captain Porter into the country, where I was with Mr. Bryerly, to come to town; accordingly the 13th, which was the Thursday, I came to town with Mr. Bryerly, and found captain Porter at the Blue Posts in Spring Garden, and we dined there. There was Keyes, and Bryerly, and Porter, and I in company, where he acquainted me with the design. We had no further discourse that day; the next day we dined at the Rose Tavern in Covent Garden, where there was King, Bryerly, Cranbourne, Porter, and I dined together.

King. Pray, was it by way of rendezvous or set meeting?

L. C. J. Holt. Look you, you must stay your time before you ask any questions of the witnesses; you shall be heard, when your time comes, as fully as you desire. Go on, Sir.

Penderg. This was Friday the 14th of February, we had some discourse about the matter; captain King and captain Porter went away, and then I went to my lord Portland's, and was by him introduced to the king. The 15th I came to captain Porter's lodgings, and he was getting ready, in expectation of notice whether they should execute the design that day or no. While he was getting ready, I goes to the Blue Posts, where was Kenrick and Sherbourne, and Mr. Bryerly, and there we were drinking a glass of wine, and in comes Durant, who was an orderly man that lay at Kensington to give intelligence; and Bryerly directed him to capt. Porter's lodgings to carry the intelligence which he brought, that the king intended to go out that day; upon that he went away to his lodging, and capt. Porter came a little time after, booted, to the Blue Posts, and there he dined; within an hour or upon that day a battle took place with the French; that after it was over, and Pendergrass was still alive, his brother officers, while they were yet in the field, jestingly asked him where was his prophecy now. Pendergrass gravely answered, "I shall die, notwithstanding what you see." Soon afterwards there came a shot from a French battery, to which the orders for a cessation of arms had not yet reached, and he was killed upon the spot. Colonel Cecil, who took possession of his effects, found, in his pocket-book the following solemn entry:

"[Here the date.] "Dreamt — or — Sir John Friend meets me" (here the very day on which he was killed was mentioned). General Oglethorpe said, he was in company with col. Cecil, when Pope came and enquired into the truth of this story, which made a great noise at the time, and was then confirmed by the colonel." Boswell's Life of Johnson, vol. 1, p. 374, 4th edition of 1791.

two after capt. Porter came in, Mr. Charnock sent a note to capt. Porter, to tell him, the king did not go that day, and so there must be counter orders; capt. Porter told me it was his hand; the note was signed R. Robinson, and he shewed me the note, and acquainted me, and the rest of the company, that they were disappointed that day, since the king did not go; there we dined, and drank a bottle of wine. The next time we met, there was Mr. King and Mr. Keyes, and Mr. De la Rue, at Mr. Porter's lodgings; this was Saturday the 22d, in the morning; there we had some discourse of the matter; and capt. Porter, upon notice from capt. Charnock of the king's intending to go abroad, had sent a list of his men, and received back a list of capt. Charnock's; and capt. Porter, and De la Rue, and we went to the Blue Posts to dine, where we had an account afterwards, that the king did not go, and so there was another disappointment; and a little after Keyes came in, and said, the guards were come home all in a foam, and the king's coaches come back to the Mews. Capt. Porter then thought all was discovered, and says he, I will go into the country; Mr. Pendergrass, will you go with me? With all my heart, said I; so we sent Keyes to get our horses ready; we lay at Epsom that night, and from thence to another place we sent the next day, where we lay till Thursday morning, when capt. Porter, Mr. Keyes and I was taken together, the place was called Leatherhead, in Surrey; whence we were brought up to town, and have remained prisoners ever since.

Att. Gen. Which of the prisoners were there present upon the Saturday the 22d, at capt. Porter's lodgings?

Pendergrass. There was captain King and Mr. Keyes.

Att. Gen. Pray was there any discourse about a gun, and who was to have it?

Pendergrass. Capt. Porter told me there was a musketoon that he had would carry 6 or 8 bullets, and I should have it, being to join with sir George Barclay to set upon the king's coach, and directed me to be sure to shoot some of the horses to stop their course if they seemed to drive furiously away; and Mr. Cranbourne was the person that carried the messages from Mr. Charnock to Mr. Porter.

Sol. Gen. Do you remember, Sir, that Keyes said the guards were come back?

Pendergrass. Yes, and that they were all in a foam, and the coaches were come back to the Mews gate; and one of my lord of Oxford's regiment told him there was something extraordinary muttered among the people, upon which they concluded it was discovered.

Att. Gen. Will the prisoners ask him any questions?—Char. King and Keyes. No.

Att. Gen. Then I must beg the favour of my lord Portland to give himself the further trouble of acquainting the court how this gentleman behaved himself in reference to this discovery.

E. of Portland. My lord, it was as he has acquainted you. This gentleman came to me upon the Friday night, and told me of it; and then upon the same Friday night, which was the 14th, I think the night before the first time that it was to have been executed, and declared his abhorrence of such a barbarous business; and he told me his design of coming into it, and keeping company with them, was to save the king's life by acquainting me with it, and discovering it, which he would do upon a promise that he should not be used as an evidence, nor pressed so much as to name names; which promise I made him, and the same promises were made him that day seven-night, when I carried him to the king. But the king pressing him to name their names, assuring him he should be safe, and not forced to be an evidence, he did then name the names under that promise from the king.

Att. Gen. Pray, my lord, who was by then besides your lordship?

E. of Port. My lord Cuts.

Att. Gen. We must desire my lord Cuts will please to be sworn. [Which was done.]

Sol. Gen. Pray, my lord, will you please to acquaint the court and the jury what happened at that time.

L. Cuts. My lords, I was in the king's closet that same Friday night, when Mr. Pendergrass was brought in there: 'twas, as near as I can remember, between twelve and one o'clock at night; nobody was present but myself with the king, when my lord Portland came in with this gentleman: all that he said to the king at first was, that he had a discovery to make of a design to assassinate his person, if that his name might not be made use of, nor he forced to be an accuser or a witness; and therefore desired to be excused if he said no more; then desiring the king not to go out the next day, but to take care of himself, because there were some persons had resolved to assassinate him coming home; but begged to be excused from naming names, for he said he would rather die than betray his friend, and he thought it enough that he had saved his majesty's life. It was above half an hour before the king could persuade him to name names, and he would not, 'till the king had given him his word and honour that he should not be obliged to be a witness; and then he did name the names*. Afterwards, when captain Porter

* The following particulars respecting the disclosures of Pendergrass are related by Blackmore:

"The second, who discovered this villainous plot, was Mr. Pendergrass, who knew nothing of the barbarous business till Thursday the 13th of February, for that day he came to London out of Hampshire, being sent for by captain Porter, who imparted to him the design in hand, of assassinating the king, and endeavoured to engage him in it. Though Mr. Pendergrass was exceedingly startled at such a horrid proposal, he seemed to comply, and promised and Mr. Pendergrass were taken, as my station obliged me to give orders, and require intelligence, and assist at the securing and examination of the conspirators, I happened to see to make one of the party; but the very next day in the evening he went to the earl of Portland, not knowing that captain Fisher had been with him before on the same errand, and told him that he came to reveal to him an important secret, namely, a design against his majesty's life: he told the earl that indeed he was a roman catholic, but that he did not think that any religion could justify so great a wickedness, and therefore from principles of christianity, and probity, he thought himself obliged, by revealing this matter, to prevent the king's falling into the hands of the conspirators. But he acquainted him at the same time, that the conspirators were his friends, and, that from one of them he had received great obligations, and therefore though he thought himself bound in duty and conscience to make this discovery, to preserve his majesty's life, yet he likewise thought himself under obligations of honour and gratitude, not to betray his friends: and therefore declared, his resolution was not to make known their names, or to appear an evidence against them. He then desired the lord Portland, as he tendered his majesty's life to prevail with him not to go to Richmond on the morrow, assuring him, that the conspirators had prepared all things to assault him in his return. It ought to be taken notice of, for the reputation of this gentleman, as to the credibility of his testimony, that the mere abhorrence of such a villainous design was the only motive that induced him to make it known to the court.

"His majesty being made acquainted with the discovery, which captain Fisher and Mr. Pendergrass had made to the earl of Portland, received but little impression from it; the obstruction he met with about giving credit to what they had related, proceeded not only from his fearless and unshaken temper, and the opinion he had received of the English honour and bravery, which make men abhor a vile and bloody action, but likewise from the princely goodness and benignity of his nature, from which he entertained too good thoughts of the worst of his enemies; and besides, it was not easy for him to believe, that there could be found in a kingdom, that owed to him the preservation of their religion, liberties, and every thing that is dear to a free people, any such monsters of ingratitude, as would attempt to take away his life in so barbarous a manner, which he had freely and frequently hazarded for their sakes; this appeared to him so unnatural and incredible, that he was with great difficulty, and not till he was overborn with importunity, prevailed with to lay by his design of going to Richmond on the Saturday, and to remain at home in his palace at Kensington. These things I likewise had from the mouth of the earl of Portland.

them before they were carried into the council, and presently knew Mr. Pendergrass to be the person that was with the king that Friday night; I had a great compassion to see gentle-

"The next man, who voluntarily gave information of this conspiracy, was Mr. De la Rue, who declared that he had frequented the company of the conspirators, and made himself intimate with them, on design, when this horrible production was almost ready for the birth, by a timely discovery to make it abortive. He applied himself to brigadier Lewson, and acquainted him with the intended villainy some few days after captain Fisher and Mr. Pendergrass had been on the same design with the lord Portland, but not one of the three was in the least acquainted with the intentions of either of the other to reveal the conspiracy; and though Mr. De la Rue gave his information without knowing that captain Fisher and Mr. Pendergrass had done the like before; yet his story so fully confirmed that of the other two, agreeing exactly with them in all the material particulars, that his majesty, notwithstanding his unshaken constancy, and his great aversion for the reasons above-named, to believe this execrable plot, which so nearly concerned his own life, was by this concurrent testimony of la Rue, at last persuaded of the truth of it.

"On Friday, the 21st of February at night, his majesty was pleased to admit Mr. Pendergrass and Mr. De la Rue severally in his presence, and heard them relate what they had told the lord Portland before, concerning the conspiracy. Mr. Pendergrass discovered the plot in general, to prevent his majesty falling into the hands of the conspirators, but withal declared, as he had done the week before to the lord Portland, that it was his positive and settled resolution, not to mention names, or at any time to become an evidence against them.

"He continued in his resolution with great steadfastness, until his majesty used such convincing arguments, as prevailed with him to recede from it.

"The king told him that he had indeed shewn himself a man of probity and honour; that he had great obligations to him for the timely care he had taken to reveal a design that so nearly concerned his life; but he shewed him withal, that unless he went further in his discovery, and made him acquainted with the names of the conspirators, he would not put him into a condition of preserving himself against them: That the detection of the treason in general might indeed render his majesty suspicious of all men, but would be no security against any that intended to take away his life; and that the conspirators might change the method and order of their design, as well as the time and place of execution; and therefore that Mr. Pendergrass by discovering the conspiracy, while he concealed the names of the conspirators, would fall short of his own intention, which was to preserve the king's life, it being impossible that his majesty could be in safety, men and officers, whom I had some knowledge of before, in such a condition, and I told them naturally what my opinion was: Mr. Porter did seem sorry for what he had done, and inclined to make the king that atonement for his fault which he has now done. When I came out and told Mr. Pendergrass this, and that Mr. Porter had named him, and owned the whole matter, I only gave him my opinion upon it, that I thought he was discharged from any obligation of friendship: and he seemed then inclined to do the same likewise that Mr. Porter had done.

Sol. Gen. Swear Thomas Bertham. [Which was done.] Pray do you give my lord and the jury an account how long you have known Mr. Charnock to be engaged in this conspiracy: tell your whole knowledge as to him.

Bertham. The 8th or 9th of February last I was crossing Covent-Garden, I lit upon one Mr. Trevor, who is now in Newgate, and he told me he was going down to Mr. Charnock's lodgings, and that he heard him say he wanted to speak with me; I told him he had no business with me nor I with him, that I knew of: but he prevailed upon me to go with him, and when we came to Mr. Charnock's lodgings, he met me in the entry.

Sol. Gen. Who did?

Berth. Mr. Charnock did. He told me he wanted to speak with me, and took me into a back room, because he had company in his own; and he told me, the king, that is, king James, was a-coming, and there was a piece of service to be done before he could come, and if I would assist in it, it would answer my expectation. I asked him what was to be done? He answered, You must only go abroad to take the air, you will see several of your acquaintance there. I desired to know what was to be done? He said it was to cut off this spark, or to take off this spark, I can't tell which, and then the king will come home quietly.

Att. Gen. Who were to cut him off?

Berth. The party that I was to meet when we rode out to take the air.

L. C. J. Who did they say they were to take off?

Berth. He said we must take off this spark, or cut off this spark, I can't tell which, which I understood to be the king.

Att. Gen. How long had you known Charnock?—Berth. By times, seven years.

unless the desperate undertakers of this design against him, were made known and secured. By this just reasoning of his majesty, Mr. Pendergrass was at last overcome; and being convinced of the absolute necessity of going further in this discovery, to enable his majesty to provide for his safety, he wrote down the names of many of the conspirators, which he delivered to the lord Portland; but not until his majesty had given his honour that he should not, unless he pleased, be used as an evidence against them. This information I received from the earl of Portland."

Mr. Cooper. How came you acquainted with him?

Berth. We were in the army together; he was a lieutenant in col. Parker's regiment, and I was a trooper there then.

Sol. Gen. What discourse was there between you and Charnock, after you heard there were warrants out?

Berth. Sir, I have not yet done with what passed at his lodgings. He asked me if I would accept of being one in the business: I told him I could not engage in it, for I had disposed of myself otherwise. So we came out of that little room, and he desired me to come into his room and drink a glass of wine: There were three or four gentlemen that I did not know; and then there was one Mr. Chambers and Mr. Trevor, and Mr. Lee, which Mr. Chambers fetched afterwards in there.

Att. Gen. He would not be engaged there, because he had otherwise disposed of himself: Indeed, he was engaged with sir William Perkins.

Berth. After I came in I observed great whisperings among the company, and frequent calling out of Mr. Charnock for private discourse; but there was no other particular discourse about this matter that night.

Sol. Gen. Pray when did you see Mr. Charnock again, and where?

Berth. At another time, which was the 22nd of February, I met him at Lincoln's-inn back gate; and meeting me here, he called me aside and took me within the inn upon the paved-stones; we took a turn there: He told me warrants were out against us, as he heard, and we had as good, if I would come to his lodging, go out to Kensington and do the work at once and take him off, and then we shall be quiet, and have the king peaceably here. I am sure he cannot say that I do him a word of wrong in what I have said, he knows it all to be true.

Mr. Cooper. Has any body else engaged you in this matter? Do you know one Lowick?

Berth. If that be necessary, I will tell it. But this is all that I know of any thing of the prisoners; only Mr. Charnock did ask me as to Mr. Trevor, what I thought of him, whether he might trust him? I told him he might do what he pleased.

L. C. J. Holt. Mr. Charnock, will you ask him any questions? for his evidence relates only to you.

Char. No, I think not. Pray did I send for you?

Berth. I met Mr. Trevor, and he told me, he was coming to your lodgings, and that you desired to speak with me. And when I came, you told me yourself you wanted to speak with me: Indeed I knew no business you had with me, or I with you.

Att. Gen. We have one more witness, and that is one Mr. Boyse. (Who was sworn.)

Sol. Gen. Pray, Mr. Boyse, will you give an account when you were spoke to about this design, and by whom?

Boyse. On Friday the 14th of February, I went to visit Mr. King, and he was the first that ever told me of the business; it was in his own chamber, he told me there was a great undertaking in hand, and he had put my name into the list, and if I would make one, I should have a horse; and he asked me if I had any boots; I said, no. He desired me to see if I could get any, and to meet him in the afternoon at the Rose Tavern in Covent Garden; but in the mean time he bid me go to Mr. Knightley, and he would inform me further. I went to Mr. Knightley, and I came to Mr. King again in the afternoon at the Rose Tavern, and he desired me not to be out of the way the next day, but to be at my lodging, and he would come or send for me; and I had 20s. of him to buy boots, and he still referred me to Mr. Knightley: when I came to Mr. Knightley, I was told there was nothing to be done that day: but I was desired to be always in the way, for the business would soon be over. This is all the discourse that day. After that I met Mr. King several times, who still referred me to Mr. Knightley, and when I asked him for my horse, he told me I should have one allotted for me time enough; and when this thing was done we should be happy: But he never told me it was to take off the king.

Att. Gen. Pray what did you understand was to be done?

Boyse. I did believe I should know further of it; for I would not have engaged till I did know. But he did not tell me it was to take off the king, or what it was. This, to the best of my memory, is what I know of the matter.

Att. Gen. Pray when did you come from France?

Boyse. He told me indeed several were come from France, and that the king would land very speedily.

Att. Gen. But when did you come?

Boyse. I came the beginning of June last.

Att. Gen. Do you remember nothing about sir George Barclay?

Boyse. Yes, he told me sir George Barclay would command the party, and that there were about forty or forty-five, that were concerned in the design.

Sol. Gen. Do you remember nothing else?

Boyse. No, truly, I do not remember any thing more concerning Mr. King.

L. C. J. Holt. Mr. King, will you ask him any questions? for what he says relates only to you.—King. No, my lord.

Att. Gen. Then we have done, my lord; we rest it here till we hear what they can say.

L. C. J. Holt. Mr. Charnock, the king's counsel have done all the evidence they design to give, and now is your time to make your defence.

Charnock. My lord, I have taken some notes of the evidence, and made some remarks, which must be my defence; and I shall take them in order of time as they were given: The first is captain Porter; and the main evidence he hath given against me, is my informing him that sir George Barclay was come from France, with a commission all written with king James's own hand, thereby authorizing us to raise war against the person of king William. But then he says, at the same time, I told him I never saw it; and I know not how I should; for it is impossible to see a thing that is invisible, a thing that never was in being; and to suppose that ever there should be such a commission under the king's own hand, and writ with his own hand, is such a contradiction to all sense and reason, that no rational man can be guilty of; and therefore I hope the court and the jury will consider of it, and reject it all as a foolish, idle, nonsensical fiction and story. It is very well known that king James has always had, and still has, notwithstanding his present sufferings and circumstances, his ministers of state about him, in how slender a condition soever they may be, or be represented to be. He has my lord Middleton as his secretary of state, he has been all along with him, and it is not supposable that he should put himself to the trouble of writing any commissions with his own hand, when there were others enough to do it for him, and he need only sign the top of it James R. much less is it supposable, that he should give any such commission as this that they speak of, and writ it all with his own hand, and that sir George Barclay should bring it over. This is such a nonsensical, ridiculous story as ought to be rejected with scorn and contempt, and is only fit to be laughed at: I hope every body will look upon it as such, and think that such evidence is very incredible.

My lord, another thing that I observe out of captain Porter's evidence, is this: He says, he and I was to command a party; he knows what he himself intended to do, but I am sure I know of no party that I was to command. It is all a dream, a mere dream and a fiction. He thinks fit to acknowledge his own guilt of a very bad crime, and he may accuse himself as long as he will, but I think that will not make me guilty of any such thing, only because he says so: He does not say what men they were, or who they were; and it cannot be an overt act, unless he can tell who they were. He says sir George Barclay and I met at the Sun Tavern in the Strand, and at several other places where this matter was discoursed of, and a great many were supposed to be in the assassination, to the number of forty; but he does not mention any thing then of its being discoursed who they were to be: and is it supposable, when the design he talks of was so near being put in execution, it should not be known who should engage in it? For my part, I deny that ever I was with him at any place where sir George Barclay, or any body else, talked of any such thing. When I was examined before the council, my Lord Keeper asked me when I saw the duke of Berwick? I thought it not fit to answer that question, because I knew the duke of Berwick was out.

lawed here, and I might accuse myself if I acknowledged having been in his company, though it were at St. Germain's. But I said I never believed he was in London, and I do not believe he was. I heard that colonel Parker was in England, but I did not see him; and as to the major general, and other officers they talk of, it is all a jest to me; and it is no way at all to be believed or credited, that because other men have notions of castles in the air, I must be so foolish as to believe such impertinencies too. He says I sent him a list of men, and written with my own hand, and subscribed with the two letters of my name; he does not swear he saw me write it, and similitude of hands was never thought good in criminal causes; and I believe it was never looked upon for law, that it should be a good evidence for a man to swear such a writing was another man's own hand, unless he says he saw him write it, and kept it in his own custody till it should be produced as evidence, and produce it in open court, and not let it go out of his custody till then. All these things, I apprehend, the law judges necessary to make a good proof of a writing to be of a man's own hand; but here is nothing of that here: here is nothing produced, nor does he say he saw me write it; and so I think it all goes for nothing, a mere idle invention of his own. My lord, upon this evidence there is not any positive proof of my doing an overt act, by buying of arms or horses, or writing letters, or any thing of that nature; and I hope if I speak irregularly, your lordship will pardon me; I am no lawyer, and I have no assistance but my own nonsensical notes to depend upon for my defence. My lord, he speaks about horses that were to be provided; but there is no proof of that; I never bought any horses, or borrowed any; nay, nor is there any proof, that while this bloody assassination that he owns himself to have contrived and carried on, was on foot, I had not so much as a horse any where; and that I should be so vain to get men to engage in such an expedition with me, and have never a horse myself, is very strange. The conspiracy, he says, was depending a long while, and whenever it was to be put in execution, we were to go expeditiously to work, lest it should be discovered; and it is very strange then that I should never have provided the least thing in the world to do it with! neither arms, nor horse, nor any thing: For there is no proof of any such thing against me, but only talk, as he is pleased to swear, to take my life to save his own: And I hope your lordship and the court will declare to the jury, that here is no evidence of any overt act against me.

My lord, there is another thing he says against me: he says he had a note from me by the name of Robinson, to countermand the orders upon the 15th: my lord, the truth of that would depend very much upon the producing of that note, then it would be seen whether it was my hand, and what it contained, and what it related to: for my part, I utterly deny I ever sent any such note wherein there was a word of the king, or of any fact of this nature that was to be committed, or any thing relating to it, if it were true that I had written any note to him at all; and I hope the jury will consider, and the court will direct them so to do: for I know not that they are any more skilled in the law than myself, and therefore I hope your lordship will give them ample and true directions, what is law and what is not law, and what is evidence and what is not evidence; and this cannot be evidence to affect me at all, there being nothing that doth appear, or is produced.

My lord, he says, there were four that were to go with sir George Barclay, that were to be appointed out of each party; he does not say I named any, nor does he name any himself; but it seems they knew what was to be done; and truly if any thing was to be done, they knew it themselves (and nobody else that I know of) who swear to save their lives, and get a reward. If the four were to be out of the party, which he calls his own, he knows them best, and I believe the party was his own, and the plot his own too, and nobody's else; he does not say that I appointed any one, he only says there were four to be appointed out of a party, which party was in Nubibus, and so is the whole design, unless it be in his head, framed there by his own invention, for it only exists there that I know of.

My lord, these observations I make upon captain Porter's evidence: the next witness is Mr. De la Rue, and he is a very good evidence indeed, if hear-say be to be believed; he says I was very shy of discoursing with him about it, that I told him it would come to nothing, without saying what would come to nothing, not that the plot would come to nothing, for there was nothing at all spoken of any plot, much less of a design to assassinate the king. This is all that he says, as to me, of his own knowledge, all the rest relating to me is but what captain Porter told him. But to begin with the beginning of his evidence, he says one thing which is very odd, That at the Rose tavern, the last year, there was a consultation about carrying king William away into France, in a vessel alive, and that sir William Perkins asked him, whether he would go along with me to Deal, to procure a vessel to carry the king over: he might as well have asked him to go with me to Constantinople, or any other place in the world, as to Deal, and about any other employment, as that. A pretty sort of thing, that I should go to Deal to hire a vessel to carry the king over into France; I that know no sea-man, or any master of a vessel at Deal, that I should be employed to hire a ship before the design was formed, as he says it was not come to an head. If we had got the prince of Orange into our power: if we had king William in our power, how was it possible we should ever have carried him to Deal? I cannot but think any one would believe us madmen to entertain such a chimera in our heads. What nonsensical stories are all these, that we should carry king William to Deal, and I hire a ship to transport him into France! I hope the jury, and all that hear it, will consider what ridiculous stuff these men talk of, as evidence against men for their lives. Then he talks of my coming in a coach to the Nag's-head door, where I was very shy of letting him see me, and afterwards, when I came out, asked him to go into the company; but he was angry that they had denied to admit him before, and so would not go up: what a stange sort of a contradictory story is all this! here was a conference, it seems, appointed the night before to be at that place, when captain Porter, and captain King, and Mr. Knightley were just come from viewing the ground, and were to make their report; and Porter told him of it, and yet they would not admit him, and I was shy of him, and yet asked him to go up: what contradictory nonsense is this! It must needs be looked upon as improbable or impossible to be true, that I should ask him to go up into such a company, where such a mighty conference was to be had about such a great transaction, when I had shewn myself apparently shy of him, by falling back in the coach, as being unwilling to let him see me; I hope the jury will consider the self-contradictoriness and improbability of such evidence. Then there is another thing, and that is, what he says captain King said, he did not believe it would come to any thing, because he did not like me as being no soldier, for I was for keeping out of danger, and having an easy post: if he means I had no mind to be in a plot, he was in the right of it; for no man in his senses would ever be engaged in any such desperate designs, where there is such apparent destruction in view: so I cannot apprehend what there is in that of any objection against me, or any proof that I had a hand in this plot, because I desired to keep out of danger. It was said, that I was to have attacked the king with sir George Barclay; but captain Porter says, we were to be together, to attack the guards; and both cannot be true, nor indeed is either of them true, but a figment and invention of their own: then he says he asked Keyes for a good sword, and he told me I had a very good one: 'Tis true, I had a sword, I always wore one, but it does not follow that that was to be employed upon such an enterprize as this. And then he tells you a story again of captain Porter's having a broad flaming two-edged sword. But what is all this to the purpose? does this prove any thing against me, that I consented to, or was engaged in, any such bloody design as this? he saith that on Wednesday he came to me, and asked me of the affair, how it went on; he doth not say what the affair was, nor he doth not say it was about killing the king; nor indeed is it probable it should be, for he says I was always shy of him, and that he could never get any intelligence but from captain Porter. He saith I told him it was a thing would not admit of being delayed, and that only three people should know such a thing; but still he doth not tell you what this thing was, and therefore I do not apprehend how this should affect me, as evidence of my intending to assassinate the king. He saith he had it from captain Porter, that Mr. Chambers was an orderly man, a word I do not understand, to convey intelligence to me; and that Durant was an orderly man, to convey intelligence elsewhere: still this is all but what captain Porter told him, and there is no proof that I sent Mr. Chambers any where. Chambers, I acknowledge I know, he is a poor man, and my Lord Chief Justice Treby, I suppose, cannot but remember that he was in prison, and tried before him upon the account of piracy; I must needs say, I thought him an honest man, because he had served with me in Ireland: I knew he was in great want, and therefore gave him his diet and lodging; there is no proof that I furnished him with money, but I acknowledge I did with bread and drink, to keep him from starving; that I think was an act of charity, but it cannot be interpreted, nor is there any proof to warrant it, that it was with any ill design, or that I gave it him to hire him, or engage him to any such purpose. My lord, they would make it as if the persons that were intended to be employed in this pretended plot, were to be regular troops, and to have courts of guard, and to be disposed of into quarters, and this was to be done by these orderly men: I profess I know not what to make of it, it is such a medley, a fancy, and a chimera, that it is perfectly unintelligible, whether these were to be general officers, or private centinels, or what. Then, my lord, he saith Cranbourne brought a list from me to captain Porter, with R. C. at the bottom: 1st, That he does not prove that it was my list, nor doth that R. C. being at the bottom of the list make me a partner in this conspiracy. Then he saith, that Cranbourne came to the Blue-posts, as from me, to acquaint them of the disappointment, because the king did not go out that day: surely, my lord, I need not trouble you with saying any thing to this, for it is all, as to me, but hearsay; and what am I concerned in that which other people talk amongst themselves? Though they do use my name, how can I help that? My lord, he saith himself that he intended to discover this conspiracy a year ago, but the thing failing then, which how ridiculous it was I observed before, he let it alone for that time; but when I met him at the Nag's-head door, and he was so angry for their not admitting him into their company, which was three weeks before this design they talk of was to be executed, he had a mind to go to the secretary's, and get warrants and messengers to apprehend us; and he saith he hath often come to me, to ask about the affair, as he calls it; but I was still reserved and shy, and told him nothing would come of it. From all this I would observe that I have very good reasons to look upon him to be no evidence, not only for the same reason that I objected against Mr.

Porter, that by his own acknowledgment he is particeps criminis, but his coming to me after he resolved to discover, plainly declares, that he set himself to be a trapper, and no trapper can, in the judgment of any honest or understanding man, be a credible person, as an evidence to take away any man's life: I am sure what he saith of my shyness to converse with him, and his own frequent attempts to converse with me, shews plainly he was willing to trapan me; for so he himself saith. He came to me several times, and took me aside, to ask how the affair went on, but he did it only to enable himself to make the better discovery; which makes him ten thousand times worse, than if he had only gone at first and told what he pretends he knew, and afterwards forbore the company. Besides, my lord, as to trapanning, I have read in a book of sir Robert Atkins, that to be particeps criminis, proves a person to be a bad man, and consequently not so credible, especially if it can appear the witness has trapped the prisoner into the committing the crime; then the witness will appear to be guilty of a far more higher crime than the prisoner, and therefore ought not to be believed as a credible witness against the prisoner, for he is a credible witness that has the credit of being a good and honest man, which a trapper cannot have; and this trapanning proves withal, that the trapper did bear a spite and malice against the person trapped, and intended to do him a mischief, and designed to take away his life: shall such a one, says he, be a credible witness, and be believed against him? God forbid!

My lord, as to Mr. Pendergrass, who is the next witness, I do not take myself to be much concerned in all he saith. I think I have seen him but once of a great while, and that was on the Wednesday or Thursday before I was taken up; but, my lord, I have this to say to his evidence, I desire your lordship to observe I was not in the proclamation, though he was: they took occasion to have me secured as a colour, or to save expences, I suppose, while they themselves went out of the way, to have their names put into the proclamation; that somebody might colourably take them, and get the king's money. All that he saith of me, is, that Cranbourne brought messages from me: one time I writ a note, signed R. Robinson; another time I sent a list subscribed R. C. and that Porter shewed him them both; but all this is but hearsay still out of the mouth of Porter, and can be no proof at all against me. He saith, upon the disappointment he and they went to Epsom, which to me seems a very remarkable thing; for if he say true, it is plain, this was before by him discovered at court; and to me it shews, that he had a strong design of getting money, and taking away people's lives upon that account; and that captain Porter was in the same design: for De la Rue saith, captain Porter asked him to go with them, as well as Pendergrass. Now, can it be supposed, that these three should agree to go together, unless they were in a combination, as it appears they now are? And I cannot but think, the court and the jury will think it reasonable to believe; for if I was in a plot of such a nature as this, and should hurry out of town after I had discovered it, with three or four of the people that were concerned in it, and some of them afterwards pretend to be discoverers too, nobody in the world can believe but they contrived the thing amongst themselves, and went out of town only for a colour, that they might be put in the proclamation, and pretend to be taken, to entitle themselves to the reward.

L. C. J. Really, Mr. Charnock, I am loth to interrupt you in any part of your defence, but I do not understand what you mean by this, and I very willingly would understand you if I could.

Char. My lord, I say, I look upon it, that they were all combined together in a design to get the king's money, and take away our lives, that Porter should desire them to go with him into the country, and particularly Mr. Pendergrass, who discovered this to the king, and then that he should agree to go with him.

L. C. J. Truly, I do not understand the force of your argument; that because upon the supposed discovery capt. Porter went to Epsom, and Mr. Pendergrass went with him, therefore this must be a design between them to get the king's money, I cannot any way see how that must follow.

Char. Pray, my lord, to what end should he run out of town, upon the apprehension of the discovery, and with captain Porter too, when he actually had got the king's promise that he should be safe, and not be a witness, unless it were a combination between them, in order to set up as witnesses against us, to get the king's money?

L. C. J. I'll tell you why he was willing to go with captain Porter; because he had not a mind that the discovery he had made, should be any way known to have come from him; for you see how unwilling he was to name names, and so kept captain Porter company still, as his friend, resolving not to be an evidence against him.

Char. Well, my lord, after all, I hope, what he saith cannot be looked upon as any evidence against me; because whatsoever he saith relating to me, is about the notes and messages that he saith were brought to captain Porter, and all of it can amount at the utmost to hear say from other people's mouths. My lord, the last evidence that I apprehend relates any way to me, is that of Mr. Bertham, and he talks of what I should say to him upon the ninth of February, that I should take him into a back room into my lodgings, and there tell him, that there was something in hand for the restoring king James; but there was somewhat to be done first to take off the spark, or I do not know what, nor do I believe any body else doth know how to make any thing of it. It is a very improbable thing, that this matter which was to be so great a secret, and which I should say, was not fit to be communicated to above three people at once, I should send for a private trooper, for he was no otherwise, to communicate so great a matter to him; besides that I cannot, nor, I believe, can any body else tell what to make of the words, "Taking off the spark," how to construe that to make it an evidence of an intention to kill the king. It might be probable I might say there was a noise that king James would come, for it hath been in the gazettes and the public prints, that there was such an expectation, and preparation for it on the coast of France; but it is not probable, I am sure it is not true, that I should say there was something to be done first, for the 'taking off the spark.' Evidence of a thing of this nature ought to be plain and clear, and distinct: He doth say nothing that I talked to him of killing the king or of assassinating him, or of my asking him to be one in any such thing, and that I furnished him with arms, and an horse on any such design, but only that he might ride out, and take the air, and there he should meet with some of his acquaintance: What unaccountable loose stuff is all this! it is very strange, my lord, that if I liked the man so well, as I must do, if I would send for him to communicate a thing of this nature to him, that I should not put it into a method, that he might be one with us in the execution of it: But there cannot be any thing inferred of that nature, for which we stand accused, from any words that he saith were spoken. My lord, he doth say, indeed, that he told me, that he had disposed of himself otherwise; but that is no more certain, nor can be referred to any particular thing, than the rest. He might dispose of himself to a friend, he might dispose of himself to his wife; but what is all that to this purpose? And he might, indeed, if king James came, dispose of himself to assist him, or to oppose him, or to let it alone; but all this is nothing to the business for which we are here to be tried; it is all loose, idle, impertinent talk, and not at all to the purpose. And then he saith, that afterwards, I met him at Lincoln's Inn back gate, and took him into Lincoln's Inn, and told him, there were warrants out, and we had as good do the business presently. My lord, I do remember I met him at Lincoln's Inn gate, and it was upon Saturday the day before I was taken up, and it was about 12 o'clock at noon, and I did hear there were warrants out, but there never was that intimacy between him and me, that I should desire him to come to my lodging, or that I should support him in any sort. My lord, I have made a few remarks to your lordship and the jury, upon the evidence; I am sensible I have given the court a deal of trouble; but I hope you will consider it is for my life, and my all; and I hope you will be of opinion, that the evidence produced against me is frivolous and weak, and that the witnesses have a very bad cause of it, since all that they talk of, if it were true, is only a discourse, and they are forced to supply in words, what they want in fact.

L. C. J. Have you any more to say, Sir?

Char. Yes, my lord, I desire to take notice to the court and the jury, that the business of bare words was never looked upon in law as an overt-act to prove a man guilty of high-treason, nor that several persons met together doth prove a conspiracy. These persons proving that I met with them, doth not prove that I was concerned in the assassination, nor that I consented to any such thing; besides, my lord, I am taxed in the indictment with buying arms and horses for this business; but there is not one word of it proved, or of my riding out to view the ground, nor any thing, that I was to be concerned about this villainous act. My lord, if I had bought any arms, that had not been an overt-act of itself; it must be proved first that I bought them with such an intent to employ them about such a business; and it neither is, nor can be proved, that I furnished any body with horses or arms: and therefore the bare buying of arms of itself, as far as I am informed of the law, would be no proof of an overt-act. To prove an overt-act of treason by the buying of arms, it must be proved that I declared some way that I bought them with such an intent, or else it is no proof at all; but now if you have no evidence that I bought any arms at all, I look upon it, that there is no possibility to make that an overt-act. If you please, my lord, to bear with me to give you the trouble of reading some short notes, which I have taken out of some law-books about overt-acts.

L. C. J. No, the court will not think it any trouble: make your defence as well as you can, and take your own way.

Char. My lord, I hope you will allow what hath been collected out of the books of law as to overt-acts: there is Hale's Pleas of the Crown, is positive in it, That an overt-act must be alledged in every indictment, and proved; that compassing the death of the king by bare words, is no overt-act. Now, if bare words be no overt-act, why then all the conspiracy that is here proved, supposing all to be true that is said, it is no overt-act; for it is all but words still. And bare conspiring is no overt-act, according to my lord Coke's opinion in his Third Institutes; and the utmost of all that any of them prove against me is, that I did say so and so, which is but bare conspiring. Pray, my lord, let me know upon what law it is that I am indicted and tried, I suppose it is upon 25 Edw. 3.

L. C. J. Yes, you are, and only upon that statute.

Char. My lord Coke, in his Third Institutes: saith, The open act must be manifestly proved. If divers conspire the death of the king, and the manner how, and thereupon provide weapons, powder, poison, send letters, or the like, for the execution of the conspiracy, or preparation be made by some overt-act to depose the king, or take him by force, or by strong hand, or imprison him; these are sufficient overt-acts, to prove the compassing the king's death. But by this it is plain, that bare conspiring is not.

treason, as wanting a sufficient overt-act to declare the intention. Now, my lord, I say, that in all this evidence that hath been given against me, there is not one overt-act proved of my providing arms, or sending letters, or the like. And the same page of the same book, the Third Institutes, chap. High Treason, upon the words 'prove able Attaint,' it must be by overt-act, it must be upon direct and manifest proof, not upon conjectural presumptions or inferences, or strains of wit: so that the strongest presumptions upon the whole earth will never be able to make any overt-act, without plain and manifest proof. And, my lord, I do insist, here is not plain and manifest proof, or any overt-act, but only presumptions in the whole scene of the thing. I must beg the favour of the court as to one particular thing: your lordship, no doubt, knows the law very well. I am here an ignorant man, unable to defend myself by the forms of law; but I hope your lordship and the court will not let me suffer any damage upon that account. You are always presumed to be of counsel for the prisoners; and I look upon it as assured, that you will do that justice to persons in our circumstances, as truly to instruct the jury how they shall behave themselves in relation to this matter that is now upon enquiry before them. Particularly, my lord, I desire they may be told plainly and truly, what is proof of an overt-act, and what is not; and when your lordship sums up the evidence, you will tell the jury directly and plainly, what is legal evidence, and what is not; and then what is sufficient proof of any one overt-act or species of treason; and that you would not leave it to the apprehension of the jury, what they do believe, but inform them really and truly what is legal evidence, and what of that sort hath been given to-day. My lord, here is a strange sort of thing, a conspiracy, which, considered in the general, hath neither head nor tail; how many there were to be is uncertain. In the indictment is said, there were forty men to do this fact upon the king in his coach, and for attacking the guards. Can it be supposed, that any man in his senses would do such an act as this, without respect to have security for himself and his family or those he is concerned for? I know not how great wits these people be in other things, but I am sure they shew no wit in this, I look upon it to be so desperate a thing. The guards are at least treble the number, and better appointed; and that forty should go to assault treble the number; and in divided bodies too, that were only to mix fury and malice with resolution, to be torn in pieces by the mob upon an apparent visible disappointment. And when we had done this, and made this attempt, where were we to go? We had no asylum that we can hear of, nor castle or fort to retire to, nor none that were to back or assist us; and I am sure no man in his wits would undertake a desperate attempt without assurance of a retreat. If I was resolved to kill any man, I would propose to myself some place, to which I might repair for shelter and safety when I had done. If, then, we were in our senses, it cannot be imagined we should ever engage in so apparently destructive a design. We ought rather to have been confined to Bedlam, than any other place, if we could be thought guilty of so much rashness and folly. My lord, I pretend not to make any particular reflections upon these gentlemen that have given evidence here; but only I must take leave to say in general, that there are none of them, but that if they have had any fortunes in the world, their circumstances as to that matter are now much altered; and if any persons will be evidence against others for their lives, in hopes to repair those fortunes, and concerning matters in which they were engaged themselves in, as they do acknowledge; and if it be true, it must be through the desperateness of their fortunes, it is the most barbarous and inhuman sort of evidence that ever was given by any that ever had any sense of honour, and must be a base reflection upon any who pretend themselves to be gentlemen: and I hope the king will think them upon that account very little deserving credit. My lord, I hope your lordship will please to consider that what I have offered is but what my own sudden thoughts could suggest to me out of the confused little remarks I have been able to make upon the evidence; and it is the more confused and immethodical, because I could have no counsel to assist me. I would only put your lordship in mind, once more, of what I earnestly desire and insist upon from your lordship, that you would tell the jury plainly and truly what evidence it is the law requires to convict any person of the crime for which I stand accused; what things are necessary to make up that evidence, what is a legal proof of an overt-act, and what overt-acts have been plainly and manifestly proved against me in this case, and not leave the construction of the evidence to the apprehension or inclination of the jury. This is all the favour that I have to beg of the court, and I hope I need not doubt the justice of the jury.

L. C. J. Have you done, Sir?

Char. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Then what say you, Mr. King?

King. My lord, I must insist upon a great many things that Mr. Charnock hath said. But as to what relates to myself, captain Porter saith, I went with him and Mr. Knightley to view the ground where this design was to be executed. Truly, my lord, I did go abroad with captain Porter and Mr. Knightley; but it was merely to take the air, and no other thing. Truly, my lord, I have not taken any notes of the evidence, nor have I any counsel to assist me, and so I am not very capable of making any defence.

L. C. J. Well, have you any more to say?

King. As to Mr. De la Rue, he doth not pretend to say, I did ever tell him of any thing of a design of destroying the king; and as to the sword he speaks of, he knows I always wore one, and ever had one.

L. C. J. Well, is this all you have to say?

King. And as to Mr. Pendergrass, he saith he saw me at the Rose-tavern in Covent-Garden, where we discoursed something of the matter; but he tells you not what that matter was, nor what the discourse was. And as to Mr. Boyse, he doth not tax me with any design of killing the king: nay, he saith, I did not mention any such thing to him. And as to the matter of an overt-act, what is an overt-act and what not, and what is good proof of it, and what not, I must refer to your lordship and the court.

Char. My lord, I beg your pardon, there is one thing I forgot to offer to your lordship; there is no place laid in the indictment, nor no set number of men ascertained.

L. C. J. At present you are out of time, for that you might have spoke to it before the evidence was given, or you may speak to it after the verdict is brought in, if there be occasion.

Char. My lord, I am ignorant in the forms of law.

L. C. J. If you will observe any thing out of the evidence, you may; now is the time.

Char. My lord, I think the evidence is inconsistent with the indictment: for the indictment doth say positively, that there were horses and arms bought and provided. Now if this be an essential overt-act, as I apprehend it is, according to my lord Coke, to prove the compassing the king's death, then there hath been no evidence to support this indictment; for there is no proof of the buying of any horses or arms.

L. C. J. They tell you there were forty provided.

Char. My lord, I have taken some notes, as well as I could, upon reading of the indictment; and in the first place it is said, that it was agreed there should be forty horsemen armed of us, Robert Charnock, Edward King, and Thomas Keyes; which I take to be nonsense and impossible.

Att. Gen. But there is, 'and others' in the indictment too.

Char. It is 'Quadragint' Homines eques-tres de ipso Roberto Charnock.'

L. C. J. And divers others, to the jurors unknown. May not they make forty? Thirty-seven and you three will make forty.

Char. That 'divers others' is so uncertain, that no one can tell whether it be five or five thousand; and I know not what will make an indictment void, if uncertainty will not.

L. C. J. But your time of exceptions to the validity of the indictment is not now; we are now only upon the trial of the fact.

Char. My lord, I was advised by my counsel, that if I could find a flaw in the indictment, I must mention it, and take the advantage of it before the summing up.

L. C. J. You were not well advised; for after the jury is sworn, we are only to have regard to the fact; and we are now upon the trial of the fact; and the only thing we have under consideration upon the fact and the evidence is, Whether upon this evidence that hath been given, you are guilty or not of the fact that is charged upon you in the indictment?

Char. My lord, I crave your pardon, and I hope you will take no advantage of my ignorance, not being used to these proceedings.

L. C. J. As to what you said at first, that there was no overt-act proved because there is no proof of buying horses or arms; it is true, that is one overt-act laid in the indictment, and there is some evidence given of it; but what that evidence will amount unto will be a farther consideration by and bye.

Char. There was another observation, my lord, that I have made upon the indictment, that it is uncertain upon the word tunc; there is no time assigned, nor no place: pray what time doth this tunc refer to?

Sol. Gen. When the king went out.

L. C. J. But these things are not proper now, I tell you we are upon the fact. Mr. King, have you any more to say? because Mr. Charnock interrupted you.

King. My lord, if there be any objection that Mr. Charnock hath made, would be of any advantage to me, I hope you will let me be heard by my counsel, that I may have the benefit of it.

L. C. J. I tell you, that is not proper now; you may have the benefit of any objection of that nature, if there be any occasion, after the verdict: now we are only considering the evidence upon the issue, Guilty or Not Guilty; and you are now to apply yourselves to that.

King. My lord, I think I have answered all the evidence.

L. C. J. Well then, Mr. Keyes, What have you to say for yourself?

Keyes. My lord, all that I have to say is, I was a servant to captain Porter, and I did nothing but by his order.

L. C. J. Is that all you have to say?

Keyes. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Then I must tell you, No man is such a servant, that the commands of his master can excuse him for committing high-treason.

Keyes. I did but obey his commands.

L. C. J. But I tell you again, No man is so much under the command of his master, as that he ought to obey him, if he command him to commit high-treason. It is proved you bought horses, and he told you upon what design, and you engaged in it.

Keyes. I did not hear any thing of it, my lord. My master was pleased to jest with me several times, and he might say a great many things that I did not much regard.

L. C. J. You were by when your master, as you call him, promised Mr. Pendergrass his musketoon, and Mr. King told Pendergrass, he hoped he would not fear breaking the glass windows.

Keyes. Indeed I do not remember any such thing.

L. C. J. And there are several other particulars sworn against you: but have you any thing more to say?

Keyes. Nothing; but that I did what my master ordered me to do.

L. C. J. Have you all done, then? If you have any more to say, you must speak it now, because you cannot speak after the king's counsel have summed up; they must have the last word. Have you any witnesses to call, or any thing more to say?

Char. No, my lord, we have nothing more to say, but leave it to your lordship entirely.

Solicitor General. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, I am of counsel in this case for the king against the prisoners at the bar, and I think the matter hath been fully proved as Mr. Attorney at first opened it; and there was a design of an invasion on this kingdom from France, and of an insurrection within this kingdom, to abet that invasion, and as an inducement to both, of a barbarous and abominable assassination upon the person of the king, and that the prisoners at the bar had an hand in this conspiracy.

Now, Gentlemen, I must tell you, that for the two first parts of this design, the invasion and the insurrection, we have given you no other evidence now, but some short hints, that such a thing was intended; and we did it purposely for this reason, because the prisoners, though they were concerned too in those other parts of this Plot, yet they are not now indicted for that matter, but only for a direct conspiracy to murder and assassinate the king. We have abundance of witnesses to prove the other parts at several times against a great many as well as them; but we confine ourselves now to this particular, as it stands charged against these persons in the indictment.

Gentlemen, There is an overt-act alledged in the indictment, as it by law is necessary to do, to prove the treason; which is, compassing the death of the king; and it is by law a good overt-act, that they did at such a place, that is to say, the parish of St. Clement's in the county of Middlesex, on the 10th of February last, consult and agree to carry on such a design: now it is not material, as my lords and judges will tell you, in point of law, to prove all the several consultations to be in that parish, nor to have been upon the day alledged in the indictment; for if it be any day before or after the times specified in the indictment, so it be before the indictment preferred, and if it be at any place within the county wherein the indictment is laid, it is sufficient; the thing that is material to be proved is, Whether they did meet upon such a design before the indictment, within this county?

This design, Gentlemen, we in law call high-treason; the highest crime that our law, or the law of any other government, takes notice of: and it very well deserves to go under that name; for it tends to subvert the very foundations of the government, without which no subject is safe, and to bring all into confusion and desolation, by taking away the life of the king, who is the head of this government; which life the law makes sacred above all others, because without that he safe, there can be no safety to any particular person.

Gentlemen, We have proved this bloody conspiracy most fully against all the prisoners at the bar: I will not take up so much of your time, as to repeat every particular of the evidence that hath been given; but only shortly remind you of what hath been materially said against each of them by the witnesses that have been produced.

Against Mr. Charnock, there is first Mr. Porter, who hath sworn, that he and others met, and consulted about this design, agreed upon it, and on the ways and methods for carrying it on; and he names the places where, and the times when those consultations were had: then there is Mr. De la Rue, who saith, he asked Mr. Charnock, how the affair went on? and he answered, He was afraid it would come to nothing. That shews he was willing it should come to something, though perhaps he might be fearful whether it would take place or no. Mr. Pendergrass saith, Mr. Charnock sent a note to Mr. Porter to countermand the orders for the 15th, subscribed by the name of Robinson; but that is only a concurring evidence to that of captain Porter, who said before, he had such a note; but Bertham tells you, that he asked him if he would be one in the design to take off the spark; and that after he heard warrants were out he would have had him joined in the putting it in immediate execution, and assured him there would be safety in so doing.

Against Mr. King there are the same witnesses, Mr. Porter and Mr. De la Rue, who tell you of the discourses at captain Porter's lodgings, where Mr. Pendergrass was likewise, who tells you the times, viz. the 15th and 22d of February last, the days when this wicked design was to have been put in execution, and there they consulted about carrying it on. Mr. Boyse likewise tells you of the discourse he had with King; he would not indeed directly tell him, what the design was, but Mr. Boyse did suspect what it might be; for Mr. King told him sir George Barclay was come, and Mr. Boyse should have a horse, and make one, and it would soon be over.

Then for Keyes, there are three positive witnesses against him; there is his master, as he calls him, captain Porter, who swears, that Keyes knew of it, and consented to it. Mr. Pendergrass saith, Keyes was one that met at captain Porter's the 15th of February, to put the design in execution that day. De la Rue tells you, Keyes was in the chamber at that time, and in other places consulting about it, and so must needs know of it, and consent to it. So that, gentlemen, if you believe these witnesses, as I see no reason offered to the contrary, we have most manifestly proved upon them all three the matters charged in the indictment.

As to what they speak of the witnesses being trappanners, and swearing them out of their lives to save their own ; it is plain the prisoners designed to trapan the king out of his life, and some the prisoners would have trappanned to have joined with them in that design, who honestly and honourably discovered it, and now the prisoners' danger is a safety to the nation.

Gentlemen, They argue against the belief of this conspiracy, from the improbability that any person should be so desperate to engage in so wicked a design. Truly, had this been a matter that had been only talked and discoursed of once, that might have been the better alledged ; but when there have been so many meetings at several times and places, and such methods taken for the putting this conspiracy in execution, and after a disappointment one day, put off to another ; nay, and as it hath been proved it hath been a project that hath been transacting several years, from one year to another, and for all this made as manifestly evident, as proof by testimony can make it ; the objection of improbability will soon vanish into nothing ; and I hope you will think, as I believe all the world doth, or will after this trial, that there hath been such a barbarous, bloody conspiracy, as in the indictment is alledged, and that these persons are guilty of it, and that you will give your verdict accordingly.

Mr. Conyers. My lord, I would only add to what Mr. Solicitor hath said, some few observations that have been omitted of the evidence that hath been given against the prisoners.

The treason charged, is a design of assassinating the king's person ; the overt-acts laid in the indictment are, several meetings and consultations in order to the bringing it to effect, and the providing men and horses to put it in execution.

This charge we have fully proved against the several prisoners at the bar, by two witnesses at the least, and it is manifest that they were all concerned in the several meetings and consultations for the carrying on that design.

As for Mr. Charnock, Mr. Porter's evidence is very full as to his providing arms and horses ; and there is besides, Mr. De la Rue, who though he met him at the tavern, and not being admitted at first, took it ill, yet afterwards at two meetings he did discourse with him about it ; and Bertham gives an account, how he would engage him in it.

As to Mr. King, there is not only captain Porter, who testifies, that he dined with him the 14th of February, where they did discourse of this intended assassination, but De la Rue likewise, that said, there was a meeting appointed for Porter and King, and another, to go and take a view of the ground ; and the prisoner himself owns he did ride out with them, but he would have it only to take the air ; captain Porter tells you, it was to see which was the most convenient place, and that the place pitched upon was the lane between Brentford and Turnham-green.

And for Keyes, there are two positive witnesses, captain Porter and Mr. De la Rue, that he was at the Blue-posts, and at Mr. Porter's lodgings when this matter was consulted of, and particularly that he came and gave an account of the disappointment the second day, upon the guards coming back.

Besides, Mr. Porter gives an account in general, of several that were to provide arms, horses, and men ; and Mr. Bertham proves that Mr. Charnock told him, the design was to take off the spark, and then the time would come that king James would come back quietly. Mr. Boyse swears, King told him on the 14th of February, that he was to go out upon a design the next day, and that he should have a horse provided ; which next day, the 15th, is by all the witnesses agreed to be the first time appointed for the assassination ; and Mr. Bertham adds, that he met with Charnock the 22d, who told him warrants were out, and it was best to go and do the business presently, and desired him to come to his lodgings, and he went to his lodgings and found several persons there.

Char. He does say no such thing, Sir.

Att. Gen. He does say that Mr. Charnock desired him to come to his lodgings.

Mr. Conyers. As I apprehend him, he says, he went thither in the evening on the 22d.

Att. Gen. He says, Mr. Charnock would have had him come, but he did not ; the time that he was at his lodging was before.

Mr. Conyers. My lord, if I mistake, I beg pardon of the court, and of the prisoner too.

L. C. J. As I take it, there is no coming to his lodging at all, but the 9th or 10th of February.

Att. Gen. He says the 9th of February he met with Trevor, who carried him to Charnock's lodgings, and then he would have engaged him in the design of taking off the spark ; the meeting of the 22d was afterwards in Lincoln's-Inn, and there was no going to the lodging that day.

Mr. Cooper. My lord, I am very loth to take up any of your time ; but I would beg the favour to observe two or three passages relating to this matter, which have not been observed yet ; and shall only mention so much as I think has been omitted.

The defence that has been made, has been principally by Mr. Charnock ; and upon his defence, it seems, the rest do depend ; therefore I would beg leave to make some few remarks upon the defence that he hath made. He says, That all the evidence is but hearsay, as to him, and no overt-act of his own proved ; but, my lord, I question not, if the evidence be looked into, it will appear sufficient not only to prove him guilty beyond contradiction of all that is charged upon him in the indictment, but particularly, that he was the principal agent (under sir George Barclay) in carrying on this whole conspiracy.

For captain Porter tells you, That Charnock first acquainted him with sir George Barclay's coming over with the commission; that Charnock brought sir George Barclay to the lodgings, where they both lay; that they had several meetings, at which he was always present, and a main promoter of the design: that he agreed to find a principal quota of the persons that were to be concerned; particularly, that he was to find eight men, and seemed always most zealous for the execution of it.

Then as to Mr. King, it is plain, that Knightley, and captain Porter, and he, went to view the ground; and Mr. De la Rue tells you, what report King made of that view; that with great joy King acquainted him, they had found the rarest place in the world for the execution of their design, a wood hard by the king's house at Richmond; and then he opens the whole manner of the ambuscade, and the design.

Charnock. It is at the liberty of any body to swear what they please; but I hope the jury will consider the nature of the evidence.

Mr. Cowper. Mr. De la Rue tells you further, something more than hearsay, as to Mr. Charnock; that he asked Mr. Charnock about the matter, what was like to come of it? And he answered him, that he feared the success of it; for that a thing of such a nature was not to be trusted to above three. Which could not refer to the intended invasion and the insurrection; for as to that, it is plain from the nature of the thing itself, that it must be communicated to a great many, or else they could not be ready to assist in it: and therefore it is evident, it was the assassination which he was in haste to have executed, saying, it had been delayed too long, and that was as dangerous as communicating it to too many.

My lord, I shall make my words good to you, and rather than take up your time in making repetition of what has been said, I will chuse to break my method, and omit what might be further observed: It is true, it was a mistake of the day as to Bertham's evidence of his going to Charnock's lodging, but that is not material; for it is in proof he did go to his lodgings the 8th or 9th of February, and there Charnock told him that king James was a-coming; but there was a service to be done first, to take off the spark, and then the king would come in quietly; if that design took effect, it would answer his expectation: he was to ride out to take the air, and meet some of his acquaintance, and after all was over, we should be very happy. The words indeed were something dark, but yet the intent and meaning of them are pretty manifest, not only from the words to take off the spark, but because this action, whatever it was, was to precede the invasion of king James with the French forces, and was to be done in order to it, and therefore could not be meant of it, nor of joining with it. My lord, I shall trouble you no further, but submit to your direction.

L. C. J. Holt. Gentlemen of the Jury, these three prisoners at the bar (viz.) Robert Charnock, Edward King, and Thomas Keyes, stand indicted of high-treason, for conspiring, com-passing and imagining the death and destruction of the king, and that in a very bloody and barbarous manner, by way of assassination; and the Indictment charges them, that they did meet and consult with divers other traitors unknown to the jurors, and there did resolve upon this assassination, and horses and arms were prepared and provided for the execution of it.

The question, gentlemen, that you are to try is, Whether these persons who stand now thus accused, are guilty of this crime or not? And you have heard a very long evidence; five witnesses have been produced, and they have given upon this occasion a very large account of the whole transaction, which I will observe to you as briefly as I can.

In the first place, gentlemen, you are told, how there had been a design forming, even for some years, for the restoring of the late king James, and the depriving and deposing of this king; it seems it was a design before the business of Cape la Hogue, which you remember very well was in the year 1692, about the time of the burning a great part of the French fleet by admiral Russel; but this design, though it met with several disappointments, yet did not die, it had its ebbings and its flowings, sometimes it was higher, and at other times lower; and in winter was twelve months it began to be more vigorously prosecuted than at any time before since the La Hogue business, and then there was a resolution framed of attempting the person and life of the king, which appears by captain Porter's and Mr. De la Rue's testimony. And great hopes were conceived amongst them, that it might be effected before the king went over into Flanders; but it seems they wanted a commission from abroad, (which they thought necessary as an authority for them to act under) which not coming in time, the king went over to Flanders, and so for that time the execution of it was deferred.

Gentlemen, after the king's return from Flanders, the prosecution of this design was resumed, and intimation was given, that a commission was brought over by sir George Barclay from king James, which was to make war upon the person of king William, who was called therein, as you may suppose, the prince of Orange: and you are told by captain Porter, that at that time, he and Mr. Charnock lodged together in one house in Norfolk-street, and that Mr. Charnock told him sir George Barclay was come with such a commission from king James, and imparted to him the design of assassinating and murdering the king, and that would be the readiest way to bring home king James: he asked captain Porter, whether he would engage himself in the matter. It seems Mr. Porter did freely and readily engage in it, and was in good earnest; and therefore there were several meetings at several places, in order to consult and contrive how they might bring it to pass.

Gentlemen, you are further informed, that there were several meetings at the Globe tavern in Hatton-garden, another at the Nag's-head, in St. James's-street in Covent-garden, and at the Sun tavern in the Strand, and that two of the prisoners at the bar, Mr. Charnock and Mr. King, with divers others, were at those meetings, and Keyes was at several of them, and there it was agreed and resolved, that the king should be murdered, as the best way to bring in the late king.

This being settled and resolved upon as fit to be done, the next consideration was, in what manner it might be effected; and two ways were proposed, one by way of ambuscade on the other side of the water, near the king's house at Richmond; the other in the lane that leads from Brentford to Turnham-Green, upon the king's return from Richmond, some evening; for it seems it is usual for the king to go to a house he has on the other side of the water, to divert himself once a week upon the Saturday, and to return in the evening.

These two places being proposed, the one on this, the other on the other side of the water, there was a difference in opinion among the conspirators, which of the places would be the best and most proper: and in order to settle that matter, it was resolved upon, that some persons should be sent to view the ground in both places, and make their report to the rest; and the men agreed upon, were captain Porter and Mr. Knightley, to whom Mr. King added himself, and accordingly they did go out of town together to take a view of these places.

[Here the Court was interrupted by Mrs. King, the prisoner's mother, who, in a very outrageous, violent manner, got into the court; but being removed, the Lord Chief Justice proceeded.]

L. C. J. Gentlemen, I was saying that this view was taken by those persons that undertook it; and the night of that day they had viewed the places, upon their return, they made a report to their accomplices, and thereupon it was resolved to relinquish the ambuscade, and that the attack should be made in the lane that leads from Brentford to Turnham-Green.

The time that was fixed upon for this execution was Saturday the 15th of February: there were two men that were appointed to lodge at Kensington, whom they called orderly men, a title that they gave them: these were to give notice at what time the king and the guards went out; the one was to give notice first of the guards going, the other was to give notice when the king went: when notice was brought them that the king was gone abroad, the conspirators were to be ready to go after in small numbers, and were to be quartered and dispersed in the several inns about Brentford and Turnham-Green, to be gathered into the several bodies, upon notice of the king's return; when the king came over, then they were to make the attack in this manner: captain Porter and Mr. Charnock, with one Rookwood, were to attack the guards, and sir George Barclay, and his party, were to come up to the king's coach, and fire into it, and kill the king, and every one that was in it; and of that party Mr. Pendergrass was designed to be one, and he was to have had a musketoon from captain Porter, that would carry seven or eight bullets: these conspirators, and the persons that were to be concerned, were in all forty, or some few more in number.

But, by great Providence, this bloody design was discovered, as was told you, by one of the witnesses, Mr. Pendergrass, a day or two before it should have been put in execution; and so his majesty did forbear going out that Saturday the 15th. But they having notice that the guards were gone, and after that receiving an account that the king did not go, it very much alarmed these conspirators; but notwithstanding this, as you have been told, they were resolved not to lay aside the prosecution of this design, but were rather bent upon executing it the next opportunity that should offer itself; for which purpose divers of the conspirators did meet together, and did consult whether it was fit further to proceed; particularly upon the Friday the 21st day of February, at the Sun-Tavern in the Strand, divers of them met, and there they had discourse of the matter, and were troubled at the disappointment, and were resolved to pursue it, and for that purpose agreed to be in a readiness upon the next day, and as soon as they should have notice that the king was gone from Kensington, they would prosecute it in the same manner in which they had formerly agreed.

It should seem, some of the men that they had engaged were gone off, and others were provided in their stead; but there was another full discovery made before that, by Mr. De la Rue, by which their wicked purpose was a second time disappointed.

Gentlemen, upon the discovery of this design, it was thought very fitting to take all possible care, for preventing such a dismal stroke, and for punishing such heinous offenders; there was a proclamation issued for the apprehension of a great many of them that absconded, which had a very good effect, by the taking of several of them, besides those that were taken up by warrants before; and these three prisoners now at the bar, are indicted for this horrid and traitorous conspiracy, and for pursuing this wicked design, and are now upon their trial for it.

Now, Gentlemen, you have heard the evidence, which you are to consider of in relation to these prisoners, and how far they are affected by it. I must tell you, that captain Porter gives a very full evidence against all three; he tells you how and in what manner they were all engaged, and what parts they had all in the prosecution of this bloody enterprize. As for Mr. Charnock, he seems to have been a remarkable person in almost all the parts of it, a great carrier-on and promoter of it, was to be an actor in it, and provide his number of men: and it seems he was a person much trusted by sir George Barclay; and he spoke to Mr.

Porter of a commission that sir George Barclay brought with him from king James, which was to levy war upon the person of king William, which it seems was understood to authorize them to assassinate the king. Mr. King went to view the ground, and Charnock and he were at the several consultations, and Keyes was at Porter's lodgings, and at divers other consults, when the carrying on of this design of assassinating the king, was debated and resolved upon. Mr. Porter's evidence you have heard at large, and I doubt not you take good notice of it, and the king's counsel have repeated the most material parts of it, therefore I need not do it again. And as to Mr. Charnock, you have heard what evidence is given by De la Rue and Bertham; for though Mr. Charnock says, all that is testified by the other witnesses is only talk and discourse, and that bare words are not high-treason, but there must be some overt-act; therefore you are here to consider particularly what the other witnesses say against him, and whether another overt-act is not proved. De la Rue (who was one of the discoverers, and (as he tells you) he resolved so to be so soon as he could get a perfect knowledge of the whole design) does inform you, that between the 15th and 22d of February, he met Mr. Charnock, and enquired of him how the business went; to which Charnock returned answer, That the design did languish, saying, that people were not so warm as formerly, and did believe the king had notice, for that he had not been abroad on Saturday; that too many were acquainted with it, and therefore thought it might come to nothing: but the main business, which was the landing of king James, would be speedy; and though the discourse may be reckoned only words, yet they do import, at least acknowledge, to the carrying on this design before that time.

But then consider what you are told by Bertham, another of the witnesses, that he being informed by Trevor, that Mr. Charnock would speak with him, he thereupon went to Mr. Charnock's lodgings, where Charnock took him aside into a back room, and told him that king James was a-coming, and there were great hopes of restoring him; but there was something to be done to facilitate it, which he would do well to join in: and when he asked what it was, Charnock told him, he must go abroad and take the air, where he would meet with some of his acquaintance; and there was no way to effect it, but by taking off the spark; and by doing that thing, it would most probably be brought about that king James should be restored. Now, though it was not directly said they were to kill the king, yet it is manifest what was meant by it: for the taking off no one person in England, besides king William, could conduce to the return of the late king. And for his encouragement, he told him further, that if Bertham would undertake the doing of it, it would answer his expectations. And then you are told again by Bertham, that he met Charnock, at Lincoln's-inn-gate, upon that very day that it was last to have been executed, which was the 22d of February, where Charnock told him he suspected a discovery was made, and that there were warrants out against them: and that therefore the best way was, to go immediately and take him off, and then all would be well.

Now I must tell you, gentlemen, that what he says, that bare words are not treason, is very true in some cases; for loose words spoken, without relation to any act or design, are not treason or an overt-act; but arguments, and words of persuasion, to engage in such design or resolution, and directing or proposing the best way for effecting it, are overt-acts of high-treason, as much as if two agree together to kill the king, though the agreement be verbal only, and not reduced to writing: likewise, consulting together for such a purpose, is an overt-act of treason. For it is the imagination, the compassing and designing the death of the king, that is the treason. For the law is very careful of the person of the king, and hath fully provided for his safety; and this treason is the first species mentioned in the statute. But there is no way of discovering those compassings or imaginations, in order to punish a traitor, but by some external act, that may be sufficient to manifest such an intention and purpose; and that which is a sufficient manifestation of such a design, is another overt-act: but there have been proved several meetings, and consultations and proposals at those meetings, about the ways and methods for bringing about the design of assassination. And it was never yet doubted, but to meet and consult how to kill the king, was an overt-act of high-treason. Besides, Mr. Charnock's endeavouring to engage Bertham in this enterprize, and the argument he used to persuade him to it, that it was a means to restore the late king, and telling him it would answer his expectation, is another overt-act. And therefore, how far Mr. Charnock is guilty of the charge in the indictment, you are to determine when you have well considered the nature of the evidence, and what answer Mr. Charnock hath made to it; which shall be opened to you by and bye.

Then, gentlemen, concerning Mr. King, who is the next man, he has these witnesses against him: captain Porter says, that he was very frequently at the meetings and consultations, and that he came to him when he and Knightley were to view the ground, and desired to be one of them, and they went together, and did view the ground; this was some time before the 15th of February, in the same week.

And you may also remember the evidence given by Mr. De la Rue, that Mr. King told him about November or December, that a major-general would come from France, and that money was to be advanced; and that after captain Porter and Mr. King told him, that the major-general was come. On Friday the 7th of February, King said he was to go out of town with Knightley and Durant, to know whether the king went to Richmond or Houn-

slow. Being informed the king had a design to go to Hounslow, and be returned on the Sunday following, Mr. King did say they had found out the rarest place, and the fittest that could be for that purpose, within a quarter of a mile of the king's house at Richmond; and that there was to be an ambuscade, and asked the witness whether he would be one in the ambuscade; but he liked it not, but had rather attack the guards. He had been at the Dog-tavern with Mr. King, and discoursing about this undertaking, Mr. King the prisoner had told this witness, that several of the guards were come from France, and that several conferences were had about taking off the king; and he did not approve of Mr. Charnock, in regard he did not talk like a soldier, and was for an easy post without danger; and as for captain Porter, he had another objection against him, he had as much fat in his brains as he had in his body; and so the one wanted skill and the other wit. But still Mr. King owned his being concerned in the carrying on of this design of assassination: for after the design of the ambuscade was disapproved of, and agreed that the guards should be attacked, and the king in his coach, at Turnham-green; he by discourse with De la Rue, presses his consent to it; besides, he told Pendergrass, who was to be one, and to have Porter's gun to shoot the king, he hoped Pendergrass would not be afraid to break the glass windows.

Mr. Keyes stands upon it, for his part, that he was only a servant to captain Porter, and if he had done any thing amiss, it was no more than what his master bid him do; and that he knew of no design; and that it was a hard thing that he should be troubled in this matter; for if a master send his servant to buy horses or arms, if he does not know how they are to be employed, afterwards it doth appear they are to be employed in assassinating the king, that the servant should be punished for obeying his master. But the question is, whether Keyes knew what the design was? Captain Porter says, he did know when he hired the horses for what purpose they were to be used. And he says further, that he was with them at many of the consults at the Globe Tavern and other places, where he did eat and drink with them, and was privy to the design, and concerned in it.

Then, gentlemen, by the other evidence it is proved, that he was in company several times when the design was discoursed of, and that he was used as a companion to captain Porter, and used to sit and eat and drink with him and the rest of them at the same table; and when they drank to the restoration of the late king, and to the squeezing of the Rotten Orange, Keyes was there, and pledged the health, which shews the intention of the man; and this was upon Saturday the 22nd; and when news was brought that the design was disappointed by the king's not going abroad that day, he went out to get intelligence, and brought in word that the guards were come home, and that all their horses were in a foam, and the king's coaches returned to the Mews; all which is evidence that he knew of the design, and consented to it. So that I must leave it to you upon the whole, though there be a great deal more evidence than I have mentioned; you are the judges how far it amounts to prove them guilty.

But then, gentlemen, as to what they say, that the witnesses do testify by hearsay, that is not evidence; but what they know themselves, or heard from the prisoners; and so Mr. Charnock insists upon it, that what Mr. De la Rue says against him, is mostly what captain Porter told him, and therefore cannot make a proof, by two. It is true, and therefore I did omit repeating a great part of what De la Rue said, because as to him it was for the most part hearsay: But whatsoever evidence has been given of any fact done within the witness's own knowledge, or of any consult or discourse of the prisoners themselves, that you are to take notice of as good evidence, and consider of it.

But then there is another thing that is objected against the evidence, and that is, as to the fairness and credibility of it, because the witnesses, especially Mr. Porter, by their own acknowledgment, are involved in the same crime, and therefore cannot be good witnesses against others.* Now, as to that objection, I must tell you, first, that prisoners under those circumstances are good legal witnesses, but their credits, as in all other cases, are left to your consideration. But, secondly, as to the weight of this objection against their credit, you may consider that traitorous conspiracies are deeds of darkness as well as wickedness, the discovery whereof can properly come only from the conspirators themselves; such evidence has always been allowed as good proof in all ages; and they are the most proper witnesses, for otherwise it is hardly possible, if not altogether impossible, to have a full proof of such secret contrivances; such discoveries are to be encouraged in all governments, without which there can be no safety: And though men have been guilty of such heinous offences, in being partakers or promoters in such designs, yet if they come in and repent, and give testimonies thereof by discovering the truth, great credit ought to be given to them, for such evidence was ever accounted good. Besides, as to two of them, De la Rue and Pendergrass, which were the first that discovered, before they were apprehended, or suspected themselves to be in danger, and therefore do not swear to save their own lives, but resolved upon it to save the life of the king. And Mr. Pendergrass had not any design to be an evidence, who though he discovered it almost as early as he knew it, yet refused to tell the names, upon a principle of honour, till he had the king's word that he should not be pressed to come in as a witness; and he tells you himself the reason why he refused then, and why he comes in now, because captain Porter was his friend, to whom he was obliged, and he never intended at first to discover his name, nor afterwards to be evidence against him; but upon captain Porter's being taken, and discovering himself and his witness, he thought that he was absolved from all that obligation, and therefore resolved to appear as a witness against the rest: And this does not depend only upon the credit of Pendergrass, but also upon the testimony of my lord Portland, and my lord Cutts, who have given you a full account of the manner of it.

And Mr. De la Rue tells you, that it was his design at first, even a year ago, if the conspiracy had so far proceeded as to be ready to be put in execution, he would have endeavoured to have prevented the mischief by acquainting the king with it; and he gives you an account how he revealed it to brigadier Lewson, and to my lord Portland, and after to the king, which is confirmed by my lord Portland; so that these are witnesses beyond all exception, and if such evidence as this be not allowed to be good, the government can never be secure against such villainous enterprizes and wicked machinations.

Gentlemen, this is not trepanning, for it doth not appear by any evidence, nor have I heard the prisoners pretend that these persons did go about to seduce them into the design, but indeed were endeavoured to be seduced into it themselves; and though they kept them company afterwards, yet it was only with a purpose to acquaint themselves with the real intentions of these wicked men, which is lawful and just in order to the making a full discovery of their so dangerous a villainy; and therefore they ought to receive all countenance for doing so great a service to the government, without undergoing the imputation of being trepanners.

Gentlemen, there is no more occurs to me at present that is material to be observed or taken notice of; I leave it to you, you have heard what the witnesses say against the prisoners, you have heard what the prisoners have said for themselves, you are the judges of this fact; if you are not satisfied that here has been sufficient evidence given to prove them guilty, you will acquit them; but if you are satisfied, that upon the evidence and all the circumstances of this case, that they are guilty, I suppose you will discharge your consciences, and give your verdict accordingly.

Then the Jury withdrew to consider of the evidence, and in less than half an hour returned, and found all the three prisoners Guilty of the High Treason for which they were indicted, and the court adjourned till six o'clock that evening.

Post Meridiem eodem Die.

About seven o'clock the Lord Mayor, and the Common Serjeant, with as many of the court as would make a quorum, came upon the bench, and by proclamation in usual form the court was resumed, and the prisoners called to the bar to their judgment.

Cl. of Arraignments. Robert Charnock, hold up thy hand. (Which he did.) You stand convicted of high treason, for conspiring the death of our sovereign lord the king by assassination, what can you say for yourself, why the court should not give judgment upon you to die according to the law?

The Jailor first made him to kneel; and then, when he rose up, he spoke as follows:

Charnock. Sir, I have a great deal to say, if I knew when was the proper time to apply myself to the saying what I have to say.

Com. Serj. You are now called to, to know what you have to say.

Char. Sir, I would put this question, because I am ignorant in forms of law, Whether it be practicable for me to say any thing before judgment or not? for I have no pardon to plead to hinder the judgment; and therefore I would know, if it be practicable to say any thing before judgment?

C. Serj. Yes, Sir, it must be before judgment; because what you are called to, and asked now, is what you have to say in arrest of judgment.

Char. I have many things to say as to observations I made out of the indictment, and upon my trial, if this be my time to offer them.

C. Serj. Yes, Sir, it is your only time.

Char. Then, Sir, I think the fact is ill laid: We are indicted here for high treason, in conspiring the death of the king, and no overt act is proved against me; I speak for myself, I suppose these gentlemen will speak for themselves.

C. Serj. At present you are the only person that is asked the question; therefore pray go on, and say what you have to say in arrest of judgment. You say the indictment is ill laid, wherein is it so?

Char. I do find fault with the indictment, because it is laid for assassinating the king; and all that is proved against me, was, That I was in company where such a thing was discoursed of: Now I am advised, and my own reason tells me, that being in company is no proof of my giving my consent to the thing; and without my consenting, there can be no overt act to make me guilty of the treason. It is said, 'that I and my accomplices,' though there are none named but us three, 'did meet together, and consult of this matter, and that we bought and provided horses and arms:' Which I take to be the only overt act. And of all these things there is not one tittle proved; and therefore, with submission to the court, the indictment is naught in that respect. And this, I think, I may speak, not only for my own sake, but for the sake of these gentlemen that stand by me; if there be nothing proved against us of an overt act, as laid in the indictment, we ought not to be condemned.

Com. Serj. Look you, Mr. Charnock, you move nothing against the indictments, but only run into the proof: That matter is quite at an end, and we cannot enter into debate about it; you have had a fair and a legal trial, and upon that trial the jury has found you guilty.

Char. I have not had a fair and an equal trial, Sir.

Com. Serj. Yes, you have had both a fair and a legal, and an equal trial.

Char. If you please to leave out the word 'legal,' because it perhaps may be according to the strict forms of law: But I say it was not a fair and an equal trial, because in the last act of parliament, which was made for regulating trials in cases of treason, the equity and reasonableness of a prisoner's having that which was denied me, that is a copy of the indictment and counsel, is laid down as the ground and reason of making the act: and without that it never had been made: It is in the preamble of the act, which I have looked upon since I went out of the court; and though as to the time of the commencement, there is a certain day prefixed, yet the equity of the act is always the same, and that equity I take myself to be intitled unto; and therefore being denied the benefit of it, I think I had not an equal and a fair trial.

Com. Serj. Sir, you have very unreasonably objected this matter of this act of parliament at your arraignment, and upon your trial, and now; but your objection is of no moment or validity in the world: For the act is to commence in futuro, and you are tried according to the course of common law before that act can take place; and it is the common law only that this court can proceed by, and you be tried by.

Char. Sir, I insist not upon the law itself, but only upon the equity of it, and the reasonableness of the thing.

Com. Serj. Courts of justice are to go according to rules of law, and that is equal that is according to those rules; I say again, Sir, you have had a fair, a legal, and an equal trial, and have been treated with all the candour and temper that I believe was ever shewn to any persons in your condition.

Char. I had not counsel allowed me to assist me.

Com. Serj. The law allows it you not; if it had, you should have had it.

Char. Then my counsel were ignorant people, to instruct and advise me, that by the equity of this act I ought to have it.

Com. Serj. It was never practicable before, nor can be, till the time that this act takes place.

Char. Sir, I cannot argue with the court in matters of law; but as to the evidence, I say, it did not come up to the indictment.

Com. Serj. If you have any thing to except against the indictment, that is very proper for you to do, and if you will propose it, we will hear you.

Char. Sir, I find fault with the indictment in several particulars; all the facts are laid in the parish of St. Clement Danes, and there is not one fact proved to be done there.

VOL. XII.

Com. Serj. It is not material that the facts should be proved to be done in the particular parish laid in the indictment; it is sufficient, if they be proved to be done in the county.

Char. There is not one fact proved to be done in that parish.

Com. Serj. All that is against the evidence, which we cannot at all take notice of after the verdict.

Char. I insisted upon several things, whereby it was impossible that the evidence could be true, and mentioned several things, wherein the indictment was erroneous, and the evidence not consistent with it, or at least not of such validity as to affect me; all which things if I might have had counsel to argue for me in point of law, (and I look upon it as a very great hardship that it was denied me.) as likewise that my lord chief justice over-ruled what I offered about trapanners, as I take these witnesses to be, out of sir Robert Atkins's book, and what I quoted out of my lord Hale's Pleas of the Crown, and Coke's Institutes.

Com. Serj. Mr. Charnock, if you please to offer any point of law to the court to stop judgment, we are ready to hear it; but you ought not to reflect upon the court.

Char. Where a man is dying, sure he may have leave to take notice of what hardships he has lain under.

Com. Serj. Pray, sir, hear me; no men that ever stood in your place have had more indulgence and favour shewed them, nor I believe, so much neither. Those of us that are here, and were at your trial, do think you do very much amiss, to make any reflections upon the court, after you were so fairly dealt with. If you have any thing that is material to offer in arrest of judgment, pray let us hear it: but we must over-rule all discourses of this nature, it is a vain sort of discourse, and will be of no use or service to you at all.

Char. Truly, I know not what it is possible for me to urge which you will think to be material, if I cannot urge false Latin and inconsistencies. There have been heretofore arrests of judgment, and that must sure have been upon some error or other.

Com. Serj. It is true, but you assign none; you abound in words, but will not offer any thing that is fit for you to offer.

Char. Sir, I assign this particularly as an error, and if it be not, I cannot tell what is: I am upon my last legs, and stand here for my life, and ought to be allowed all legal advantages. One particular thing is this, Whether the scene of the fact being laid to be at the parish of St. Clement Danes, there ought not to be proof that such facts were done there; and if so, whether it be not an error, that there was no proof of any one fact done there? And then the next thing is, we are charged to have bought horses and arms in the indictment, and there was no proof of any horses or arms bought; I am sure as to me there was not.

Com. Serj. I told you before, all this is to no purpose; you enter into the evidence, which is matter of fact, which is all over, and we cannot enter into any consideration of it, therefore pray do not spend our time: but if you have any thing that is an objection to the frame of the indictment, let us hear it.

Char. Then I think that the indictment is uncertain; it says, 'quadraginta homines equestres aut circiter de ipsis Roberto Charnock, Edwardo King, et Thoma Keyes;' this is either not true, or it is nonsense: for if there be 40 horsemen, or thereabouts, of Robert Charnock, Edward King, and Thomas Keyes, that cannot be true, for they cannot make forty: and if you take in the 'alii Proditoribus ignotis,' that will make it uncertain, and that uncertainty will make the indictment void.

Com. Serj. I thought my Lord Chief Justice had satisfied you as to that objection; you repeat but part of the sentence: It is said, 'de ipsis Roberto Charnock, et prædictis aliis Proditoribus ignotis, ac aliis' that is certain enough. I thought we should have heard no more of that frivolous objection, but you had been satisfied with the Judges' answer to it.

Char. I am satisfied in point of fact that they construed it so; but these are the words of the indictment as they were read to me.

Com. Serj. You shall have the words read to you again. Read them.

Cl. of Arraignments. 'Quod quadraginta Homines Equestres aut eo circiter de ipsis Roberto Charnock, Edwardo King, et Thoma Keyes, et prædictis aliis Proditoribus ignotis, ac aliis.'

Com. Serj. You took but part of the sentence, or else you could never have made that objection.

Char. Then, sir, here is 'tunc et ibidem,' what is that.

Com. Serj. You can easily tell that sure; it is then and there.

Char. What, ibidem? What word is that?

Com. Serj. It is the best word that could be used; what word would you have had?

Char. Tunc et ibi, is then and there.

Com. Serj. No, ibidem is a better word, and is always used in our pleadings at law.

Char. Then I have only this in general to say; whether it be possible for a man that is ignorant in forms of law to defend himself without counsel? I must desire counsel to look into the indictment and to assist me.

Com. Serj. That is what we cannot allow by law, unless you offer something that may be such an objection as the court shall think fit to have argued by counsel.

Char. But how shall I that am ignorant in the law, know how to offer you that which you will think fit to hear counsel to?

Com. Serj. You may offer any thing that you think is an exception, and the court will consider of it; for I think it is my duty, and every man's that has the honour to sit here by the king's commission, to lay as much weight upon any objection that the prisoner does offer, as it will bear; but if nothing be offered that is of the least weight or moment, we being to do our duty equally between the king and the prisoner, we cannot allow counsel when there is nothing before us to allow it upon.

Char. You will not, it seems, let me have such assistance, as I may offer you something material.

C. Serj. You know well enough we cannot do it; pray do not spend our time to no purpose.

Char. Nay, Sir, if you be in haste, I will not trouble you any longer.

C. Serj. You have no reason to say we are in haste; I am sure you have had all the indulgence and patience that could be; you are at liberty to offer any thing that you can, but to spend the time of the court in bare words is not reasonable.

Char. The law was never my practice, Sir, nor study: I perceive, whatsoever I offer signifies nothing; therefore I beg your pardon for the trouble I have given you; I shall not attempt to offer any thing further.

C. Serj. You may offer what you will, we will hear you.

Char. Sir, I perceive whatsoever I say is unacceptable, and so I had as good let it alone.

C. Serj. You shall be heard to say whatever you think is for your interest to say.

Char. I thought these things were for my interest to offer; but I see it is to no purpose; therefore I have no more to say; I have done.

C. Serj. You may offer what you will, and you shall be heard with all the patience and candour imaginable.

Char. I see it is impossible for me to offer any thing that the court will think material; therefore it is in vain for me to speak, and trouble myself and the court with what will be of no use to me.

Cl. of Arraignments. Edward King, hold up thy hand (Which he did.) You stand convicted of the same high-treason: what can you say for yourself, why the court should not give judgment upon you to die according to the law? (Then he was made to kneel, and rise up again.)

King. What Mr. Charnock has said, all of it I do imagine to be material; and since he is not to be heard, I have done; I can say no more.

Cl. of Ar. Thomas Keyes, hold up your hand: you are in the same case with the prisoner that went last before you: what can you say for yourself, why the court should not give judgment upon you to die according to the law? (He was made to kneel, and rise again.)

Keyes. Sir, I have had no counsel, nor no assistance since I have been in prison.

C. Serj. That you alledged upon your trial, and you were then told you might have had counsel, if you had thought fit; for you had an order for it, and you come too late to offer any thing of that nature now. But the question that is now asked you is, What have you to say for yourself, why judgment should not pass upon you?

Keyes. I was only a servant.

C. Serj. You have been told, that will not excuse a man in such a case.

Keyes. I cannot help it, Sir, I have done; I hope you will take care of my wife and children when I am gone.

[Then Proclamation was made for silence, whilst Judgment was in giving; which the Common Serjeant, sitting down upon the Bench, pronounced thus:]

Common Serj. Robert Charnock, Edward King, and Thomas Keyes, the prisoners at the bar: you have been severally indicted for high-treason; you have pleaded not guilty, and put yourselves, for your trial, upon the country, which country have found you guilty: you have had the benefit of a fair, lawful, indifferent, and equal trial, according to the laws of this land; those very laws, which you are charged in this indictment to have conspired to subvert. It is a crime of the highest nature that the law knows: you are gentlemen of liberal education, and I hope this will bring you to some reflection, both upon the state of your own case, and the blackness of your offence, in the time you have to live, which I fear is but short: it is certainly the heinouslest crime that any persons can be guilty of; the murdering of a prince in cold blood, and involving your country in slaughter and confusion. I have nothing more to do, but to pronounce the judgment that the law has provided for such offenders, and which the court doth award:

‘That you go from hence to the place from whence you came; and that from thence you be drawn upon a hurdle to the place of execution, where you are severally to be hanged by the neck, and cut down alive; your bowels and privy members to be cut out from your bodies, and to be burnt in your view; your heads to be cut off, your bodies respectively to be divided into four parts; which heads and quarters are to be at the king’s disposal: and God have mercy upon your souls.’

Char. Sir, I desire we may have the favour to have our friends and relations come to us while we are in prison.

C. Serj. You shall have all the liberty of your friends and relations coming to you, that you can reasonably desire.

Char. And I hope we shall have no hard usage in prison.

C. Serj. No, God forbid you should! You may assure yourself you shall have none.

(Then the Sessions of Peace for London, and of gaol-delivery of Newgate for London and Middlesex, were adjourned unto Saturday the 21st of March following.)

Accordingly on Wednesday the 18th of March, 1696, they were all three drawn from Newgate to Tyburn on sledges, where they delivered the following Papers to the sheriff:

Mr. CHARNOCK’S PAPER.

That I might avoid distractions, and be composed as much as is possible at the time of my execution, I thought it much more proper to communicate this to the sheriffs, than to give myself the uneasiness of speaking, leaving it to them to publish (if they should think convenient) for the satisfaction of the world; and in what I have to say, I have taken as much care as I could to be short, that I might not lose time in my greatest concern.

As concerning an invasion intended by king James upon England, there was certain intelligence of it from abroad, I presume every body was satisfied, and to the facilitating of which, I own that myself and some others did agree upon the undertaking to attack the prince of Orange and his guards, for which I am now to suffer; but I think myself obliged, by all the ties imaginable both of conscience and honour, to declare, that as for any order or commission of king James’s for assassinating the prince of Orange, I never saw nor knew of any, but have had frequent assurances of his having rejected such proposals when they have been offered.*

I confess, I did hear that there was a commission arrived for levying of war; and which was natural to believe, if the king was in such a readiness to come over as was reported; but

* “Upon the discovery of the Assassination Plot, parliament voted an Address to his majesty, to desire him to issue his royal proclamation to banish all Papists from the cities of London and Westminster, and ten miles from the same; and that he would give instructions to the Judges going the circuits, to put the laws in execution against Papists and Non-jurors. And, as the greatest test of their loyalty, the Commons drew up this form of Association, to be subscribed by all the members.

“Whereas there has been a horrid and detestable conspiracy formed and carried on by Papists and other wicked and traitorous persons, for assassinating his majesty’s royal person, in order to encourage an invasion from France, to subvert our religion, laws, and liberty: We, whose names are hereunto subscribed, do heartily, sincerely, and solemnly profess, testify, and declare, that his present majesty king William is rightful and lawful king of these realms: and we do mutually promise to engage, to stand by, and assist each other to the utmost of our power, in the support and defence of his majesty’s most sacred person and government, against the late king James and all his adherents, And in case his majesty come to any violent or untimely death (which God forbid!) we do hereby further freely and unanimously oblige ourselves to unite, associate, and stand by each other, in revenging the same upon his enemies and their adherents, and in supporting and defending the succession of the crown, according to an act made in the first year of if there was any such authority as that, I declare I never saw it.

As to what regards the body of the Roman Catholics, I must do them this justice, and which I dare be positive in, that they had no manner of knowledge of this design; nor do I believe it was communicated to any other party of such as are reputed the king's friends, but carried on merely by a small number, without the advice, consent, or privity of any parties whatsoever.

'the reign of king William and queen Mary, intituled, 'An act declaring the rights and liberties of the subject, and settling the succession of the crown.'

"This Association was the three following days signed by all the members who came to the House; and because some others had absented themselves upon pretence of health or business, but in reality to avoid setting their hands to the Association, it was ordered on the 27th of February, 'That such members, who had not already, should in sixteen days sign it, or declare their refusal, notwithstanding their leave to be absent.' On the appointed day, March 16, the names of such members were called over, as were absent upon the last call of the House, and several of them being still absent, the Speaker was ordered to write to those who were in the country, and had not signed the Association, or declared their refusal to do so, to know what they would do, and return their answer by the first opportunity; and at the same time the clerk of the House was ordered to attend such members as were ill in town, with the association, in order to their signing the same, or receiving their answer or refusal. The absent members seeing themselves so pressed, and the nation at this time in so great a ferment against the disaffected, thought it prudent to yield to the times, and either to subscribe the association, or promise to do it upon their first coming up to town, though it were against their principles to own king William to be rightful and lawful king. However, the Association was on the 3rd of April presented to the king by the Commons in a body, with this request, 'That his majesty would order both that, and all other Associations by the Commons of England, to be lodged among the records in the Tower, there to remain as a perpetual memorial of their loyalty and affection to his majesty.' Whereupon the king told them, 'That he took this as a most convincing and acceptable evidence of their affection. And, as they had freely associated themselves for his and their common safety, he did heartily enter into the same Association, and would be always ready with them, and the rest of his good subjects, to venture his life against all, who should endeavour to subvert the religion, laws, and liberties of England.' And he promised them, that this and all other Associations, should be lodged among the records in the Tower. The next day the Commons made a resolution,

I ask forgiveness of all the world for what offences or injuries I have done to them; and I am (I bless Almighty God) in perfect charity with all mankind. ROBERT CHARNOCK.

MR. KING'S PAPER.

I am now within a few moments of eternity, brought to this place by the just hand of God, in punishment of all my crimes, but particularly of that of which I have been lately arraigned, and for which I stand here con-

'That whoever should by word or writing affirm, that an Association entered into by any member of this House, or any other person, was illegal, such person should be deemed a promoter of the designs of the late king James, and an enemy to the laws and liberties of this kingdom.'

"The Lords resolved on an Association as well as the Commons. The motion was much opposed by the earl of Nottingham, as that of the Commons had been by sir Edward Seymour and Mr. Finch. Their objections turned chiefly upon this, that 'rightful and lawful' were words, that had been laid aside in the beginning of this reign; that they imported one, who was king by descent, and so could not belong to the present king. They said, that the crown and the prerogatives of it were vested in him, and therefore they would obey him, and be faithful to him, though they could not acknowledge him their rightful and lawful king. Great exceptions were also taken to the word revenge, as not of an evangelical sound; but that word was so explained, that these were soon cleared. Revenge was to be meant in a legal sense, either in the prosecution of justice at home, or of war abroad. And the same word had been used in that Association, into which the nation entered, when it was apprehended, that queen Elizabeth's life was in danger by the practices of the queen of Scots. At last the Association was carried in the House of Lords, with this difference from that of the Commons, that instead of the words 'rightful and lawful king,' these words were inserted, 'That king William hath the right by law to the crown of these realms; and that neither king James, nor the pretended prince of Wales, nor any other person, hath any right whatsoever to the same.' This was done to satisfy those, who said, they could not come up to the words 'rightful and lawful.' And the earl of Rochester offering these words, they were thought to answer the ends of the Association, and so were agreed to. Ninety-two only of the Commons, and fifteen of the peers, refused to sign voluntarily.

"The Association was carried from the houses of parliament over all England, and was signed by all sorts of people, very few only excepted. The bishops also drew up a form for the clergy, according to that signed by the House of Lords, with some small variation; which was so universally signed, that not above an hundred over all England refused it." Tindal.

demned; but I hope that goodness of God, which has given me a sense of my wickedness, will accept my repentance, and shew mercy on me; which I hope to obtain, through the passion and merits of my Redeemer, upon whom I entirely cast myself.

And that I may find his mercy, I hink myself obliged to do justice to my neighbour, that so none may suffer wrongfully on my account. And, therefore, as I am soon to answer the truth of what I say before the tribunal of God,

First, I declare, that I never saw any order or commission for king James's promoting the assassination, for which I am condemned; neither do I know of any such order or commission.

Secondly, That this design was not undertaken with any general knowledge or approbation of any body of men, either Catholic or Protestant.

Lastly, That I did not engage in it on presumption of any king-killing principles that could justify such an undertaking, but was drawn into it by my own rashness and passion; for which, and all other sins, I heartily beseech God to forgive me.

And I hope, that such who think the misfortune of their imprisonment or trouble is derived from my having been engaged in this enterprize, or such to whom it has any ways given scandal, that they will admit me to their pardon, as I freely and heartily forgive all mankind. In this disposition of a sincere repentance, and true charity, I commend my soul into the hands of God, and hope to find mercy from him. And for this I beg all your prayers.

EDWARD KING.

Mr. KEYES'S PAPER.

I am going to appear before the living God; I trust in his mercy, that he will forgive all my sins committed to this last moment of my life. God is just in all his judgments, and I accept of this death as the punishment of my iniquities. I forgive all my enemies, and hope, through a hearty repentance, and the merits of my Saviour, to obtain mercy.

Have mercy on me, O Father of Mercy, and through thy only Son forgive me all my sins.

THOMAS KEYES.

After which they were executed as traitors, and their quarters exposed about the city.
